Thus much I thought fit to ſay in anſwer to thoſe undeniable Proofs of Curcellæus, which our Unitarians boaſt ſo much of, and whether they be ſo or not, let the Reader examine and judge.

CHAP. VII.

The Athanaſian Creed clear'd from Contradictions.

III. I Now come to the laſt thing I propoſed, viz. to ſhew, That it is no contradiction to aſſert three Perſons in the Trinity and but one God; and for that purpoſe, I ſhall examine the Charge of Contradictions on the Athanaſian Creed. The ſum of the firſt Articles, ſay they, is this, The one true God is three diſtinct Perſons, and three diſtinct Perſons, Father, Son and Holy Ghoſt are the one true God. Which is plainly, as if a Man ſhould ſay, Peter, James and John, being three Perſons are one Man; and one Man is theſe three diſtinct Perſons, Peter, James and John. Is it not now a ridiculous Attempt as well as a barbarous Indignity, to go about thus to make Aſſes of all Mankind, under pretence of teaching them a Creed. This is very freely ſpoken, with reſpect, not merely to our Church, but the Chriſtian World, which owns this Creed to be a juſt and true Explication of the Doctrine of the Trinity. But there are ſome Creatures as remarkable for their untoward kicking, as for their Stupidity. And is not this great skill in theſe Matters, to make ſuch a Parallel between three Perſons in the Godhead and Peter, James and John? Do they think there is no difference between an infinitely perfect Being, and ſuch finite limited Creatures as Individuals among Men are? Do they ſuppoſe the divine Nature capable of ſuch Diviſion and Separation by Individuals, as humane Nature is? No, they may ſay, but ye who hold three Perſons muſt think ſo: For what reaſon? We do aſſert three Perſons, but it is on the account of divine Revelation, and in ſuch a manner, as the divine Nature is capable of it. For it is a good rule of Boethius, Talia ſunt prædicata, qualia ſubjecta permiſerint. We muſt not ſay that there are Perſons in the Trinity, but in ſuch a manner as is agreeable to the divine Nature; and if that be not capable of Diviſion and Separation, then the Perſons muſt be in the ſame undivided Eſſence. The next Article is, Neither confounding the Perſons, nor dividing the Subſtance; But how can we, ſay they, not confound the Perſons that have, as ye ſay, but one numerical Subſtance? And how can we but divide the Subſtance, which we find in three diſtinct divided Perſons? I think the terms numerical Subſtance not very proper in this caſe; and I had rather uſe the Language of the Fathers, than of the Schools; and ſome of the moſt judicious and learned Fathers would not allow the terms of one numerical Subſtance to be applied to the divine Eſſence. For their Notion was, That Number was only proper for compound Beings, but God being a pure and ſimple Being, was one by Nature and not by Number, as St. Baſil ſpeaks (as is before obſerved) becauſe he is not compounded, nor hath any beſides himſelf to be reckon'd with him. But becauſe there are different Hypoſtaſes, therefore they allow'd the uſe of Number about them, and ſo we may ſay the Hypoſtaſes or Perſons are numerically different; but we cannot ſay that the Eſſence is one Numerically. But why muſt they confound the Perſons, if there be but one Eſſence? The relative Properties cannot be confounded; for the Father cannot be the Son, nor the Son the Father; and on theſe the difference of Perſons is founded. For, there can be no difference, as to eſſential Properties, and therefore all the difference, or rather diſtinction muſt be from thoſe that are Relative. A Perſon of it ſelf imports no Relation, but the Perſon of the Father or of the Son muſt; and theſe Relations cannot be confounded with one another. And if the Father cannot be the Son, nor the Son the Father, then they muſt be diſtinct from each other. But how? By dividing the Subſtance? That is impoſſible in a Subſtance that is indiviſible. It may be ſaid, That the Eſſence of created Beings is indiviſible, and yet there are divided Perſons. I grant it, but then a created Eſſence is capable of different accidents and qualities to divide one Perſon from another, which cannot be ſuppoſed in the divine Nature; and withal the ſame power which gives a Being to a created Eſſence, gives it a ſeparate and divided Exiſtence from all others. As when Peter, James, and John received their ſeveral diſtinct Perſonalities from God; at the ſame time he gave them their ſeparate Beings from each other, although the ſame Eſſence be in them all.

Notes on Athanaſius his Creed, p. 11.

But how can we but divide the Subſtance which we ſee in three diſtinct divided Perſons? The queſtion is, Whether the diſtinct Properties of the Perſons do imply a Diviſion of the Subſtance? We deny that the Perſons are divided as to the Subſtance, becauſe that is impoſſible to be divided; but we ſay, they are and muſt be diſtinguiſhed as to thoſe incommunicable Properties which make the Perſons diſtinct. The eſſential Properties are uncapable of being divided, and the Relations cannot be confounded; ſo that there muſt be one undivided Subſtance and yet three diſtinct Perſons.

But every Perſon muſt have his own proper Subſtance; and ſo the Subſtance muſt be divided if there be three Perſons. That every Perſon muſt have a Subſtance to ſupport his Subſiſtence is not denied, but the queſtion is, Whether that Subſtance muſt be divided or not. We ſay, where the Subſtance will bear it as in created Beings a Perſon hath a ſeparate Subſtance, i. e. the ſame Nature diverſified by Accidents, Qualities and a ſeparate Exiſtence, but where theſe things cannot be, there the ſame Eſſence muſt remain undivided, but with ſuch relative Properties as cannot be confounded. But may not the ſame undivided Subſtance be communicated to three divided Perſons; ſo as that each Perſon may have his own proper Subſtance, and yet the divine Eſſence be in it ſelf undivided? This is not the caſe before us. For the queſtion upon the Creed is, Whether the Subſtance can be divided? And here it is allow'd to remain undivided. Yes, in it ſelf, but it may be divided in the Perſons. The Subſtance, we ſay, is uncapable of being divided any way; and to ſay, that a Subſtance wholly undivided in it ſelf, is yet divided into as many proper and peculiar Subſtances, as there are Perſons, doth not at all help our Underſtanding in this matter; but if no more be meant, as is expreſly declared, than That the ſame one divine Nature is wholly and entirely communicated by the eternal Father to the eternal Son, and by Father and Son to the eternal Spirit, without any diviſion or ſeparation; it is the ſame which all Trinitarians aſſert. And it is a great pity, that any new Phraſes or Ways of Expreſſion ſhould cauſe unreaſonable Heats among thoſe who are really of the ſame Mind. For thoſe who oppoſe the Expreſſions of three diſtinct Subſtances as new and dangerous; yet grant, That it is one peculiar Prerogative of the divine Nature and Subſtance, founded in its infinite, and therefore tranſcendent Perfection, whereby it is capable of reſiding in more Perſons than one; and is accordingly communicated from the Father to the Son and Holy Ghoſt; but this is done without any Diviſion or Multiplication. Now if both Parties mean what they ſay, where lies the difference? It is ſufficient for my purpoſe that they are agreed, that there can be no Diviſion as to the divine Eſſence by the diſtinction of Perſons. And ſo this paſſage of the Athanaſian Creed holds good, Neither confounding the Perſons nor dividing the Subſtance.

The next Article, as it is ſet down in the Notes on Athanaſius his Creed, is a contradiction to this. For there it runs, "There is one Subſtance of "the Father, another of the Son another of the Holy Ghoſt. They might well charge it with Contradictions at this rate. But that is a plain miſtake for Perſon; for there is no other variety in the Copies but this, that Bayſius his Greek Copy hath ὑπόστασις, and that of Conſtantinople πρόσωπον, but all the Latin Copies Perſona. But what conſequence do they draw from hence? Then, ſay they, The Son is not the Father, nor the Father the Son, nor the Holy Ghoſt either of them. If they had put in Perſon as they ought to have done, it is what we do own. And what follows? If the Father be not the Son, and yet is the one true God, then the Son is not the one true God, becauſe he is not the Father. The one true God may be taken two ways: 1. The one true God, as having the true divine Nature in him, and ſo the Father is the one true God; but not excluſive of the Son, if he have the ſame divine Nature. 2. The one true God, as having the divine Nature ſo wholly in himſelf, as to make it incommunicable to the Son; ſo we do not ſay, that the Father is the one true God, becauſe this muſt exclude the Son from being God; which the Scripture aſſures us that he is; and therefore though the Son be not the Father, nor the Father the Son, yet the Son may be the one true God as well as the Father, becauſe they both partake of the ſame divine Nature, ſo that there is no contradiction in this, That there is but one true God, and one of the Perſons is not the other. For that ſuppoſes it impoſſible, that there ſhould be three Perſons in the ſame Nature; but if the diſtinction of Nature and Perſons be allow'd, as it muſt be by all that underſtand any thing of theſe matters, then it muſt be granted, that although one Perſon cannot be another, yet they may have the ſame common Eſſence. As for inſtance, let us take their own, Peter, James and John. What pleaſant arguing would this be, Peter is not James nor John, nor James nor John are Peter, but Peter hath the true Eſſence of a Man in him; and the true Eſſence is but one and indiviſible; and therefore James and John cannot be true Men, becauſe Peter hath the one and indiviſible Eſſence of a Man in him? But they will ſay, We cannot ſay that Peter is the One true Man, as we ſay, That the Father is the One true God. Yes, we ſay the ſame in other Words, for he can be ſaid to be the One true God in no other Reſpect, but as he hath the One true divine Eſſence. All the difference lies, that a finite Nature is capable of Diviſion, but an infinite is not.

It follows, "The Godhead of the Father, and of the Son, and of the "Holy Ghoſt is all one, the Glory Equal, the Majeſty Co-eternal.

To this they ſay, That this Article doth impugn and deſtroy it ſelf. How ſo? For, if the Glory and Majeſty be the ſame in Number, then it can be neither Equal, nor Co-eternal. Not Equal for it is the ſame, which Equals never are, nor Co-eternal for that intimates that they are diſtinct. For nothing is Co eternal, nor Cotemporary with it ſelf.

There is no appearance of Difficulty or Contradiction in this, if the Diſtinction of Perſons is allowed; for the three Perſons may be well ſaid to be Co-equal and Co eternal; and if we honour the Son, as we honour the Father, we muſt give equal Glory to him.

But one great Point of Contradiction remains, viz. "So that the Father "is God, the Son is God, and the Holy Ghoſt is God, and yet there are "not three Gods, but one God.

Firſt, they ſay, This is as if a Man ſhould ſay, the Father is a Perſon, the Son a Perſon, and the Holy Ghoſt a Perſon, yet there are not three Perſons, but one Perſon. How is this poſſible, if a Perſon doth ſuppoſe ſome peculiar Property, which muſt diſtinguiſh him from all others? And how can three Perſons be one Perſon, unleſs three incommunicable Properties may become one communicated Property to three Perſons? But they are aware of a Diſtinction in this Caſe, viz. That the term God is uſed Perſonally, when it is ſaid, God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghoſt; but when it is ſaid, There are not three Gods, but one God, the term God is uſed Eſſentially, Notes on Athanaſius's Creed, p. 13.

and therefore comprehends the whole three Perſons, ſo that there is neither a Grammatical, nor Arithmetical Contradiction. And what ſay our Unitarians to this? Truly no leſs, Than that the Remedy is worſe (if poſſible) than the Diſeaſe. Nay then we are in a very ill Caſe. But how I pray doth this appear? 1. Say they, Three perſonal Gods and one eſſential God make four Gods, if the eſſential God be not the ſame with the perſonal Gods; and though he is the ſame, yet ſince they are not the ſame with one another, but diſtinct, it follows that there are three Gods, i.e. three perſonal Gods. 2. It introduces two ſorts of Gods, three Perſonal and one Eſſential. But the Chriſtian Religion knows and owns but One, true and moſt high God of any ſort. So far then we are agreed, That there is but One true and moſt high God; and that becauſe of the perfect Unity of the Divine Eſſence, which can be no more than One, and where there is but One Divine Eſſence, there can be but One true God, unleſs we can ſuppoſe a God without an Eſſence, and that would be a ſtrange ſort of God. He would be a perſonal God indeed in their critical Senſe of a Perſon for a ſhape or appearance. But may not the ſame Eſſence be divided? That I have already ſhewed to be impoſſible. Therefore we cannot make ſo many perſonal Gods, becauſe we aſſert one and the ſame Eſſence in the three Perſons of the Father, Son and Holy Ghoſt. But they are diſtinct, and therefore muſt be diſtinct Gods, ſince every one is diſtinct from the other. They are diſtinct as to perſonal Properties, but not as to eſſential Attributes, which are and muſt be the ſame in all: So that here is but one eſſential God, and three Perſons.

But after all, why do we aſſert three Perſons in the Godhead? Not becauſe we find them in the Athanaſian Creed, but becauſe the Scripture hath revealed that there are Three, Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt, to whom the Divine Nature and Attributes are given. This we verily believe that the Scripture hath revealed; and that there are a great many places, of which we think no tolerable Senſe can be given without it; and therefore we aſſert this Doctrine on the ſame Grounds on which we believe the Scriptures. And if there are three Perſons which have the Divine Nature attributed to them, what muſt we do in this Caſe? Muſt we caſt off the Unity of the Divine Eſſence? No, that is too frequently and plainly aſſerted for us to call it into Queſtion. Muſt we reject thoſe Scriptures which attribute Divinity to the Son and Holy Ghoſt, as well as to the Father? That we cannot do, unleſs we caſt off thoſe Books of Scripture, wherein thoſe things are contained.

But why do we call them Perſons, when that Term is not found in Scripture, and is of a doubtful Senſe? The true Account whereof I take to be this: It is obſerved by Facundus Hermianenſis, that the Chriſtian Church received the Doctrine of the Trinity before the Terms of three Perſons were uſed. But Sabellianiſm was the occaſion of making uſe of the name of Perſons. It's true, That the Sabellians did not diſlike one Senſe of the Word Perſon, (which they knew was not the Church's Senſe) as it was taken for an Appearance or an external Quality; which was conſiſtent enough with their Hypotheſis, who allow'd but One real Perſon with different Manifeſtations. That this was their true Opinion, appears from the beſt account we have of their Doctrine, from the firſt Riſe of Sabellianiſm. The Foundations of it were laid in the earlieſt and moſt dangerous Hereſies in the Chriſtian Church, viz. that which is commonly called by the name of the Gnoſticks, and that of the Cerinthians and Ebionites. For how much ſoever they differ'd from each other in other things; yet they both agreed in this, that there was no ſuch thing as a Trinity, conſiſting of Father, Son and Holy Ghoſt; but that all was but different Appearances and Manifeſtations of God to Mankind. In conſequence whereof, the Gnoſticks denied the very Humanity of Chriſt, and the Cerinthians and Ebionites his Divinity. But both theſe ſorts, were utterly rejected the Communion of the Chriſtian Church; and no ſuch thing as Sabellianiſm was found within it. Afterwards there aroſe ſome Perſons who ſtarted the ſame Opinion within the Church; the firſt we meet with of this ſort are thoſe mention'd by Theodoret, Epigonus, Cleomenes, and Noetus, from whom they were called Noetians. Not long after, Sabellius broached the ſame Doctrine in Pentapolis, and the parts thereabouts, which made Dionyſius of Alexandria appear ſo early and ſo warmly againſt it. But he happening to let fall ſome Expreſſions, as though he aſſerted an Inequality of Hypoſtaſes in the Godhead, Complaint was made of it to Dionyſius then Biſhop of Rome; who thereupon explained that which he took to be the true Senſe of the Chriſtian Church in this matter, which is ſtill preſerved in Athanaſius: Therein he diſowns the Sabellian Doctrine, which confounded the Father, Son and Holy Ghoſt, and made them to be the ſame; and withal, he rejected thoſe who held three diſtinct and ſeparate Hypoſtaſes, as the Platoniſts, and after them, the Marcioniſts did. Dionyſius of Alexandria, when he came to explain himſelf, agreed with the others, and aſſerted the Son to be of the ſame Subſtance with the Father, as Athanaſius hath proved at large; but yet he ſaid, That if a diſtinction of Hypoſtaſes were not kept up, the Doctrine of the Trinity would be loſt, as appears by an Epiſtle of his in St. Baſil. Athanaſius ſaith, That the Hereſy of Sabellius lay in making the Father and Son to be only different Names of the ſame Perſon; ſo that in one reſpect he is the Father, and in another the Son. Gregory Nazianzen in oppoſition to Sabellianiſm, ſaith, We muſt believe one God, and three Hypoſtaſes, and commends Athanaſius for preſerving the true Mean, in aſſerting the Unity of Nature, and the Diſtinction of Properties. St. Baſil ſaith, That the Sabellians made but one Perſon of the Father and Son; that in Name they confeſſed the Son, but in reality they denied him. In another place, That the Sabellians aſſerted but one Hypoſtaſis in the divine Nature, but that God took ſeveral Perſons upon him as occaſion required; ſometimes that of a Father, at other times of a Son; and ſo of the Holy Ghoſt. And to the ſame purpoſe in other places, he ſaith, That there are diſtinct Hypoſtaſes with their peculiar properties; which being joined with the Unity of Nature, make up the true Confeſſion of Faith. There were ſome who would have but one Hypoſtaſis, whom he oppoſes with great vehemency; and the Reaſon he gives, is, That then they muſt make the Perſons to be mere Names, which is Sabellianiſm. And he ſaith, That if our Notions of diſtinct Perſons have no certain Foundation they are mere Names, ſuch as Sabellius called Perſons. But by this Foundation he doth not mean any diſtinct Eſſences, but the incommunicable Properties belonging to them, as Father, Son and Holy Ghoſt.

It is plain from hence, that the neceſſity of aſſerting three Hypoſtaſes, came from thence, that otherwiſe they could not ſo well diſtinguiſh themſelves from the Sabellians, whoſe Doctrine they utterly diſown'd, as well as Arianiſm and Judaiſm; and it appears by the Teſtimonies of Athanaſius, Gregory Nazianzen, and St. Baſil, that they look'd on one as bad as the other, and they commonly join Judaiſm and Sabellianiſm together.

But yet there aroſe Difficulties, whether they were to hold one Hypoſtaſis or three. The former inſiſted on the generally received Senſe of Hypoſtaſis for Subſtance or Eſſence; and therefore they could not hold three Hypoſtaſes without three diſtinct Eſſences, as the Platoniſts and Marcioniſts held. Upon this a Synod was called at Alexandria to adjuſt this matter, where both Parties were deſired to explain themſelves. Thoſe who held three Hypoſtaſes were asked, Whether they maintained three Hypoſtaſes as the Arians did, of different Subſtances and ſeparate Subſiſtences, as Mankind and other Creatures are? Or as other Hereticks, three Principles or three Gods? All which they ſtedfaſtly denied. Then they were asked, Why they uſed theſe terms? They anſwered, Becauſe they believed the Holy Trinity to be more than mere Names; and that the Father, and Son, and Holy Ghoſt had a real Subſiſtence belonging to them; but ſtill they held but one Godhead, one Principle, and the Son of the ſame Subſtance with the Father; and the Holy Ghoſt not to be a Creature, but to bear the ſame proper and inſeparable Eſſence with the Father and the Son. Then the other ſide were asked, When they aſſerted but one Hypoſtaſis, whether they held with Sabellius or not; and that the Son and Holy Ghoſt had no Eſſence or Subſiſtence? Which they utterly denied; but ſaid, that their meaning was, That Hypoſtaſis was the ſame with Subſtance; and by one Hypoſtaſis they intended no more, but that the Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt were of the ſame individual Subſtance; (for the Words are διὰ τὴν ταυτότητα τῆς φύσεως) and ſo they held but one Godhead and one divine Nature, and upon theſe terms they agreed. From whence it follows, that the Notion of three Hypoſtaſes, as it was received in the Chriſtian Church, was to be underſtood ſo as to be conſiſtent with the Individual Unity of the divine Eſſence. And the great rule of the Chriſtian Church was to keep in the middle, between the Doctrines of Sabellius and Arius; and ſo by degrees the Notion of three Hypoſtaſes and one Eſſence was look'd on in the Eaſtern Church, as the moſt proper Diſcrimination of the Orthodox from the Sabellians and Arians.

But the Latin Church was not ſo eaſily brought to the uſe of three Hypoſtaſes, becauſe they knew no other Senſe of it, but for Subſtance or Eſſence; and they all denied that there was any more than one divine Subſtance, and therefore they rather embraced the Word Perſona; and did agree in the name of Perſons as moſt proper to ſignifie their meaning, which was, That there were three which had diſtinct ſubſiſtences, and incommunicable properties, and one and the ſame divine Eſſence. And ſince the Notion of it is ſo well underſtood to ſignifie ſuch a peculiar Senſe, I ſee no reaſon why any ſhould ſcruple the uſe of it. As to its not being uſed in Scripture, Socinus himſelf deſpiſes it, and allows it to be no good reaſon. For when Franciſcus Davides Socin. Vol. I. p. 778. objected, That the terms of Eſſence and Perſon were not in Scripture; Socinus tells him, That they expoſed their cauſe who went upon ſuch grounds; and that if the ſenſe of them were in Scripture, it was no matter whether the terms were or not.

Having thus clear'd the Notion of three Perſons, I return to the Senſe of Scripture about theſe matters; and our Unitarians tell us, that we ought to interpret Scripture otherwiſe. How doth that appear? They give us very little encouragement to follow their Interpretations, which are ſo new, ſo forced, ſo different from the general Senſe of the Chriſtian World, and which, I may ſay, reflect ſo highly on the Honour of Chriſt and his Apoſtles, i. e. by making uſe of ſuch Expreſſions, which if they do not mean what to honeſt and ſincere Minds they appear to do, muſt be intended (according to them) to ſet up Chriſt a mere Man to be a God. And if ſuch a thought as this could enter into the Mind of a thinking Man, it would tempt him to ſuſpect much more as to thoſe Writings, than there is the leaſt colour or reaſon for. Therefore theſe bold inconſiderate Writers ought to reflect on the conſequence of ſuch ſort of Arguments, and if they have any regard to Chriſtianity, not to trifle with Scripture as they do.

Notes on Athanaſ. his Creed, p 13 But ſay they, The queſtion only is, Whether we ought to interpret Scripture when it ſpeaks of God, according to Reaſon or not, that is, like Fools or like wiſe Men? Like wiſe Men no doubt, if they can hit upon it; but they go about it as untowardly as ever Men did. For is this to interpret Scripture like wiſe Men, to take up ſome novel Interpretations againſt the general ſenſe of the Chriſtian Church from the Apoſtles times? Is this to act like wiſe Men, to raiſe Objections againſt the Authority of the Books they cannot anſwer, and to cry out of falſe Copies and Tranſlations without reaſon, and to render all places ſuſpicious which make againſt them? Is this to interpret Scripture like wiſe Men, to make our Saviour affect to be thought a God, when he knew himſelf to be a mere Man, and by their own Confeſſion had not his divine Authority and Power conferr'd upon him? And to make his Apoſtles ſet up the Worſhip of a Creature, when their deſign was to take away the Worſhip of all ſuch, who by Nature are not Gods? Is this like wiſe Men, to tell the World, that theſe were only ſuch Gods whom they had ſet up, and God had not appointed; as though there were no real Idolatry, but in giving divine Worſhip without God's Command.

The Socinian Senſe of Scripture examin'd.

BUT they muſt not think to eſcape ſo eaſily for ſuch a groundleſs and preſumptuous ſaying; that they interpret the Scripture not like Fools, but like wiſe Men, becauſe the true ſenſe of Scripture is really the main point between us, and therefore I ſhall more carefully examine the wiſe ſenſe they give of the chief places which relate to the matter in hand.

1. Is this to interpret Scripture like wiſe Men, to make the Author to the Hebrews in one Chapter, and that but a ſhort one, to bring no leſs than four places out of the Old Teſtament, and according to their Senſe, not one of them proves that which he aimed at, viz. that Chriſt was ſuperiour to Angels, as will appear by the Senſe they give of them. Heb. 1. 5. For unto which of the Angels ſaid he at any time, Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee? Theſe Words, ſay they, in their original and primary ſenſe are ſpoken of David, but in their myſtical ſenſe are a Prophecy concerning Chriſt. Was this myſtical ſenſe primarily intended or not? If not, they are only an accommodation and no proof. But they ſay, even in that myſtical ſenſe, they were intended not of the Lord Chriſt's ſuppos'd Eternal Generation from the Eſſence of the Father, but of his Reſurrection from the dead.

Hiſt. of the Unit. p. 15. Edit. 2.

But if that be not taken as an Evidence of his being the Eternal Son of God, how doth this prove him above Angels?

Heb. 1. 6. And again, when he bringeth his firſt-begotten into the World, he ſaith, And let all the Angels of God worſhip him. This one would think home to the buſineſs; but our wiſe Interpreters tell us plainly, That the Words were uſed by the Pſalmiſt on another occaſion, i. e. they are nothing to the purpoſe. But being told of this, inſtead of mending the matter, they have made it far worſe; for upon ſecond Thoughts (but not wiſer) they ſay, The words are not taken out of the Pſalm, but out of Deut. 32. 43. where the words are not ſpoken of God, but of God's People; and if this be ſaid of God's People, they hope it may be ſaid of Chriſt too, without concluding from thence, that Chriſt is the ſupreme God. But we muſt conclude from hence, that theſe are far from being wiſe Interpreters; for what conſequence is this, the Angels worſhip God's People, therefore Chriſt is ſuperiour to Angels?

Re*flections on* Dr. Bull, p. 39. 46.

2. Is this to interpret Scripture like wiſe Men, to give ſuch a forced Senſe of the beginning of St. John*'s Goſpel,* as was never thought of from the writing of it, till ſome in the laſt Age thought it neceſſary to avoid the proof of Chriſt's Divinity from it. For the Λόγος was never taken, in the Senſe they put upon it, for him that was to preach the Word in St. John's time; but the ſignification of it was then well underſtood from the Alexandrian School (as appears by Philo) whence it was brought by Cerinthus into thoſe parts of Aſia, where St. John lived when he wrote his Goſpel: and one of themſelves confeſſes, that Cerinthus did by the Λόγος mean ſomething divine, which reſted upon, and inhabited the Perſon of Jeſus, and was that power by which God created original Matter and made the World, but as the Chriſt or the Word deſcended on Jeſus at his Baptiſm, ſo it left him at his Crucifixion. That which I obſerve from hence is, that there was a known and current Senſe of the Λόγος at the time of St. John's writing his Goſpel, very different from that of a Preacher of the Word of God; and therefore I cannot but think it the wiſeſt way of interpreting St. John, to underſtand him in a Senſe then commonly known; and ſo he affirms the Λόγος to have been in the beginning, i. e. before the Creation (for he ſaith afterwards, All things were made by him) and that he was with God, and was God; and this Word did not inhabit Jeſus, as Cerinthus held, but was made Fleſh and dwelt among us. And ſo St. John clearly aſſerted the Divinity and Incarnation of the Son of God. And in all the Diſputes afterwards with Paulus Samoſatenus and Photinus, it appears, that they underſtood the Λόγος not for any mere Man, but for ſome Divine Power, which reſted upon the Perſon of Jeſus. So that this was a very late, and I think no very wiſe Interpretation of St. John. And even Sandius confeſſes, That Socinus his Senſe was wholly new and unheard of in the ancient Church; not only among the Fathers, but the Hereticks, as I have before obſerved. For they agreed (except their good Friends the Alogi who went the ſureſt way to work) that by the Word no mere Man was underſtood. Let them produce one if they can, ſaith Sandius (even the learned and judicious Sandius.) Did they all interpret the Scriptures like Fools, and not like wiſe Men? But if the Chriſtian Interpreters were ſuch Fools; what think they of the Deiſts, whom they ſeem to have a better opinion of, as to their Wiſdom? What, if Men without Biaſs of Intereſt, or Education think ours the more proper and agreeable Senſe?

Anſwer to Archbiſh p. 51.

The late Archbiſhop to this purpoſe had mention'd Amelius the Platoniſt, as an indifferent Judge. But what ſay our Wiſe Interpreters to this? Truly they ſay, That the Credit of the Trinitarian Cauſe runs very low, when an uncertain Tale of an obſcure Platoniſt of no reputation for Learning or Wit, is made to be a good part of the Proof which is alledged for theſe Doctrines. If a Man happen to ſtand in their way, he muſt be content with ſuch a Character as they will be pleaſed to give him. If he had deſpiſed St. John's Goſpel, and manner of expreſſion, he had been as Wiſe as the Alogi; but notwithſtanding the extraordinary Character given of Friend Amelius (as they call him) by Euſebius, by Porphyrius, by Proclus, and by Damaſcius, this very Saying of his ſinks his Reputation for ever with them. What would Julian have given for ſuch Wiſe Interpretation of St. John? When he cannot deny, but that he did ſet up the Divinity of Chriſt by theſe Expreſſions; and upbraids the Chriſtians of Alexandria, for giving Worſhip to Jeſus as the Word and God?

With what ſatisfaction would he have received ſuch a Senſe of his Words; when he Complemented Photinus for denying the Divinity of Chriſt; while other Chriſtians aſſerted it?

Facund. l. 4. p. 163.

But they do not by any means deal fairly with the late Archbiſhop as to the Story of Amelius; for they bring it in, as if he had laid the weight of the Cauſe upon it; whereas he only mentions it, as a Confirmation, of a probable Conjecture, That Plato had the Notion of the Word of God from the Jews; becauſe that was a Title which the Jews did commonly give to the Meſſias, as he proves from Philo, and the Chaldee Paraphraſt. To which they give no manner of Anſwer. But they affirm in anſwer to my Sermon, p. 9. That Socinus his Senſe was, That Chriſt was called the Word, becauſe he was the Bringer or Meſſenger of God's Word. But were not the Jews to underſtand it in the Senſe it was known among them? And if the Chaldee Paraphraſt had uſed it in that Senſe, he would never have applied it to a Divine Subſiſtence, as upon Examination it will appear that he doth. Of which Rittangel gives a very good Account, who had been a Jew and was very well skilled in their ancient Learning. He tells us, That he had a Diſcourſe with a learned Unitarian upon this Subject, who was particularly acquainted with the Eaſtern Languages; and he endeavoured to prove, That there was nothing in the Chaldee Paraphraſts uſe of ממרא, becauſe it was promiſcuouſly uſed by him for דבר where it was applied to God. This Rittangel denied; and offer'd to prove, that the Chaldee Paraphraſt did never uſe that Word in a common manner, but as it was appropriated to a Divine Subſiſtence. He produces ſeveral places where ממרא יי is put, and nothing anſwering to Word in the Hebrew, as Gen. 20. 21. The Chaldee hath it, The Word of Jehovah ſhall be my God, Exod. 2. 25. And Jehovah ſaid, He would redeem them by his Word, Exod. 6. 8. Your murmurings are not againſt us, but againſt the Word of Jehovah, Exod. 19. 17. And Moſes brought the People out to meet the Word of Jehovah, Levit. 26. 46. Theſe are the Statutes and Judgments, and Laws, which Jehovah gave between his Word and the Children of Iſrael by the hand of Moſes, Numb. 11. 20. Ye have deſpiſed the Word of Jehovah whoſe Divinity dwelt among you, Num. 23. 21. The Word of Jehovah is with him, and the Divinity of their King is among them, Deut. 1. 30. The Word of Jehovah ſhall fight for you, Deut. 2. 7. Theſe forty years the Word of Jehovah hath been with thee, Deut. 1. 32. Ye did not believe in the Word of Jehovah your God, Deut. 4. 24. Jehovah thy God, his Word is a conſuming fire, Deut. 5. 5. I ſtood between the Word of Jehovah and you, to ſhew you the Word of the Lord, Deut. 32. 6, 8. Jehovah thy God, his Word ſhall go with thee, with many other places, which he brings out of Moſes his Writings; and there are multitudes to the ſame purpoſe in the other Books of Scripture; which ſhews, ſaith he, that this Term the Word of God, was ſo appropriated for many Ages; as appears by all the Chaldee Paraphraſts, and the ancient Doctors of the Jews. And he ſhews by ſeveral places, that the Chaldee Paraphraſt did not once render דבר by ממרא when there was occaſion for it; no, not when the Word of God is ſpoken of with reſpect to a Prophet; as he proves by many Teſtimonies; which are particularly enumerated by him. The reſult of the Conference was, that the Unitarian had ſo much Ingenuity to confeſs, That unleſs thoſe Words had another Senſe, their Cauſe was loſt; and our Faith had a ſure Foundation.

Rittangel in Jezirah p. 95.

But it may be objected that Morinus hath ſince taken a great deal of pains to prove the Chaldee Paraphraſts, not to have been of that Antiquity, which they have been ſuppoſed by the Jews to be of.

Morinus Exerc. Biblic. l. 3. Exerc. 8. c. 6.

In anſwer to this, we may ſay in general, that Morinus his great Proofs are againſt another Chaldee Paraphraſt of very ſmall Reputation, viz. of Jonathan upon the Law; and not that of Onkelos, which Rittangel relied upon in this Matter. And none can deny this to have been very ancient; but the Jews have ſo little knowledge of their own Hiſtory, but what is in Scripture, that very little certainty can be had from them. But we muſt compare the Circumſtances of things, if we would come to any reſolution in this Matter. Now it is certain, that Philo the Alexandrian Jew, who lived ſo very near our Saviours time, had the ſame Notion of the Word of God, which is in the Chaldee Paraphraſt: whoſe Teſtimonies have been produced by ſo many already, that I need not to repeat them.

Euſebius Dem. Evang. l. 4. c. 1.

And Euſebius ſaith, The Jews and Chriſtians had the ſame Opinion as to Chriſt, till the former fell off from it in oppoſition to the Chriſtians; and he particularly inſtances in his Divinity. But if Morinus his Opinion be embraced, as to the lateneſs of theſe Chaldee Paraphraſes, this inconvenience will neceſſarily follow, viz. That the Jews when they had changed ſo much their Opinions, ſhould inſert thoſe Paſſages themſelves which aſſert the Divinity of the Word. And it can hardly enter into any Man's Head that conſiders the Humour of the Jewiſh Nation, to think, that after they knew what St. John had written concerning the Word; and what uſe the Chriſtians made of it to prove the Divinity of Chriſt, they ſhould purpoſely inſert ſuch paſſages in that Paraphraſe of the Law which was in ſuch eſteem among them, that Elias Levita ſaith, They were under Obligation to read two Paraſcha's out of it every Week, together with the Hebrew Text. Now, who can imagine that the Jews would do this upon any other account, than that it was deliver'd down to them, by ſo ancient a Tradition, that they durſt not diſcontinue it. And it is obſerved in the place of Scripture which our Saviour read in the Synagogue, that he follow'd neither the Hebrew nor the Greek, but in probability the Chaldee Paraphraſe; and the Words he uſed upon the Croſs, were in the Chaldee Dialect.

Bichin. Happeraſch. p. 21.

The latter Jews have argued againſt the Trinity, and the Divinity of Chriſt like any Unitarians, as appears by the Collection out of Joſeph Albo, David Kimchi, &c. publiſhed by Genebrard, with his Anſwers to them. And is it any ways likely, that thoſe who were ſo much ſet againſt theſe Doctrines, ſhould themſelves put in ſuch Expreſſions, which juſtifie what the Evangeliſt ſaith about the Word, being in the Beginning, being with God, and being God?

Paris, A. D. 1566.

The Subſtance of what I have ſaid, as to St. John's Notion of the Word, is this; That there is no colour for the Senſe which Socinus hath put upon it; either from the uſe of it among other Authors, or any Interpretation among the Jews. But that there was in his time a current ſenſe of it, which from the Jews of Alexandria, was diſperſed by Cerinthus in thoſe parts where he lived. That for ſuch a Notion there was a very ancient Tradition among the Jews, which appears in the moſt ancient Paraphraſe of the Law, which is read in their Synagogues. And therefore according to all reaſonable ways of interpreting Scripture, the Word cannot be underſtood in St. John, for one whoſe Office it was to preach the Word, but for that Word which was with God before any thing was made, and by whom all things were made.

Joh. 1. 1. 3. 13. 6. 38, 62. 8. 42.

3. Is this to interpret Scripture like wiſe Men, to give a new Senſe of ſeveral Places of Scripture from a matter of Fact of which there is no proof, the better to avoid the proof of the Divinity of the Son of God?

Anſwer to the Archbiſhop's Serm p. 56 Anſwer to my Sermon, p. 10.

This relates to the ſame beginning of St. John's Goſpel, the Word was with God; and ſeveral other places, making mention of his deſcent from Heaven. The ſenſe which theſe wiſe Interpreters put upon them is, that Chriſt was rapt up into Heaven, before he entred upon his Preaching. But where is this ſaid? What Proof, what Evidence, what credible Witneſſes of it, as there were of his Transfiguration, Reſurrection and Aſcenſion? Nothing like any Proof is offer'd for it; but it is a wiſe way they think of avoiding a preſſing difficulty.

But they have a farther reach in it, viz. to ſhew how Chriſt, being a meer Man, ſhould be qualified for ſo great an Undertaking as the founding the Chriſtian Church; and therefore they ſay, That before our Lord entred upon his Office of the Meſſias, he was taken up to Heaven to be inſtructed in the Mind and Will of God (as Moſes was into the Mount, Exod. 24. 1, 2, 12.) and from thence deſcended to execute his Office, and declare the ſaid Will of God. Hiſt. of the Unit. p. 29. In another place, That when it is ſaid, the Word was with God; that is, the Lord Chriſt was taken up into Heaven to be inſtructed in all points relating to his Ambaſſage or Miniſtry. Anſwer to my Sermon, p. 9. In a third, they ſay, That our Saviour before he entred upon his Miniſtry, aſcended into Heaven, as Moſes did into the Mount, to be inſtructed in all things belonging to the Goſpel Doctrine, and Polity which he was to eſtabliſh and adminiſter. Anſw. to the Archbiſhop, p. 56. Now conſidering what ſort of a Perſon they make Chriſt to have been, viz. a meer Man; this was not ill thought of by them; to ſuppoſe him taken up into Heaven and there inſtructed in what he was to teach and do, as Moſes was into the Mount before he gave the Law. But here lies a mighty difference; when Moſes was called up into the Mount, the People had publick notice given of it; and he took Aaron and his Sons, and Seventy Elders of Iſrael with him; who ſaw the Glory of God, v. 10. And all Iſrael beheld the Glory of the Lord as a devouring Fire on the top of the Mount, v. 17. and after the 40 days were over, it is ſaid, That Moſes came down from the Mount, and the Children of Iſrael ſaw him with his Face ſhining, Exod. 34. 40. Now if Chriſt were taken up into Heaven, as Moſes was into the Mount, why was it not made publick at that time? why no Witneſſes? why no Appearance of the Glory to ſatisfie Mankind of the truth of it? And yet we find, that when he was transfigured on the holy Mount, he took Peter, and James, and John with him; which Circumſtance is carefully mention'd by the Evangeliſts. Matt. 17. 1. Mar. 9. 2. Luk. 9. 28. And Peter, who was one of the Witneſſes then preſent, lays great weight upon this being done in the preſence of Witneſſes. For we have not follow'd cunningly deviſed Fables, when we made known unto you the Power and coming of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, but were Eye-witneſſes of his Majeſty. 2 Pet. 1. 16. For he received from God the Father, Honour and Glory, when there came ſuch a Voice to him from the excellent Glory——. 17. And this Voice which came from Heaven we heard, when we were with him in the holy Mount. 18. Now let any one compare this with the account which they give of Chriſt's Aſcenſion into Heaven. The Transfiguration was intended only for a particular Teſtimony of God's Favour, before his Suffering; but even in that he took care there ſhould be very credible Witneſſes of it. And is it then poſſible to believe, there ſhould be ſuch an Aſcenſion of Chriſt into Heaven, for no leſs a purpoſe, than to be inſtructed in his Ambaſſage, and to underſtand the Mind and Will of God, as to his Office; and yet not one of the Evangeliſts give any account of the Circumſtances of it? They are very particular, as to his Birth, Faſting, Baptiſm, Preaching, Miracles, Sufferings, Reſurrection and Aſcenſion; but not one Word among them all as to the Circumſtances of his being taken up into Heaven for ſo great a purpoſe? If it were neceſſary to be believed, why is it not more plainly revealed? Why not the time and place mention'd in Scripture, as well as of his Faſting and Temptation? Who can imagine it conſiſtent with that Sincerity and Faithfulneſs of the Writers of the New Teſtament, to conceal ſo material a Part of Chriſt's Inſtructions and Qualifications; and to wrap it up in ſuch doubtful Expreſſions, that none ever found out this meaning till the days of Socinus? Enjedinus mentions it only as a poſſible Senſe; but he confeſſes, That the New Teſtament ſaith nothing at all of it; but, ſaith he, neither ther doth it mention other things before he entred upon his Office. But this is a very weak Evaſion, for this was of greateſt importance with reſpect to his Office, more than his Baptiſm, Faſting and Temptation; yet theſe are very fully ſet down.

And after all, our Unitarians themſelves ſeem to miſtruſt their own Interpretations; for in their anſwer to my Sermon, they ſay, it is not the Doctrine of all the Unitarians, and refer me to another account given of theſe Texts in the Hiſtory of the Unitarians. There indeed I find Grotius his interpretation (as they call it) prefer'd before that of Socinus. But they ſay, Grotius was Socinian all over, and that his Annotations are a compleat Syſtem of Socinianiſm; and his Notes on the firſt of St. John are written artificially, but the Senſe at the bottom is theirs. In ſhort, That the Word, according to Grotius, is not an eternal Son of God, but the Power and Wiſdom of God; which abiding without meaſure on the Lord Chriſt, is therefore ſpoken of as a Perſon and as one with Chriſt, and he with that. And this Notion of the Word leads a Man through all the difficulties of this Chapter, with far more eaſe than any hitherto offer'd. But theſe wiſe Interpreters have as much miſinterpreted Grotius, as they have done the Scriptures, as I ſhall make it appear.

Anſwer to my Sermon, p. 10. Hiſtory of the Unit. p. 26. p. 11. p. 28.

(1.) Grotius on John 6. 62. interprets Chriſt's Aſcenſion into Heaven, of his corporal Aſcent thither after his Reſurrection, where the Λόγος or Word was before, of whom it is ſaid, That the Word was with God. But how comes Chriſt to aſſume that to himſelf which belong'd to the Word? He anſwers, Why not, ſince we call Body and Soul by the Name of the Man? But if no more were meant by the Word, but a divine Attribute of Wiſdom and Power, what colour could there be for the Son of Man taking that to himſelf, which belonged to an Attribute of God? What ſtrange way of arguing would this have been? What, and if ye ſhall ſee the Son of Man aſcending where he was before? For according to this Senſe, how comes a divine Attribute to be called the Son of Man? How could the Son of Man be ſaid to aſcend thither, where a divine Attribute was before? The Words ὅπου ἦν τὸ πρότερον. muſt relate to him ſpoken of before; and how could the Power and Wiſdom of God be ever ſaid to be the Son of Man? But if we ſuppoſe a perſonal Union of the Word with the humane Nature in Chriſt, then we have a very reaſonable Senſe of the Words; for then no more is imply'd, but that Chriſt, as conſiſting of both Natures, ſhould aſcend thither, where the Word was before; when it is ſaid, that the Word was with God; and ſo Grotius underſtands it.

(2.) Grotius doth not make the Word in the beginning of St. John*'s Goſpel to be a mere Attribute of Wiſdom and* Power, but the Eternal Son of God. This I ſhall prove from his own Words.

1. He aſſerts in his Preface to St. John's Goſpel, that the chief cauſe of his writing was univerſally agreed to have been to prevent the ſpreading of that Venom which had been then diſperſed in the Church; which he underſtands of the Hereſies about Chriſt and the Word. Now among theſe, the Hereſie of Cerinthus was this very Opinion which they faſten upon Grotius; viz. that the Word was the Divine Wiſdom and Power inhabiting in the Perſon of Jeſus, as I have ſhew'd before from themſelves. And beſides, Grotius ſaith, That the other Evangeliſts had only intimated the divine Nature of Chriſt from his miraculous Conception, Miracles, knowing Mens Hearts, perpetual Preſence, promiſe of the Spirit, remiſſion of Sins, &c. But St. John, as the time required, attributed the Name and Power of God to him from the beginning. So that by the Name and Power of God, he means the ſame which he called the divine Nature before.

2. He ſaith, that when it is ſaid, The Word was with God; it ought to be underſtood as Ignatius explains it, with the Father; what can this mean, unleſs leſs he underſtood the Word to be the eternal Son of God? And he quotes Tertullian, ſaying, that he is the Son of God, and God ex unitate Subſtantiæ; and that there was a Prolation of the Word without Separation. Now what Prolation can there be of a meer Attribute? How can that be ſaid to be the Son of God begotten of the Father, without Diviſion, before all Worlds, as he quotes it from Juſtin Martyr? And that he is the Word, and God of God, from Theophilus Antiochenus? And in the next Verſe, when it is ſaid, The ſame was in the beginning with God; it is repeated on purpoſe, ſaith he, That we might conſider, that God is ſo to be underſtood, that a Diſtinction is to be made between God, with whom he was, and the Word who was with God; ſo that the Word doth not comprehend all that is God. But our wiſe Interpreters put a ridiculous Senſe upon it; as though all that Grotius meant was, That God's Attributes are the ſame with himſelf (which although true in it ſelf, is very impertinent to Grotius his purpoſe) and that the Reaſon why he ſaith, That the Word is not all that God is, was, becauſe there were other Attributes of God beſides. But where doth Grotius ſay any thing like this? Is this wiſe Interpreting? or honeſt and fair dealing? For Grotius immediately takes notice from thence of the Difference of Hypoſtaſes; which he ſaith was taken from the Platoniſts, but with a change of the Senſe.

3. When it is ſaid, v. 3. That all things were made by him; Grotius underſtands it of the old Creation, and of the Son of God. For, he quotes a paſſage of Barnabas, where he ſaith, The Son is the work of his hands; and ſeveral paſſages of the Fathers to prove, That the World and all things in it were created by him; and he adds, That nothing but God himſelf is excepted. What ſay our wiſe Interpreters to all this? Nothing at all to the purpoſe; but they cite the Engliſh Geneva Tranſlation (when they pretend to give Grotius his Senſe) and add, That the Word now begins to be ſpoken of as a Perſon by the ſame Figure of Speech, that Solomon ſaith, Wiſdom hath builded her Houſe, &c. Doth Grotius ſay any thing like this? And yet they ſay, Let us hear Grotius interpreting this ſublime Proeme of St. John's Goſpel. But they leave out what he ſaith, and put in what he doth not ſay; is not this interpreting like wiſe Men?

4. The Word was made fleſh, v. 14. i. e. ſay the Unitarians as from Grotius; It did abide on, and inhabit a humane Perſon, the Perſon of Jeſus Chriſt; and ſo was in appearance made Fleſh or Man. But what ſaith Grotius himſelf? The Word that he might bring us to God, ſhew'd himſelf in the Weakneſs of humane Nature; and he quotes the Words of St. Paul for it, 1 Tim. 3. 16. God was manifeſt in the fleſh: and then produces ſeveral Paſſages of the Fathers to the ſame purpoſe. Is not this a rare Specimen of wiſe Interpreting, and fair dealing with ſo conſiderable a Perſon, and ſo well known, as Grotius? Who, after all, in a Letter to his intimate Friend Ger. J. Voſſius, declares, that he owned the Doctrine of the Trinity, both in his Poems and his Catechiſm, after his reviewing them; which Epiſtle is printed before the laſt Edition of his Book about Chriſt's Satisfaction; as an account to the World of his Faith as to the Trinity. And in the laſt Edition of his Poems, but little before his Death, he gives a very different Account of the Son of God from what theſe Unitarians faſten upon him. And now let the World judge, how wiſely they have interpreted both St. John, and his Commentator Grotius?

IV. Is this to interpret Scripture like wiſe Men, to make our Saviour's meaning to be expreſly contrary to his Words? For when he ſaid, Before Abraham was, I am; they make the Senſe to be that really he was not, but only in God's Decree, as any other Man may be ſaid to be. This place the late Archbiſhop (who was very far from being a Socinian, however his Memory hath been very unworthily reproached in that as well as other Reſpects ſince his Death) urged againſt the Socinians, ſaying, That the obvious ſenſe of the Words is, that he had a real Exiſtence before Abraham was actually in Being; and that their Interpretation about the Decree is ſo very flat, that he can hardly abſtain from ſaying it is ridiculous. And the wiſe Anſwer they give is, That the Words cannot be true in any other Senſe, being ſpoken of one who was a Son, and Deſcendant of Abraham. Which is as ridiculous as the Interpretation; for it is to take it for granted, he was no more than a Son of Abraham.

Anſwer to the Arch-biſhop, p. 58.

V. Is this to interpret Scripture like wiſe Men, to ſay, that when our Saviour ſaid in his Conference with the Jews, I am the Son of God, his chief meaning was, That he was the Son of God in ſuch a ſenſe, as all the faithful are called God's Children? Is not this doing great Honour to our Saviour? Eſpecially when they ſay, That he never ſaid of himſelf any higher than this, which is true of every good man, I am the Son of God. And yet the Jews accuſed him of Blaſphemy, for making himſelf the Son of God; and the High Prieſt adjured him to tell, Whether he were the Chriſt, the Son of God?

Joh. 19. 7. Matt. 26. 63.

Did they mean no more, but as any good Man is?

But Mr. Selden ſaith, that by the Son of God the Jews meant the Word of God (as he is called in the Chaldee Paraphraſt) which was all one as to profeſs himſelf God: And our learned Dr Pocock ſaith, That according to the ſenſe of the ancient Jews, the Son of God ſpoken of, Pſal. 2. was the eternal Son of God, of the ſame ſubſtance with the Father.

Selden de Jure Nat. & Gent. l. 2. c. 12. Pocock Not. Miſcel. ad Maim. p. 307, &c.

And by this we may underſtand St. Peter's Confeſſion, Thou art the Chriſt, the Son of the living God; and Nathanael's, Thou art the Son of God. But it is plain, the Jews in the Conference thought he made himſelf God, by ſaying, I and my Father are One. Not one God, ſay our wiſe Interpreters, but as Friends are ſaid to be One. And what muſt they think of our Saviour the mean time, who knew the Jews underſtood him quite otherwiſe, and would not undeceive them?

Matt. 16. 16. S. Joh. 6. 69. 1. 49. 10. 30, 33. Hiſt. of Unitar. p. 29.

But they ſay, The Jews put a malicious Conſtruction upon his Words. How doth that appear? Do they think the Jews had not heard what paſſed before in ſome former Conferences, when they thought he had made himſelf equal with God; and that he ſaid, That all Men ſhould honour the Son even as they honoured the Father?

Joh. 5. 18. 23.

Theſe Sayings no doubt ſtuck with them; and therefore from them they had Reaſon to think that he meant ſomething extraordinary, by his ſaying, I and my Father are One. And if they were ſo wiſe in interpreting Scripture, as they pretend, they would have conſidered, that if theſe things did not imply his being really the Son of God, according to the old Jewiſh Notion, he would have ſeverely checked any ſuch Miſconſtructions of his meaning, and have plainly told them, he was but the Son of Man. But St. Paul's Character of him doth plainly ſhew, that he was far from any thing like Vanity or Oſtentation, Although he was in the form of God, and thought it no robbery to be equal with God; which muſt imply that he was very far from aſſuming any thing to himſelf: which he muſt do in a very high meaſure, if he were not really the Son of God, ſo as to be equal with God. The meaning whereof, ſay our wiſe Interpreters, is, he did not rob God of his Honour by arrogating to himſelf to be God, or equal with God. But what then do they think of theſe Paſſages in his Conferences with the Jews? Was he not bound to undeceive them, when he knew they did ſo groſly miſunderſtand him, if he knew himſelf to be a meer Man at the ſame time? This can never go down with me, for they muſt either charge him with affecting Divine Honour, which is the higheſt degree of Pride and Vanity, or they muſt own him to be, as he was, The Eternal Son of God.

Phil. 2. 6, 7.

Hiſt. of Unitar. p. 38.

VI. Is this interpreting Scripture like wiſe Men, to deny Divine Worſhip to be given to our Saviour, when the Scripture ſo plainly requires it? When I had urged them in my Sermon with the Argument from Divine Worſhip being given to Chriſt; they do utterly deny it, and ſay, I may as well charge them with the blackeſt Crimes. This I was not a little ſurprized at, knowing how warmly Socinus had diſputed for it. But that I might not miſunderſtand them, I look'd into other places in their late Books, and from them I gather theſe things.

Anſwer to Serm. p. 13

1. They make no Queſtion but ſome Worſhip is due to the Lord Chriſt, but the Queſtion is concerning the kind or ſort of Worſhip.

Anſwer to Milb. p. 49.

2. They diſtinguiſh three ſorts of Worſhip. 1. Civil Worſhip from Men to one another. 2. Religious Worſhip given on the account of a Perſon's Holineſs, or Relation to God; which is more or leſs according to their Sanctity or nearer Relation to God. 3. Divine Worſhip which belongs only to God; which conſiſts in a Reſignation of our Underſtandings, Wills, and Affections, and ſome peculiar Acts of Reverence and Love towards him. The two former may be given to Chriſt, they ſay, but not the laſt.

From whence it follows, that they cannot, according to their own Principles, reſign their Underſtandings, Wills, and Affections to Chriſt; becauſe this is proper Divine Worſhip. Are not theſe very good Chriſtians the mean while? How can they believe ſincerely and heartily what he hath revealed, unleſs they reſign their Underſtandings to him? How can they love and eſteem him, and place their Happineſs in him, if they cannot reſign their Wills and Affections to him? I think never any who pretended to be Chriſtians, durſt venture to ſay ſuch things before, and all for fear they ſhould be thought to give Divine Worſhip to Chriſt.

But they confeſs, That they are divided among themſelves about the Invocation of Chriſt. Thoſe who are for it, ſay, That he may be the object of Prayer without making him God, or a Perſon of God, and without aſcribing to him the Properties of the Divine Nature, Omnipreſence, Omniſcience, or Omnipotence. Thoſe who deny it, they ſay, do only refuſe it, becauſe they ſuppoſe he hath forbidden it, which makes it a meer Error. And in the New Teſtament, they ſay, the Charge is frequently renewed, that they are to worſhip God only. And as great Writers as they have been theſe laſt ſeven years, they affirm that, They have wrote no Book in that time, in which they have not been careful to profeſs to all the World, that a like Honour or Worſhip (much leſs the ſame) is not to be given to Chriſt as to God. And now I hope we underſtand their Opinion right as to this matter. The Queſtion is, Whether this be interpreting thoſe Scriptures, which ſpeak of the Honour and Worſhip due to Chriſt, like wiſe Men? And for that I ſhall conſider,

P. 59.

1. That herein they are gone off from the opinion of Socinus and his Followers, as to the ſenſe of Scripture in thoſe places.

2. That they have done it in ſuch a way, as will juſtifie the Pagan and Popiſh Idolatry; and therefore have not interpreted Scripture like wiſe Men.

1. That they are gone off from the opinion of Socinus and his Followers, who did allow divine Worſhip to Chriſt. This appears by the diſputes he had with Franciſcus Davidis and Chriſtianus Francken about it. The former was about the ſenſe of Scripture. Socinus produced all thoſe places which mention the Invocation of Chriſt, and all thoſe wherein St. Paul ſaith, The Grace of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt be with you all; and, The Lord Jeſus Chriſt direct our way, &c. and all thoſe wherein a divine Power and Authority is given to Chriſt as head of the Church, for the ſupport of the Faith and Hope of all thoſe who believe in him in order to Salvation. And this Socinus truly judged to be proper divine Worſhip. Georg. Blandrata was unſatisfied, that Socinus did not ſay enough to prove the neceſſity of the Invocation of Chriſt, which he ſaid he could do from his Prieſthood and his Power, from the Examples of the Apoſtles, and the very Nature of Adoration. And Blandrata was a Man of great Authority among the Unitarians, and he thought Socinus ought to aſſert the Neceſſity of it, or elſe he would do injury both to Chriſt and to his Cauſe.

In the diſpute with Francken, Socinus went upon this ground, that divine Authority was a ſufficient ground for divine Worſhip, although there were not thoſe eſſential Attributes of Omniſciency and Omnipotency. But I obſerve that Socinus did not look on this as a matter of Liberty, as our Unitarians now ſeem to do; for in the Preface to the former Diſpute, he calls the Error of denying the Invocation of Chriſt not, as they now do, a ſimple Error, or a meer Miſtake; but a moſt filthy and pernicious Error, an Error that leads to Judaiſm, and is in effect the denying of Chriſt: And in the latter Diſpute he ſaith, That it tends to Epicuriſm and Atheiſm. And Smalcius ſaith, That they are no Chriſtians who refuſe giving divine Worſhip to Chriſt.

De divin Chriſti, c. 24.

2. Is it like wiſe Men, to go upon ſuch grounds as will juſtifie both Pagan and Popiſh Idolatry? This they have been charged with, and we ſhall ſee what wiſe Men they are, by the Defences they make for themſelves.

1. As to Pagan Idolatry, they ſay,

Defence of the Hiſt. of the Unit. p. 54.

1. They had no divine Command for ſuch a Worſhip. This was well thought of, when they confeſs, that ſome among themſelves deny that there is any Command for invocating Chriſt, and therefore they muſt charge all thoſe who do it with Idolatry. But this is no very wiſe Notion of Idolatry, which depends upon the Nature of the Worſhip, and not the meer poſitive Will of God.

2. They ſet up the Creatures more than the Creator, as St. Paul ſaith. St. Paul doth not think them ſuch Fools, that they took the Creatures to be above the Creator; which was impoſſible, while they owned one to be the Creator, and the other the Creatures; but that they gave ſuch Acts of Worſhip to them, as belong'd only to the Creator, and exceeded in the Worſhip of them thoſe bounds which ought to be between them.

3. They ſet up an infinite number of Gods who had been meer Men. This is, as if the queſtion were only, Whether one or a great many were to have ſuch Worſhip given them? As if it were a Diſpute about a Monarchy or a Common-wealth of Gods. But if it be lawful to give divine Worſhip to one Creature, it is to a hundred.

4. Their Worſhip was terminated on them, and ſo they made true Gods of Men. Suppoſe they aſſerted one ſupreme God, and made the reſt ſubordinate to him, and appointed by him to be the immediate Directors of humane Affairs; I deſire to know, Whether the Adoration of ſuch were Idolatry or not? If it were, they cannot be excuſed who give Adoration to Chriſt, while they eſteem him a mere Creature; if not, all the wiſer Pagans muſt be excuſed.

2. As to the Papiſts, the difference they make is not like wiſe Interpreters of Scripture; for they ſay,

1. They have no Text of Scripture which commands them to worſhip St. Peter, St. Paul and St. Francis. So ſome among them ſay, there is none for the Invocation of Chriſt; and with them the Caſe is parallel. But if Socinus his Principle be true, that communicated Excellency is a ſufficient Foundation for Worſhip, becauſe it is relative to the Giver; then the Papiſts muſt be juſtified in all their relative Acts of Worſhip without any Text to command it.

2. They exceed the Bounds of Honour and Reſpect due to glorified Saints. But who is to ſet theſe Bounds but themſelves in all Acts of relative Worſhip, ſhip, becauſe they depend upon the intention of the Perſons? And they hold the very ſame things concerning communicated Knowledge and Power from God, which our Unitarians make uſe of to juſtifie their Notion of the Invocation of Chriſt.

VII. Is this interpreting Scripture like wiſe Men, to turn St. Paul's words, Of whom as concerning the Fleſh Chriſt came, who is over all, God bleſſed for ever, into a Thankſgiving to God for the Exaltation of Chriſt, i. e. God who is over all be bleſſed for ever. But what reaſon do they give for ſuch a forced and unuſual Senſe, beſides the avoiding the difficulty of having the Name of God given here to Chriſt? A very ſubſtantial one. If the words had been intended of Chriſt, it would have been in the Greek ὃς ὢν and not ὁ ὢν, which they have taken up from Eraſmus and Curcellæus. But Beza, who underſtood Greek as well as either, (and Curcellæus owned him for his Maſter in that Tongue) ſaith, He could not ſufficiently wonder at this Criticiſm of Eraſmus, and thinks it a violent and far fetch'd Interpretation, and not agreeable to the Greek Idiom, and that ὁ ὢν is the ſame there with ὃς ἐστι. And which may ſignify more to our Unitarians, one of the learnedſt Men they have had among them utterly diſowns this Interpretation, and ſaith, That the whole Verſe belongs to Chriſt. But if that will not do, they have another fetch in the caſe, viz. That it is very probable, that the Word God was not originally in the Text. How doth this appear to be very probable? Of that we have this Account: Grotius obſerves that the Greek Copies uſed by the Author of the Syriac, had not the word God; and that Eraſmus had noted, that the Copies of St. Cyprian, St. Hilary, and St. Chryſoſtom, had only bleſſed over all, or above all, without the word God: upon which he charges his Adverſary with no leſs than Impiety in concealing this, and calls it, cheating his Reader. But how if all this prove a groſs miſtake in him; unleſs it be only, that Grotius and Eraſmus come in for their ſhares. It's true, that Grotius ſaith, That the word God was left out in the Syriac Verſion. But F. Simon, whoſe Authority they ſometimes magnifie as to critical Learning, ſaith plainly, That Grotius was miſtaken, and that the word God is in all the old Copies, and in all the old Verſions. And upon his bringing Eraſmus to prove that it was not in St. Cyprian, St. Hilary, and St. Chryſoſtome, he cries out, Where is Sincerity? Eraſmus had met with one faulty Edition which had it not, but he ſaith, all the reſt of the MSS. have it. And the Learned Oxford Annotators, both on St. Cyprian, and the Greek Teſtament compar'd with MSS. (which excellent Work we hope will ſhortly appear more publickly) declare, that they found it in all the MSS. they could meet with; and even Eraſmus himſelf ſaith, That the Omiſſion in St. Hilary might be only by the negligence of the Tranſcribers; and ſo it appears by the late Edition out of the beſt MSS. where the words are, Ex quibus Chriſtus qui eſt ſuper omnia Deus. And for St. Chryſoſtom, all that is ſaid is, That it doth not appear that he read it, but he thinks it might be added afterwards. But what a ſort of proof is this againſt the general conſent of MSS. for St. Chryſoſtom doth not ſay he thought ſo. Eraſmus very plainly ſaith, that it is clearer than the Sun, that Chriſt is called God in other places of Scripture; but Grotius can by no means be excuſed, nor thoſe that rely upon him as to this place.

VIII. Is this interpreting Scripture like wiſe Men, to take advantage of all Omiſſions in Copies, when thoſe which are entire ought to be preferr'd? This I mention for the ſake of another noted place, 1 Tim. 3. 16. God was manifeſt in the Fleſh. Here our wiſe Interpreters triumph unreaſonably; viz. For, they ſay, it appears by the Syriac, Latin, Æthiopick, Armenian, Arabick, and moſt ancient Greek Bibles, that the word God was not originally in this Text, but added to it. But the Arabick in all the Polyglotts hath God in; the Syriac and Æthiopick, if we believe their Verſions, read it in the Hiſt. of the Unit. p. 40.

Maſculine Gender, and therefore in the King of Spain's Bible, Guido Fabricius Boderianus puts in Deus. As to the Armenian, I have nothing to ſay, but what F. Simon tells us from Uſcan an Armenian Biſhop; that there was great variety in their Copies; and that their firſt Tranſlation was out of Syriac and not out of Greek. And the main point is, as to the old Greek Copies; and we are aſſured, that there is but One, viz. the Clermont Copy which leaves out God, but that it is in the Alexandrian, the Vatican and all others; and Curcellæus mentions no more than the Clermont Copy.

Hiſt. Critique du Nov. To. II. c. 17.

It is therefore neceſſary to examine in this place, the Authority of this Clermont Copy, (as it is called) whoſe reading is ſet up againſt all other ancient Greek Copies. Beza affirms it with great Confidence, That all the Greek Copies have God with one Conſent. But how comes he to take no notice of this Difference of the Clermont Copy? For that he had a ſight of that part of it, which hath the Epiſtles of St. Paul, appears by his Notes in which he refers to it. For he mentions it three times in his Notes on Rom. 1. v. 13, 29, 32. and in one he calls it a very ancient Manuſcript written in large Letters. What ſhould make Beza paſs it over here? It ſeems by Morinus that in the Clermont Copy, there was a Correction made by another hand; which is put into the various Lections of the Polyglott in Morinus his Words. But how doth it appear, that Beza's Clermont Copy was the very ſame which Morinus had? Morinus ſaith, he had it from the F. F. Puteani; (and is the ſame I ſuppoſe with that in the King of France's Library; of which they were then the Keepers) But Morinus intimates that it was an old Copy, which fell into their hands; and ſo might come into the French King's Library, when they gave their own Manuſcripts to it. This ſeems to have been the ſame which P. Pithæus ſpeaks of; for the Deſcription exactly agrees with it; but Pithæus, who was a Perſon of great Integrity and Learning, affirms, That this Volume of the Epiſtles in great Letters came out of the Monaſtery of Corbey; and ſo it could not be the Clermont Copy which Beza had. And I ſhall make it appear from the very places mention'd by Morinus, that Beza's Copy did differ from that which Morinus peruſed, as Rom. 4. 9. Morinus his Copy had μόνον; Beza takes notice of it only in the vulgar Latin; which he would never have done, if it had been in the Clermont Copy, Rom. 5. 6. For ἔτι Morinus reads in that Copy εἰς τί, and ſaith it is the true reading; but Beza condemns it, and never intimates that his Copy had it, Rom. 7. 25. Morinus ſaith, the reading of his Copy is the true, χάρις τȣ͂ Θεȣ͂: Beza ſaith, It is againſt all the Greek Copies but one, and that hath χάρις δὲ τῷ Θεῷ; whether Beza were miſtaken as to other Copies is not our buſineſs to enquire; but if the reading had been in his Copy as Morinus found it, he could never have ſaid, that but one Copy had that different reading, Rom. 8. 13. Morinus his Copy had it τῆς σαρκὸς; Beza takes no notice of any difference. Rom. 10. 8. Morinus reads τί λέγει ἡ γραφή. Beza ſaith, It is not in the Greek Copies; and he had then the Clermont by him: but it is both in that of the French King's Library, and of St. Germains; which agree with each other, where Beza's Copy differs; and Beza upon Rom. 7. 6. and 11. 6. obſerves, that his Clermont Copy differs from the reſt; by which we ſee how careful he was to obſerve the various Readings in it; and ſo upon Rom. 15. 24, 33. 16. 27.

Rom. 14. 6. Beza obſerves, That the vulgar Latin leaves out part of the Verſe, but that it is found in all the Greek Copies; here Morinus charges Beza with Negligence, or Diſ-ingenuity; becauſe it was left out in the Clermont Copy; but how doth he prove he had the ſame Copy; He ſaith indeed, That the ancient Copy, which he had, was lent to Beza; but he tells not by whom, nor in whoſe Poſſeſſion it was afterwards. But if Beza were a Man of any ordinary Care or Honeſty, he would never have concealed thoſe things, which Morinus found in it. 1 Cor. 6. 20. Beza ſaith, That thoſe Words ϰ̀ ἐν τῷ πνεύματι ὑμῶν, are in all the Greek Copies; Morinus ſaith, That they were wanting in that which he made uſe of. It's true, they are wanting in the Alexandrian, and ſome others; but in none that Beza had the ſight of, if he may be believed. Theſe are ſufficient to ſhew, that there is no good Proof, that the Copy which Beza had was the ſame which Morinus borrow'd; and therefore his Authority is not to be ſlighted in this matter, when he affirms, that all the Greek Copies agreed in reading God manifeſt in the fleſh; and I cannot imagine Beza ſo intolerably careleſs as he muſt have been, if Morinus his Copy and Beza's were the ſame. But whether it were in Beza's Copy or not, it's certain, they ſay, That it is not in that ancient Manuſcript, which is called the Clermont Copy; which is affirmed by Morinus, and taken for granted by others, therefore we muſt enquire a little farther into the Authority of this ancient Copy. It appears by thoſe who have view'd and conſider'd them, that there are two very ancient Copies of St. Paul's Epiſtles, ſo exactly agreeing, that one is ſuppoſed to be the Tranſcript of the other; one is in the King's Library, the other in the Monaſtery of St. Germains. Which Mabillon ſaith is a thouſand Years old. Theſe two Copies are in effect but one, agreeing ſo much where they differ from others; and having the old Latin Verſion oppoſite to the Greek. Monſieur Arnauld had ſo bad an Opinion of both parts of this Clermont Copy, (as it is called) that he charges it with manifeſt Forgery, and Impoſture; inſerting things into the Text without ground. F. Simon who defends them cannot deny ſeveral things to be inſerted, but he ſaith, it was through Careleſsneſs and not Deſign. But he confeſſes, That thoſe who tranſcribed both thoſe ancient Copies of St. Paul's Epiſtles, did not underſtand Greek, and hardly Latin. And now let us conſider, of what juſt Authority this different Reading of the Clermont Copy ought to be againſt the Conſent of all other ancient Copies. We find ſome good Rules laid down by the Roman Criticks, when they had a Deſign under Urban 8th. to compare the Greek Text of the New Teſtament, with their ancient Manuſcripts in the Vatican, and elſewhere; and to publiſh an exact Edition of it (which Collation was preſerved in the Barberin Library, and from thence publiſhed by Pet. Poſſinus,) and the main Rules as to the various Lections of Manuſcripts were theſe, 1. That the Text was not to be alter'd but by a Concurrence of all, or the greateſt part of the Manuſcripts. 2. That if one Manuſcript agreed with the vulgar Latin, the Text was not to be alter'd, but the Difference to be ſet down at the end of the Chapter. But it is obſervable in that Collation of twenty two Manuſcripts, there is no one Copy produced, wherein there is any Variety as to this place. I know they had not Twenty Two Manuſcripts of St. Paul's Epiſtles, (they mention but Eight ancient Manuſcripts) but they found no difference in thoſe they had. And now I leave any reaſonable Man to judge, whether this Clermont Copy ought to be relied upon in this matter. But I have ſomething more to ſay about the Greek Copies.

Mabil. de Re Deplomat. l. 5. p. 346.

Differt. ſur les MS. du Nov. Teſt. p. 17.

1. That God is in the Complutenſian Polyglott, which was the firſt of the Kind, and carried on by the wonderful Care and Expence of that truly great Man Cardinal Ximenes, who ſpared for no Coſt or Pains in procuring the beſt ancient Copies both Hebrew and Greek; and the fitteſt Men to judge of both Languages. And in purſuit of this noble Deſign, he had the beſt Vatican Manuſcripts ſent to him (as is expreſſed in the Epiſtle before his Greek Teſtament) and what others he could get out of other places, among which he had the Codex Britannicus mention'd by Eraſmus. But after all theſe Copies made uſe of by the Editors there is no intimation of any variety as to this Place; although the vulgar Latin be there as it was.

Alvarez Gomez de rebus Geſtis Fr. Ximenii, l. 2. & 3.

But Eraſmus mentions the great Conſent of the old Copies as to the vulgar Latin, and whence ſhould that come, but from a Variety in the old Greek Copies. To that I anſwer,

2. That the Greek Copies, where they were beſt underſtood had no Variety in them; i. e. among the Greeks themſelves. As appears by Gregory Nyſſen, St. Chryſoſtom, Theodoret, Oecumenius and Theophylact. But doth not Monſieur Amelote ſay, That the Marquiſs of Velez had Sixteen old Manuſcripts, out of which he gathered various Readings, and he reads it ὃ. I cannot but obſerve, how he commends Fabricius and Walton, for rendring the Syriac Verſion according to the vulgar Latin, but that will appear to be falſe, to any one that looks into them; the former is mentioned already; and the latter tranſlates it, Quod manifeſtatus ſit in carne. But as to the Marquiſs of Velez his Copies, there is a Secret in it, which ought to be underſtood, and is diſcover'd by Mariana. He confeſſes, He had ſo many Manuſcripts, eight of them out of the Eſcurial, but that he never ſet down whence he had his Readings.

3. That the Latin Fathers did not concern themſelves about changing their Verſion, becauſe they underſtood it ſtill to relate to the Perſon of Chriſt. IX. Is it not wiſely done of theſe Interpreters, to charge our Church ſo much for retaining a Verſe in St. John's firſt Epiſtle, when they had ſo good Authority to do it? The Verſe is, There are three that bear Record in Heaven, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt, &c. From hence they charge us with corrupted Copies and falſe Tranſlations; as an inſtance of the former, they produce this Text, which they ſay, was not originally in the Bible, but is added to it, and is not found in the moſt ancient Copies of the Greek, nor in the Syriac, Arabic, Ethiopic, or Armenian Bibles, nor in the moſt ancient Latin Bibles. Notwithſtanding all which, I hope to be able to ſhew, that our Church had reaſon to retain it. For which end we are to conſider theſe things;

Selden de Syned. l. 2. c. 4.

1. That Eraſmus firſt began to raiſe any ſcruple about it. For, however it might not be in ſome MSS. which were not look'd into, this Verſe was conſtantly and ſolemnly read as a part of Scripture both in the Greek and Latin Churches, as Mr. Selden confeſſes, and that it was in Wickliff's Bible. So that here was a general conſent of the Eaſtern and Weſtern Churches for the receiving it; and although there might be a variety in the Copies, yet there was none in the publick Service, and no Objections againſt it that we can find. But Eraſmus his Authority ſway'd ſo much here, that in the Bibles in the time of H. 8. and E. 6 it was retained in a different Letter. As in Tyndall's Bible printed by the King's Printer, A. D. 1540. and in the Church Bible of King E. 6. in both which they are read, but not in the ſame Character. Yet Eraſmus his Authority was not great enough to caſt it out, if he had a mind to have done it. Which doth not appear, for he ſaith himſelf, that finding it in the codex Britannicus, as he calls it, he reſtored it in his Tranſlation as well as the Greek Teſtament, out of which he had expunged it before in two Editions, and the Complutenſian Bible coming out with it, added greater Authority to the keeping of it in, and ſo it was preſerved in the Greek Teſtaments of Hervagius, Plantin and R. Stephens and others, after the MSS. had been more diligently ſearched. Morinus ſaith, it was in ſeven of Rob. Stephens his MSS. but F. Simon will not allow that it was in any but the Complutenſian, which is a ſtrange piece of boldneſs in him. For Beza ſaith, He had the uſe of them all from him; and H. Stephens let him have his Father's Copy compared with 25 MSS. and he affirms, That he found it in ſeveral of R. Stephens his old MSS. beſides the Codex Britannicus and the Complutenſian Copy, and therefore he concludes, that it ought to be retained. (And ſo it was, after theſe Copies were come abroad in the Biſhop's Bible, under Queen Elizabeth, without any diſtinction of Character, as likewiſe in our laſt Tranſlation.) And it is obſervable, that Amelote affirms that he found it in the moſt ancient Greek Copy in the Vatican Library; but the Roman Criticks confeſs, it was not in their 8 MSS; yet they thought it fit to be retained from the common Greek Copies, and the Teſtimonies of the Fathers agreeing with the vulgar Latin.

2. This Verſe was in the Copies of the African Churches from St. Cyprian's time, as appears by the Teſtimonies of St. Cyprian, Fulgentius, Facundus, Victor Vitenſis, and Vigilius Tapſenſis, which are produced by others. F. Simon hath a bold conjecture, of which he is not ſparing, that Victor Vitenſis is the firſt who produced it as St. John's ſaying; and that it was St. Cyprian's own aſſertion and not made uſe of by him as a Teſtimony of Scripture. But they who can ſay ſuch things as theſe, are not much to be truſted. For St. Cyprian's Words are, ſpeaking of St. John before, Et iterum de Patre & Filio ſcriptum eſt, & hi tres unum ſunt. And it was not Victor Vitenſis, but the African Biſhops and Eugenius in the head of them, who made that addreſs to Huneric, wherein they ſay, That it is clearer than Light, that Father, Son and Holy Ghoſt are one God, and prove it by the Teſtimony of St. John. Tres ſunt qui Teſtimonium perhibent in cælo, Pater, Verbum & Spiritus Sanctus, & hi Tres unum ſunt.

Critique in nov. Teſt. c. 18.

3. In the former Teſtimony, the Authority of the Vulgar Latin was made uſe of; and why is it rejected here? When Morinus confeſſes there is no variety in the Copies of it. Vulgata verſio hunc verſum conſtanter habet. And he obſerves, that thoſe of the Fathers, who ſeem to omit it (as St. Auguſtin againſt Maximinus) did not follow the old Latin Verſion. Lucas Brugenſis, ſaith only, That in 35 old Copies, they found it wanting but in five. As to St. Jerom's Prologue, I am not concerned to defend it; but Eraſmus thought it had too much of St. Jerom in it, and others think it hath too little. F. Simon confeſſes, that P. Pithæus and Mabillon think it was St. Jerom's, and that it was in the MSS. But I conclude with ſaying, That whoever was the Author, at the time when it was written, the Greek Copies had this Verſe, or elſe he was a notorious Impoſtor.

X. The next thing I ſhall ask theſe wiſe Interpreters of Scripture, is, Whether, when the Scripture ſo often affirms, That the World was made by the Son, and that all things were created by him in Heaven and in Earth, it be reaſonable to underſtand them of Creating nothing? For after all their Shifts and Evaſions it comes to nothing at laſt. But that we may ſee, how much they are confounded with theſe places, we may obſerve.

Joh. 1. 3. Heb. 1. 2, 10. Col. 1. 16.

1. They ſometimes ſay, that where the Creation of all things is ſpoken of, it is not meant of Chriſt but of God. For in the anſwer they give to the place of the Epiſtle to the Colloſſians, they have theſe Words: For by him all things were created, are not ſpoken of Chriſt, but of God: The ſenſe of the whole context is this, The Lord Chriſt is the moſt perfect Image of the inviſible God, the Firſt born from the dead of every Creature; for, O Coloſſians, by him, even by the inviſible God were all things created; they were not from all eternity, nor roſe from the concourſe of Atoms; but all of them, whether things in Heaven, or things in Earth, whether Thrones, or Dominions, or Principalities, or Powers, are Creatures, and were by God created, who is before them all, and by him they all conſiſt. This is a very fair Conceſſion, that of whomſoever theſe Words are ſpoken he muſt be God.

Def. of the Hiſtory of the Unit. p. 3, 14. 2. But in the defence of this very Book, they go about to prove, That the Creation of the World is not meant by theſe Words. Is not this interpreting like wiſe Men indeed? And they tell us, They cannot but wonder, that Men ſhould attribute the old or firſt Creation to Chriſt. Wiſe Men do not uſe to wonder at plain things. For what is the old or firſt Creation, but the making the World, and creating all things in Heaven and Earth? And theſe things are attributed to the Word, to the Son, to Chriſt. But ſay they, The Scripture does never ſay in expreſs words, that Chriſt hath created the Heaven and the Earth. What would theſe wiſe Interpreters have? Doth not by whom all things were created in Heaven and Earth imply, that Heaven and Earth were created by him? But they have a notable obſervation from the Language of the New Teſtament, viz. That Chriſt is never ſaid to have created the Heaven, the Earth, and the Sea, and all that therein is; but we are apt to think, that creating all things takes in the Sea too; and that in the Scripture Language Heaven and Earth are the ſame with the World; and I hope the World takes in the Sea; and the World is ſaid to be made by him: And do not all things take in all? No, ſay they, all things are limited to all Thrones, Principalities and Powers, viſible and inviſible. Then however the making of theſe is attributed to Chriſt. And if he made all Powers viſible and inviſible, he muſt be God. Not ſo neither. What then is the meaning of the words, By him were all things created that are in Heaven and in Earth, viſible and inviſible; whether they be Thrones, or Dominions, or Principalities or Powers, all things were created by him and for him? Surely then theſe P. 10. Dominions and Powers were created by him. No, ſay they, that which we render created, ought to be rendred modelled, diſpoſed, or reformed into a new Order. Were ever wiſe Men driven to ſuch miſerable Shifts? One while theſe words are very ſtrong and good Proof of the Creation of the World againſt Atheiſts and Epicureans, and by and by they prove nothing of all this, but only a new modelling of ſome things called Dominions and Powers. Do they hope ever to convince Men at this rate of wiſe interpreting? Well but what is this creating or diſpoſing things into a new Order? And who are theſe Dominions and Powers? They anſwer, Men and Angels. How are the Angels created by him and for him? Did he die to reform them, as well as Mankind? No, but they are put under him. And ſo they were created by him, that is, they were not created by him, but only made ſubject to him. But who made them ſubject to him? The Man Chriſt Jeſus? No; God appointed him to be the Lord of every Creature. Then they were not created by Chriſt, but by God; but the Apoſtle ſaith, they were created by Chriſt. But God made him Head of the Church, and as Head of the Body he rules over all. This we do not at all queſtion; but how this comes to be creating Dominions and Powers, viſible and inviſible. Did God make the Earth, and all the living Creatures in it, when he made Man Lord over them? Or rather was Man ſaid to create them, becauſe he was made their Head? If this be their interpreting Scripture like wiſe Men, I ſhall be content with a leſs meaſure of Underſtanding, and thank God for it.

XI. Laſtly, is this to interpret Scripture like wiſe Men, to leave the Form of Baptiſm doubtful, whether it were not inſerted into St. Matthew's Goſpel? Or to underſtand it in another Senſe than the Chriſtian Church hath done from Anſwer to Milb. p. 15. the Apoſtles times? I ſay firſt, Leave it doubtful; becauſe they ſay, That Learned Criticks have given very ſtrong Reaſons why they believe thoſe words, In the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghoſt, were not ſpoke by our Saviour, but have been added to the Goſpel of St. Matthew, from the common Form and Practice of the Church. Why are theſe ſtrong Reaſons of Learned Criticks mentioned, but to raiſe Doubts in Peoples Minds about them? But they declare afterwards againſt them. Not too much of that. For they ſay only, That they are not without their weight, but they have obſerved ſeveral things that make them think, that this Text is a genuine part of Scripture. Very wiſely and diſcreetly ſpoken! The Reaſons are ſtrong and weighty, but they think otherwiſe. I wiſh they had told the World, who theſe learned Criticks were, leſt it ſhould be ſuſpected that they were their own Inventions. But I find a certain Nameleſs Socinian was the Author of them; and his Words are produced by Sandius, (a Perſon highly commended by them for his Induſtry and Learning, but as much condemned by others for want of Skill or Ingenuity.) The reaſon of writing theſe Reaſons, Sandius freely confeſſes was, Becauſe this place clearly proved a Trinity of Perſons againſt the Socinians. But what are theſe very ſtrong and weighty Reaſons? For it is great pity but they ſhould be known.

Sand. Interp. Et Paradox. p. 115.

In the firſt place he obſerves, That St. Matthew's Goſpel was written in Hebrew, and the Original he ſaith is loſt; and he ſuſpects that either St. Jerom was himſelf the Tranſlator into Greek and Latin (who was a Corrupter of Scripture, and Origen) or ſome unknown Perſon; from whence it follows, that our Goſpel of St. Matthew is not of ſuch Authority, that an Article of ſuch moment ſhould depend upon it. Is not this a very ſtrong and weighty Reaſon? Muſt not this be a very learned Critick, who could mention St. Jerom as Tranſlator of St. Matthew's Goſpel into Greek? But then one would think this Interpreter might have been wiſe enough to have added this of himſelf. No; he dares not ſay that, But that it was added by Tranſcribers. But whence or how? To that he ſaith, That they ſeem to be taken out of the Goſpel according to the Egyptians. This is great News indeed. But comes it from a good hand? Yes, from Epiphanius. And what ſaith he to this purpoſe? He ſaith, That the Sabellians made uſe of the counterfeit Egyptian Goſpel, and there it was declared that Father, Son and Holy Ghoſt were the ſame. And what then? Doth he ſay they borrowed the Form of Baptiſm from thence? Nothing like it. But on the contrary, Epiphanius urges this very Form in that place againſt the Sabellians; and quotes St. Matthew's Authority for it. But this worthy Author produces other Reaſons, which Sandius himſelf laughs at and deſpiſes, and therefore I paſs them over. The moſt material ſeems to be if it hold, That the moſt ancient Writers on St. Matthew take no notice of them, and he mentions Origen, Hilary, and St. Chryſoſtom; but theſe Negative Arguments Sandius thinks of no force. Origen and St. Chryſoſtom, he ſaith, reach not that Chapter. The Opus imperfectum, which was none of his, doth not; but his own Commentaries do, and there he not only mentions the Form, but takes notice of the Compendious Doctrine delivered by it, which can be nothing elſe but that of the Trinity. In the Greek Catena on St. Matthew there is more mentioned, viz. That Chriſt had not then firſt his Power given him; for he was with God before, and was himſelf by Nature God. And there Gregory Nazianzen ſaith, The Form of Baptiſm was in the Name of the Holy Trinity. And he there ſpeaks more fully: Remember, ſaith he, the Faith into which thou wert baptized. Into the Father? That is well, but that is no farther than the Jews go (for they own one God, and one Perſon.) Into the Son? That is beyond them, but not yet perfect. Into the Holy Ghoſt? Yes, ſaith he, this is perfect Baptiſm. But what is the common Name of theſe three, δηλαδὴ τοῦ Θεοῦ? Plainly that of God. But this learned Critick obſerves, that Hilary in ſome Copies takes no notice of this Form. That is truly obſerved; for the very Concluſion is not Hilary's, but taken out of St. Jerom; but if he had look'd into Hilary's Works, he would have found the Form of Baptiſm owned and aſſerted by him. For he not only ſets it down as the Form of Faith, as well as our Baptiſm appointed by Chriſt; but argues from it againſt the Sabellians and Ebionites as well as others. Thus we ſee how very ſtrong and weighty the Arguments of this learned Critick were.

CHAP. IX.

The General Senſe of the Chriſtian Church proved from the Form of Baptiſm, as it was underſtood in the firſt Ages.

P. 17.

But our Unitarians pretend, That they are ſatisfied, that the Form of Baptiſm is found in all Copies, and all the ancient Tranſlations, and that it was uſed before the Council of Nice, as appears by ſeveral places of Tertullian. But how then? There are two things ſtick with them.

(1.) That the Ante-Nicene Fathers do not alledge it to prove the Divinity of the Son or Holy Ghoſt.

(2.) That the Form of Words here uſed, doth not prove the Doctrine of the Trinity. Both which muſt be ſtrictly examin'd.

1. As to the former. It cannot but ſeem ſtrange to any one converſant in the Writings of thoſe Fathers; when St. Cyprian ſaith expreſly, That the Form of Baptiſm is preſcribed by Chriſt, that it ſhould be in plenâ & adunatâ trinitate; i. e. in the full Confeſſion of the Holy Trinity; and therefore he denied the Baptiſm of the Marcionites, becauſe the Faith of the Trinity was not ſincere among them, as appears at large in that Epiſtle. And this, as far as I can find, was the general Senſe of the Ante-Nicene Fathers, as well as others. And it is no improbable Opinion of Eraſmus and Voſſius, two learned Criticks indeed, That the moſt ancient Creed went no further than the Form of Baptiſm, viz. to Believe in the Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt; and the other Articles were added as Hereſies gave occaſion. St. Jerom ſaith, That in the Traditional Creed, which they received from the Apoſtles, the main Article was, the Confeſſion of the Trinity; to which he joins, the Unity of the Church, and Reſurrection of the Fleſh; and then adds, that herein is contained, Omne Chriſtiani Dogmatis Sacramentum, the whole Faith into which Chriſtians were baptized. And he ſaith, It was the Cuſtom among them to inſtruct thoſe who were to be baptized for forty days in the Doctrine of the Holy Trinity. So that there was then no Queſtion but the Form of Baptiſm had a particular Reſpect to it; and therefore ſo much weight is laid upon the uſe of it, as well by the Ante-Nicene Fathers as others. For Tertullian ſaith, That the Form of Baptiſm was preſcribed by our Saviour himſelf as a Law to his Church. St. Cyprian to the ſame purpoſe, That he commanded it to be uſed. St. Auguſtin calls them, the Words of the Goſpel, without which there is no Baptiſm. The reaſon given by St. Ambroſe is, becauſe the Faith of the Trinity is in this Form. But how if any one Perſon were left out? He thinks, that if the reſt be not denied, the Baptiſm is good; but otherwiſe, vacuum eſt omne Myſterium, the whole Baptiſm is void.

So that the Faith of the Trinity was that which was required in order to true Baptiſm, more than the bare Form of Words. If there were no reaſon to queſtion the former, St. Ambroſe ſeems of Opinion that the Baptiſm was good, although every Perſon were not named; and therein he was followed by Beda, Hugo de Sancto Victore, Peter Lombard, and others. And

St. Baſil in the Greek Church aſſerted, that Baptiſm in the name of the Holy Ghoſt was ſufficient, becauſe he is hereby owned to be of equal Dignity with the Father and Son; but it is ſtill ſuppoſing that the whole and undivided Trinity be not denied. And he elſewhere ſaith, That baptizing in the Name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt is a moſt ſolemn Profeſſion of the Trinity in Unity, becauſe they are all joined together in this publick Act of Devotion. But others thought that the Baptiſm was not good, unleſs every Perſon were named; which Opinion generally obtained both in the Greek and Latin Church. And the late Editors of St. Ambroſe obſerve, that in other places he makes the whole Form of Words neceſſary as well as the Faith in the Holy Trinity. The Baptiſm of the Eunomians was rejected, becauſe they alter'd the Form and the Faith too, ſaying, That the Father was uncreate, the Son created by the Father, and the Holy Ghoſt created by the Son.

Epiph. Hær. 76. ad fin.

The Baptiſm of the Samoſatenians was rejected by the Council of Nice. St. Auguſtine thinks it was becauſe they had not the right Form; but the true Reaſon was, they rejected the Doctrine of the Trinity. And ſo the Council of Arles I. doth in expreſs Words refuſe their Baptiſm who refuſed to own that Doctrine. That Council was held A. D. 314. and therefore Bellarmine and others after him are very much miſtaken, when they interpret this Canon of the Arians, concerning whoſe Baptiſm there could be no Diſpute till many years after. But this Canon is de Afris, among whom the Cuſtom of Baptizing prevailed; but this Council propounds an expedient as moſt agreeable to the general Senſe of the Chriſtian Church, viz. That if any relinquiſhed their Hereſy, and came back to the Church, they ſhould ask them the Creed; and if they found that they were baptized in the Name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt, they ſhould have only impoſition of hands; but if they did not confeſs the Trinity, their Baptiſm was declared void. Now this I look on as an impregnable Teſtimony of the Senſe of the Ante-Nicene Fathers, viz. That they did not allow that Baptiſm which was not in the Name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt; or (which they underſtood to be the ſame) in the Confeſſion of the Faith of the Trinity. How then can our Unitarians pretend, That the Ante-Nicene Fathers did not alledge the Form of Baptiſm to prove the Trinity? For the words are, If they do not anſwer to this Trinity, let them not be baptized, ſaith this plenary Council, as St. Auguſtine often calls it. What Trinity do they mean? Of meere Names or Cyphers, or of one God and two Creatures joined in the ſame Form of words, as our Unitarians underſtand it? But they affirm, That the Ancients of 400 Years do not inſiſt on this Text of St. Matthew to prove the Divinity or Perſonality of the Son or Spirit.

Anſwer to Milb. p. 18.

Therefore to give a clear account of this matter, I ſhall prove, that the Ante-Nicene Fathers did underſtand theſe words, ſo as not to be taken, either for meer Names, or for Creatures joined with God; but that they did maintain the Divinity of the Son and Holy Ghoſt, from the general Senſe, in which theſe words were taken among them.

And this I ſhall do from theſe Arguments;

1. That thoſe who took them in another Senſe, were oppoſed and condemned by the Chriſtian Church.

2. That the Chriſtian Church did own this Senſe in publick Acts of divine Worſhip as well as private.

3. That it was owned and defended by thoſe who appeared for the Chriſtian Faith againſt Infidels. And I do not know any better means than theſe to prove ſuch a matter of Fact as this.

1. The Senſe of the Chriſtian Church may be known by its behaviour towards thoſe, who took theſe words only for different Names or Appearances of One Perſon.

And of this we have full Evidence, as to Praxeas, Noetus and Sabellius, all long before the Council of Nice.

Praxeas was the firſt, at leaſt in the Weſtern Church, who made Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt, to be only ſeveral Names of the ſame Perſon, and he was with great Warmth and Vigour oppoſed by Tertullian, who charges him with introducing a new Opinion into the Church, as will preſently appear. And his Teſtimony is the more conſiderable, becauſe our Unitarians confeſs, that he p. 17. lived 120 Years before the Nicene Council, and that he particularly inſiſts upon the Form of Baptiſm againſt Praxeas. But to what purpoſe? Was not his Adverſ. Prax. c. 26. whole deſign in that Book to prove three diſtinct Perſons of Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt, and yet but One God? Doth he not ſay expreſly, That Chriſt commanded that his Diſciples ſhould baptize into the Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt, not into One of them; ad ſingula nomina in Perſonas ſingulas tingimur. In Baptiſm we are dipped once at every Name, to ſhew that we are baptized into three Perſons. It is certain then, that Tertullian could not miſtake the Senſe of the Church ſo groſly, as to take three Perſons to be only three ſeveral Names.

c. 2. He grants to Praxeas, that Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt are one, but how? Per unitatem ſubſtantiæ, becauſe there is but one divine Eſſence: but yet he ſaith, there are three, not with reſpect to eſſential Attributes, for ſo they are unius Subſtantiæ, & unius Status, & unius Poteſtatis, quia unus Deus. And therefore the difference can be only as to perſonal Properties and diſtinct Capacities, which he calls Gradus, Forma, Species, not merely as to internal Relations, but as to external Diſpenſations, which he calls their Oeconomy. For his great buſineſs is to prove againſt Praxeas, that the Son and Holy Ghoſt had thoſe things attributed to them in Scripture, which could not be attributed to Tertul. de præſcr. hæret. c. ult. the Father. For Praxeas aſſerted, That the Father ſuffer'd; and thence his Followers were called Patripaſſians and Monarchici, i. e. Unitarians. The main ground which Praxeas went upon, was the Unity of the Godhead, ſo often men- Con. Prax. c. 3. tion'd in Scripture, from hence Tertullian ſaith, That he took advantage of the weakneſs of the common ſort of Chriſtians, and repreſented to them, that whereas the Doctrine of Chriſt made but one God, thoſe who held the Trinity according to the Form of Baptiſm, muſt make more Gods than one. Tertullian anſwers, that they held a Monarchy, i. e. unicum imperium, one ſupreme Godhead, and a ſupreme Power may be lodged in diſtinct Perſons and adminiſtred in ſeveral manners; that nothing overthrew the divine Monarchy, but a different Power c. 4. and Authority, which they did by no means aſſert. They held a Son, but of the Subſtance of the Father, and a Holy Ghoſt from the Father by the Son: he ſtill keeps to the diſtinction of Perſons, and the Unity of Subſtance. And he utterly denies any Diviſion of Eſſences or ſeparate Subſtances: for therein, he ſaith, lay the Hereſie of Valentinus, in making a Prolation of a ſeparate Being. But although he ſaith, the Goſpel hath declared to us, that the Father is God, the Son God, and the Holy Ghoſt God, yet we are taught that there is ſtill but One God: redactum eſt jam nomen Dei & Domini in unione, c. 13. whereby the Chriſtians are diſtinguiſhed from the Heathens who had many Gods. This is the force of what Tertullian ſaith upon this matter.

Alium autem quomodo accipere debes jam profeſſus ſum, Perſonæ non Subſtantiæ nomine, ad Diſtinctionem, non ad Diviſionem, cæterum ubique teneo unam ſubſtantiam in tribus cohærentibus. Adverſ. Prax. c. 12.

Et ſermo erat apud Deum & nunquam ſeparatus à Patre aut alius à Patre quia ego & Pater unum ſumus: Hæc erat probola veritatis, cuſtos unitatis qua prolatum dicimus Filium à Patre, ſed non ſeparatum. C. 8.

And what ſay our Unitarians to it? They cannot deny that he was an Ante-Nicene Father; and it is plain that he did underſtand the Form of Baptiſm ſo as to imply a Trinity of Perſons in an Unity of Eſſence: To which they give no Anſwer.

But I find three things objected againſt Tertullian by their Friends;

1. That Tertullian brought this Doctrine into the Church from Montanus, whoſe Diſciple he then was. So Schlichtingius in his Preface againſt Meiſner, grants, That he was very near the Apoſtolical Times, and by his Wit and Learning promoted this new Doctrine about the Trinity, eſpecially in his Book againſt Praxeas. But how doth it appear, that he brought in any new Doctrine? Yes, ſaith Schlichtingius, he confeſſes, That he was more inſtructed by the Paraclete. But if he had dealt ingenuouſly, he would have owned that in that very place he confeſſes, He was always of that Opinion, although more fully inſtructed by the Paraclete. This only ſhews that Montanus himſelf innovated nothing in this matter, but endeavoured to improve it. And it is poſſible, that Tertullian might borrow his Similitudes and Illuſtrations from him, which have added no ſtrength to it. But as to the main of the Doctrine, he ſaith, It came from the rule of Faith delivered by the Apoſtles, before Praxeas, or any Hereticks his Predeceſſors. Which ſhews, that thoſe who rejected this Doctrine were always eſteemed Hereticks in the Chriſtian Church. And this is a very early Teſtimony of the Antiquity and general Reception of it, becauſe as one was received the other was rejected, ſo that the Aſſertors of it were accounted Hereticks. And the Senſe of the Church is much better known by ſuch publick Acts, than by mere particular Teſtimonies of the learned Men of thoſe times. For when they deliver the Senſe of the Church in ſuch publick Acts, all Perſons are Judges of the truth and falſhood of them at the time when they are deliver'd; and the nearer they came to the Apoſtolical Times, the greater is the ſtrength of their evidence; this I ground on Tertullian's appealing to the ancient rule of Faith, which was univerſally known and received in the Chriſtian Church, and that ſuch Perſons were look'd on as Hereticks who differ'd from it. Which being ſo very near the Apoſtles Times, it's hardly poſſible to ſuppoſe, that the whole Chriſtian Church ſhould be miſtaken as to what they received as the rule of Faith, which was deliver'd and explained at Baptiſm, and therefore the general Senſe of the Form of Baptiſm muſt be underſtood by all who were admitted to it. So that the Members of the Chriſtian Church cannot be ſuppoſed better acquainted with any thing than the Doctrine they were baptized into. Here then we have a concurrence of ſeveral publick Acts of the Church. 1. The Form of Baptiſm. 2. The Rule of Faith relating to that Form, and explained at Baptiſm. 3. The Churches rejecting thoſe as Hereticks who differ'd from it; which Tertullian applies to thoſe who rejected the Trinity. And Praxeas his Doctrine was then condemned, not by a particular Sentence, but by the general Senſe of the Church at that time. For Optatus Milevitanus reckons him among the condemned Hereticks, and joyns him with Marcion and Valentinus, as well as Sabellius, who follow'd him in the ſame Hereſie. How was this poſſible, if Praxeas deliver'd the true Doctrine, and Tertullian brought in a new Opinion as Schlichtingius fanſies? Tertullian was at that time a declared Montaniſt; and if he had introduc'd a new Doctrine about the Trinity, can we imagine thoſe would have been ſilent about it, who were ſharp enough upon Tertullian for the ſake of his Paraclete? Some of the Followers of Montanus afterwards fell into the ſame Opinions with Praxeas, as Theodoret tells us, and Tertullian ſaith as much of thoſe Cataphrygians who follow'd Æſchines: But theſe Montaniſts are diſtinguiſhed from the reſt. And Rigaltius obſerves, that Tertullian follow'd Montanus chiefly in what related to Diſcipline, and that himſelf was not ſo corrupted in point of Doctrine as ſome of his Followers were.

2. It's objected, That Tertullian's Doctrine is inconſiſtent with the Doctrine of the Trinity; for he denies the eternal Generation of the Son; and only aſſerts an Emiſſion of him before the Creation.

Ante-Nicen. p. 27.

But my buſineſs is not to juſtifie all Tertullian's Expreſſions or Similitudes; for Men of Wit and Fancy love to go out of the Road, and ſometimes involve volve things more by Attempts to explain them; but I keep only to that which he ſaith was the Faith of the Church from the beginning; and I ſee no reaſon to call in queſtion his Fidelity in reporting, however he might be unhappy in his Explications.

3. Tertullian himſelf, ſaith Schlichtingius, in other Places, where he ſpeaks of the Rule of Faith, doth not mention the Holy Ghoſt; and therefore this ſeems added by him for the ſake of the Paraclete. But this can be of no force to any one that conſiders, that Tertullian grounds his Doctrine not on any New Revelation by the Paraclete, but on the Rule of Faith received in the Church long before; and upon the Form of Baptiſm preſcribed by our Saviour. Will they ſay, the Holy Ghoſt was there added for the ſake of Montanus his Paraclete? And in another of his Books, he owns the Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt to make up the Trinity in Unity. Wherein Petavius himſelf confeſſes, That he aſſerted the Doctrine of the Church in a Catholick manner; although he otherwiſe ſpeaks hardly enough of him.

The next I ſhall mention, is Novatian, whom Schlichtingius allows, to have been before the Nicene Council; and our modern Unitarians call him a great Man, whoever he was, and very ancient. And there are two things I obſerve in him. 1. That he oppoſes Sabellianiſm; for, before his time Praxeas and Noetus were little talked of, eſpecially in the Weſtern Church; but Sabellius his Name and Doctrine were very well known by the oppoſition to him, by the Biſhops of Alexandria and Rome. He ſticks not, at the calling it Hereſie ſeveral times; and Diſputes againſt it, and anſwers the Objection about the Unity of the Godhead. 2. That he owns, that the Rule of Faith requires our believing in Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt; and aſſerts the Divine Eternity of it, and therefore muſt hold the Doctrine of the Trinity to be the Faith of the Church contained in the Form of Baptiſm. For he ſaith, The Authority of Faith, and the Holy Scriptures admoniſh us to believe not only in the Father and Son, but in the Holy Ghoſt. Therefore the Holy Ghoſt muſt be conſidered, as an object of Faith joyned in the Scripture with the other two, which is no where more expreſs, than in the Form of Baptiſm, which as St. Cyprian ſaith, was to be adminiſted in the full Confeſſion of the Trinity, in the place already mention'd. And it is obſervable that St. Cyprian rejects the Baptiſm of thoſe who denied the Trinity at that time, among whom he inſtances in the Patripaſſians, who it ſeems were then ſpread into Africa.

Cypr. Ep. 37.

The Diſpute about the Marcionites Baptiſm was upon another ground, for they held a real Trinity, as appears by Dionyſius Romanus in Athanaſius, and Epiphanius, &c. but the Queſtion was, whether they held the ſame Trinity or not. St. Cyprian, ſaith, That our Saviour appointed his Apoſtles to baptize in the Name of Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt, and in the Sacrament of this Trinity they were to baptize. Doth Marcion hold this Trinity? So that St. Cyprian ſuppoſed the validity of Baptiſm to depend on the Faith of the Trinity. And if he had gone no farther, I do not ſee how he had tranſgreſſed the Rules of the Church; but his Error was, that he made void Baptiſm upon difference of Communion, and therein he was juſtly oppoſed. But the Marcionites Baptiſm was rejected in the Eaſtern Church, becauſe of their Doctrine about the Trinity.

Baſil Epiſt. Canon, 47.

In the Parts of Aſia about Epheſus, Noetus had broached the ſame Doctrine, which Praxeas had done elſewhere. For which he was called to an account, and himſelf with his Followers were caſt out of the Churches Communion, as Epiphanius reports, which is another conſiderable Teſtimony of the Senſe of the Church at that time. Epiphanius ſaith, he was the firſt who broached that blaſphemy; but Theodoret mentions Epigonus and Cleomenes before him; it ſeems,

that he was the firſt who was publickly taken notice of for it; and therefore underwent the Cenſure of the Church with his Diſciples. When he was firſt ſummon'd to anſwer, he denied that he aſſerted any ſuch Doctrine; becauſe no Man before him ſaith Epiphanius, had vented ſuch Poiſon. And in the beginning he ſaith, that Noetus out of a Spirit of Contradiction had utter'd ſuch things, as neither the Prophets, nor the Apoſtles, nor the Church of God ever thought or declared. Now what was this unheard of Doctrine of Noetus? That appears beſt by Noetus his anſwer upon his ſecond appearance which was, That he worſhipped One God, and knew of no other, who was born and ſuffer'd, and died for us; and for this he produced the ſeveral places which aſſert the Unity of the Godhead, and among the reſt one very obſervable, N. 2. Rom. 9. 5. Of whom as concerning the fleſh Chriſt came, who is over all God bleſſed for ever. From whence he inferr'd, that the Son and the Father were the ſame, and the ſame he affirmed of the Holy Ghoſt. But from hence we have an evident Proof, that the moſt ancient Greek Copies in Noetus his time, which was long before the Council of Nice, had God in the Text. Epiphanius brings many places of Scripture to prove the Diſtinction of Perſons in the Unity of the Godhead; but that is not my preſent buſineſs, but to ſhew the general Senſe of the Church at that time. I do not ſay that Noetus was condemned by a general Council; but it is ſufficient to ſhew that he was caſt out of the Church, where he broached his Doctrine, and no other Church received him, or condemned that Church which caſt him out, which ſhews an after Conſent to it. Now what was this Doctrine of Noetus? The very ſame with that of Praxeas at Rome. Theodoret ſaith, this his Opinion was, Theod. hær. l. 3. c. 3. That there was but one God the Father, who was himſelf impaſſible, but as he took our Nature, ſo he was paſſible and called the Son. Epiphanius more fully, Epiph. 57. n. 2. that the ſame Perſon was Father, Son and Holy Ghoſt; wherein, he ſaith, he plainly contradicts the Scriptures, which attribute diſtinct Perſonalities to them; and yet aſſert but one Godhead. The Father hath an Hypoſtaſis of his own, and ſo have the Son and Holy Ghoſt; but yet there is but one Divinity, one Power, and one Dominion; for theſe diſtinct Perſons are τῆς αὐτῆς ταυτότητος, τῆς αὐτῆς κυριότητος; of the ſame individual Eſſence and Power. But Epiphanius was no Ante-Nicene Father: however in matters of Antiquity, where there is no incongruity in the thing, we may make uſe of his Authority; and I think no one will queſtion, that Noetus was condemned; which was the thing I produced him to prove.

But although Noetus was condemned, yet this Doctrine did ſpread in the Eaſtern Parts; Comment. in Matth. p. 470. for Origen mentions thoſe who confounded the Notion of Father and Son, and made them but one Hypoſtaſis, and diſtinguiſhed only by Thought, and Denomination. This Doctrine was oppoſed not only by Origen, but he had the Senſe of the Church concurring with him, as appears in the Caſe of Beryllus Biſhop of Boſtra, who fell into this Opinion, and was reclaimed by Origen; and Euſebius gives this account of it, Euſeb. l. 6. c. 33. That there was a Concurrence of others with him in it, and that this Doctrine was look'd on as an Innovation in the Faith. For his Opinion was, that our Saviour had no proper Subſiſtence of his own before the Incarnation; and that the Deity of the Father alone was in him. He did not mean that the Son had no ſeparate Divinity from the Father, but that the Deity of the Father only appeared in the Son; ſo that he was not really God, but only one in whom the Deity of the Father was made manifeſt. Which was one of the oldeſt Hereſies in the Church, and the moſt early condemned and oppoſed by it.

But thoſe Hereſies, which before had differenced Perſons from the Church, were now ſpread by ſome at firſt within the Communion of it; as it was not only in the Caſe of Noetus and Beryllus, but of Sabellius himſelf, who made the greateſt noiſe about this Doctrine; Epiph. hær. 62. and his Diſciples, Epiphanius tells us, ſpread ſpread very much both in the Eaſtern and Weſtern parts, in Meſopotamia and at Rome. Their Doctrine, he ſaith, was, that Father, Son and Holy Ghoſt were but one Hypoſtaſis, with three different Denominations. They compared God to the Sun, the Father to the Subſtance, the Son to the Light, and the Holy Ghoſt to the Heat which comes from it; and theſe two latter were only diſtinct Operations of the ſame Subſtance.

Epiphanius thinks that Sabellius therein differ'd from Noetus, becauſe he denied that the Father ſuffer'd; but St. Auguſtine can find no difference between them. All that can be conceiv'd is, that a different Denomination did ariſe from the different Appearance and Operation; which our Unitarians call three Relative Perſons, and one ſubſiſting Perſon.

Aug. in Joh. tract. 36.

Diſcourſe of Nominal and Real Unit. p. 16.

Sabellius did ſpread his Hereſy moſt in his own Country, which was in Pentapolis of the Cyrenaick Province, being born in Ptolemais one of the five Cities there. Of this Dionyſius Biſhop of Alexandria gives an account in his Epiſtle to Xyſtus, then Biſhop of Rome; wherein he takes notice of the wicked and blaſphemous Hereſie lately broached there againſt the Perſons of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt. Letters on both ſides were brought to him, on which occaſion he wrote ſeveral Epiſtles; among which there was one to Ammonius Biſhop of Bernice, another of the Cities of Pentapolis. In this he diſputed with great warmth againſt this Doctrine of Sabellius; inſomuch, that he was afterwards accuſed to Dionyſius of Rome, that he had gone too far the other way, and leſſen'd the Divinity of the Son by his Similitudes; of which he clear'd himſelf, as appears by what remains of his Defence in Athanaſius. But as to his Zeal againſt Sabellianiſm, it was never queſtion'd. Dionyſius of Rome declares his Senſe at large in this matter againſt both Extremes, viz. of thoſe who aſſerted three ſeparate and independent Principles, and of thoſe who confounded the Divine Perſons; and he charges the Doctrine of Sabellius too with Blaſphemy, as well as thoſe who ſet up three different Principles, and ſo made three Gods. But he declares the Chriſtian Doctrine to be, that there were Father, Son and Holy Ghoſt; but that there is an indiviſible Union in one and the ſame Godhead. It ſeems Dionyſius of Alexandria was accuſed for dividing and ſeparating the Perſons; to which he anſwers, that it was impoſſible he ſhould do it, becauſe they are indiviſible from each other; and the Name of each Perſon did imply the inſeparable Relation to the other, as the Father to the Son, and the Son to the Father, and the Holy Ghoſt to both. And this Judgment of theſe two great Men in the Church concerning Sabellianiſm was univerſally receiv'd in the Chriſtian Church. And this happen'd long before the Nicene Council.

2. Another Argument of the general Senſe of the Chriſtian Church is from the Hymns and Doxologies publickly received; which were in the moſt ſolemn Acts of religious Worſhip made to Father, Son and Holy Ghoſt. The force of this Argument appears hereby, that divine Worſhip cannot be given to meer Names; and an Equality of Worſhip doth imply an Equality of Dignity in the object of Worſhip; and therefore if the ſame Acts of Adoration be performed to Father, Son and Holy Ghoſt, it is plain, that the Chriſtian Church did eſteem them to have the ſame divine Nature, although they were diſtinct Perſons. And if they were not ſo, there could not be diſtinct Acts of divine Worſhip performed to them. St. Baſil mentions this Doxology of Africanus, (that ancient Writer of the Chriſtian Church) in the fifth Book of his Chronicon, We render thanks to him who gave our Lord Jeſus Chriſt to be a Saviour, to whom with the Holy Ghoſt be Glory and Majeſty for ever. And another of Dionyſius Alexandrinus, in his ſecond Epiſtle to Dionyſius of Rome; To God the Father, and his Son our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, with the Holy Ghoſt, be Glory and Power for ever and ever, Amen. And this is the more conſiderable, be-becauſe he ſaith he did herein follow the ancient Cuſtom and Rule of the Church; and he joined with it, ὁμοφώνως αὐτοῖς προσευχαριστοῦντες, Praiſing God in the ſame voice with thoſe who have gone before us; which ſhews how early theſe Doxologies to Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt, had been uſed in the Chriſtian Church. But to let us the better underſtand the true Senſe of them, St. Baſil hath preſerved ſome paſſages of Dionyſius Alexandrinus which do explain it, viz. That either the Sabellians muſt allow three diſtinct Hypoſtaſes, or they muſt wholly take away the Trinity. By which it is evident, that by Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt, he did underſtand three diſtinct Hypoſtaſes but not divided; for that appears to have been the Sabellians Argument, That if there were three, they muſt be divided. No, ſaith Dionyſius, they are three whether the Sabellians will or not, or elſe there is no Trinity; which he look'd on as a great abſurdity to take away, τὴν θείαν τριάδα, the Divine Trinity. Of what? Of mere Names or Energies? That is no Trinity; for there is but one ſubſiſting Perſon of ſeparate and divided Subſtances: That the Sabellians thought muſt follow, but both the Dionyſius's denied it. And in another Paſſage there mention'd, Dionyſius of Alexandria aſſerts the Trinity in Unity. But before Dionyſius, he quotes a Paſſage of Clemens Romanus concerning Father, Son and Holy Ghoſt, which attributes Life diſtinctly to them. Now Life cannot belong to a Name or Energy, and therefore muſt imply a Perſon.

Θειοτάτη γὰρ διὰ τοῦτο μετὰ τὴν Μονάδα καὶ ἡ τριάς.

Ζῇ φησιν ὁ Θεὸς καὶ ὁ Κύριος Ἰησοῦς Χριστὸς, καὶ πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον.

But that which is moſt material to our purpoſe, is the Publick Doxology in the Church of Neo-Cæſarea, brought in by Gregory Thaumaturgus. St. Baſil gives a very high Character of him, as of a Perſon of extraordinary Piety and Exactneſs of Life, and a great Promoter of Chriſtianity in thoſe parts, and by him the Form of Doxology was introduced into that Church, being chiefly formed by him, (there being but ſeventeen Chriſtians when he was firſt made Biſhop there) which was, Glory to God the Father, and Son, with the Holy Ghoſt, which ought to be underſtood according to the ſenſe of the Maker of it. And Gregory hath deliver'd his ſenſe plainly enough in this matter; for in that Confeſſion of Faith, which was preſerved in the Church of Neo-Cæſarea, he owns a perfect Trinity in Glory, Eternity, and Power, without Separation or Diverſity of Nature. On which Doctrine his Form of Doxology was grounded. Which St. Baſil following, Exceptions were taken againſt it by ſome, as varying from the Form uſed in ſome other places. For the Followers of Aetius took advantage from the Expreſſion uſed in thoſe Doxologies, Glory be to the Father, by the Son, and in the Holy Ghoſt, to infer a Diſſimilitude in the Son and Holy Ghoſt to the Father, and to make the Son the Inſtrument of the Father, and the Holy Ghoſt only to relate to time and place. But St. Baſil takes a great deal of Pains to ſhew the impertinency of theſe Exceptions. They would fain have charged this Doxology as an Innovation on St. Baſil, becauſe it attributed equal Honour to Father, Son and Holy Ghoſt, which the Aetians would not endure; but they ſaid, That the Son was to be honoured only in Subordination to the Father, and the Holy Ghoſt as inferiour to both. But St. Baſil proves from Scripture an Equality of Honour to be due to them; and particularly from the Form of Baptiſm, c. 10. wherein the Son and Holy Ghoſt are joined with the Father, without any note of Diſtinction. And what more proper token of a Conjunction in the ſame Dignity, than being put together in ſuch a manner?

Eſpecially conſidering theſe two things. 1. The extream Jealouſie of the Jewiſh Nation, as to joining the Creatures with God in any thing that related to Divine Honour. But as St. Baſil argues, If the Son were a Creature then we muſt believe in the Creator and the Creature together; and by the ſame reaſon that one Creature is joined, the whole Creation may be joined with him; but, ſaith he, we are not to imagine the leaſt Diſunion or Separation between Father, ther, Son and Holy Ghoſt; nor that they are three diſtinct parts of one inſeparable Being, but that there is an indiviſible Conjunction of three in the ſame Eſſence; ſo that where one is, there is the other alſo. For where the Holy Ghoſt is, there is the Son; and where the Son is, there is the Father. And ſo Athanaſius urges the Argument from theſe words, That a Creature could not be joined with the Creator in ſuch a manner as in the Form of Baptiſm; and it might have been as well ſaid, Baptize in the Name of the Father, and any other Creature. And for all that I ſee, our Unitarians would have liked ſuch a Form very well; for they parallel it with thoſe in Scripture; And they worſhipped the Lord and the King; and, They feared the Lord and Samuel. But the Jews underſtood the different occaſion of ſuch Expreſſions too well, to have born ſuch a Conjunction of Creatures with the Creator, in the moſt ſolemn Act of initiating into a Profeſſion of Religion.

Athanaſ. c. Serap. p. 10.

Anſwer to Milb. p. 18.

The Jews had a Notion among them of three diſtinct Subſiſtences in the Deity, ſuitable to theſe of Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt. This hath been ſhewed by many as to the Son, or the Divine Word; and Rittangel makes out the ſame as to the Holy Ghoſt. Among the three Subſiſtences in the Mercavah, (which Rittangel had proved from their moſt ancient Writings) thoſe which are added to the firſt are Wiſdom and Intelligence, and this laſt is by the old Chaldee Paraphraſt render'd שכינתא, and he proves it to be applied to God in many places of the Pentateuch, where ſuch things are attributed to him as belong to the Holy Ghoſt. And he particularly ſhews by many places, that the Shechinah is not taken for the Divine Glory, but that is render'd by other Words, (however the Interpreters of the Chaldee Paraphraſt have render'd it ſo) but he produces ten places where the Chaldee Paraphraſt uſes it in another Senſe; and he leaves, he ſaith, many more to the Reader's obſervation. If the Jews did of old own three Subſiſtences in the ſame Divine Eſſence, there was then great Reaſon to join Father, Son and Holy Ghoſt in the ſolemn Act of Initiation: But if it be denied, that they did own any ſuch thing, they muſt deny their moſt ancient Books, and the Chaldee Paraphraſt, which they eſteem next to the Text, and Rittangel ſaith, They believe it written by Inſpiration. That which I chiefly urge is this, That if theſe things be not very ancient, they muſt be put in by the later Jews to gratifie the Chriſtians in the Doctrine of the Trinity; which I do not believe any Jew will aſſent to. And no one elſe can imagine this, when our Unitarians ſay, That the Doctrine of the Trinity is the chief Offence which the Jews take at the Chriſtian Religion. How then can we ſuppoſe the Jews ſhould forge theſe Books on purpoſe to put in ſuch Notions, as were moſt grateful to their Enemies, and hateful to themſelves? Morinus hath endeavoured to run down the Credit of the moſt ancient Books of the Jews; and among the reſt the Book Jezirah, the moſt ancient Cabbaliſtical Book among the Jews, which he learnedly proves was not written by Abraham, (as the Jews think) I will not ſtand with Morinus about this; however the Book Coſri ſaith, It was made by Abraham before God ſpake to him, and magnifies it to the King of Coſar, as containing an admirable Account of the firſt Principles above the Philoſophers. Buxtorf ſaith, that the Book Coſri hath been extant Nine hundred Years; and in the beginning of it it is ſaid, That the Conference was four hundred Years before; and therein the Book Jezirah is alledged as a Book of Antiquity; and there the three Subſiſtences of the Deity are repreſented by Mind, Word and Hand. So that this can be no late Invention of Cabbaliſtical Jews. But our Unitarians utterly deny that the Jews had any Cabbala concerning the Trinity. And they prove it, becauſe the Jews in Origen and Juſtin Martyr deny the Meſſias to be God. They might as well have brought their Teſtimony to prove Jeſus not to be the Meſſias; for the Jews of thoſe times being hard preſſed by the Chriſtians, found they could not otherwiſe avoid ſeveral places of the Old Teſtament. But this doth not hinder, but that they might have Notions of three Subſiſtences in their ancient Books; which contained neither late Invention, nor Divine Revelations, but a Traditional notion about the Divine Being, and the Subſiſtences in it; and I can find no Arguments againſt it that deſerve mentioning. For when they ſay the Jewiſh Cabbala was a Phariſaical Figment, &c. it needs no anſwer. But what do they ſay to the Old Paraphraſes, whereon the main Weight as to this matter lies? All that I can find is, That they do not ſpeak of diſtinct Per- P. 61. ſons; but they confeſs that Philo ſpeaks home, and therefore they make him a Chriſtian. But Philo had the ſame Notion with the Paraphraſts; and their beſt way will be to declare, that they look upon them all as Chriſtians; and they might as well affirm it of Onkelos, as they do of Philo; but I doubt the World will not take their Word for either.

But to proceed with the Chriſtian Doxologies. Nothing, ſaith St. Baſil, De Sp. Sancto, c. 10. ſhall make me forſake the Doctrine I received in my Baptiſm, when I was firſt entered into the Chriſtian Church; and I adviſe all others to keep firm to that Profeſſion of the Holy Trinity which they made in their Baptiſm; that is, of the indiviſible Union of Father, Son and Holy Ghoſt. And, as he ſaith afterwards, C. 17. by the Order of the Words in Baptiſm, it appears, that as the Son is to the Father, ſo the Holy Ghoſt is to the Son. For they are all put without any Diſtinction or Number, which he obſerves agrees only to a multitude. For by their C. 18. Properties they are one and one; yet by the Community of Eſſence the two are but one: and he makes it his Buſineſs to prove the Holy Ghoſt to be a proper Object of Adoration as well as the Father and Son, and therefore there was no reaſon to find fault with the Doxology uſed in that Church; and that, Firmi- C. 29. lian, Meletius, and the Eaſtern Chriſtians, agreed with them in the uſe of it, and ſo did all the Weſtern Churches from Illyricum to the Worlds end; and this, he ſaith, was by an immemorial Cuſtom of all Churches, and of the greateſt Men in them. Nay, more he ſaith, It had been continued in the Churches from the time the Goſpel had been receiv'd among them. And nothing can be fuller than the Authority of his Teſtimony, if St. Baſil may be believed.

To this I ſhall add the Doxology of Polycarp at his Martyrdom, mentioned by Euſebius, which is very full to our purpoſe; I glorify thee by our E- Euſeb. l. 4. c. 15. ternal High-Prieſt, Jeſus Chriſt thy beloved Son, by whom be Glory to thee, with him in the Holy Ghoſt. What can we imagine Polycarp meant by this, but to render the ſame Glory to Father, Son and Holy Ghoſt; but with ſuch a difference as to the Particles, which St. Baſil at large proves come to the ſame thing? And to the ſame purpoſe, not only the Church of Smyrna, but Pionius the Martyr, who tranſcribed the Acts, ſpeaking of Jeſus Chriſt, with whom be Glory to God the Father, and the Holy Ghoſt. Theſe ſuffer'd Mar- Valeſ. ad Euſeb. p. 73. tyrdom for Chriſtianity, and owned the ſame Divine Honour to the Father, Son and Holy Ghoſt.

What could they mean, if they did not believe them to have the ſame Coteler. VII. p. 1027. Divine Nature? Can we ſuppoſe them guilty of ſuch Stupidity to loſe their Lives for not giving Divine Honour to Creatures, and at the ſame time to do it themſelves? So that if the Father, Son and Holy Ghoſt were not then believed to be three Perſons and one God, the Chriſtian Church was mightily deceived; and the Martyrs acted inconſiſtently with their own Principles: Which no good Chriſtian will dare to affirm. But ſome have adventured to ſay that Polycarp did not mean the ſame Divine Honour to Father, Son and Holy Ghoſt. But if he had ſo meant it, how could he have expreſſed it otherwiſe? It was certainly a Worſhip diſtinct from what he gave to Creatures; as appears by the Church of Smyrna's diſowning any Worſhip but of Love and Reſpect to their Fellow-Creatures; and owning the giving Adoration to the Son of God; with whom they joyn both Father and Holy Ghoſt. Which it is impoſſible to conceive, that in their Circumſtances, they ſhould have done, unleſs they had believed the ſame Divine Honour to belong to them.

St. Baſil's Teſtimony makes it out of Diſpute, that the Doxology to Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt, was univerſally receiv'd in the publick Offices of the Church, and that from the time of greateſt Antiquity: So that we have no need of the Teſtimonies from the Apoſtolical Conſtitutions (as they are called) to prove it. But I avoid all diſputable Authorities. And I ſhall only add, that it appears from St. Baſil, that this Doxology had been long uſed not only C. 29. in publick Offices, but in Occaſional Ejaculations, as at the bringing in of Light in the Evening, the People, he ſaith, were wont to ſay, Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghoſt, &c. This, he ſaith, had been an ancient Cuſtom among the People, and none can tell who brought it in. But Prudent. Cath. Hymn. 5. Prudentius, ſhews, that it was continued to his Time; as appears by his Hymn on that occaſion, which concludes with this Doxology, and St. Hilar. Op. N. E. p. 1214. Hilary ends his Hymn written to his Daughter, in the ſame manner.

3. I come therefore to the laſt Proof, which I ſhall produce of the Senſe of the Chriſtian Church, which is, from the Teſtimony of thoſe who wrote in Defence of our Religion againſt Infidels. In which I ſhall be the ſhorter, ſince the particular Teſtimonies of the Fathers, have been ſo fully produced, and defended by others, eſpecially by Dr. Bull.

Apol. 2. p. 94. Juſtin Martyr in his Apology for the Chriſtians, gives an account of the Form of Baptiſm, as it was adminiſtred among Chriſtians, which he ſaith, was in the Name of God the Father of all, and of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, and of the Holy Ghoſt. And he ſpake of them as of diſtinct Perſons, as appears by his P. 26. Words afterwards. They who take the Son to be the Father, neither know the Father nor the Son, who being the Word and firſt begotten is God. And when P. 97. he ſpeaks of the Euchariſt, he ſaith, That it is offer'd to the Father of all, by the Name of the Son, and the Holy Ghoſt: and of other ſolemn Acts of Devotion, P. 98. he ſaith, That in all of them they praiſe God the Father of all, by his Son P. 56. Jeſus Chriſt, and the Holy Ghoſt. And in other places, he mentions the Worſhip they give to Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt. Indeed he mentions a P. 60. difference of Order between them; but makes no Difference as to the Worſhip given to them. And all this in no long Apology for the Chriſtian Faith. What can be the meaning of this, if he did not take it for granted, that the Chriſtian Church embraced the Doctrine of the Trinity in Baptiſm? Juſtin Martyr was no ſuch weak Man to go about to expoſe the Chriſtian Religion inſtead of defending it; and he muſt have done ſo, if he did not believe this not only to be a true, but a neceſſary part of the Chriſtian Faith. For, why did he at all mention ſuch a Myſterious and dark Point? Why did he not conceal it, (as ſome would have done) and only repreſent to the Emperors, the fair and plauſible part of Chriſtianity? No, he was a Man of great Sincerity, and a through Chriſtian himſelf; and therefore thought he could not honeſtly conceal ſo fundamental a Point of the Chriſtian Faith, and which related to their being entred into the Chriſtian Church For if the Profeſſion of this Faith had not been look'd on as a neceſſary condition of being a Member of the Church of Chriſt; it is hard to imagine, that Juſtin Martyr ſhould ſo much inſiſt upon it, not only here, but in his other Treatiſes: Of which an Account hath been given by others.

Athenagoras had been a Philoſopher, as well as Juſtin Martyr, before he profeſſed himſelf a Chriſtian; and therefore, muſt be ſuppoſed to underſtand his Religion before he embraced it. And in his Defence he aſſerts, That the Chriſtians do believe in Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt; in God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghoſt. And he mentions both the Unity and Order which is among them. Which can ſignifie nothing unleſs they be owned to be diſtinct Perſons in the ſame Divine Nature. And in the next Page, he looks on it, as a thing which all Chriſtians aſpire after in another Life, That they ſhall then know the Union of the Father, and the Communication of the Father to the Son, what the Holy Ghoſt is, and what Union and Diſtinction there is between the Holy Ghoſt, the Son and the Father. No Man who had ever had the name of a Philoſopher would have ſaid ſuch things, unleſs he had believed the Doctrine of the Trinity as we do, i. e. that there are three diſtinct Perſons in the ſame Divine Nature, but that the manner of the Union, and diſtinction between them, is above our reach and comprehenſion.

Athenag. p. 8.

But our Unitarians have an Anſwer ready for theſe Men, viz. That they came out of Plato*'s School, with the Tincture of his three Principles; and they ſadly complain, that* Platoniſm had very early corrupted the Chriſtian Faith as to theſe matters.

Defence of the Hiſt. of the Unit. p. 5.

In anſwer to which Exception, I have only one Poſtulatum to make; which is, that theſe were honeſt Men, and knew their own Minds beſt, and I ſhall make it appear, that none can more poſitively declare, than they do, that they did not take up theſe Notions from Plato, but from the Holy Scriptures; Juſtin Martyr ſaith, he took the Foundation of his Faith from thence, and that he could find no certainty as to God and Religion any where elſe: that he thinks, Plato took his three Principles from Moſes; and in his Dialogue with Trypho, he at large proves the Eternity of the Son of God from the Scriptures; and ſaid, He would uſe no other Arguments, for he pretended to no Skill but in the Scriptures, which God had enabled him to underſtand.

Athenagoras declares, That where the Philoſophers agreed with them, their Faith did not depend on them, but on the Teſtimony of the Prophets, who were inſpired by the Holy Ghoſt.

Athenag. p. 8, 9.

To the ſame purpoſe ſpeaks Theophilus Biſhop of Antioch, who aſſerts the Co-eternity of the Son with the Father, from the beginning of St. John*'s Goſpel*; and ſaith, their Faith is built on the Scriptures.

Theophil. ad Autolyc. p. 100.

Clemens Alexandrinus owns not only, the Eſſential Attributes of God to belong to the Son; but that there is one Father of all, and one Word over all, and one Holy Ghoſt who is every where.

And he thinks, Plato borrowed his three Principles from Moſes; that his ſecond was the Son, and the third his Holy Spirit.

Even Origen himſelf highly commends Moſes above Plato, in his moſt undoubted Writings, and ſaith, That Numenius went beyond Plato, and that he borrowed out of the Scriptures; and ſo he ſaith, Plato did in other places; but he adds, That the Doctrines were better deliver'd in Scripture, than in his Artificial Dialogues. Can any one that hath the leaſt reverence for Writers of ſuch Authority and Zeal for the Chriſtian Doctrine, imagine that they wilfully corrupted it in one of the chief Articles of it; and brought in new Speculations againſt the Senſe of thoſe Books, which at the ſame time, they profeſſed to be the only Rule of their Faith? Even where they ſpeak moſt favourably of the Platonick Trinity, they ſuppoſe it to be borrowed from Moſes.

And therefore Numenius ſaid, That Moſes and Plato did not differ about the firſt Principles; and Theodoret mentions Numenius as one of thoſe, who ſaid, Plato underſtood the Hebrew Doctrine in Egypt; and during his Thirteen Years ſtay there, it is hardly poſſible to ſuppoſe, he ſhould be ignorant of the Hebrew Doctrine, about the firſt Principles, which he was ſo inquiſitive after, eſpecially among Nations, who pretended to Antiquity.

And the Platonick Notion of the Divine Eſſence inlarging it ſelf to three Hypoſtaſes, is conſiderable on theſe Accounts:

1. That it is delivered with ſo much aſſurance by the Oppoſers of Chriſtianity; ſuch as Plotinus, Porphyrius, Proclus and others were known to be, and they ſpeak with no manner of doubt concerning it; as may be ſeen in the paſſages of Porphyry preſerved by St. Cyril and others.

Cyril. c. Jul. l. 1. & l. 8.

2. That they took it up from no Revelation; but as a Notion in it ſelf agreeable enough; as appears by the paſſages in Plato and others concerning it. They never ſuſpected it to be liable to the Charge of Non-Senſe, and Contradictions, as our modern Unitarians charge the Trinity with; although their Notion as repreſented by Porphyry be as liable to it. How came theſe Men of Wit and Senſe, to hit upon, and be ſo fond of ſuch abſurd Principles which lead to the Belief of Myſterious Non-Senſe, and Impoſſibilities, if theſe Men may be truſted?

3. That the Nations moſt renowned for Antiquity and deep Speculations, did light upon the ſame Doctrine, about a Trinity of Hypoſtaſes in the Divine Eſſence. To prove this I ſhall not refer to the Triſmegiſtick Books, or the Chaldee Oracles, or any doubtful Authorities; but Plutarch aſſerts the three Hypoſtaſes to have been receiv'd among the Perſians, and Porphyry, and Jamblichus, ſay the ſame of the Egyptians.

Marcrob. in Som. Scipion. l. 1. c. 14.

4. That this Hypoſtaſis did maintain its Reputation ſo long in the World. For we find it continued to the time of Macrobius; who mentions it as a reaſonable Notion, viz. of one ſupreme Being, Father of all, and a Mind proceeding from it; and Soul from Mind. Some have thought that the Platoniſts made two created Beings, to be two of the Divine Hypoſtaſes; but this is contrary to what Plotinus and Porphyry affirm concerning it, and it is hard to give an Account, how they ſhould then be Eſſentially different from Creatures, and be Hypoſtaſes in the Divine Eſſence. But this is no part of my buſineſs, being concerned no farther, than to clear the Senſe of the Chriſtian Church, as to the Form of Baptiſm in the Name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt; which according to the Senſe of the Ante Nicene Fathers, I have proved, doth manifeſt the Doctrine of the Trinity, to have been generally receiv'd in the Chriſtian Church.

2 Let us now ſee what our Unitarians object againſt the Proof of the Trinity from theſe Words.

Anſwer to Milb. p. 17.

1. They ſay, That there is a Note of diſtinction and Superiority. For Chriſt owns, that his Power was given to him by the Father.

There is no queſtion, but that the Perſon who ſuffer'd on the Croſs, had Power given to him, after his Reſurrection; but the true Queſtion is, whether his Sonſhip were then given to him. He was then declared to be the Son of God with Power, and had a Name or Authority given him above every Name; being exalted to be a Prince and a Saviour, to give Repentance; and Remiſſion of Sins: in order to which he now appointed his Apoſtles to teach all Nations; baptizing them in the Name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghoſt. He doth not ſay, in the Name of Jeſus, who ſuffer'd on the Croſs; nor in the Name of Jeſus the Chriſt now exalted; but in the Name of Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt: and although there were a double Gift with reſpect to the Son and Holy Ghoſt; the one, as to his Royal Authority over the Church; the other, as to his extraordinary Effuſion on the Apoſtles, yet neither of theſe are ſo much as intimated; but the Office of Baptiſm is required to be performed in the Name of theſe three as diſtinct and yet equal; without any Relation to any Gift, either as to the Son or Holy Ghoſt. But if the ancient Jews were in the Right, as we think they were, then we have a plain account, how theſe came to be thus mention'd in the Form of Baptiſm, viz. that theſe three diſtinct Subſiſtences in the Divine Eſſence, were not now to be kept up as a ſecret Myſtery from the World; but that the Chriſtian Church was to be formed upon the Belief of it.

2. They bring ſeveral places of Scripture, where God and his Creatures are joyned, without any Note of diſtinction or Superiority; as, The People feared the Lord, and Samuel, 1 Sam. 12. 18. They worſhipped the Lord, and the King, 1 Chron. 29. 20. I charge thee before God and the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and his elect Angels, 1 Tim. 5. 21. The Spirit and the Bride ſay come, Revel. 22. 17.

But can any Man of Senſe imagine, theſe places contain a Parallel with a Form of Words, wherein Men are entred into the Profeſſion of a new Religion, and by which they were to be diſtinguiſhed from all other Religions? In the former places, the Circumſtances were ſo notorious as to God, and the Civil Magiſtrate, that it ſhews no more than that the ſame external Acts may be uſed to both, but with ſuch a different Intention as all Men underſtood it. What if St. Paul name the elect Angels in a ſolemn Obteſtation to Timothy, together with God, and the Lord Jeſus Chriſt? What can this prove, but that we may call God and his Creatures to be Witneſſes together of the ſame thing? And ſo Heaven and Earth are called to bear Witneſs againſt obſtinate Sinners: May Men therefore be baptized in the Name of God and his Creatures? The Spirit and Bride may ſay come without any Incongruity; but it would have been ſtrange indeed, if they had ſaid, Come be baptized in the Name of the Spirit and the Bride. So that theſe Inſtances are very remote from the purpoſe.

But they ſay farther, That the ancients of the firſt four Hundred Years do not inſiſt on this place, to prove the Divinity or Perſonality of the Son or Spirit. As to the firſt three Hundred Years, I have given an Account already; and as to the Fourth Century, I could not have thought, that they would have mention'd it: ſince there is ſcarce a Father of the Church in that time, who had occaſion to do it, but makes uſe of the Argument from this place to prove the Divinity and Perſonality of the Son and Spirit.

Athanaſius ſaith, That Chriſt founded his Church on the Doctrine of the Trinity contained in theſe Words; and if the Holy Ghoſt had been of a different Nature, from the Father and Son, he would never have been joyned with them in a Form of Baptiſm, no more than an Angel, or any other Creature. For the Trinity muſt be Eternal and Indiviſible, which it could not be, if any created Being were in it, and therefore he diſputes againſt the Arian Baptiſm, although performed with the ſame Words, becauſe they joyned God and a Creature together in Baptiſm. To the ſame purpoſe argue Didymus, Gregory Nazianzen, St Baſil and others, within the Compaſs of four hundred Years, whoſe Teſtimonies are produced by Petavius; to whom I refer the Reader, if he hath a mind to be ſatisfied in ſo clear a Point, that I cannot but think our Unitarians never intended to take in the Fathers after the Council of Nice, who are ſo expreſly againſt them; and therefore I paſs it over as a ſlip.

4. They object, That the Form of Baptiſm implies no more, than being admitted into that Religion which proceeds from God the Father, and deliver'd by his Son, and confirmed by the Teſtimony of the Holy Ghoſt. So much we grant is implied, but the Queſtion ſtill remains, whether the Son and Holy Ghoſt are here to be conſider'd only in order to their Operations, or whether the Perſons of the Son and Holy Ghoſt, from whom thoſe Effects came, are not here chiefly intended? For if no more had been meant but theſe Effects, then the right Form of Admiſſion had not been, Into the Name of Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt; but in the Name of the Father alone, as revealing himſelf by his Son, and confirming it by the miraculous Works of the Holy Ghoſt. For theſe are only ſubſervient Acts to the deſign of God the Father, as the only ſubſiſting Perſon.

Aug. in Pſal. 77.

4. They tell us, That it is in vain, not to ſay ridiculouſly pretended, that a Perſon or thing is God, becauſe we are baptized into it; for ſome were baptized into Moſes, and others into John's Baptiſm, and ſo Moſes and John Baptiſt would be Gods; and to be baptized into a Perſon or Perſons, and in the Name of ſuch a Perſon is the ſame thing. Grant this; yet there is a great difference between being baptized in the name of a Miniſter of Baptiſm, and of the Author of a Religion, into which they are baptized. The Iſraelites were baptized unto Moſes; but how? The Syriac and Arabic Verſions render it per Moſen; and ſo St. Auguſtine reads it. And this ſeems to be the moſt natural ſenſe of the Word, εἰς being put for διὰ, as it is Act. 7: 53. compared with Gal. 3. 19. And the force of the Apoſtle's Argument doth not lie in the Parallel between being baptized into Moſes, and into Chriſt; but in the Privileges they had under the Miniſtery of Moſes, with thoſe which Chriſtians enjoyed. The other place implies no more, than being enter'd into that Profeſſion, which John baptized his Diſciples into. But doth any one imagine, that becauſe John Baptiſt did enter his Diſciples by Baptiſm, therefore they muſt believe him to be God? I know none that lay the force of the Argument upon any thing parallel to thoſe places. But it depends upon laying the Circumſtances together. Here was a new Religion to be taught Mankind, and they were to be entred into it, not by a bare verbal Profeſſion, but by a ſolemn Rite of Baptiſm; and this Baptiſm is declar'd to be in the Name of the Father, Son and Holy Ghoſt; which cannot be underſtood of their Miniſtry, and therefore muſt relate to that Faith which they were baptized into, which was concerning the Father, Son and Holy Ghoſt. And ſo the Chriſtian Church underſtood it from the beginning, as I have proved in the foregoing Diſcourſe.

Anſwer to Dr. Bull, p. 17.

And from hence came the Inſtruction of Catechumens, who were to be baptized, about the Trinity; and the firſt Creeds, which related only to them, as I have already obſerved. And ſo much our Unitarians grant in one of their lateſt Pamphlets, that a Creed was an Inſtitution or Inſtruction what we are to believe in the main and fundamental Articles, eſpecially concerning the Perſons of Father, Son and Holy Ghoſt. But they contend, That the Creed which bears the Name of the Apoſtles, was the Original Creed framed by the Apoſtles themſelves, becauſe they ſuppoſe this Creed doth not aſſert the Son and Holy Ghoſt to be eternal and divine Perſons, and therefore they conclude, that the Makers of this Creed either did not know, that any other Perſon but the Father is God, or Almighty, or Maker of Heaven and Earth, or they have negligently or wickedly concealed it.

This is a matter ſo neceſſary to be clear'd, that I ſhall examine theſe two things before I put an end to this Diſcourſe.

1. What Proofs they bring that this Creed was framed by the Apoſtles.

2. What Evidence they produce that this Creed excludes the Divinity of the Son and Holy Ghoſt.

1. As to the Proofs they bring, that this Creed was framed by the Apoſtles. We believe the Creed to be Apoſtolical in the true Senſe of it; but that it was ſo in that Frame of Words, and Enumeration of Articles, as it is now receiv'd, hath been called in queſtion by ſome Criticks of great Judgment and Learning, whom I have already mentioned. Eraſmus ſaith, He doth not queſtion the Articles being Apoſtolical; but whether the Apoſtles put it thus into Writing. And his chief Argument is from the Variety of the ancient Creeds; of which no Account can be given ſo probable, as that they were added Occaſionally in oppoſition to a growing Hereſie. As for Inſtance, the Word impaſſible was inſerted with Reſpect to the Father in the ancient Eaſtern Creed, againſt the Doctrine of Sabellius; but it was not in the old Weſtern Creed. And he argues, That the Apoſtolical Creed ended with the Holy Ghoſt; becauſe the Nicene Creed did ſo. And Voſſius thinks the other Articles which are in Cyril, were added after the Nicene Council; which would not have omitted them, if they had been in the former Creed. And when there were ſo many Creeds made afterwards, it is obſervable that they do all end with the Article of the Holy Ghoſt; which they would never have done, in ſo jealous a time about Creeds, if they had left out any Articles of what was then receiv'd for the Apoſtolical Creed.

Eraſ. ad Cenſ. pariſ. Tit II.

Voſſ. de tribus Symb. Diſſert. 1. Sect. 47.

The firſt Creed after the Nicene, which made great noiſe in the World, was that framed at Antioch; and that Creed not only ends with the Article of the Holy Ghoſt, but mentions the Form of Baptiſm, and our Saviour's commanding his Apoſtles to baptize in the Name of the Father, Son and Holy Ghoſt, as the Foundation of the Creed. For it hereby appears, that the Father is true Father, and the Son true Son, and the Holy Ghoſt true Holy Ghoſt; not bare Names, but ſuch as import three diſtinct Subſiſtences.

Hilar. de Synod, p. 1169.

For Hilary obſerves, That this Council chiefly intended to overthrow Sabellianiſm, and therefore aſſerted tres Subſiſtentium Perſonas, as Hilary interprets their meaning, and ſo doth Epiphanius; which was to remove the Suſpicion, that they aſſerted only triplicis vocabuli Unionem, as Hilary ſpeaks. The next Creed is of the Eaſtern Biſhops at Sardica, and that ends with the Holy Ghoſt; and ſo do both the Creeds at Sirmium: and the latter calls the Article of the Trinity, the cloſe of our Faith; which is always to be kept according to our Saviour's Command, Go teach all Nations, baptizing them in the Name of the Father, Son and Holy Ghoſt. So that in all theſe Creeds, about which there was ſo much heat in the Chriſtian Church, there was not the leaſt Objection, that any Articles of the Apoſtolical Creed were omitted. It is no Argument, That there was then no conteſt about theſe Articles; for they were bound to give in an entire Creed; and ſo the Council of Antioch declares, that they would publiſh the Confeſſion of the Faith of the Church; and how could this be, if they left out ſuch Articles which had been always receiv'd from the Apoſtles times? But certainly our Unitarians would not attack ſuch Men as Eraſmus and Voſſius, in a matter relating to Antiquity, if they had not ſome good Arguments on their ſide. Their firſt buſineſs is to ſhew, that ſome of Voſſius his Arguments are not concluſive; ſuch as they are, I leave them to any one that will compare them with the Anſwers. But there are two things they lay weight upon.

Epiphanius hær. 73. n. 17.

Clauſula Fidei in Edit. nuperâ Pariſ. ex MSS.

1. That the whole Chriſtian Church Eaſt and Weſt, could not have agreed in the ſame Creed, as to Number and Order of Articles, and manner of Expreſſion, if this Creed had not come from the ſame Perſons, from whom they receiv'd the Goſpel and the Scriptures; namely, from the Apoſtles and Preachers of Chriſtianity. P. 27.

2. That it was receiv'd by a conſtant Tradition to have been the Apoſtles; not a bare Oral Tradition, but the Tradition of the ancient Commentators upon it. P. 28.

Now theſe I confeſs to be as good Arguments as the Matter will bear; and I will no longer conteſt this Point with them, provided that we be allowed to make uſe of the ſame Arguments, as to the ſecond Point; wherein they undertake to prove, That the Apoſtles Creed doth exclude the Divinity of the Son and Holy Ghoſt. What is now become of the general Conſent of the Chriſtian Church, Eaſt and Weſt? And of the Commentators upon this Creed? If the Argument hold good in one Caſe, I hope it will be allowed to do ſo in the other alſo. And what greater Teſtimony can be given of ſuch a Conſent of the Chriſtian Church, than that thoſe who oppoſed it have been condemned by it, and that the Church hath expreſſed her Senſe of it in Publick and Private Acts of Devotion, and Divine Worſhip, and have defended it as a neceſſary part of the Chriſtian Faith, againſt the Aſſaults of Infidels and Hereticks? So that although the Apoſtles Creed do not in expreſs words declare, The Divinity of the three Perſons in the Unity of the Divine Eſſence; yet taking the Senſe of thoſe Articles, as the Chriſtian Church underſtood them from the Apoſtles times, then we have as full and clear Evidence of this Doctrine, as we have that we receiv'd the Scriptures from them.

CHAP. X.

The Objections againſt the Trinity in Point of Reaſon anſwer'd.

HAving in the foregoing Chapters endeavour'd to clear the Doctrine of the Trinity from the charge of Contradictions, and to prove it agreeable to the Senſe of Scripture, and the Primitive Church;

I now come in the next place to examine the remaining Objections in point of Reaſon; and thoſe are,

1. That this Doctrine is ſaid to be a Myſtery, and therefore above Reaſon; and we cannot in reaſon be obliged to believe any ſuch thing.

2. That if we allow any ſuch Myſteries of Faith as are above Reaſon, there can be no ſtop put to any abſurd Doctrines, but they may be receiv'd on the ſame grounds.

1. As to this Doctrine being ſaid to be above Reaſon, and therefore not to be believ'd, we muſt conſider two things;

1. What we underſtand by Reaſon.

2. What ground in Reaſon there is, to reject any Doctrine above it, when it is propoſed as a Matter of Faith.

1. What we underſtand by Reaſon. I do not find that our Unitarians have explain'd the Nature and Bounds of Reaſon in ſuch manner, as thoſe ought to have done, who make it the Rule and Standard of what they are to believe. But ſometimes they ſpeak of clear and diſtinct Perceptions, ſometimes of natural Ideas, ſometimes of congenit Notions, &c. But a late Author hath endeavour'd to make amends for this, and takes upon him to make this matter clear; and to be ſure to do ſo, he begins with telling us, That Reaſon is not the Soul abſtractedly conſider'd; (no doubt of it) but the Soul acting in a peculiar manner is Reaſon. (And this is a very peculiar way of explaining it.) But farther we are told, It is not the Order or Report (reſpect I ſuppoſe) which is naturally between all things. (But that implies a Reaſon in things.) But the thoughts which the Soul forms of things according to it, may properly claim that Title, i. e. ſuch thoughts which are agreeable to the reaſon of things are reaſonable Thoughts. This is clear and diſtinct. And I perfectly agree with him, That our own Inclinations, or the bare Authority of others is not Reaſon. But what is it? Every one experiences in himſelf a Power, or Faculty of forming various Ideas, or Perceptions of things; of affirming or denying, according as he ſees them to agree or diſagree; and this is Reaſon in general. It is not the bare receiving Ideas into the Mind, that is ſtrictly Anſwer to my Sermon, p. 4. Letter of Reſolution, p. 3. Chriſtianity not myſterious, p. 8, 9.

ſtrictly Reaſon, (who ever thought it was?) but the Perception of the Agreement or Diſagreement of our Ideas in a greater or leſſer Number, wherein ſoever this Agreement or Diſagreement may conſiſt. If the Perception be immediate without the Aſſiſtance of any other Idea, this is not call'd Reaſon, but Self-Evidence; but when the Mind makes uſe of intermediate Ideas to diſcover that Agreement or Diſagreement, this method of Knowledge is properly call'd Reaſon or Demonſtration. And ſo Reaſon is defined to be that Faculty of the Soul which diſcovers the Certainty of any thing dubious or obſcure, by comparing it with ſomething evidently known.

This is offer'd to the World as an account of Reaſon; but to ſhew how very looſe and unſatisfactory it is, I deſire it may be conſider'd, that this Doctrine ſuppoſes that we muſt have clear and diſtinct Ideas of whatever we pretend to any certainty of in our Minds; and that the only way to attain this Certainty, is by comparing theſe Ideas together. Which excludes all Certainty of Faith or Reaſon, where we cannot have ſuch clear and diſtinct Ideas. But if there are many things of which we may be certain, and yet can have no clear and diſtinct Ideas of them; if thoſe Ideas we have are too imperfect and obſcure to form our Judgments by, if we cannot find out ſufficient intermediate Ideas, then this cannot be the Means of Certainty, or the Foundation of Reaſon.

But I ſhall keep to our preſent Subject; and our certainty of it in point of Reaſon depends upon our Knowledge of the Nature of Subſtance and Perſon, and the Diſtinction between them; but if we can have no ſuch clear Ideas in our Minds concerning theſe things, as are required from Senſation or Reflection, then either we have no uſe of Reaſon about them, or it is inſufficient to paſs any Judgment concerning them.

1. I begin with the Notion of Subſtance; and I have great reaſon to begin with it; for according to this Man's Principles, there can be no Certainty of Reaſon at all about it. And ſo our new way of Reaſon is advanced to very good purpoſe. For we may talk and diſpute about Subſtance as long as we pleaſe; but if his Principles of Reaſon be true, we can come to no Certainty; ſince we can have no clear Idea in our Minds concerning it, as will appear from his own Words, and the Method he proceeds in.

(1.) He ſaith, That the Mind receives in Ideas two ways. 1. By Intromiſſion of the Senſes; as Colours, Figures, Sounds, Smells, &c. 2. By the Souls conſidering its own Operations about what it thus gets from without; as knowing, doubting, affirming, denying, &c. Chap. I.

(2.) That theſe ſimple and diſtinct Ideas, thus laid up in the great Repoſitory of the Underſtanding, are the ſole Matter and Foundation of all our Reaſoning.

Then it follows, That we can have no Foundation of Reaſoning, where there can be no ſuch Ideas from Senſation or Reflection.

Now this is the Caſe of Subſtance; it is not intromitted by the Senſes, nor depends upon the Operations of the Mind, and ſo it cannot be within the compaſs of our Reaſon. And therefore I do not wonder, that the Gentlemen of this new way of Reaſoning have almoſt diſcarded Subſtance out of the reaſonable part of the World. For they not only tell us, That we can have no Idea of it by Senſation or Reflection; but that nothing is ſignified by it, only an uncertain Suppoſition of we know not what. And therefore it is parallel'd more than once with the Indian Philoſophers, He knew not what; which ſupported the Tortoiſe, that ſupported the Elephant, that ſupported the Earth; ſo Subſtance was found out only to ſupport Accidents. And, That when we talk of Subſtances we talk like Children, who being ask'd a Queſtion about ſomewhat which they know not, readily give this ſatisfactory Anſwer, that it is ſomething.

Human Underſtanding, l. 1. chap. 4. ſect. 18. L. 2. c. 13. ſect. 19. Chap. 23. ſect. 2.

If this be the truth of the Caſe, we muſt ſtill talk like Children, and I know not how it can be remedied. For, if we cannot come at a rational Idea of Subſtance, we can have no Principle of certainty to go upon in this Debate.

I do not ſay, that we can have a clear Idea of Subſtance, either by Senſation or Reflexion; but from hence I argue, that this is a very inſufficient Diſtribution of the Ideas neceſſary to Reaſon. For beſides theſe, there muſt be ſome general Ideas, which the Mind doth form, not by meer comparing thoſe Ideas it has got from Senſe or Reflexion; but by forming diſtinct general Notions of things from particular Ideas. And among theſe general Notions, or rational Ideas, Subſtance is one of the firſt; becauſe we find that we can have no true Conceptions of any Modes or Accidents (no matter which) but we muſt conceive a Subſtratum, or Subject wherein they are, ſince it is a Repugnancy to our firſt Conceptions of things, that Modes or Accidents ſhould ſubſiſt by themſelves, and therefore the Rational Idea of Subſtance is one of the firſt, and moſt natural Ideas in our Minds.

But we are ſtill told, That our Underſtanding can have no other Ideas, but either from Senſation or Reflection. And that, herein chiefly lies the Excellency of Mankind, above Brutes, that theſe cannot abſtract, and inlarge their Ideas, as Men do.

L. 2. ch. 1. ſect. 5.

But how comes the general Idea of Subſtance, to be framed in our Minds? Is this by Abſtracting and inlarging ſimple Ideas? No, but it is by a Complication of many ſimple Ideas together: becauſe not imagining how theſe ſimple Ideas can ſubſiſt by themſelves, we accuſtom our ſelves to ſuppoſe ſome Subſtratum wherein they do ſubſiſt, and from which they do reſult, which therefore we call Subſtance. And is this all indeed, that is to be ſaid for the being of Subſtance, that we accuſtom our ſelves to ſuppoſe a Subſtratum? Is that Cuſtom grounded upon true Reaſon or not? If not, then Accidents or Modes, muſt ſubſiſt of themſelves, and theſe ſimple Ideas need no Tortoiſe to ſupport them: For Figures and Colours, &c. would do well enough of themſelves, but for ſome Fancies Men have accuſtomed themſelves to. If it be grounded on plain and evident Reaſon, then we muſt allow an Idea of Subſtance, which comes not in by Senſation or Reflection; and ſo we may be certain of ſome things which we have not by thoſe Ideas.

L. 2. ch 23. ſect. 1.

The Idea of Subſtance, we are told again, is nothing but the ſuppoſed, but unknown ſupport of thoſe Qualities we find exiſting, which we imagine cannot ſubſiſt ſine re ſubſtante which according to the true import of the Word, is in plain Engliſh ſtanding under, or upholding. But very little weight is to be laid upon a bare Grammatical Etymology, when the Word is uſed in another Senſe by the beſt Authors, ſuch as Cicero and Quintilian, who take Subſtance for the ſame with Eſſence; as Valla hath proved; and ſo the Greek Word imports; but Boethius in tranſlating Ariſtotle's Predicaments, rather choſe the Word Subſtance as more proper, to expreſs a Compound Being, and reſerved Eſſence, for what was more ſimple and immaterial. And in this Senſe, Subſtance was not applied to God but only Eſſence, as St. Auguſtine obſerves, but afterwards, the Names of Subſtance, and Eſſence were promiſcuouſly uſed, with reſpect to God and his Creatures. And do imply, that which makes the Real Being, as diſtinguiſhed from Modes and Properties. And ſo the Subſtance, and Eſſence of a Man are the ſame; not being taken for the individual Subſtance, which cannot be underſtood without particular Modes and Properties; but the general Subſtance, or Nature of Man abſtractly for all the Circumſtances of Perſons.

Vall. Diſput. Dial. l. 1. c. 6.

And I deſire to know, whether according to true Reaſon, that be not a clear Idea of a Man; not of Peter, James or John, but of a Man as ſuch. This is not a meer univerſal Name, or Mark, or Sign; but there is as clear and diſtinct a Conception of this in our Minds, as we can have from any ſuch ſimple Ideas, as are convey'd by our Senſes. I do not deny that the Diſtinction of particular Subſtances, is by the ſeveral Modes and Properties of them, (which they may call a Complication of ſimple Ideas, if they pleaſe) but I do aſſert, that the general Idea, which relates to the Eſſence without theſe is ſo juſt, and true an Idea, that without it the Complication of ſimple Ideas, will never give us a right Notion of it.

I muſt do that right to the ingenious Author of the Eſſay of humane Underſtanding, (from whence theſe Notions are borrowed to ſerve other Purpoſes than he intended them) that he makes the Caſe of Spiritual, and Corporeal Subſtances to be alike, as to their Idea's, and that we have as clear a Notion of a Spirit, as we have of a Body, the one being ſuppoſed to be the Subſtratum to thoſe ſimple Ideas we have from without, and the other of thoſe Operations we find within our ſelves. And that it is as rational to affirm, there is no Body, becauſe we cannot know its Eſſence, as 'tis called, or have no Idea of the Subſtance of Matter; as to ſay, there is no Spirit, becauſe we know not its Eſſence, or have no Idea of a Spiritual Subſtance.

Chap. 23. ſect. 5.

From hence it follows, That we may be certain, that there are both Spiritual and Bodily Subſtances, although we can have no clear and diſtinct Ideas of them. But, if our Reaſon depend upon our clear and diſtinct Idea's, how is this poſſible? We cannot reaſon without clear Idea's, and yet we may be certain without them: Can we be certain without Reaſon? Or doth our Reaſon give us true Notions of things, without theſe Idea's? If it be ſo, this new Hypotheſis about Reaſon muſt appear to be very unreaſonable.

Let us ſuppoſe this Principle to be true, That the ſimple Ideas by Senſation or Reflexion, are the ſole Matter and Foundation of all our Reaſoning: I ask then, how we come to be certain that there are Spiritual Subſtances in the World, ſince we can have no clear and diſtinct Ideas concerning them? Can we be certain without any Foundation of Reaſon? This is a new ſort of Certainty, for which we do not envy theſe Pretenders to Reaſon. But methinks they ſhould not at the ſame time aſſert the abſolute neceſſity of theſe Ideas to our Knowledge, and declare that we may have certain Knowledge without them. If there be any other method, they overthrow their own Principle; if there be none, how come they to any Certainty, that there are both Bodily and Spiritual Subſtances?

As to theſe latter (which is my buſineſs) I muſt enquire farther, how they come to know that there are ſuch. The Anſwer is by ſelf-reflection on thoſe Powers we find in our ſelves, which cannot come from a mere Bodily Subſtance. I allow the Reaſon to be very good, but the Queſtion I ask is, Whether this Argument be from the clear and diſtinct Idea or not? We have Ideas in our ſelves of the ſeveral Operations of our Minds of Knowing, Willing, Conſidering, &c. which cannot come from a Bodily Subſtance. Very true; but is all this contained in the ſimple Idea of theſe Operations? How can that be, when the ſame Perſons ſay, that notwithſtanding their Ideas it is poſſible for Matter to Think. For it is ſaid, That we have the Ideas of Matter and Thinking, but poſſibly ſhall never be able to know, whether any mere material Being thinks or not; it being impoſſible for us by the Contemplation of our own Ideas, without Revelation to diſcover whether Omnipotency hath not given to ſome Syſtems of Matter, fitly diſpoſed, a Power to perceive or think. If this be true, then for all that we can know by our Ideas of Matter and Thinking, Matter may have a Power of Thinking: and if this hold, then it is impoſſible to prove a Spiritual Subſtance in us, from the Idea of Thinking: For how can we be aſſured by our Ideas, That God hath not given ſuch a Power of Thinking, to Matter ſo diſpoſed as our Bodies are? Eſpecially ſince it is ſaid, That in reſpect of our Notions, it is not much more remote from our Comprehenſion to conceive, that God can, if he pleaſes, ſuperadd to our Idea of Matter a Faculty of Thinking, than that he ſhould ſuper-add to it another Subſtance, with a Faculty of Thinking. Whoever aſſerts this, can never prove a Spiritual Subſtance in us, from a Faculty of Thinking ; becauſe he cannot know from the Idea of Matter and Thinking, that Matter ſo diſpoſed cannot Think. And he cannot be certain that God hath not framed the Matter of our Bodies, ſo as to be capable of it.

Book IV. Chap. 10. ſect. 5.

It is ſaid indeed elſewhere, That it is repugnant to the Idea of ſenſleſs Matter, that it ſhould put into it ſelf Senſe, Perception and Knowledge: But this doth not reach the preſent Caſe ; which is not what Matter can do of it ſelf, but what Matter prepared by an Omnipotent Hand can do. And what certainty can we have that he hath not done it? We can have none from the Ideas ; for thoſe are given up in this Caſe ; and conſequently, we can have no certainty upon theſe Principles, whether we have any ſpiritual Subſtance within us or not.

Book II. Chap. 23. ſect. 15.

But we are told, That from the Operations of our Minds, we are able to frame the Complex Idea of a Spirit. How can that be, when we cannot from thoſe Ideas be aſſured, but that thoſe Operations may come from a material Subſtance. If we frame an Idea on ſuch Grounds, it is at moſt but a poſſible Idea ; for it may be otherwiſe ; and we can have no aſſurance from our Ideas, that it is not : So that the moſt Men may come to in this way of Idea's is, That it is poſſible it may be ſo, and it is poſſible it may not ; but that it is impoſſible for us from our Ideas, to determine either way. And is not this an admirable way to bring us to a certainty of Reaſon?

Sect. 28.

I am very glad to find the Idea of a ſpiritual Subſtance made as conſiſtent, and intelligible, as that of a Corporeal ; for as the one conſiſts of a Coheſion of ſolid Parts, and the Power of communicating Motion by impulſe, ſo the other conſiſts in a Power of Thinking, and Willing, and moving the Body ; and that the Coheſion of ſolid Parts, is as hard to be conceived as Thinking ; and we are as much in the dark about the Power of communicating Motion by impulſe, as in the Power of exciting Motion by thought. We have by daily experience clear Evidence of Motion produced, both by Impulſe and by Thought ; but the manner how, hardly comes within our Comprehenſion ; we are equally at a loſs in both.

Sect. 32.

From whence it follows, That we may be certain of the Being of a ſpiritual Subſtance, although we have no clear and diſtinct Idea of it, nor are able to comprehend the manner of its Operations: And therefore it is a vain thing in any to pretend, that all our Reaſon and Certainty is founded on clear and diſtinct Ideas ; and that they have Reaſon to reject any Doctrine which relates to ſpiritual Subſtances, becauſe they cannot comprehend the manner of it. For the ſame thing is confeſſed by the moſt inquiſitive Men, about the manner of Operation, both in material, and immaterial Subſtances. It is affirmed, That the very Notion of Body, implies, ſomething very hard, if not impoſſible to be explained, or underſtood by us ; and that the natural Conſequence of it ; viz. Diviſibility involves us in Difficulties impoſſible to be explicated, or made conſiſtent. That we have but ſome few ſuperficial Ideas of things ; that we are deſtitute of Faculties, to attain to the true Nature of them? and that when we do that, we fall preſently into Darkneſs, and Obſcurity ; and can diſcover nothing farther, but our own Blindneſs and Ignorance.

Theſe are very fair and ingenuous Confeſſions of the ſhortneſs of humane Underſtanding, with reſpect to the Nature and Manner of ſuch things, which we are moſt certain of the Being of, by conſtant and undoubted Experience. I appeal now to the Reaſon of Mankind, whether it can be any reaſonable Foundation for rejecting a Doctrine propoſed to us, as of Divine Revelation, becauſe we cannot comprehend the manner of it; eſpecially, when it relates to the Divine Eſſence. For as the ſame Author obſerves, Our Idea of God is framed from the Complex Ideas of thoſe Perfections we find in our ſelves, but enlarging them ſo, as to make them ſuitable to an infinite Being, as Knowledge, Power, Duration, &c. And the Degrees or Extent of theſe which we aſcribe to the Soveraign Being, are all boundleſs and infinite. For it is Infinity, which joyned to our Ideas of Exiſtence, Power, Knowledge, &c. makes that Complex Idea, whereby we repreſent to our ſelves the beſt we can, the Supreme Being.

Sect. 36.

Now when our Knowledge of groſs material Subſtances is ſo dark; when the Notion of Spiritual Subſtances is above all Ideas of Senſation; when the higher any Subſtance is, the more remote from our Knowledge; but eſpecially when the very Idea of a Supreme Being implies its being Infinite, and Incomprehenſible; I know not whether it argues more Stupidity, or Arrogance, to expoſe a Doctrine relating to the Divine Eſſence, becauſe they cannot comprehend the manner of it. But of this more afterwards. I am yet upon the Certainty of our Reaſon, from clear and diſtinct Ideas; and if we can attain to Certainty without them, and where it is confeſſed we cannot have them; as about Subſtances; then theſe cannot be the ſole Matter and Foundation of our Reaſoning, which is ſo peremptorily aſſerted by this late Author.

But I go yet farther; and as I have already ſhew'd, we can have no certainty of an immaterial Subſtance within us, from theſe ſimple Ideas; ſo I ſhall now ſhew, that there can be no ſufficient Evidence, brought from them by their own Confeſſion, concerning the Exiſtence of the moſt ſpiritual and infinite Subſtance, even God himſelf.

We are told, That the Evidence of it is equal to Mathematical Certainty; and very good Arguments are brought to prove it, in a Chapter on purpoſe: but that which I take notice of is, that the Argument from the clear and diſtinct Idea of God is paſſed over. How can this be conſiſtent with deducing our Certainty of Knowledge from clear and ſimple Ideas? I do not go about to juſtifie thoſe, who lay the whole ſtreſs upon that Foundation; which I grant to be too weak to ſupport ſo important a Truth; and that thoſe are very much to blame, who go about to invalidate other Arguments for the ſake of that; but I doubt all this talk about clear and diſtinct Ideas, being made the Foundation of Certainty, came Originally from thoſe Diſcourſes, or Meditations, which are aimed at. The Author of them was an Ingenious, Thinking Man, and he endeavour'd to lay the Foundations of Certainty, as well as he could. The firſt thing he found any Certainty in, was his own Exiſtence; which he founded upon the Perception of the Acts of his Mind, which ſome call an internal, infallible Perception that we are. From hence he proceeded, to enquire, how he came by this Certainty, and he reſolved it into this, that he had a clear and diſtinct Perception of it; and from hence he formed his general Rule, That what he had a clear and diſtinct Perception of was true. Which in Reaſon ought to go no farther, than where there is the like Degree of Evidence: for the Certainty here, was not grounded on the clearneſs of the Perception, but on the Plainneſs of the Evidence, which is of that Nature, that the very Doubting of it proves it; ſince it is impoſſible, that any thing ſhould doubt or queſtion its own Being, that had it not. So that here it is not the clearneſs of the Idea, but an immediate Act of Perception, which is the true ground of Certainty. And this cannot extend to things without our ſelves; of which we can have no other Perception, than what is cauſed by the Impreſſions of outward Objects. But whether we are to judge according to thoſe Impreſſions, doth not depend on the Ideas themſelves, but upon the Exerciſe of our Judgment and Reaſon about them, which put the Difference rence between true and falſe, and adequate and inadequate Ideas. So that our Certainty is not from the Ideas themſelves, but from the Evidence of Reaſon, that thoſe Ideas are true and juſt, and conſequently that we may build our Certainty upon them.

But the Idea of an infinite Being hath this peculiar to it, that neceſſary Exiſtence is implied in it. This is a clear and diſtinct Idea, and yet it is denied, that this doth prove the Exiſtence of God. How then can the Grounds of our Certainty ariſe from clear and diſtinct Ideas, when in one of the cleareſt Ideas of our Minds we can come to no Certainty by it? I do not ſay, That it is denied to prove it; but this is ſaid, That it is a doubtful thing Sect. 7. from the different Make of Mens Tempers, and Application of their Thoughts. What can this mean, unleſs it be to let us know, that even clear and diſtinct Ideas may loſe their Effect by the difference of Mens Tempers and Studies; ſo that beſides Ideas in order to a right Judgment, a due Temper and Application of the Mind is required.

And wherein is this different from what all Men of Underſtanding have ſaid? Why then ſhould theſe clear and ſimple Ideas be made the ſole Foundation of Reaſon? One would think by this, that theſe Ideas would preſently ſatisfy mens Minds if they attend to them. But even this will not do, as to the Idea of an infinite Being. It is not enough to ſay, They will not examine how far it will hold; for they ought either to ſay, that it doth hold, or give up this Ground of Certainty from clear and diſtinct Ideas.

Sect. 6. But inſtead of the proper Argument from Ideas, we are told, That from the Conſideration of our ſelves, and what we find in our own Conſtitutions, our Reaſon leads us to the Knowledge of this certain and evident Truth, that there is an eternal, moſt powerful, and moſt knowing Being. All which I readily yield; but we ſee plainly the Certainty is not placed in the Idea, but in good and ſound Reaſon, from the Conſideration of our ſelves and our Conſtitutions. What! in the Idea of our ſelves? No certainly; for let our Idea be taken which way we pleaſe, by Senſation or Reflection, yet it is not the Idea that makes us certain, but the Argument from that which we perceive in and about our ſelves.

Sect. 5. But we find in our ſelves Perception and Knowledge. It's very true; but how doth this prove that there is a God? Is it from the clear and diſtinct Idea of it? No; but from this Argument, That either there muſt have been a knowing Being from Eternity, or an unknowing; for ſomething muſt have been from Eternity: but if an unknowing, then it was impoſſible there ever ſhould have been any Knowledge; it being as impoſſible that a thing without Knowledge ſhould produce it, as that a Triangle ſhould make it ſelf three Angles bigger than two right ones. Allowing the Argument to be good, yet it is not taken from the Idea, but from Principles of true Reaſon, as, That no Man can doubt his own Perception; That every thing muſt have a Cauſe; That this Cauſe muſt either have Knowledge or not: if it have, the Point is gained; if it hath not, nothing can produce nothing; and conſequently, a not knowing Being cannot produce a knowing.

Sect. 10. Again, If we ſuppoſe nothing to be firſt, Matter can never begin to be; if bare Matter without Motion eternal, Motion can never begin to be; if Matter and Motion be ſuppoſed eternal, Thought can never begin to be. For, if Matter could produce Thought, then Thought muſt be in the power of Matter; and if it be in Matter as ſuch, it muſt be the inſeparable Property of all Matter; which is contrary to the Senſe and Experience of Mankind. If only ſome parts of Matter have a power of Thinking, how comes ſo great a difference in the Properties of the ſame Matter? What diſpoſition of Matter is required to Thinking? And from whence comes it? Of which no account can be given in Reaſon.

This is the Subſtance of the Argument uſed to prove an infinite ſpiritual Being, which I am far from weakening the force of; but that which I deſign is to ſhew, That the Certainty of it is not placed upon any clear and diſtinct Ideas, but upon the force of Reaſon diſtinct from it; which was the thing I intended to prove.

2. The next thing neceſſary to be clear'd in this Diſpute is, the Diſtinction between Nature and Perſon, and of this we can have no clear and diſtinct Idea from Senſation or Reflection. And yet all our Notions of the Doctrine of the Trinity depend upon the right underſtanding of it. For we muſt talk unintelligibly about this Point, unleſs we have clear and diſtinct Apprehenſions concerning Nature and Perſon, and the grounds of Identity and Diſtinction. But that theſe come not into our Minds by theſe ſimple Ideas of Senſation and Reflection, I ſhall now make it appear;

1. As to Nature, That is ſometimes taken for the Eſſential Property of a thing; as when we ſay, that ſuch a thing is of a different Nature from another, we mean no more than that it is differenc'd by ſuch Properties as come to our Knowledge. Sometimes Nature is taken for the Thing it ſelf in which thoſe Properties are; and ſo Ariſtotle took Nature for a Corporeal Subſtance which had the Principles of Motion in it ſelf; but Nature and Subſtance are of an equal extent; and ſo that which is the Subject of Powers and Properties is the Nature, whether it be meant of Bodily or Spiritual Subſtances. I grant that by Senſation and Reflection we come to know the Powers and Properties of Things; but our Reaſon is ſatisfied, that there muſt be ſomething beyond theſe, becauſe it is impoſſible that they ſhould ſubſiſt by themſelves. So that the Nature of things properly belongs to our Reaſon, and not to meer Ideas.

But we muſt yet proceed farther. For, Nature may be conſider'd two ways.

1. As it is in diſtinct Individuals, as the Nature of a Man is equally in Peter, James, and John; and this is the common Nature with a particular Subſiſtence proper to each of them. For the Nature of Man, as in Peter, is diſtinct from that ſame Nature, as it is in James and John; otherwiſe they would be but one Perſon, as well as have the ſame Nature. And this Diſtinction of Perſons in them is diſcerned both by our Senſes, as to their different Accidents; and by our Reaſon, becauſe they have a ſeparate Exiſtence, not coming into it at once and in the ſame manner.

2. Nature may be conſider'd abſtractedly, without reſpect to individual Perſons, and then it makes an entire Notion of it ſelf. For however the ſame Nature may be in different Individuals, yet the Nature in it ſelf remains one and the ſame; which appears from this evident Reaſon, that otherwiſe every Individual muſt make a different kind.

Let us now ſee, how far theſe things can come from our ſimple Ideas, by Reflection or Senſation. And I ſhall lay down the Hypotheſis of thoſe who reſolve our Certainty into Ideas, as plainly and intelligibly as I can.

1. We are told, That all ſimple Ideas are true and adequate. Not that they are the true Repreſentations of things without us; but that they are the true Effects of ſuch Powers in them as produce ſuch Senſations within us. So that really we can underſtand nothing certainly by them, but the Effects they have upon us. Humane Underſt. l. 2. ch. 30, 31.

2. All our Ideas of Subſtances are imperfect and inadequate; becauſe they refer to the real Eſſences of things, of which we are ignorant, and no Man knows what Subſtance is in it ſelf: And, they are all falſe, when look'd on as the Repreſentations of the unknown Eſſences of things. Chap. 32. ſect. 18.

3. Abſtract Ideas are only general Names, made by ſeparating Circumſtances of time and place, &c. from them, which are only the Inventions and Creatures of the Underſtanding. Book 3. Chap. 3. ſect. 6.

Ib ſect. 15. 4. Eſſence may be taken two ways. 1. For the real, internal, unknown Conſtitutions of things; and in this Senſe it is underſtood as to particular things: 2. For the abſtract Idea; and one is ſaid to be the Nominal, the other the Real Sect. 19, 20. Eſſence. And the Nominal Eſſences only are immutable; and helps to enable Men to conſider things, and to diſcourſe of them.

But two things are granted, which tend to clear this Matter.

1. That there is a Real Eſſence, which is the Foundation of Powers and Properties.

2. That we may know theſe Powers and Properties, although we are ignorant of the Real Eſſence.

From whence I infer,

1. That from thoſe true and adequate Ideas, which we have of the Modes and Properties of Things, we have ſufficient certainty of the Real Eſſence of them: For theſe Ideas are allow'd to be true; and either by them we may judge of the truth of things, or we can make no Judgment at all of any thing without our ſelves.

If our Ideas be only the Effects we feel of the Powers of things without us; yet our Reaſon muſt be ſatisfied, that there could be no ſuch Powers, unleſs there were ſome real Beings which had them. So that either we may be certain by thoſe Effects of the real Being of things; or it is not poſſible, as we are framed, to have any certainty at all of any thing without our ſelves.

2. That from the Powers and Properties of things which are knowable by us, we may know as much of the internal Eſſence of Things, as thoſe Powers and Properties diſcover. I do not ſay, That we can know all Eſſences of things alike, nor that we can attain to a perfect underſtanding of all that belong to them; but if we can know ſo much, as that there are certain Beings in the World, endued with ſuch diſtinct Powers and Properties, what is it we complain of the want of, in order to our Certainty of Things? But we do not ſee the bare Eſſence of things. What is that bare Eſſence without the Powers and Properties belonging to it? It is that internal Conſtitution of things from whence thoſe Powers and Properties flow. Suppoſe we be ignorant of this (as we are like to be, for any Diſcoveries that have been yet made) that is a good Argument to prove the uncertainty of Philoſophical Speculations about the Real Eſſences of things; but it is no prejudice to us who enquire after the Certainty of ſuch Eſſences. For although we cannot comprehend the internal Frame or Conſtitution of things, nor in what manner they do flow from the Subſtance; yet by them we certainly know that there are ſuch Eſſences, and that they are diſtinguiſhed from each other by their Powers and Properties.

3. The Eſſences of things, as they are knowable by us, have a Reality in them; for they are founded on the natural Conſtitution of things. And however the abſtract Ideas are the work of the Mind, yet they are not meer Creatures of the Mind; as appears by an Inſtance produced of the Book 3. Chap. 6. Sect. 1. Eſſence of the Sun, being in one ſingle Individual; in which Caſe it is granted, That the Idea may be ſo abſtracted, that more Suns might agree in it, and it is as much a ſort as if there were as many Suns as there are Stars. So that here we have a Real Eſſence ſubſiſtly in one Individual, but capable of being multiplied into more, and the ſame Eſſence remaining. But in this one Sun there is a Real Eſſence, and not a meer Nominal or abſtracted Eſſence; but ſuppoſe there were more Suns, would not each of them have the Real Eſſence of the Sun? For what is it makes the ſecond Sun to be a true Sun, but having the ſame Real Eſſence with the firſt? If it were but a Nominal Eſſence, then the ſecond would have nothing but the Name.

Therefore there muſt be a Real Eſſence in every individual of the ſame kind; for that alone is it which makes it to be what it is. Peter and James, and John are all true and real Men; but what is it which makes them ſo? Is it the attributing a general Name to them? No certainly, but that the true and Real Eſſence of a Man is in every one of them. And we muſt be as certain of this, as we are that they are Men: They take their Denomination of being Men from that common Nature, or Eſſence which is in them.

4. That the general Idea is not made from the ſimple Ideas by the meer Act of the Mind abſtracting from Circumſtances, but from Reaſon and Conſideration of the true Nature of things. For when we ſee ſo many Individuals, that have the ſame Powers and Properties, we thence infer, that there muſt be ſomething common to all, which makes them of one kind; and if the difference of Kinds be real, that which makes them of one kind and not of another, muſt not be a Nominal but Real Eſſence. And this difference doth not depend upon the complex Ideas of Subſtance, whereby Men arbitrarily join Modes together in their Minds; for let them miſtake in the Complication of their Ideas, either in leaving out or putting in what doth not belong to them; and let their Ideas be what they pleaſe, the real Eſſence of a Man, and a Horſe, and a Tree, are juſt what they were; and let their Nominal Eſſences differ never ſo much, the real common Eſſence or Nature of the ſeveral Kinds are not at all alter'd by them.

And theſe real Eſſences are unchangeable; for however there may happen ſome variety in Individuals, by particular Accidents, yet the Eſſences of Men, and Horſes, and Trees, remain always the ſame; becauſe they do not depend on the Ideas of Men, but on the Will of the Creator, who hath made ſeveral ſorts of Beings.

2. Let us now come to the Idea of a Perſon; for although the common Nature in Mankind be the ſame, yet we ſee a difference in the ſeveral Individuals from one another. So that Peter, James, and John, are all of the ſame kind; yet Peter is not James, and James is not John. But what is this diſtinction founded upon? They may be diſtinguiſhed from each other by our Senſes, as to difference of Features, diſtance of Place, &c. but that is not all; for ſuppoſing there were no ſuch external difference, yet there is a difference between them, as ſeveral Individuals in the ſame common Nature. And here lies the true Idea of a Perſon, which ariſes from that manner of Subſiſtence which is in one Individual, and is not communicable to another. An individual, intelligent Subſtance is rather ſuppoſed to the making of a Perſon, than the proper Definition of it; for a Perſon relates to ſomething which doth diſtinguiſh it from another intelligent Subſtance in the ſame Nature; and therefore the Foundation of it lies in the peculiar manner of Subſiſtence, which agrees to one, and to none elſe of the kind; and this is it which is called Perſonality.

But how do our ſimple Ideas help us out in this Matter? Can we learn from them the difference of Nature and Perſon? We may underſtand the difference between abſtracted Ideas, and particular Beings, by the Impreſſions of outward Objects; and we may find an Intelligent Subſtance in our ſelves by inward Perception, but whether that make a Perſon or not, muſt be underſtood ſome other way; for if the meer intelligent Subſtance makes a Perſon, then there cannot be the Union of two Natures, but there muſt be two Perſons.

Therefore a Perſon is a compleat intelligent Subſtance, with a peculiar manner of Subſiſtence; ſo that if it be a part of another Subſtance, it is no Perſon: And on this Account the Soul is no Perſon, becauſe it makes up an entire Being by its Union with the Body.

But when we ſpeak of finite Subſtances and Perſons, we are certain that diſtinct Perſons do imply diſtinct Subſtances, becauſe they have a diſtinct and ſeparate Exiſtence; but this will not hold in an infinite Subſtance where neceſſary Exiſtence doth belong to the Idea of it. And although the Argument from the Idea of God, may not be ſufficient of it ſelf to prove his Being; yet it will hold as to the excluding any thing from him, which is inconſiſtent with neceſſary Exiſtence; therefore, if we ſuppoſe a Diſtinction of Perſons in the ſame Divine Nature, it muſt be in a way agreeable to the infinite Perfections of it. And no objection can be taken from the Idea of God, to overthrow a Trinity of Co-exiſting Perſons in the ſame Divine Eſſence. For neceſſary Exiſtence doth imply a Co-exiſtence of the Divine Perſons; and the Unity of the Divine Eſſence, that there cannot be ſuch a difference of individual Subſtances, as there is among Mankind. But theſe things are ſaid to be above our Reaſon, if not contrary to it; and even ſuch are ſaid to be repugnant to our Religion.

2. That therefore is the next thing to be carefully examin'd, whether Myſteries of Faith, or Matters of Revelation above our Reaſon, are to be rejected by us. And a thing is ſaid to be above our Reaſon, when we can have no clear and diſtinct Idea of it in our Minds: And, that if we have no Ideas of a thing, it is certainly but loſt labour for us to trouble our ſelves about it; and that, if ſuch Doctrines be propoſed which we cannot underſtand, we muſt have new Powers, and Organs for the Perception of them.

Chriſtianity not Myſt. p. 28.

We are far from defending Contradictions to our natural Notions (of which I have ſpoken already) but that which we are now upon is, whether any Doctrine may be rejected, when it is offer'd as a Matter of Faith upon this account, that it is above our Comprehenſion, or that we can have no clear Idea of it in our Minds. And this late Author hath undertaken to prove, That there is nothing ſo Myſterious, or above Reaſon in the Goſpel.

P. 67. To be above Reaſon, he ſaith, may be underſtood two ways. 1. For a thing intelligible in it ſelf, but cover'd with figurative and myſtical Words. 2. For a thing in its own Nature unconceivable, and not to be judged of by our Faculties, tho' it be never ſo clearly revealed. This in either Senſe is the ſame with Myſtery. And from thence he takes occaſion to ſhew his Learning about the Gentile Myſteries, and Eccleſiaſtical Myſteries, which might have been ſpared in this Debate, but only for the Parallel aimed at between them, as to Prieſt-craft and Myſteries; without which a Work of this nature would want its due reliſh with his good Chriſtian Readers. Others we ſee have their Myſteries too; but the comfort is, that they are ſo eaſily underſtood, and ſeen through; as when the Heathen Myſteries, are ſaid, to have been inſtituted at firſt in Commemoration of ſome remarkable Accidents, or to the Honour of ſome great Perſons that obliged the World by their Vertues and uſeful Inventions to pay them ſuch Acknowledgments. He muſt be very dull that doth not underſtand the meaning of this; and yet this Man pretends to vindicate Chriſtianity from being Myſterious.

P. 71.

P. 73. But there are ſome, he ſaith, that being ſtrongly inclined out of Ignorance, or Paſſion, to maintain what was firſt introduced by the Craft or Superſtition of their Fore-fathers, will have ſome Chriſtian Doctrines to be ſtill Myſteries in the ſecond Senſe of the Word; that is, unconceiveable in themſelves, however clearly revealed. I hope there are ſtill ſome, who are ſo throughly perſwaded of the Chriſtian Doctrine, that they dare own and defend it, notwithſtanding all the Flouts and Taunts of a ſort of Men, whoſe Learning and Reaſon lies moſt in expoſing Prieſt-craft, and Myſteries. Suppoſe there are ſuch ſtill in the World, who own their Aſſent to ſome Doctrines of Faith, which they confeſs to be above their Comprehenſion, what mighty Reaſon, and invincible Demonſtration is brought againſt them? He pretends to Demonſtrate; but what I pray? The Point in hand? No. But he will Demonſtrate ſomething inſtead of it? What is that? Why truly, That in the New Teſtament Myſtery is always uſed in the firſt Sence of the Word. And what then? Doth it therefore follow, that there are no Doctrines in the Goſpel above the reach and comprehenſion of our Reaſon? But how doth it appear, that the Word Myſtery is always uſed in that Senſe? When St. Paul ſaith in his firſt Epiſtle to Timothy, Chap. 3 v. 9. That the Deacons muſt hold the Myſtery of Faith in a pure Conſcience; doth he not mean thereby the ſame with the form of ſound Words, which Timothy had heard of him, 2 Tim. 1. 13. And are not all the main Articles of the Chriſtian Faith comprehended under it? Eſpecially that whereinto they were Baptized, in the Name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt: and if the Doctrine of the Trinity were underſtood by this Form, as I have already proved, then this muſt be a part of the Myſtery of Faith. And in the ſame Chapter, v. 16. He makes God manifeſt in the Fleſh, the firſt part of the Myſtery of Godlineſs. If it extends to all the other things, doth it exclude this, which is the firſt mention'd? (And that our Copies are true, is already made to appear.) There is no reaſon therefore to quarrel with our Uſe of the Word Myſtery in this Senſe; but the Debate doth not depend upon the Word, but upon the Senſe of it.

And therefore I paſs over all that relates to the bare uſe of the Word, as not coming up to the main Point; which is, Whether any Point of Doctrine, which contains in it ſomething above our Comprehenſion can be made a Matter of Faith?

P. 145. For our Author concludes from his Obſervations, That Faith is ſo far from being an implicit Aſſent to any thing above Reaſon, that this Notion directly contradicts the end of Religion, the Nature of Man, and the Goodneſs and Wiſdom of God.

But we muſt not be frighted with this bold Concluſion, till we have examin'd his Premiſes; and then we ſhall find, that ſome who are not great Readers, are no deep Reaſoners. P. 75. The firſt thing he premiſes is, That nothing can be ſaid to be a Myſtery, becauſe we have not an adequate Idea of it, or a diſtinct View of all its Properties at once, for then every thing would be a Myſtery. What is the meaning of this, but that we cannot have an adequate Idea of any thing? And yet all our Reaſon depends upon our Ideas according to him, and our clear and diſtinct Ideas are by him made the ſole Foundation of Reaſon. All our ſimple Ideas are ſaid to be adequate, becauſe they are ſaid to be only the Effects of Powers in things which produce Senſations in us. But this doth not prove them adequate as to the things, but only as to our Perceptions. But as to Subſtances we are told, That all our Ideas of them are inadequate. So that the ſhort of this is, that we have no true Knowledge or Comprehenſion of any thing; but we may underſtand Matters of Faith, as well as we underſtand any thing elſe, for in Truth we underſtand nothing. Is not this a method of true Reaſoning to make us reject Doctrines of Faith, becauſe we do not comprehend them, and at the ſame time to ſay, we comprehend nothing? For I appeal to the common Senſe of Mankind, whether we can be ſaid to Comprehend that, which we can have no adequate Idea of? But he appeals to the Learned; for he ſaith, That to Comprehend in all correct Authors is nothing elſe but to know. But what is it to know? Is it not to have adequate Ideas of the things we know? How then can we know, that of which we can have no adequate Idea? For if our Knowledge be limited to our Ideas, our Knowledge muſt be imperfect and inadequate where our Ideas are ſo.

But let us lay theſe things together. Whatever we can have no adequate Idea of is above our Knowledge, and conſequently above our Reaſon; and ſo all Subſtances are above our Reaſon; and yet he ſaith, with great Confidence, That to Aſſent to any thing, above Reaſon, deſtroys Religion, and the Nature of Man, and the Wiſdom and Goodneſs of God. How is it poſſible for the ſame Man to ſay this, and to ſay withal, that it is very conſiſtent with the Nature of Man, and the Goodneſs and Wiſdom fo God to leave us without adequate Ideas of any Subſtance? How come the Myſteries of Faith to require more Knowledge than the Nature of Man is capable of? In natural things we can have no adequate Ideas; but the things are confeſſed to be above our Reaſon; but in Divine and Spiritual things, to aſſent to things above our Reaſon is againſt the Nature of Man.

How can theſe things conſiſt?

But theſe are not Myſteries. Yes, whatever is of that Nature that we can have no Idea of it, is certainly a Myſtery to us. For what is more unknown than it is known is a Myſtery. The true Notion of a Myſtery being ſomething that is hidden from our Knowledge. Of which there may be ſeveral Kinds. For a Myſtery may be taken for Ad. Artic. 4. 87. ed. R. S.

1. Something kept ſecret, but fully underſtood as ſoon as it is diſcover'd; thus Tully in his Epiſtles ſpeaks of Myſteries which he had to tell his Friend, but he would not let his Amanuenſis know; no doubt ſuch things might be very well underſtood as ſoon as diſcover'd.

Acad. 4. 18.

2. Something kept from common Knowledge, although there might be great Difficulties about them when diſcover'd. Thus Tully ſpeaks of Myſteries among the Philoſophers, particularly among the Academicks, who kept up their Doctrine of the Criterion as a Secret, which, when it was known had many Difficulties about it.

De Leg. l. 2. c. 14.

3. Something that Perſons were not admitted to know, but with great Preparation for it. Such were the Athenian Myſteries which Tully mentions with Reſpect, although they deſerved it not; but becauſe they were not Communicated to any but with Difficulty, they were called Myſteries. And this is ſo obvious a piece of Learning, that no great Reading, or deep Reaſoning is required about it. Only it may be obſerved, that the word μυεῖν is oppoſed to ἐποπτᾶν, and ſo the Myſteries related to thoſe who were initiated and not made Epoptæ; i. e. to thoſe who did not throughly underſtand them, although they had more knowledge of them than ſuch as were not initiated. Olympiodorus, in reckoning up the Degrees of Admiſſions, mentions the μυήσεις before ἐποπτεῖαι. So that they were properly Myſteries to ſuch, who knew ſomething; though there were other things farther to be diſcover'd, but they did not yet know what they were, as the Epoptæ did.

Chryſ. Hom. de Reſurrect. Iſidor. Peluſ. l. 2. Ep. 192.

From hence the ancient Chriſtian Writers did not only call the Sacraments, but more abſtruſe Points of Faith by the name of Myſteries; ſo St. Chryſoſtom calls the Reſurrection, a great and ineffable Myſtery. And Iſidore Peluſiota in his Epiſtle to Lampetius ſaith, That St. Paul, when he ſpeaks of the great Myſtery of Godlineſs, doth not mean that it is wholly unknown to us, but that it is impoſſible to comprehend it. Theophylact ſaith, it is therefore called the great Myſtery of Godlineſs; becauſe although it be now revealed to all, yet the manner of it is hidden from us, διὰ τȣτο Μυςήριόν ἐςι. for this reaſon it is called a Myſtery.

Chriſtianity not Myſt. p. 80, 81.

But this is in the way of Reading, let us now come to deep Reaſoning; and ſee how ſtrongly he argues againſt this Senſe of the Word Myſteries: his Words are theſe, They trifle then exceedingly, and diſcover a mighty ſcarcity of better Arguments, who defend their Myſteries, by this pitiful ſhift of drawing Inferences from what is unknown to what is known, or of inſiſting upon adequate Ideas; except they will agree as ſome do, to call every ſpire of Graſs, ſitting and ſtanding, fiſh and fleſh to be Myſteries. And if out of a pertinacious or worſe humour, they will be ſtill fooling, and call theſe things Myſteries, I'm willing to admit as many as they pleaſe in Religion, if they will allow me likewiſe to make mine as intelligible to others, as theſe are to me.

It is eaſie to gueſs whom theſe kind Words were intended for: And are not theſe very modeſt and civil Expreſſions? Trifling, Fooling; out of a pertinacious, or worſe Humour; but why, Fooling about Myſteries, to call ſuch things by that Name, which are in ſome meaſure known, but in a greater meaſure unknown to us? and if theſe are real Myſteries in Nature, why may not the ſame term be uſed for Matters of Faith?

And I think in ſo plain a Caſe, no great ſtore of Arguments need to be uſed. P. 84. But in theſe natural things, he ſaith, we have diſtinct Ideas of the Properties which make the Nominal Eſſence, but we are abſolutely ignorant of the Real Eſſence, or intrinſick Conſtitution of a thing, which is the ground or ſupport of all its Properties. Are not then (without Trifling and Fooling) theſe Real Eſſences Myſteries to them ? They know there are ſuch by the Ideas of their Properties, but know nothing of their Real Eſſence; and yet they will not allow them to be Myſteries? If they do underſtand them, why do they ſay, They do not, nor cannot? And if this be true, let them call them what they pleaſe, they muſt be inexplicable Myſteries to them. So that all this is mere quarrelling about a Word, which they would fain be rid of, if they knew how; but they involve and perplex themſelves more by their own deep Reaſonings againſt the Trifling and Fooling of others.

But he ſaith, That ſome would have the moſt palpable abſurdities and groſs Contradictions to go down, or words that ſignifie nothing, becauſe men cannot comprehend the Eſſence of their own Souls, nor the Eſſence of God, and other Spiritual Subſtances. We utterly deny, that any Article of our Faith contains in it any palpable Abſurdities, or groſs Contradictions (as I hope hath been proved already as to the Doctrine of the Trinity which is chiefly ſtruck at) but ſurely your deep Reaſoners may find a difference between groſs Contradictions to our Reaſon, and barely being above it, or not having any diſtinct Conception of the Nature of it. And that is all that we aſſert, and which they grant as to all Subſtances.

If this be their way of arguing, they may even return to Tranſubſtantiation again, without any great leſſening of their Underſtandings. But none are ſo bold in attacking the Myſteries of the Chriſtian Faith; as the Smatterers in Ideas, and new Terms of Philoſophy, without any true Underſtanding of them. For theſe Ideas are become but another ſort of Canting with ſuch Men; and they would reaſon as well upon Genus and Species, or upon Occult Qualities, and Subſtantial Forms, but only that they are Terms out of Faſhion.

But we find that the change of Terms doth neither improve nor alter Mens Underſtandings; but only their Ways of Speaking; and ill Gameſters will not manage their Game one jot the better, for having new Cards in their hands. However we muſt ſee what Work they make of it.

P. 86. Although we do not know the Nature of the Soul, yet we know as much of it, as we do of any thing elſe, if not more, i. e. we really know nothing by any adequate Idea of it, but we muſt believe nothing, but what we have a clear diſtinct Idea of. Is not this a rare way of fixing the Boundaries of Faith and Reaſon; As to God and his Attributes, it is ſaid. P. 81. That they are not Myſteries to us for want of an adequate Idea; no not Eternity. P. 88. And in another place, As to God, we comprehend nothing better than his Attributes.

Let us try this, by the Attribute pitched on by himſelf; viz. Eternity. We ſee he pretends to comprehend nothing better than the Divine Attributes; and Eternity as well as any; (which I am very apt to believe) but how doth he Comprehend Eternity? P. 82. Even by finding, That it cannot be Comprehended. Is not this Subtle and deep Reaſoning? But Reaſon he ſaith, performs its part in finding out the true Nature of Things; and if ſuch be the Nature of the Thing, that it cannot be Comprehended, then Reaſon can do no more, and ſo it is not above Reaſon. Was there ever ſuch Trifling that pretended to Reaſon; and that about the higheſt Matters, and with Scorn and Contempt of others whom he calls Myſterious Wits? The Queſtion is, whether any thing ought to be rejected as an Article of Faith, becauſe we cannot comprehend it, or have a clear and diſtinct Perception of it: He concludes it muſt be ſo, or elſe we overthrow Religion, and the Nature of Man, and the Wiſdom and Goodneſs of God. Here is an Eſſential Attribute of God, viz. his Eternity. Am I bound to believe it or not? Yes, doubtleſs. But how can I comprehend this Attribute of Eternity? Very eaſily. How ſo? Do not you comprehend that it is incomprehenſible? What then? Doth this reach the Nature of the thing, or only the manner of our Conception? If the Nature of the thing be, that it cannot be comprehended, then you rightly underſtand the Nature of the thing, and ſo it is not above your Reaſon. Let the Caſe be now put to the Trinity; do you believe the Doctrine of it, as of Divine Revelation? No, God hath given me the Nature and Faculties of a Man; and I can believe nothing, which I cannot have a diſtinct and clear Idea of, otherwiſe I muſt have new Faculties. Will you hold to this Principle? Then you muſt believe nothing, which you cannot have a clear and diſtinct Idea of. Very true. But can you have a clear and diſtinct Idea of what you cannot comprehend? A clear Idea is that whereof the mind hath a full and evident Perception. A diſtinct Idea is that whereby the Mind perceives the difference of it from all others. Is this right? Yes. But can you have a full and evident Perception of a thing, ſo as to difference it from all others, when you grant it to be incomprehenſible? If you have a full Perception of it, you comprehend its Nature, and eſpecially if you can difference it from all other things; but when you ſay, its Nature is incomprehenſible, and yet believe it, you muſt deny it to be neceſſary to Faith, to have a clear and diſtinct Idea of the thing propoſed. And if it be repugnant to your Faculties to reject the Trinity, becauſe you cannot have a clear and diſtinct Idea of it; for the ſame Reaſon you muſt unavoidably reject his Eternity, and all other Attributes which have Infinity joined with them.

P. 83. But we muſt ſtop here, becauſe this admirable Undertaker hath ſaid, That he deſpairs not of rendring Eternity and Infinity as little myſterious, as that three and two make five. And till then I take my leave of him.

And ſo I return to our profeſſed Unitarians, who in anſwer to my Sermon fell upon the ſame Subject; and it is neceſſary that I conſider ſo much as tends to the clearing of it. In my Sermon I had urged this Argument to prove, that we may be bound to believe ſome things that are incomprehenſible to us, becauſe the Divine Nature and Attributes are acknowledged to be; and I had ſaid,

(1.) That there is no greater Difficulty in the Conception of the Trinity and Incarnation, than there is of Eternity. Not but that there is great Reaſon to believe it; but from hence it appears, that our Reaſon may oblige us to believe ſome things, which it is not poſſible for us to comprehend.

And what ſay our Unitarians to this?

They charge my Notion of Eternity (as they call it) with a Contradiction.

Anſwer to Serm. p. 5. The beſt way of proceeding will be to ſet down my own Words, which are theſe. "We know that either God muſt have been for ever, or it is "impoſſible he ever ſhould be; for if he ſhould come into being when he "was not, he muſt have ſome Cauſe of his Being, and that which was "the firſt Cauſe would be God. But if he was for ever, he muſt be from "himſelf; and what Notion or Conception can we have in our Minds "concerning it?

To this ſay they, To ſay a Perſon or thing is from it ſelf, is a Contradiction; it implies this Contradiction, it was before it was. And they are ſorry an Eternal God muſt be a Contradiction. What a falſe and ſpiteful Inference is this?

But it had look'd like very deep Reaſoning, if I had ſaid, That God was the Cauſe of himſelf; for that would have implied the Contradiction he had charged it with: but I had expreſly excluded his being from any Cauſe; and the thing I urged was only the Impoſſibility of our having a clear and diſtinct Conception of Eternity. For if he could have no Cauſe, what could we think of his being Eternal? If to be from himſelf as a Cauſe, be unconceivable, (as I grant it is) then it proves what I deſigned, that we cannot have any diſtinct Idea of Eternity. But to be from himſelf, in the Senſe generally underſtood, is a meer Negative Expreſſion; for no Men were ſuch

Fools to imagine any thing could be before it ſelf; and in this Senſe only Learned Men have told us, that it is to be underſtood by thoſe ancient and modern Writers, who have uſed that Expreſſion; as when St. Jerom ſaith, That God is ſelf-originated; and St. Auguſtin, that God is the Cauſe of his own Wiſdom; and Lanctantius, that God made himſelf. All theſe, and ſuch like Expreſſions, are only to be negatively underſtood. Poſſevin. Appar. in Genebrard.

But I confeſs I aimed at ſhewing, that it was impoſſible for us to have any clear and diſtinct Idea of Eternity; and therefore I took in all poſſible ways of conceiving it, either by God's being from himſelf, or his Co-exiſting with all differences of Time, without any ſucceſſion in his own Being, or his having a ſucceſſive Duration. From all which I argued the Impoſſibility of a clear Notion of Eternity. And now what do theſe Men do? They diſpute againſt one of theſe Notions, and very triumphantly expoſe, as they think, the Abſurdities of it. And what then? Why then this Notion will not do. But I ſay none will do.

I prove there can be no ſucceſſive Duration in a Being of neceſſary Exiſtence; and that it is not to be conceived, how without Succeſſion God ſhould be preſent with the Being and not Being, the Promiſe and Performance of the ſame thing; and yet one of theſe ways we muſt make uſe of. From whence I concluded, That all we can attain to is a full Satisfaction of our Reaſon concerning God's Eternity, although we can form no diſtinct Conception of it in our Minds. But when theſe Men, inſtead of anſwering the Argument from all the Notions of Eternity, only diſpute againſt one Notion of it, they apparently ſhew the weakneſs of their Cauſe, if it will bear no other Defences but ſuch as this. For I take it, that the main Debate in point of Reaſon depends upon this, whether we can be certain of the Being of a Thing, of which we can have no clear and diſtinct Idea? If we may, then it can be no Objection in point of Revelation, that we can have no clear and diſtinct Idea of the Matter revealed; ſince there can be no Reaſon to tie us up ſtricter in Point of Revelation than we are without it. If we can be certain in Reaſon of many things we can have no ſuch Ideas of, what imaginable Reaſon can there be, that a point of Faith ſhould be rejected on that account?

2. I urged another Attribute of God, viz. his Spirituality, for the ſame Reaſon; viz. that we are ſatisfied in point of Reaſon that God muſt be a Spirit, and yet we cannot have a clear diſtinct poſitive Notion of a Spirit.

And what Anſwer do they give to this? As wiſe as the former. Why truly, I had no cauſe to object this againſt them, becauſe they own the Spirituality of God's Nature, and none ſince Biddle have denied it. P. 6.

Very well! but doth my Argument proceed upon that, or upon the not having a diſtinct and clear Idea of a Spirit? It was hardly poſſible for Men ſo to miſtake my meaning, unleſs they did it becauſe they had no other Anſwer to give.

3. I argued from God's Preſcience, which I do expreſly aſſert, and prove that they cannot have a diſtinct Notion of it; nay that Socinus denied it, becauſe he could not underſtand it.

But here they tell me, I cannot defend our Doctrine againſt theirs without finding Contradictions in God's Eternity and Foreknowledge. If this be the Ingenuity and Juſtice and Charity of the Unitarians, commend me to the honeſt-hearted Deiſts, if there be any ſuch, as they aſſure us there are. One had better be charged with Trifling and Fooling with Myſteries, than with undermining the main foundations of Religion, by charging them with Contradictions. P. 7.

But nothing could be farther from my Thoughts, than any thing tending that way. And ſuch a baſe Calumny is too much honoured with a Confutation. But do they offer to clear the Difficulty, and give us a clear and di- diſtinct Idea of God's foreknowing future Events without a certain Cauſe to make them future? Nothing like it. For the queſtion is not, Whether a thing be neceſſary, becauſe God foreſees it as certain? (as they ſuppoſe) But how of a thing merely poſſible it comes to be certain without a certain Cauſe; and how a thing which hath no certain Cauſe, can be certainly foreknown; and what clear and diſtinct Notion we can have of this in our Minds. If they had anſwer'd this, they had ſaid ſomething to the purpoſe. To reſolve all into God's infinite Wiſdom, is a good Anſwer from us, but not from them. For we think it our Duty to ſatisfie our ſelves with what God hath revealed, without prying into the manner of things above our Comprehenſion; but theſe Men who will receive nothing but what they have clear and diſtinct Ideas of, ought to ſhew the manner of this, or elſe we muſt be excuſed on the ſame reaſon, if we allow the manner of the divine Subſiſtences in the ſame Eſſence to be above our Comprehenſion.

4. I ſhew'd how unreaſonable their Demands were, when the Nature of God is owned to be incomprehenſible, and his Perfections infinite.

And now of a ſudden they are quite turned about; for before, they were only for fencing and warding off Blows, but at laſt they come to the point, and own the Being of God to be comprehenſible by them; and that they have clear and diſtinct Ideas of God's infinite Attributes. This is indeed to the purpoſe, if they can make theſe things out. But Fencers have many tricks, and I wiſh we find none here. I had ſaid, “That in conſequence to the Aſſertion, that nothing is to be believ'd, but what may be comprehended, the very Being of God muſt be rejected too, becauſe his Being is incomprehenſible, and ſo they muſt reject one God as well as three Perſons.

P. 7. To this they reply, That to comprehend the Being or Exiſtence of God is only this, to comprehend that God is; and if we cannot comprehend that, all Religion ceaſes. Is not this a fine turn? What I ſaid of God as to the Perfections of his Nature, they will have it underſtood of his bare Exiſtence, which I do not mention. When God is ſaid to be an incomprehenſible Being, who before them did underſtand the meaning to be, That we cannot comprehend that there is a God: This is not mere trifling, for it looks like ſomething worſe; and yet they preſently after ſay, That to comprehend a thing is to have a clear adequate Conception of it. And will they pretend to have ſuch a one
P. 5. of the divine Eſſence, when they confeſs but a little before, That we converſe every day with very many things, none of which we comprehend, and that I might have ſpared my pains in proving it? But what can be the meaning of theſe ſayings, They cannot comprehend the common Natures of things, nor have a clear and diſtinct Idea of them, but they can comprehend an infinite Being, whom all Mankind own to be incomprehenſible. But as to divine Attributes, they ſay, They have clear, diſtinct and adequate Conceptions of them, and inſtance in Eternity, Power, Wiſdom and Juſtice. We do not deny that in ſuch Attributes which we apply to God, becauſe we find them to be Perfections in us, we have a diſtinct and clear Perception of them, as they are conſider'd in themſelves, for that is the reaſon why we attribute them to God. But for ſuch as peculiarly belong to God, as Eternity doth; and for the degrees of other Attributes as they belong to him, as they are infinite, ſo they are above our Comprehenſion. (1.) As to Eternity, ſay they, it is a clear and diſtinct Notion of Eternity, to ſay, it is a Duration without beginning and without end.

But we can have no clear and diſtinct notion of Duration, when applied to a Being that hath neceſſary Exiſtence; for Duration, they ſay, conſiſts in a Succeſſion. And what Succeſſion can there be in a Being which always is the ſame, if there were no difference of times, i. e. God was the ſame Being before time was, and is the very ſame Being under all the differences of times; he hath not any other Duration now than he had before; and what Succeſſion could there be where there was no time? But we make uſe of Duration with reſpect to things done in time, and for the help of our Underſtandings apply the meaſure of time to divine Acts. But in a neceſſary Exiſtence, there can be no paſt, preſent or to come; and in a ſucceſſive Duration, there muſt be conceived a longer continuance from time to time; which is repugnant to the Notion of a Being which always is. So that if we cannot conceive Eternity without Duration, nor Duration without Succeſſion, nor can apply Succeſſion to a Being which hath neceſſary Exiſtence, then we can have no clear and diſtinct Notion of God's Eternity. (2.) As to the Infiniteneſs of God's Perfections, they ſay, That although the Mind be in it ſelf finite, yet it hath an infinite Comprehenſion, for what is finite with reſpect to its Extenſion of parts, may be infinite in other reſpects, and with reſpect to ſome of its Powers. But how doth it appear that we have any Power to comprehend what is infinite? All the Power we have extends only to adding and enlarging our Ideas without bounds, i. e. we can put no ſtop to our Apprehenſions, but ſtill they may go farther than we can poſſibly think, but is this an infinite Comprehenſion? So far from it, that this ſhews our Capacities to be finite, becauſe our Ideas cannot go ſo far as our Reaſon. For our Reaſon tells us, we can never go ſo far, but we may ſtill go farther: but it is impoſſible for our Underſtanding to have diſtinct Ideas of the infinite moments in an eternal Succeſſion of the utmoſt Bounds of Immenſity, or of the extent of infinite Power and Knowledge; ſince the very Notion of Infinite implies, that we can ſet no bounds to our Thoughts; and therefore although the Infinity of the divine Attributes be evident to our Reaſon; yet it is likewiſe evident to our Reaſon, that what is infinite muſt be above our Comprehenſion.

P. 8.

II. I come now to the laſt enquiry, which is, that if we allow things above our Reaſon, what ſtop can be put to any abſurd Doctrine, which we may be required to believe?

And this is that which our Unitarians object in all their late Pamphlets. In anſwer to my Sermon they ſay, That on our principles, our Reaſon would be in vain, and all Science and Certainty would be deſtroy'd, which they repeat ſeveral times. And from hence they do ſo frequently inſiſt on the Parallel between the Doctrine of the Trinity and Tranſubſtantiation: They ſay, That all the defence we have made for one will ſerve for the other, or any other abſurd and impoſſible Doctrine. That what we ſay will equally ſerve all the Nonſenſe, and impoſſible Doctrines that are to be found among Men; and they particularly inſtance in Tranſubſtantiation. I need mention no more. But I did not expect to have found this Parallel ſo often inſiſted upon, without an anſwer to two Dialogues purpoſely written on that Subject, at a time when the Doctrine of the Trinity was uſed as an Argument to bring in Tranſubſtantiation, as that is now alledged for caſting off the other.

P. 67.
Letter of Reſolut. p. 3
Conſiderat. on the Explication, &c. by Dr. W. p. 30.

But I muſt do them that right to tell the World, that at that time a Socinian Anſwer was written to thoſe Dialogues, which I ſaw, and wiſh'd it might be printed, that the World might be ſatisfied about it and them. But they thought fit to forbear; and in all their late Pamphlets, where this Parallel is ſo often repeated, there is but once, that I can find, any notice taken of thoſe Dialogues, and that in a very ſuperficial manner. For the main Deſign and Scope of them is paſt over, and only one particular mention'd, which ſhall be anſwer'd in its due order.

But in anſwer to the general Enquiry, I ſhall endeavour to ſtate the due bounds between Faith and Reaſon, and thereby to ſhew, that by thoſe grounds on which we receive the Doctrine of the Trinity, we do not give way to the Entertainment of any abſurd Opinion, nor overthrow the Certainty of Reaſon.

1. We have no difference with them about the Uſe of our Reaſon as to the Certainty of a Revelation. For in this caſe, we are as much as they for ſearching into the grounds of our Faith; for we look on it as a reaſonable Act of our Minds, and if we did not allow this, we muſt declare our ſelves to believe without grounds. And if we have grounds for our Faith, we can expreſs them in Words that are intelligible; and if we can give an account of our Faith in an intelligible manner, and with a deſign to give others ſatisfaction about it, I think this is making uſe of our Reaſon in Matters of Faith.

2. We have no difference with them about the uſe of our Reaſon, as to the true Senſe of Revelation. We never ſay, that Men are bound to believe upon the bare ſound of Words without examining the Senſe of them. We allow all the beſt and moſt reaſonable ways of attaining to it, by Copies, Languages, Verſions, comparing of Places, and eſpecially the Senſe of the Chriſtian Church in the beſt and pureſt Ages, neareſt the Apoſtolical Times, and expreſs'd in ſolemn and publick Acts.

By theſe Rules of Reaſon we are willing to proceed, and not by any late and uncertain methods of interpreting Scripture.

3. We differ not with them about the right uſe of the Faculties which God hath given us, of right Underſtanding ſuch matters as are offer'd to our Aſſent. For it is to no purpoſe to require them to believe, who cannot uſe the Faculties which are neceſſary in order to it. Which would be like giving the Benefit of the Clergy to a Man with a Cataract in both his Eyes. And it would be very unreaſonable to put his Life upon that Iſſue, whether he could read or not, becauſe he had the ſame Organs of Seeing that other Men had; for in this caſe the whole matter depended not on the Organ but the Uſe of it: This needs no Application.

4. We differ not with them about rejecting ſome Matters propoſed to our Belief, which are contradictory to the Principles of Senſe and Reaſon. It is no great argument of ſome Mens Reaſon, whatever they pretend to talk againſt admitting ſeeming Contradictions in Religion; for who can hinder ſeeming Contradictions? Which ariſe from the ſhallowneſs of Mens Capacities, and not from the repugnancy of Things: and who can help Mens Underſtandings? But where there is evident proof of a Contradiction to the Principles of Senſe and Reaſon; we are very far from owning any ſuch thing to be an Article of Faith, as in the caſe of Tranſubſtantiation. Which we reject, not only, as having no foundation in Scripture, but as repugnant to the common Principles of Senſe and Reaſon; as is made to appear in the two Dialogues before mention'd.

Conſiderat. on the Explication by Dr. W. p. 30.

But our Unitarians find fault with the Author of them, for laying the force of his argument upon this, That there are a great many more Texts for the Trinity, than are pretended for Tranſubſtantiation; whereas many other arguments are inſiſted on, and particularly the great abſurdity of it in point of Reaſon, Dial. 2. from p. 33. to the end. And it is not the bare number of Texts, which he relies upon, but upon the greater Evidence and Clearneſs of the Text on one ſide than on the other, which depends upon figurative Words, not capable of a literal Senſe without overthrowing the Doctrine deſigned to be proved by it. See with what Ingenuity theſe Men treat the Defenders of the Trinity, and the Enemies to Tranſubſtantiation, which they call only a Philoſophical Error or Folly; but the Doctrine of the Trinity is charged with Nonſenſe, Contradiction, and Impoſſibilities.

Anſwer to Archbiſh. p. 21.

But wherein then lies the difference in point of Reaſon? For thus far I have ſhew'd, that we are far from overthrowing Reaſon or giving way to any abſurd Doctrines. It comes at laſt to the point already treated of in this Chapter, how far we may be obliged to believe a Doctrine which carries in it ſomething above our Reaſon; or of which we cannot have any clear and diſtinct Ideas. And of this I hope I have given a ſufficient Account in the foregoing Diſcourſe.

AN
TO Mr. LOCKE's LETTER,

Concerning Some Paſſages Relating to his ESSAY of Humane Underſtanding: Mention'd in the late Diſcourſe in Vindication of the Trinity. With a POSTSCRIPT in anſwer to ſome Reflections made on that Treatiſe in a late Socinian Pamphlet.

SIR,

I HAVE ſeriouſly conſider'd the Letter you were pleaſed to ſend me, and I find it made up of two Parts; A Complaint of me, and a Vindication of your ſelf: To both which I ſhall return as clear and diſtinct an Anſwer, and in as few words, as the matter will permit.

1. As to the Complaint of me, it runs quite through the Book, and even your Poſtſcript is full of it.

The Subſtance of it is, that in anſwering Objections againſt the Trinity, in point of Reaſon, I produce ſeveral Paſſages out of your Eſſay of Humane Underſtanding, as if they were intended by you to that Purpoſe; but you declare to the World, p. 150. that it was written by you without any Thought of the Controverſie between the Trinitarians and Unitarians; and p. 224. That your Notions about Ideas have no Connexion with any Objections that are made by others againſt the Doctrine of the Trinity, or againſt Myſteries. And therefore you complain of it, as an Injury done to you, in imputing that to you, which you have not done, p. 95. or at leaſt in leaving it ſo doubtfull, that the Reader cannot diſtinguiſh who is meant, p. 96. and this you call my peculiar way of Writing in this part of my Treatiſe.

Now to give you and others ſatisfaction as to this matter, I ſhall firſt give an account of the Occaſion of it, and then ſhew what Care I took to prevent Miſunderſtanding about it.

The Occaſion was this, Being to anſwer the Objections in Point of Reaſon, (which had not been anſwered before) the firſt I mention'd, was, That it was above Reaſon, and therefore not to be believed; in anſwer to this, I propoſed two Things to be conſider'd; 1. What we underſtand by Reaſon. 2. What Ground in Reaſon there is to reject any Doctrine above it, when it is propoſed as a matter of Faith.

As to the former I obſerv'd that the Unitarians in their late Pamphlets talk'd very much of clear and diſtinct Ideas and Perceptions, and that the Myſteries of Faith were repugnant to them, but never went about to ſtate the Nature and Bounds of Reaſon in ſuch a manner as thoſe ought to have done who make it the Rule and Standard of what they are to believe. But I added, that a late Author in a Book, call'd Chriſtianity not Myſterious, had taken upon him to clear this Matter, whom for that cauſe I was bound to conſider; the deſign of his Diſcourſe related wholly to Matters of Faith, and not to Philoſophical Speculations; ſo that there can be no Diſpute about his Application of thoſe he calls Principles of Reaſon and Certainty.

When the mind makes uſe of intermediate Ideas to diſcover the Agreement or Diſagreement of the Ideas received into them, this Method of Knowledge, he ſaith, is properly called Reaſon or Demonſtration.

The Mind, as he goes on, receives Ideas two ways:

1. By Intromiſſion of the Senſes.
2. By conſidering its own Operations.

And theſe ſimple and diſtinct Ideas, are the ſole Matter and Foundation of all our Reaſoning.

And ſo all our Certainty is reſolved into two things, either immediate Perception, which is ſelf-Evidence, or the uſe of intermediate Ideas, which diſcovers the Certainty of any thing dubious; which is what he calls Reaſon.

Now this I ſaid did ſuppoſe,

“ That we muſt have clear and diſtinct Ideas of what-ever we pretend to any Certainty of in our minds (by Reaſon) and that the only way to attain this Certainty is by comparing theſe Ideas together; which excludes all Certainty of Faith or Reaſon, where we cannot have ſuch clear and diſtinct Ideas.

From hence I proceeded to ſhew, that we could not have ſuch clear and diſtinct Ideas, as were neceſſary in the preſent Debate, either by Senſation or Reflection, and conſequently we could not attain to any Certainty about it; for which, I inſtanced in the Nature of Subſtance and Perſon, and the Diſtinction between them.

And by vertue of theſe Principles I ſaid, “ That I did not wonder, that the Gentlemen of this new way of Reaſoning had almoſt diſcarded Subſtance out of the Reaſonable part of the World. Which Expreſſion you tell me you do not underſtand. But if you had pleaſed to have look'd back on the Words juſt before, a perſon of your Sagacity could not have miſſed the Meaning I intended. Which are, Now this is the caſe of Subſtance; it is not intromitted by the Senſes, nor depends upon the Operations of the Mind, and cannot be within the compaſs of our Reaſon.

P. 6. But you ſay, That if I mean that you deny or doubt that there is in the World any ſuch thing as Subſtance, I ſhall acquit you of it, if I look into ſome Paſſages in your Book which you refer to. But this is not the point before us, whether you do own Subſtance or not? but whether by vertue of theſe Principles, you can come to any Certainty of Reaſon about it? And I ſay, the very places you produce do prove the contrary; which I ſhall therefore ſet down in your own Words, both as to Corporeal and Spiritual Subſtances.

P. 7. When we talk or think of any particular ſort of Corporeal Subſtance, as Horſe, Stone, &c. tho' the Idea we have of either of them be but the Complication or Collection of thoſe ſeveral ſimple Ideas of ſenſible Qualities which we uſe to find united in the thing called Horſe or Stone, yet becauſe we cannot conceive how they ſhould ſubſiſt alone, or one in another, we ſuppoſe them exiſting in and ſupported by ſome common ſubject, which Support we denote by the name Subſtance, tho' it be certain we have no clear or diſtinct Idea of that thing we ſuppoſe a Support. The ſame happens concerning Operations of the Mind, viz. Thinking, Reaſoning, &c. which we conſidering not to ſubſiſt of themſelves, nor apprehending how they can belong to Body or be produced by it, we are apt to think theſe the Actions of ſome other Subſtance, which we call Spirit, whereby yet it is evident, that having no other Notion or Idea of Matter, but ſomething wherein thoſe many ſenſible Qualities, which affect our Senſes do ſubſiſt, by ſuppoſing a Subſtance wherein Thinking,
P. 8. Knowing, Doubting, and a Power of Moving, &c. do ſubſiſt, we have as clear a Notion of the Nature or Subſtance of Spirit as we have of Body, the one being ſuppoſed to be (without knowing what it is) the Subſtratum to thoſe ſimple Ideas we have from without, and the other ſuppoſed (with a like Ignorance of what it is) to be the Subſtratum to thoſe Operations which we experiment in our ſelves. You mention tion other places to the ſame purpoſe, but theſe are ſufficient for mine. P. 9. Theſe and the like faſhions of ſpeaking, you ſay intimate, that the Subſtance is ſuppoſed always ſomething, &c. I grant that you ſay over and over, that Subſtance is ſuppoſed: but that is not what I looked for, but ſomething in the way of Certainty by Reaſon. Yes, you ſay, we cannot conceive how theſe ſenſible Qualities ſhould ſubſiſt alone, and therefore we ſuppoſe a Subſtance to ſupport them. It is but ſuppoſing ſtill, becauſe we cannot conceive it otherwiſe. But what Certainty follows barely from our not being able to Conceive? Are there not multitudes of Things which we are not able to conceive, and yet it would not be allowed us to ſuppoſe what we think fit on that account? I could hardly conceive that Mr. L. would have brought ſuch Evidence as this againſt himſelf; but I muſt ſuppoſe ſome unknown Subſtratum in this Caſe.

But you go on, That as long as there is any ſimple Idea, or ſenſible Quality left, according to my way of Arguing, Subſtance cannot be diſcarded, becauſe all ſimple Ideas, all ſenſible Qualities carry with them a ſuppoſition of a Subſtratum to exiſt in and of a Subſtance wherein they inhere. What is the meaning of carrying with them a ſuppoſition of a Subſtratum and a Subſtance? Have theſe ſimple Ideas the Notion of a Subſtance in them? No, but they carry it with them. How ſo? Do ſenſible Qualities carry a Corporeal Subſtance along with them? Then a Corporeal Subſtance muſt be intromitted by the Senſes together with them. No; but they carry the Suppoſition with them. And truly that is burden enough for them. But which way do they carry it? It ſeems it's only becauſe we cannot conceive it otherwiſe. What is this Conceiving? It may be ſaid that it is an Act of the Mind, not built on ſimple Ideas, but lies in comparing the Ideas of Accident and Subſtance together, and from thence finding that an Accident muſt carry Subſtance along with it? But this will not clear it; for the Ideas of Accidents are ſimple Ideas, and carry nothing along with them, but the Impreſſion made by ſenſible Objects: and the Idea of Subſtance comes in by way of Suppoſition with the other: ſo that it is not the comparing two Ideas together, but the ſuppoſing one Idea from another, and that a very obſcure and confuſed one too, as is confeſſed, viz. That it is ſomething which ſupports Accidents, and was found out for that ſubſtantial End. As appears from theſe remarkable words of yours.

Book 2. Ch. 13. Sect. 19. They who firſt ran into the Notion of Accidents, as a ſort of real Beings that needed ſomething to inhere in, were forc'd to find out the word Subſtance to ſupport them. Had the poor Indian Philoſopher but thought of this word Subſtance, he needed not to have been at the trouble to find an Elephant to ſupport it, and a Tortoiſe to ſupport his Elephant. The word ſubſtance would have done it effectually. And it might have been taken for as good an Anſwer from an Indian Philoſopher, that Subſtance without knowing what it is, is that which ſupports the Earth, as we take it for a ſufficient Anſwer, and good Doctrine from our European Philoſophers, that Subſtance without knowing what it is, is that which ſupports Accidents. P. 14. What can be ridiculing the Notion of Subſtance, and the European Philoſophers for aſſerting it, if this be not? I forbear now your Repetition of it; becauſe I ſee it doth not pleaſe you. Ch. 23. Sect. 2. But truly it was not to upbraid you with the bare Repetition as a fault in Writing (many of which I am too much ſenſible of my ſelf, to blame it in others) but only to ſhew that it was not a ſudden Fancy, but a deliberate, and (as you thought) a lucky Similitude.

P. 11. But you ſay, You would be glad to hear a clearer and more diſtinct Idea of Subſtance, but you can find no better in your own Thoughts, or in the Books of Logicians. Are not theſe Logicians a ſort of European Philoſophers, who were deſpiſed ſo much before, for this very Notion of Subſtance? Even Burgerſdicius and Sanderſon (whom you quote) were ſo, as well as many others of the dull Tribe of Logicians.

But I do not find fault with the Definition of Subſtance brought by Logicians; for they do not ſay, that it was found out only to ſupport Accidents, but they ſay, it firſt implies a Subſiſtence by it ſelf; and then that it ſupports Accidents: But you ſay, The former implies no more than that Subſtance is a Thing, or Being; or in ſhort, ſomething they know not what. Is there no difference between the bare Being of a Thing, and its Subſiſtence by it ſelf? I had thought Accidents or Modes of Matter which make ſenſible Impreſſions on us, were Things or Beings, or elſe there could be no effect of them; but you will not ſay they ſubſiſt of themſelves, and are in no other thing as the proper ſubject of them, and you confeſs at laſt, that Subſtance doth imply that it is not ſupported it ſelf as a Mode or Accident. So that our European Philoſophers happen to be in the right at laſt.

P. 12. Well! but I would think it hard to be thought to diſcard every thing which I do not comprehend; for I own Myſteries. Why then ſhould I charge others for diſcarding Subſtance, becauſe they have but a confuſed Idea of it? This is the force of the Charge which I bring into as few words as may be, but without the leaſt Intention to abate the ſtrength of it.

To which I anſwer, That I do not charge them with diſcarding the Notion of Subſtance, becauſe they have but an imperfect Idea of it; but becauſe upon thoſe Principles there can be no certain Idea at all of it: whereas I aſſert it to be one of the moſt natural and certain Ideas in our Minds, becauſe it is a Repugnance to our firſt conception of Things that Modes or Accidents ſhould ſubſiſt by themſelves; and therefore I ſaid the Rational Idea of Subſtance is one of the firſt Ideas in our Minds; and however imperfect and obſcure our Notion be, yet we are as certain that Subſtances are and muſt be, as that
P. 22. there are any Beings in the World. Herein you tell me you agree with me, and therefore you hope this is no Objection againſt the Trinity. I never thought it was, but to lay all Foundation of Certainty as to matters of Faith upon clear and diſtinct Ideas, which was the Opinion I oppoſed, does certainly overthrow all Myſteries of Faith, and excludes the Notion of Subſtance out of Rational Diſcourſe, which at length you apprehend to have been my meaning.

P. 35. But, ſay you, if any aſſert, that we can have no Ideas but from Senſation or Reflection, you declare, that this is not your Opinion. I am very glad of it: And I will do you all the Right I can in this matter. But we muſt take your Meaning from your own words. And there are three Particulars you expreſs it in.

P. 25. (1.) That your Meaning was, to ſignifie all thoſe Complex Ideas of Modes, Relations, and ſpecifick Subſtances, which the Mind forms out of ſimple Ideas. So that theſe Ideas are allowed by you although they come not by Senſation or Reflection. But is not the Notion of particular Subſtances a Complex Idea, becauſe it is a Complication of ſimple Ideas, as will preſently appear from your own words; but all ſimple Ideas come in by Senſation and Reflexion. But you may ſay the Combination of them to make one Idea, is an Act of the Mind, and ſo this Idea is not from Senſation or Reflection. It ſeems then, the Mind hath a Power to form one Complex Idea out of many ſimple ones, and this makes a true Idea of a particular Subſtance not coming in by Senſation or Reflexion. But I am ſtill to ſeek, how this comes to make an Idea of Subſtance; I underſtand it very well to be a Complex Idea of ſo many Accidents put together; but I cannot underſtand, how a Complex Idea of Accidents ſhould make an Idea of Subſtance. And till you do this you are as far as ever from a true Idea of Subſtance, notwithſtanding your Complex Ideas.

P. 38. (2.) You never ſaid that the general Idea of Subſtance comes in by Senſation or Reflection. And if there be any Expreſſions that ſeem to aſſert it to be by a Complication of ſimple Ideas, (and not by Abſtracting and Inlarging them) be-
P. 28, 29. cauſe we accuſtom our ſelves to ſuppoſe a Subſtratum; it ought to be look'd on as a ſlip of the Pen, or a Negligence of Expreſſion. In which Caſes, I think no Man ought to be ſevere. But was there not too much occaſion given for others to think, that the Idea of particular Subſtance was only a Complication of ſimple Ideas; and becauſe all ſimple Ideas do come in, you ſay, only by Senſation and Reflection, therefore all the Ideas of particular Subſtance (which is but a Complication of them) muſt either come in thoſe ways, or elſe we can have no true Idea of particular Subſtance at all?

So that there are Two things, wherein you are very far from giving Satisfaction.

P. 32. 1. That although you ſay, That the Idea of Subſtance in general is made by Abſtraction; yet you add, That all the Ideas we have of particular diſtinct Subſtances are nothing but ſeveral Combinations of ſimple Ideas. From whence it is plain, that according to your repeated Aſſertions, we can have no Idea of particular and diſtinct Subſtances, but what is made up of a Complication of ſimple Ideas; and although there may be ſome abſtracted Notion or general Idea of Subſtance, which is only an act of the Mind, yet there is no real Idea of any particular Subſtance, but what is a Complication of ſimple Ideas. And Book 2. ch. 23. Sect. 6. that a Man hath no other Idea of any Subſtance, let it be Gold, or Horſe, Iron, Man, Vitriol, Bread, but what he has barely of thoſe ſenſible Qualities, which he ſuppoſes to inhere with a ſuppoſition of ſuch a Subſtratum, as gives as it were a ſupport to thoſe Qualities or ſimple Ideas, which he has obſerved to exiſt united together. Theſe are your own words; and what can the meaning of them be, but that we neither have nor can have any Idea of a particular Subſtance, but only with reſpect to the ſimple Ideas which make it up; and theſe being ſenſible Qualities, there is no ſuch thing as an Idea of Subſtance, but only a ſuppoſition of a Subſtratum to ſupport Accidents?

P. 32. 2. That although the Idea of Subſtance be made doubtfull by attributing it only to our accuſtoming our ſelves to ſuppoſe ſome Subſtratum; yet the Being of Subſtance is not. How is this poſſible? Is not the Being doubtful if the Idea be; and all our Certainty come in by Ideas? No, ſay you, the Being would not be ſhaken if we had no Idea of Subſtance at all. What! not as to our Knowledge? P. 33. But you ſay, there are many things in Nature of which we have no Ideas. And can we have any Certainty of Reaſon as to thoſe things? For about that our debate is, viz. What Certainty we can have as to Subſtance, if we can have no Idea of it? So that the Being of Subſtance on theſe Principles is far from being ſafe and ſecure as to us, when we have ſo lame an account of the Idea of it.

But you have yet a farther diſtinction to bring off the Idea of Subſtance; for you ſay,

P. 40. (3.) That the Idea of Subſtance is a Relative Idea. For the mind can frame to it ſelf Ideas of Relation, and perceiving that Accidents cannot ſubſiſt of themſelves, but have a neceſſary Connexion with Inherence or being ſupported, which being a Relative Idea, it frames the Correlative of a Support, which is Subſtance. And now I think we have all that is ſaid in Defence of the Idea of Subſtance; viz. That there is a Complex Abſtracted and Relative Idea of it; which is derived from the ſimple Ideas got by Senſation or Reflection. But this Relative Abſtracted Idea is confeſſed to be an obſcure, indiſtinct, vague Idea of Thing or Something; and is all that is left to be the poſitive Idea, which hath the Relation of a Support or Subſtratum to Modes or Accidents: And that what Idea we have of particular and diſtinct Subſtances is nothing but a Complication of ſimple Ideas with the ſuppoſition of a Subſtratum or Support.

Theſe being the Conceſſions and Diſtinctions you make in this Matter, I muſt now return to the Occaſion of this Debate, which was, whether the ground of our Certainty, as to the Nature of Subſtance, can be reſolved into the ſimple Ideas we receive in by Senſation or Reflection. The queſtion is not, Whether you doubt or deny any ſuch Being as Subſtance in the World? nor whether the Notion you have of it be clear and diſtinct? for you confeſs it is not; but the point in debate is, What Certainty we can have of the Nature of Subſtance from the ſimple Ideas we have by Senſation or Reflection? And here the queſtion is not, Whether the mind cannot form Complex and Abſtracted general Ideas from thoſe ſimple Ideas? But whether thoſe ſimple Ideas are the Foundation of our Knowledge and Certainty as to the Nature of Subſtance?

For you affirm over and over (if I may have leave to ſay ſo) That the ſimple Ideas we have by Senſation and Reflection are the Foundation of all our Knowledge. P. 18, 23. 24, 36, 37. And yet that the Ideas we have of particular diſtinct Subſtances are nothing but ſeveral Combinations of ſimple Ideas of Accidents. P 8.

Which being ſuppoſed, I think it no hard matter to make it appear that we come to any Certainty as to the Nature of Subſtance cannot in this way of Ideas. For,

1. The ſimple Ideas afford no ground of Certainty any farther than as to themſelves. Outward Objects make an impreſſion on our Senſes; and all the Certainty we have by them is that our Senſes are ſo and ſo affected by them; but what that is in thoſe Objects which produces thoſe Effects in us, theſe ſimple Ideas do not acquaint us. For the old or new Doctrine of Qualities may be true, notwithſtanding any Effect of theſe ſimple Ideas upon us; for the ſame effects would be whether there be real Qualities in the Objects, or only a power to make ſuch Impreſſions on us, which we fancy to be Qualities without us. And ſo for our inward Perceptions; we certainly know, that we have a Power of Thinking, Doubting, Conſidering, &c. theſe ſimple Ideas we are very certain of; but whether theſe Perceptions come from a Material or Immaterial Subſtance, you ſay, cannot be certainly known by theſe ſimple Ideas: for you think Matter may be ſo refined and modified as to produce them. Now it is a very ſtrange thing to me, that Men of Underſtanding ſhould make theſe ſimple Ideas the Foundation of all our Knowledge and Certainty; and yet, that we ſhould be able to attain to no Certainty at all by them, from whence they proceed. For if theſe Ideas were intended for the means of our attaining to any Certainty, this would be the firſt thing we ſhould know by them. It is not diſtinguiſhing Primary and Secundary Qualities will help us out here. For theſe ſenſible Qualities of Bodies, which ariſe from the firſt, viz. Bulk, Figure, Texture and Motion of Parts, do not carry any evidence along with them that they are not Reſemblances of ſomething in the Objects as well as the Primary. It is very eaſie to affirm, That there is in Truth nothing in the Objects themſelves, but only Powers to produce various Senſations in us: but I intend not to diſpute, whether it be ſo or not; all that I obſerve, is, that there have been Philoſophers, both European and others, of another opinion; and that theſe ſimple Ideas, which are ſaid to be the only Foundation Eſſay. B.2. ch.8. Sect. 25. of our Knowledge, do not help us one jot in the Diſcovery. For it is confeſſed by your ſelf, That Senſation diſcovers nothing of Bulk, Figure or Motion of Parts in the Production of ſenſible Qualities, nor can Reaſon ſhew how Bodies by their Bulk, Figure and Motion ſhould produce in the Mind the Ideas of Blew, Yellow, &c. How then are theſe ſimple Ideas the Foundation of our Knowledge and Certainty, when by them we can diſcover nothing of the true Cauſes of thoſe Impreſſions which are made upon us? Ch.9. Sect. 8, 9, 10. And you own, That the Ideas of Senſation are often corrected by Judgment, and that ſo inſenſibly, that we are apt to miſtake one for the other; ſo that theſe ſimple Ideas are but a very ſlippery and uncertain Foundation for our Knowledge, unleſs Reaſon and Judgment be watchfull to prevent the Errors we are liable to in the Ideas of Senſation. But if no more be meant by the ſimple Ideas that come in by Senſation or Reflection, and their being the Foundation of our Knowledge, but that our Notions of Things come in either from our Senſes or the Exerciſe of our Minds: As there is nothing extraordinary in the Diſcovery, ſo I am far enough from oppoſing that, wherein I think all Mankind are agreed. But when new Terms are made uſe of by ill men to promote Scepticiſm and Infidelity, and to overthrow the Myſteries of our Faith, we have then Reaſon to enquire into them, and to examine the Foundation and Tendency of them. And this was the true and only Rea- ſon of my looking into this way of Certainty by Ideas, becauſe I found it applied to ſuch Purpoſes.

(2.) The Idea of particular Subſtances being only the Complication of many ſimple Ideas, can give no greater Foundation of Knnowledge or Certainty, than thoſe ſimple Ideas of which it conſiſts.

Which is ſo clear of it ſelf, that I ſhall not go about to prove it. But that P. 7, 8, 10, 30. you make the Ideas of particular Subſtances to be no other, is plain from the ſeveral places before mention'd, produced by your ſelf in this Book. So that as to the Notion of particular Subſtances, we can find no Foundation of Knowlege or Certainty at all from the Ideas. It cannot be denied, that you joyn the ſuppoſition of a Subſtratum with this Complication of ſimple Ideas; but we muſt take notice that you place the Idea of particular and diſtinct Subſtances in that Complication, and only reſerve the ſuppoſition of the Subſtratum, as a general confuſed unknown thing, which makes no part of the Idea, but is only kept at a dead liſt to ſupport Accidents. Your words are, When we talk or think P. 6. of any particular ſort of Corporeal Subſtance, as Horſe, Stone, &c. tho' the Idea we have of either of them be but the Complication or Collection of thoſe ſeveral ſimple Ideas of ſenſible Qualities, we uſe to find united in the thing called Horſe or Stone: then follows, Yet we ſuppoſe them exiſting in ſome common Subject, &c. So that the Idea was compleat before the ſuppoſition. And again, Whatever be the ſecret Nature of Subſtance in general, all the Ideas we have of particular Sub- P. 8. ſtances are nothing but ſeveral Combinations of ſimple Ideas. Can any thing be plainer? Yet there follows, Co-exiſting in ſuch, though unknown cauſe of their Union, as makes the whole ſubſiſt of it ſelf. Here we have ſtill an unknown Support, but made no part of the Idea it ſelf. In another place, the Idea of Sub- B. 2. ch. 23. Sect. 1. ſtance is ſaid to be a Complication of many Ideas together, becauſe not imagining how theſe ſimple Ideas can ſubſiſt by themſelves, we accuſtom our ſelves to ſuppoſe ſome Subſtratum which we call Subſtance. And this is ſaid to be the Notion of Sect. 2, 3, 4. pure Subſtance in general, and not of any particular Subſtance, which conſiſts in a Complication only of ſimple Ideas.

(3.) The Relative Idea of Subſtance ariſing from the neceſſary Support of Accidents is a mere effect of Reaſon and Judgment, and no effect of any ſimple Ideas. For it ariſes from nothing ſuggeſted by the Ideas of Senſation or Reflection, but it comes only from the Mind it ſelf. Becauſe, as I ſaid before, it is a Repugnancy to our firſt Conception of Things, that Modes or Accidents ſhould ſubſiſt by themſelves. But which of the ſimple Ideas is this built upon? You tell me, You ſay the ſame thing, and quote theſe Words of yours; And I P. 22. ſay, Becauſe we cannot conceive how ſimple Ideas of ſenſible Qualities ſhould ſubſiſt alone, or one in another, we ſuppoſe them exiſting in and ſupported by ſome common Subject. But you have not told me, how this is founded on the ſimple Ideas, which was your main point. You boaſt, you ſay, of my Agreement with you herein: I wiſh we might as well agree in all other things under Debate; but why did you not inform me, how you came to this, by your ſimple Ideas; and what ſteps and progreſs you made in the Complication of your ſimple Ideas before you came to it? For truly, I ſhould have found ſome difficulty in it, ſince you make the Idea of a particular Subſtance a Complication of many ſimple Ideas: for if it be ſo, how could a Complication of ſimple Ideas, which cannot ſubſiſt by themſelves, make the Idea of a Subſtance which doth ſubſiſt by it ſelf? This looks a little untowardly in the way of Knowledge and Certainty. But there is no help for it, a Subſtratum muſt be ſuppoſed to ſupport theſe unlucky Accidents. Let it be ſo then. How came we to know that theſe Accidents were ſuch feeble things? What ſimple Ideas inform'd you of it? If none, then it is to be hoped there is ſome other way to attain Knowledge and Certainty in this matter. No; you tell me, there is no need of any other way, but this of Ideas. How ſo? Your words are theſe, The general indetermined Idea of Some- P. 40.

thing, is by the Abſtraction of the mind derived alſo from the ſimple Ideas of Senſation and Reflection. But alas! We are not upon the general indetermined Idea of ſomething; but upon the particular Idea of diſtinct Subſtances, which is granted not to be by Abſtraction, but by a Complication of ſimple Ideas. So that this is quite off from the matter. But as to your general abſtracted Idea, I have ſomething farther to ſay.

(4.) A general Abſtracted Idea of Subſtance is no real Subſtance, nor a true Idea of one, if particular Subſtances be nothing but a Complication of ſimple Ideas. P. 40. For you ſay, That the Mind by Abſtraction from the poſitive ſimple Ideas got by Senſation or Reflection comes to the general Relative Idea of Subſtance. If then the general Idea be raiſed from the ſimple Ideas, and thoſe ſimple Ideas make that of particular and diſtinct Subſtances only by Complication, then the general Idea of Subſtance can be nothing but an Abſtracted Complication of theſe ſimple Ideas, or elſe it is not by Abſtraction from the ſimple Ideas. But I do not deny that there is a general Nature of Subſtance, which is as real as a general Idea can be, and it is that, which makes any particular Subſtance be what it is in its own Nature without reſpect to Individual Modes and Properties. And although this general Subſtance doth not exiſt of it ſelf, yet it doth really exiſt in the ſeveral Individuals that belong to its kind; and the ſeveral kinds of particular Subſtances are really diſtinguiſhed from each other, not merely by ſimple Ideas of ſenſible Qualities, but by their inward Frame and Conſtitution: as the Subſtance of a Man is from that of a Horſe or a Tree. For it is ridiculous to imagine, that theſe really differ from each other only as Individuals of the ſame ſort under the general Abſtracted Idea of Subſtance. And if there be Subſtances of ſeveral kinds really different from each other, an account muſt be given, not only of the general Notion of a Subſtratum for Accidents, but of the ſpecifick Nature of different Subſtances, and wherein the difference of the unknown Support lies, as to the Modes and Accidents of their kinds, which I deſpair of ever ſeeing done by the ſimple Ideas of Senſation and Reflection. B. 2 Ch. 24. Sect. 16. And your ſelf confeſs, That we have no Idea of Abſtract Subſtance; and that by the Complex Idea of ſenſible Qualities, we are as far from the Idea of the Subſtance of Body, as if we knew nothing at all.

And now I freely leave the Reader to judge whether this be a tolerable Account of the Idea of Subſtance by Senſation or Reflection, and whether I deſerve ſo much to be complained of, for expoſing the unreaſonableneſs of laying the Foundation of all our Certainty and Knowledge upon ſimple Ideas which we receive by Senſation or Reflection.

But before I proceed further, it will be proper here to take notice how you P. 43. juſtifie your Idea of Subſtance from the Etymology of the Word; which, ſay you, is ſtanding under or upholding. I told you very little weight is to be laid on a bare Grammatical Etymology, when the Word is otherwiſe uſed by the beſt Authors for the Eſſence of a thing; and I named Cicero and Quintilian; and the Greek Word imports the ſame. But ſtill you ſay, it is derived à ſubſtando; P. 44. and you tell us your opinion, That if we knew the Original of Words, we ſhould be much helped to the Ideas they were firſt applied to and made to ſtand for. If you mean the true Ideas of them, I muſt beg leave to differ in my opinion, and my Reaſon is this, becauſe Words were uſed before men came to form Philoſophical Notions or Ideas of Things; and therefore they were forced to make uſe of Words applied in another Senſe; or elſe to coin Words on purpoſe to expreſs their own (as Cicero often doth, as Qualities, Evidence, Comprehenſion, &c.) So that if ſubſtare were uſed in another Senſe before, it doth not follow, that it ought to be ſo, when we enquire into the true Ideas of Things. But one of the beſt Criticks of the Latin Tongue in our Age, hath told us, that ſubſtantia Voſſ. Etymol. in V. Sto. is ſo called, quia per ſe ſubſtat. And ſubſtare is uſed by Terence, not for ſtanding under, but for being ſtedfaſt, Metuo ut ſubſtet hoſpes. But as to your general ral Obſervation; I think there are very few Words uſed in the Philoſophical Language of the Romans, but what were taken off from the original Senſe they were applied to; as Perſona was firſt taken for a Man in Maſquerade, Genus for a Pedegree, Species for a Sight, from Specio, to ſee, Virtus for manly Courage, and diſtinguiſh'd from Probity. Sit virtus etiam non Probitate minor. Ovid. de Pont. l. 3. And ſo Anima was firſt taken for the Breath in the Body, as well as Spiritus. Thence Varro ſaith, Their Anceſtors, although they eat Leeks and Onions, yet were bene animati, had no ill Breath; and thence Animam agere and efflare, ſaith Cicero; and from Anima, he ſaith came Animus, by which they underſtood the Mind; Hinc Animus ad intelligentiam tributus, ſaith Varro: and many others of a like Nature. But I ſhall only add one more, and that is the Name of Idea, ſo very often uſed by your ſelf and others of late. I wiſh we had been told the original uſe of it, and how it was firſt applied, that we might better judge of the true meaning of it now when ſo much Weight is laid upon it. I find in Thucydides, who was an accurate Writer, and underſtood the true Senſe of Words, that an Idea is uſed by him for an Appearance and Shew without Reality, as when he ſaith, That the Athenians in dealing with the Sicilians, made uſe of the ſame Idea which they had done before. Where it can ſignifie nothing but what he calls before a Pretence. But when the Philoſophers came to uſe this Word, they applied it to another Senſe; Plato made uſe of it to ſignifie the true Exemplars or Models of Things, according to which the ſeveral ſorts of them were framed and diſtinguiſhed. This Notion he had, as many others, from the Pythagoreans, but what they Myſtically called Numbers he called Ideas. But Idea in its original Senſe from the Etymology of it, is derived from Seeing, and ſo the natural Senſe of it is ſomething Viſible; from thence it came to ſignifie the Impreſſion made in us from our Senſes; and thence it was carried to the general Notion of a thing, and from thence by Metaphyſical and abſtracted Speculations to the Original Exemplars of particular Eſſences, which were Simple and Uniform, and not liable to thoſe Changes which viſible Objects are ſubject to. So Cicero tells us, Plato formed his Notion of Idea, which he would by no means allow to any Repreſentation made by our Senſes, which are dull, heavy, uncertain and imperfect either by the Minuteneſs, or Diſtance, or Mutability of the Objects; thence the Philoſophers of his School denied any true grounds of Certainty to be laid in the Ideas we have by our Senſes, which can only afford ground for Probability (not as to the bare Objects) but as to the Notions we take from them. But all Knowledge and Certainty was placed in the acts of the Mind (Scientiam nuſquam eſſe cenſebant niſi in animi notionibus atque rationibus) i. e. in examining and comparing, not the bare Ideas, but the Definitions of things; and from theſe, judging of the Truth and Certainty of them. And if our Ideas of things be ſo few, ſo ſuperficial, and ſo imperfect as you confeſs them to be; if we are ſo much to ſeek, as to the Connexion of Ideas, and the finding out proper intermediate Ideas, I am afraid this way of Certainty by Ideas will come to very little at laſt. And ſo this Agreement and Diſagreement of Ideas will have the Fate of the Stoicks Criterion of Truth, which only multiplied Diſputes, but ended none. Never any men talked more of Certainty than they; and they boaſted of their Diſcoveries of the true grounds of it: and the queſtion then was not about a Criterion of the bare Exiſtence of things; (about which they allow'd the Judgment of the Senſes to be ſufficient, and the Ideas from them to be true;) Nor was it about a Criterion for the Actions of Life, for which they thought Probability or Opinion ſufficient; but it was about finding out ſuch a mark of truth in the Ideas of our Minds as could not agree to a Falſhood, i. e. ſuch an Impreſſion or Signature, as Cicero expreſſes it, as appear'd in that which was, which could not be found in that which was not. And this was called Viſum, or a true Idea; his words are, Quale igitur viſum? quod ex eo quod eſſet, ſicut eſſet, impreſſum eſt ſignatum,

C. 24. ſignatum, & effectum. The Greeks called it a Comprehenſive Idea, which they compared to Light, which diſcovers it ſelf as well as other Things. But when they came to be pinched with particular difficulties about the Natures of Things, they were never able to make out that infallible mark of Truth in their Idea; and yet this was a more likely way to have found it, than to place the grounds of Certainty in the comparing the Agreement and Diſagreement of Ideas, unleſs it could be made out that we have a full ſtock of Ideas, and are able to diſcern and make out the Connexion of them with one another. For if we fail in either of theſe, the talking of Ideas and comparing thoſe which we have will do us little ſervice in finding out of Truth.

But I confeſs, the deſign in general is ſo good, that it's pity that it ſhould lie open to ſo many Objections; and much more, that it ſhould be abuſed to very bad purpoſes. But my joyning your words with another's Application, is that which hath given you ſo much Offence as to make you think it neceſſary to publiſh this Letter for your Vindication.

2. I come therefore now to ſhew the Care I took to prevent being miſ-underſtood; which will beſt appear by my own Words. " I muſt do that right " to the Ingenious Author of the Eſſay of Humane Underſtanding, (from " whence theſe Notions are borrow'd to ſerve other purpoſes than he intend" ed them,) that he makes the caſe of Spiritual and Corporeal Subſtances to " be alike. It was too plain that the bold Writer againſt the Myſteries of our Faith took his Notions and Expreſſions from thence, and what could be ſaid more for your Vindication, than that he turned them to other purpoſes than the Author intended them? And the true Reaſon why the Plural Number was ſo often uſed by me, was becauſe he built upon thoſe which he imagin'd had been your grounds, and my buſineſs was to ſhew that thoſe Expreſſions of yours, which ſeemed moſt to countenance his method of Proceeding could not give any reaſonable Satisfaction. But you ſay, You do not place Certainty only in clear and diſtinct Ideas; but in the clear and viſible Connection of any of our Ideas. P. 57. And Certainty of Knowledge, you tell us, is to perceive the Agreement or Diſagreement of Ideas, as expreſſed in any Propoſition. Whether this be a true account of the Certainty of Knowledge or not, will be preſently conſider'd. But it is very poſſible he might miſtake or miſapply your Notions; but there is too much reaſon to believe, he thought them the ſame, and we have no reaſon to be ſorry, that he hath given you this occaſion for the explaining your Meaning, and for the Vindication of your ſelf in the matters you apprehend I had charged you with: And if your Anſwer doth not come fully up in all things to what I could wiſh, yet I am glad to find that in general you own the Myſteries of the Chriſtian Faith, and the Scriptures to be the Foundation and Rule of it. For thus you conclude your Book, in the laſt Paragraph of the Poſtſcript. P. 226. The Holy Scripture is to me, and always will be the conſtant Guide of my Aſſent, and I ſhall always hearken to it, as containing infallible Truth relating to things of the higheſt Concernment. And I wiſh I could ſay there were no Myſteries in it; I acknowledge there are to me, and I fear always will be. But where I want the Evidence of things, there yet is ground enough for me to believe, becauſe God hath ſaid it: And I ſhall preſently condemn and quit any Opinion of mine, as ſoon as I am ſhewn that it is contrary to any Revelation in the Holy Scripture.

Which Words ſeem to expreſs ſo much of a Chriſtian Spirit and Temper, that I cannot believe you intended to give any advantage to the Enemies of the Chriſtian Faith; but whether there hath not been too juſt occaſion for them to apply them in that manner is a thing very fit for you to conſider. For in an age wherein the Myſteries of Faith are ſo much expoſed by the Promoters of Scepticiſm and Infidelity, it is a thing of dangerous conſequence to ſtart ſuch new methods of Certainty as are apt to leave mens minds more doubtfull than before; as will ſoon appear from your own Conceſſions. For if the ground of Certainty be reſolved into the Agreement and Diſagreement of the Ideas as expreſſed in any Propoſition; is it not natural enough from hence to infer, that from whenceſoever this Propoſition comes, I muſt judge of it by the Agreement or Diſagreement of the Ideas contained it: You make a Diſtinction between the Certainty of Truth and the Certainty of Knowledge. The former you ſay, Is when Words are ſo put together in Propoſitions as exactly to expreſs the Agreement or Diſagreement of the Ideas they ſtand for: and the latter, When we perceive the Agreement or Diſagreement of Ideas, as expreſſed in any Propoſition. Book 4. Ch. 6. Sect. 3. But our queſtion about Certainty muſt relate to what we perceive, and the means we have to judge of the Truth and Falſhood of Things as they are expreſſed to us; which you tell us, Is by the Agreement or Diſagreement of the Ideas in the Propoſition. And in another place, Where ever we perceive the Agreement or Diſagreement of any of our Ideas, there is certain Knowledge; and when-ever we are ſure thoſe Ideas agree with the Reality of Things, there is certain real Knowledge: Ch. 4. Sect. 18. and then conclude, I think I have ſhewn wherein it is that Certainty, real Certainty, conſiſts, which, whatever it was to others, was, I confeſs, to me heretofore, one of thoſe Deſiderata which I found great want of. So that here is plainly a new Method of Certainty owned, and that placed in the Agreement and Diſagreement of Ideas. But the Author already mention'd profeſſes to go upon the ſame grounds, and therefore it was neceſſary for me to examine them.

He ſaith, That the ſimple and diſtinct Ideas we receive by Senſation and Reflection are the ſole Matter and Foundation of all our Reaſoning; and that our Knowledge is in Effect nothing elſe but the Perception of the Agreement or Diſagreement of our Ideas. Christianity not Myſt. p. 10. And that where our Perception is not immediate, our Certainty comes from the clear and viſible Connexion of Ideas. P. 12. For he ſaith, That if the Connexion of all the intermediate Ideas be not indubitable, we can have no Certainty. P. 13. Wherein now do his grounds of Certainty differ from yours?

But he applies them to other Purpoſes. I grant he doth ſo, and that was it which I had ſaid for your Vindication. But the queſtion now is, whether your general expreſſion had not given him too much occaſion for it?

It is true, that Ch. 3. he diſtinguiſhes the means of Information from the ground of Perſwaſion; and he reckons all Authority Divine as well as Humane among the means of Information: and the ground of Perſwaſion he makes to be nothing but Evidence; and this Evidence, he ſaith lies in our Ideas, Ch. 4. in the Agreement or Diſagreement of them, p. 19. and he places Certainty in our clear Perceptions of this Agreement or Diſagreement, which you call clear and viſible Connexion of Ideas. And wherein then lies the difference as to the grounds of Certainty?

But his deſign is to overthrow the Myſteries of Faith.

This is too true. But upon what grounds? Is it not upon this Principle, that our Certainty depends upon the clear Perception of the Agreement or Diſagreement of Ideas in any Propoſition? Now let the Propoſition come to us either by Humane or Divine Authority: If our Certainty depends upon this, we can be no more certain, than we have clear Perception of the Agreement or Diſagreement of the Ideas contained in it; and ſo he thought he had reaſon to reject all Myſteries of Faith, which are contained in Propoſitions upon your grounds of Certainty.

But you ſay, you own the infallible Truth of the Scriptures, and that where you want the Evidence of Things there is ground enough for you to believe, becauſe God hath ſaid it. I do verily believe you, becauſe I have a far greater Opinion of your Sincerity and Integrity than I ſee reaſon for, as to the other Perſon who pretends mightily to own the Authority of Scripture at the ſame time when he undermines it. For his Words are, The Authority of God or Divine Revelation is the Manifeſtation of Truth by Truth it ſelf, to whom it is impoſſible to lye, p. 16. But when he comes to ſtate the point, how far we are to believe upon Divine Revelation, he hath theſe Words, Sect. 2. ch. 1. n. 10. The natural Reſult of what hath been ſaid is, That to believe the Divinity of Scripture, or the Senſe of any Paſſage thereof without rational Proofs, and an evident Conſiſtency is a blameable Credulity, and a temerarian Opinion ordinarily grounded upon an ignorant and wilful Diſpoſition. And in the next Chapter he ſaith, That Revelation is not a neceſſitating Motive, but a mean Information. Not the bare Authority of him that ſpeaks, but the clear Conception I form of what he ſays is the ground of my Perſuaſion. And again, Whoever reveals any thing, his words muſt be intelligible, and the matter poſſible. This rule holds good, let God or Man be the Revealer. As for unintelligible Relations, we can no more believe them from the Revelation of God, than from that of Man. Sect. 2. ch. 2. n. 16. p. 42.

But what are all theſe things to you, who own, That where you want the Evidence of things, the Authority of Revelation is ground enough for you to believe. I do not impute them to you, but I muſt ſay, that he alleges no ground for his ſayings but your ground of Certainty: For in the ſame Page he ſaith, That the conceived Ideas of things are the only ſubjects of Believing, Denying, Approving, and every other act of the Underſtanding. All the difference we ſee is, that he applies that to Propoſitions in Scripture, which you affirm'd of Propoſitions in general, viz. that our Certainty depends upon the clear Perception of the Agreement or Diſagreement of the Ideas contained in them. But I ſhall do you all the Right I can, as to this matter, by ſhewing what Reaſon I had to ſay, that your Notions were turned to other purpoſes than you intended them, and that I ſhall make appear from ſeveral paſſages in the ſame Book.

B. 4. ch. 3. Sect. 23. 1. You own the great Defects of Humane Knowledge, notwithſtanding the ſimple Ideas we have by Senſation or Reflection. And from theſe things,

1. The Paucity and Imperfection of our Ideas in general; becauſe our Senſation and Reflexion goes ſo little a way in reſpect of the vaſt extent of the Univerſe; and the infinite Power and Wiſdom of the Creator of it: So that what we ſee in the intellectual and ſenſible World, holds no proportion to what we ſee not: and whatever we can reach with our Eyes or our Thoughts of either of them, is but a point almoſt nothing in compariſon of the reſt.

Sect. 24, &c. 2. The want of Ideas which we are capable of, becauſe although we have Ideas in general of Bulk, Figure and Motion; yet we are to ſeek as to the particulars of them in the greateſt part of the Bodies of the Univerſe; although we daily ſee their Effects. And that becauſe of the Diſtance and Remoteneſs of ſome, and the Minuteneſs of others, and therefore we cannot come to a ſcientifical Knowledge in Natural Things, much leſs to that of Spiritual Beings, of which we have only ſome few and ſuperficial Ideas.

Sect. 28. 3. Want of a diſcoverable Connexion between thoſe Ideas we have. Becauſe the Mechanical Affections of Bodies have no Affinity at all with the Ideas they produce in us; there being no conceivable Connexion between any Impulſe of any ſort of Body, and any Perception of any Colour or Smell which we find in our Minds. And ſo the Operations of our Minds upon our Bodies are inconceivable by us; And the Coherence and Continuity of Parts of Matter; and the original Rules and Communication of Motion, are ſuch as we can diſcover no natural Connexion with any Ideas we have.

Sect. 30. 4. Want of finding out ſuch intermediate Ideas, which may ſhew us the Agreement or Diſagreement they have one with another. And this for want of due Application of Mind in acquiring, examining and due comparing thoſe Ideas; and by ill uſe of Words, which have ſo much perplexed and confounded Mens underſtanding.

Book 4. Ch. 17. Sect. 1. 2. You own the many Failings in our Reaſon: By which you underſtand two Faculties in our Minds, viz. Sagacity, and Illation; the one finding out, and the other ordering the intermediate Ideas; ſo as to diſcover the Connexion ductions of Reaſon, but upon the Credit of the Propoſer, as coming immediately from God which we call Revelation.

2. That things above Reaſon and not contrary to it, are properly Matters of Faith, and to be aſſented to on the Authority of Divine Revelation.

Thus far I have endeavoured with all poſſible Brevity and Clearneſs to lay down your Senſe about this matter. By which it is ſufficiently proved that I had reaſon to ſay, that your Notions were carried beyond your Intention.

But you ſtill ſeem concerned that I quote your Words, although I declare, P. 59.
that they were uſed to other purpoſes than you intended them. I do confeſs to you, that the Reaſon of it was, that I found your Notions as to Certainty by Ideas was the main Foundation which the Author of Chriſtianity not Myſterious went upon; and that he had nothing which look'd like Reaſon, if that Principle were removed; which made me ſo much endeavour to ſhew that it would not hold. And ſo I ſuppoſe the Reaſon of my mentioning your words ſo oſten P. 62.
is no longer a Riddle to you.

I now proceed to other particulars of your Vindication.

Among other Arguments againſt this Principe of Certainty, I inſtanced in the Being of Spiritual Subſtances within our ſelves, from the Operations of our Minds, which we do perceive by Reflexion, as Thinking, Doubting, Conſidering, &c. This Argument I yielded to be very good; but that which I urged from thence was, that it could not be from thoſe ſimple Ideas of the Operations of the Mind; becauſe you had affirmed that it is impoſſible for us by the Contemplation of our Ideas to be certain without Revelation that a material Subſtance cannot think. This is a point, in my apprehenſion, of great conſequence, and therefore I muſt more ſtrictly examine what you ſay in anſwer to it.

Which is, That thinking is inconſiſtent with the Idea of Self-ſubſiſtence, and P. 65.
therefore hath a neceſſary connexion with a Support or Subject of Inheſion; i. e. If there be Thinking there muſt be ſomething that Thinks.

But the queſtion is, Whether that Something be a Material or Immaterial Subſtance? But this Thinking Subſtance is in your ſenſe a Spirit. The queſtion I put is, whether Matter can think or not? If not, then the Subſtance which thinks muſt be Immaterial; if it can think, then there can be no evidence from the Idea of Thinking to prove the Subſtance which thinks to be Immaterial.

This I take to be plain Reaſoning; which you muſt allow, becauſe it is about the Agreement or Diſagreement of two ſimple Ideas, viz. Matter and Thinking.

But you ſay, That the general Idea of Subſtance being the ſame every-where, P. 66.
the Modification of Thinking, or the Power of Thinking joyned to it makes it a Spirit, without conſidering what other Modification it has, as whether it has the Modification of Solidity or not. As on the other ſide, Subſtance, which hath the Modification of Solidity is Matter, whether it has the Modification of Thinking or not. And therefore if I mean by a Spiritual and Immaterial Subſtance, you grant that you have not proved, nor upon your Principles can it be demonſtratively proved, that there is an Immaterial Subſtance in us that thinks.

Id. p. 74. 82.

I have thus ſet down your own Words, that you may not complain I have done you Injury. But when you put in demonſtratively proved, I ſuppoſe you mean in the way of Certainty by Ideas; for concerning that our diſpute is. And therefore when you add, That you expect that I ſhould conclude it demonſtrable from Principles of Philoſophy, you muſt give me leave to ſay, this is going off from the buſineſs before us; which is about your Principles of Certainty from Ideas; for it was only to that purpoſe, that I brought this argument to prove, that we cannot from our Ideas be certain of one of the points of greateſt importance, viz. that there is a Spiritual Subſtance within us; and yet the operations of our Mind are made one of the Sources of thoſe ſimple Ideas, which are made by you the Foundation of Knowledge and Certainty. So that the point before us is, whether this Aſſertion of yours, That the Power of Thinking may belong to modified Matter, doth not overthrow your Certainty by Ideas?

No, ſay you, that which you are certain of by the Idea is only, That there is in us a Spiritual Subſtance, and that, you ſay, implies no more than a Thinking Subſtance, i. e. that by Thinking you can prove you have a Power of Thinking, which I believe may be demonſtratively proved.

But I pray Sir, conſider how this queſtion aroſe, it was from your diſtinguiſhing Spiritual and Corporeal Subſtances from each other; and ſaying that we have as clear a Notion of a Spirit as we have of a Body. Againſt this I urged, that if it be poſſible for Matter to think, which you aſſert, then from the Idea of Thinking, we cannot prove the Certainty of a Spiritual Subſtance within us, where it is plain, that a Spiritual Subſtance is oppoſed to the Power of Matter. It is not whether Matter ſo modified can think, but whether Matter can think; and let it be modified how it will, Matter is Matter ſtill. But the Power of Thinking makes it a Spirit, ſay you. But doth it ceaſe to be Matter or not? If not, then it is Matter ſtill endued with a Power of Thinking; and ſo our Idea can be no other, than of a Material Thinking Subſtance. But you ſay further, That the Power of Thinking makes it a Spirit, without conſidering what other Modifications it has, whether it has the Modification of Solidity or not. That is, “Although it be really a Material Subſtance, yet the Modification of “Thinking makes it a Spiritual Subſtance; for we are to go no farther than “that Modification of Thinking, and from thence we are to conclude it to be “a Spiritual Subſtance. But we are now enquiring not into the bare Modification of Thinking; but whether from thence we can prove an Immaterial Subſtance within us, or which is all one, a Spiritual Subſtance as oppoſed to Corporeal, which is your own Diſtinction. And that I may not be thought to do you injury, I ſhall produce your own Words.

B. 2. Ch. 23. Sect. 15.

By the ſimple Ideas we have taken from our own minds we are able to frame the complex Idea of a Spirit. And thus by putting together the Ideas of Thinking, Perceiving, Liberty and Power of moving themſelves, we have as clear a Perception and Notion of Immaterial Subſtances, as well as Material. So that here we have two things clear.

1. That a Spirit and Immaterial Subſtance are the ſame.
2. That from the Operations of our Minds, we have a clear Idea of an Immaterial Subſtance within us.

Sect. 17.

Again you ſay, That the primary Ideas we have of Body as contradiſtinguiſhed to Spirit, are the Coheſion of ſolid and conſequently ſeparable parts, and a Power of communicating Motion by Impulſe. Theſe you think are the Original Ideas proper and peculiar to Body. Here Body is contradiſtinguiſhed to Spirit; and as it is ſo, the Coheſion of ſolid and ſeparable Parts is made one of the original Ideas proper and peculiar to Body as diſtinguiſhed from a Spiritual Subſtance: How then, I pray, can a Spiritual Subſtance conſiſt of ſolid and ſeparable Parts? Fo what,

whatever is ſolid, you grant to be conſequently ſeparable. This ſeems to me to confound the Ideas of Body and Spirit, which you had taken ſo much care to diſtinguiſh; and ſo muſt deſtroy all Certainty of a Spiritual Subſtance from your Ideas. For although the bare ſimple Idea of Thinking may be ſaid to be diſtinct from that of a ſolid Body; yet it is impoſſible from that Idea ſo explained to prove a Spiritual Subſtance, as diſtinct from Body. Which was the thing I intended to prove.

But you go on to compare the Complex Idea of Spirit and Body in theſe Words; Let us compare then our Complex Idea of Spirit, without our Complex Idea of Body. Sect. 22. Our Idea of Body is an extended ſolid Subſtance, capable of communicating Motion by Impulſe; and our Idea of our Souls is of a Subſtance that thinks and has a Power of exciting Motion in Body by Will and Thought. Theſe you think are our Complex Ideas of Soul and Body as contradiſtinguiſhed. Here you do not ſpeak of the bare Ideas of Thinking and Solidity; but of the different Subſtances, and one is ſaid to be a ſolid Subſtance and the other a Subſtance that thinks.

I ſhall add one paſſage more to the ſame purpoſe.

The Idea we have of Spirit compared with that we have of Body, ſtands thus. Sect. 30. The Subſtance of Spirit is unknown to us, and ſo is the Subſtance of Body equally unknown to us. Here we have again the Subſtance of Spirit and the Subſtance of Body diſtinguiſhed from each other; and not the bare Modifications. So that I need no body to anſwer you but your ſelf. But leaſt ſuch expreſſions ſhould be thought a mere ſlip of the Pen; you are pleaſed again to aſſert the Notion of Sect. 31. an Immaterial knowing Subſtance to imply no more of a Contradiction than an extended diviſible Body.

And yet after all this you confeſs, That you have not proved an Immaterial P. 67. Subſtance, and that it cannot be proved upon your Principles.

What is the meaning of this? I cannot think you intended to leſſen the Authority of your Book in ſo conſiderable a part of it: And I ſhould much rather have thought the latter Paſſage a ſlip of your Pen, but that in your Letter you go about to defend it. Therefore I muſt attend your Motions in it.

You ſay, That all the great ends of Religion and Morality are ſecured barely P. 68. by the Immortality of the Soul without a neceſſary ſuppoſition that the Soul is Immaterial.

I am of opinion, that the great ends of Religion and Morality are beſt ſecured by the Proofs of the Immortality of the Soul from its Nature and Properties; and which I think prove it Immaterial. I do not queſtion whether God can give Immortality to a Material Subſtance; but I ſay it takes off very much from the evidence of Immortality, if it depend wholly upon God's giving that, which of its own Nature it is not capable of. For if the Soul be a material Subſtance it is really nothing but Life; or Matter put into Motion with ſuch Organs and Parts as are neceſſary to hold them together; and when Death comes, then this Material Subſtance ſo modified is loſt. God may by his Power grant a new Life; but will any man ſay, God can preſerve the Life of a Man when he is dead? This is a plain Abſurdity, and I think no ſuch thing tends to preſerve Religion or Morality.

Mr. Hobbes ſpeaks very conſonantly to his own Principles (although not to thoſe of Religion and Morality.) For he ſaith, That the univerſe being the Aggregate of all Bodies, there is no real part of it that is not alſo a Body. Leviath. ch. 34. And ſo he ſaith, That Subſtance and Body ſignifie the ſame thing, and therefore Subſtance Incorporeal are Words which deſtroy one another. But what then is a Spirit? That, he ſaith, in the proper ſignification of it in common Speech, is either a ſubtle, fluid, inviſible Body, or a Ghoſt, or other Idol or Phantaſm of the Imagination. But is there not an Immortal Soul in Man? The Promiſe of Immortality, ſaith he, is made to the Man and not to the Soul; and Immortal Life doth not begin in Man till the Reſurrection. From whence it is plain, he look'd on the Soul as nothing Leviath. but the Life; and ſo he ſaith, That Soul and Life in Scripture do uſually ſignifie

ch. 38. the ſame thing. And in the Vindication of his Leviathan, he ſaith, That his Vindicat. Doctrine is, that the Soul is not a ſeparated Subſtance, but that the Man at his of Leviath. Reſurrection ſhall be revived. And he anſwers that place, Fear not them which
p. 90, 91. kill the Body, but cannot kill the Soul; thus, Man cannot kill a Soul, for the Man killed ſhall revive again. I think he might as well have ſaid, That Man cannot kill the Body; for that ſhall be revived at the Reſurrection.

But what is all this to you? I hope nothing at all. But it ſhews, that thoſe who have gone about to overthrow the Immortality of the Soul by Nature, have not been thought to ſecure the great ends of Religion and Morality.

And although we think the ſeparate State of the Soul after Death is ſufficiently revealed in Scripture, yet it creates a great difficulty in underſtanding it, if the Soul be nothing but Life, or a Material Subſtance which muſt be diſſolved when Life is ended. For if the Soul be a Material Subſtance it muſt be made up as others are, of the Coheſion of ſolid and ſeparate Parts, how minute and inviſible ſoever they be. And what is it which ſhould keep them together, when Life is gone? So that it is no eaſie matter to give an account, how the Soul ſhould be capable of Immortality, unleſs it be an Immaterial Subſtance; and then we know the Solution of the Texture of Bodies cannot reach the Soul being of a different Nature.

And this is no more than what the wiſeſt and moſt intelligent Philoſophers have aſſerted, merely from the conſideration of the Nature and Properties of the Soul: as you very well know; and I need not for your ſake, run into ſuch a Digreſſion, (or as you call it, ſtep out of my way) any farther, than you
P. 69. give occaſion for it in what follows. For you tell me, You have great Authorities to juſtifie your uſing a Spiritual Subſtance without excluding Materiality from it. And for this you refer me to two great men indeed among the Romans, Cicero and Virgil. I was ſurprized at what you ſay out of Cicero, having been no ſtranger to his Writings about theſe matters, and I have conſulted the place you refer to; where you ſay that he oppoſes Corpus to Ignis and Anima, i. e. Breath; and that the Foundation of his diſtinction of the Soul from the Body is, becauſe it is ſo ſubtle as to be out of Sight. It is a very eaſie matter to multiply Citations out of Cicero, where Spiritus and Anima are both taken for Breath; but any one who will but read the very beginning of his Tuſculan Queſtions, may underſtand his meaning. For in the Entrance of that Diſpute he takes Animus for the Soul, and neither Anima nor Spiritus: and he tells us, there were two opinions about it at Death. Some held a Diceſſus Animi à Corpore, a departure of the Soul from the Body, others ſaid, that the Soul never departed, but was extinguiſhed with Life: and the ſeveral opinions he ſets down at large, Ch. 9, 10. and then Ch. 11. he ſumms up the different opinions; and ſaith he, If it be the Heart, or Blood, or Brain; becauſe it is a Body, it will be extinguiſhed with it: If it be Anima, the Vital Breath, it will be diſſipated; if it be Fire, it will be extinguiſhed. It is true, he diſtinguiſhes here the Vital Breath from the Body; and no one queſtions ſuch a diſtinction of the Animal and Vital Spirits from the groſſer parts of the Body; but all this proceeds upon the Suppoſition of thoſe who held nothing to ſurvive after Death; but then he goes on to thoſe who held the Souls, when they are gone out of their Bodies, to go to Heaven as their proper Habitation. And here he plainly ſuppoſes the Soul not to be a finer ſort of Body, but of a different Nature from the Body which it leaves. Nam Corpus quidem, ſaith he, quaſi vas eſt & receptaculum Animi, C. 22. and elſewhere he calls the Body the Priſon of the Soul, C. 30. and ſaith, That every wiſe Man is glad to be diſmiſſed out of the Bonds and Darkneſs of it: and his buſineſs in the Body is ſecernere Animum à Corpore, to draw off the Soul from the Body; which the Philoſophers called Commentatio mortis, i. e.

a Continual Exerciſe of Dying; therefore, ſaith he, Disjungamus nos à Corporibus, id eſt, conſueſcamus mori. Is it poſſible now to think ſo great a Man look'd on the Soul but as a Modification of the Body, which muſt be at an end with Life? Inſtead of it, there are ſeveral things very remarkable in this very Book concerning the Immortality of Souls by Nature.

1. He extremely deſpiſes thoſe who made the Soul a mere Mode of Matter which was extinguiſhed with Life; and he ſaith, they were Plebeii Philoſophi, Ch. 23. a mean ſort of Philoſophers, and in another place minuti Philoſophi, De Senect. c. 23. who held there was no Senſe after Death. But he repreſents Cato there, as weary of the Noiſe and Filth of this World, and longing to go to far better Company. O præclarum diem, cum ad illud Divinum Animorum Concilium Cœtumq; proficiſcar, atq; ex hâc turbâ & colluvione diſcedam! Did theſe men look on the Souls of Men, as mere Modifications of Matter?

2. He urges the general Conſent of Nations for the Permanency of Souls after Death. c. 16. and he affirms Nature it ſelf de Immortalitate Animorum tacitè judicare, c. 14. And I do not think the general Conſent of Mankind in this Matter, ſo uncertain, or ſo ſlight an argument, as ſome have made it; even ſince the late Diſcoveries: as I think it were no hard Matter to prove; but I ſhall not here go out of my way to do it.

3. The moſt ancient Philoſophers of Greece held the ſame opinion as he ſhews from Pherecydes, Pythagoras, Socrates, Plato, &c. c. 16, 17, &c. and they went upon far better Reaſons than the other, as he proves at large, c. 21, 22, 23.

4. That the Bodies and Souls of Men have a different Frame and Original. Our Bodies, he ſaith, c. 19. are made of Terreſtrial Principles; but the Souls, he ſaith, are of a divine Original; and if we could give an account how they were made, we ſhould likewiſe how they were diſſolved, c. 14. as we may of the Parts and Contexture of Bodies; but ſaith he, Animorum nulla in terris origo inveniri poteſt, nihil eſt enim in animis mixtum atque concretum, aut quod ex terra natum atque fictum eſſe videatur, c. 27. So that here he plainly makes a Difference between our Bodily Subſtance, and that of our Souls, which have no bodily Texture and Compoſition: becauſe there is no material Subſtance, which can reach to the wonderful Faculties and Operations of the Soul, and therefore he concludes in theſe words, Singularis eſt igitur quædam natura atque vis animi ſejuncta ab his uſitatis notiſque naturis. What can expreſs the Soul to be of a different Subſtance from the Body, if theſe words do it not? And preſently adds, That the Mind is of a divine and Spiritual Nature and above Material Compoſition as God himſelf is.

I hope this may give you ſatisfaction as to Cicero, how far he was from making the Soul a Material Subſtance. And the only place you produce out of him c. 22. proves nothing but that the Soul is inviſible, as you may ſee by looking upon it again.

As to Virgil, you quote that Expreſſion, Dum Spiritus hos regit artus; where it is taken for the Vital Spirit: which ſenſe I know no body queſtions; and ſo Tully expreſſes Life, quæ Corpore & Spiritu continetur, and oppoſes it to a Life of Immortal Fame, which he there ſpeaks of, Pro Marcello, c. 9. but the only matter in debate is, Whether they excluded any other Notion of Spirit, which was not done, as I have made it appear concerning Cicero, and ſo I ſhall of Virgil too.

For ſoon after, Æneid 4. 385. he hath theſe Words.

Et cum frigida mors Animæ ſeduxerit Artus,
Omnibus Umbra locis adero, dabis improbe pœnas.

Which ſhews that Virgil did believe the Soul to be more than a mere Vital Spirit, and that it ſubſiſted and acted in a ſeparate State: And it is obſerved by Servius, that Virgil uſes Spiritus, Mens and Animus for the ſame. In Æneid 6. 726.

Spiritus intus alit, totamq; infuſa per artus.
Mens agitat molem ——

And he proves, that Virgil aſſerted the Immortality of Souls, and anſwers the arguments againſt it; and as far as he could underſtand, he ſaith, that our Bodies are from the Elements and our Souls from God; and the Poets intention was, Vt Animos immortales diceret. So that neither Cicero nor Virgil do you any kindneſs in this matter, being both Aſſertors of the Souls Immortality by Nature. P.71. If theſe will not do, you bring me to Scripture, and ſay, that Solomon himſelf ſpeaks after the ſame manner about Man and Beaſt, as the one dieth, ſo dieth the other, yea, they have all one Spirit, Eccleſ. 3. 19. I will not diſpute about the proper Senſe of the Hebrew Word, but I muſt about Solomon's Senſe. For although he makes Life and Death common to Man and Beaſt; yet he ſaith, v. 21. The Spirit of a Man goeth upward, and the Spirit of a Beaſt goeth down to the Earth. But you ſay, If the Notion of a Spirit excludes Materiality, then the Spirit of a Beaſt muſt be Immaterial, as well as that of a Man. I anſwer, that although the bare Word doth not prove it, yet the deſign of Solomon's Diſcourſe doth, and ſo the going upward of the Spirit of a Man muſt be underſtood in a very different Senſe, from the going downward of the Spirit of a Beaſt. For he ſaith concerning Man, That the Spirit ſhall return to God that gave it, c. 12. 7. To what purpoſe? To be diſſipated in the common Air? or to be loſt in the vaſt Confuſion of Matter? no, but he concludes his Book thus; v. 14. For God ſhall bring every Work into Judgment with every ſecret thing, whether it be good, or whether it be evil. If theſe be Solomon's Words, as no doubt they were, and he were a Man of Senſe, and laid his Sayings together, as no doubt he did; theſe laſt Words muſt interpret the foregoing, and his other Sayings be made Conſonant to this. Yes, you may ſay, This relates to the general Judgment, and not to the Soul's Subſiſtence after Death. But Solomon ſpeaks of the Spirit of a Man going upward at Death, and returning to God that gave it: What Senſe is there in this, if it be a Material Subſtance which vaniſhes and is diſſolved then? And if the Soul be not of it ſelf a free, thinking Subſtance, I do not ſee what Foundation there is in Nature for a Day of Judgment. For where there is nothing but Matter, there is no Freedom of acting; where there is no Liberty, there is no Choice; where there is no Choice, there is no room for Rewards and Puniſhments, and conſequently no Day of Judgment. But Solomon poſitively concludes, there will be a Judgment to come as to good and evil Actions in another World, and therefore he muſt be underſtood in thoſe Expreſſions, to mean a Free and Thinking, and conſequently an Immaterial Spirit in us.

P. 72. But you urge farther, That our Saviour himſelf oppoſes Spirit to Fleſh and Bones, Luk. 24. 39. i. e. to ſuch a groſs Compages as could be ſeen and felt. The queſtion then was, whether it were the real Body of Chriſt or only an Appearance of it; and how could this be reſolved better than our Saviour doth? Handle me and ſee, for a Spirit hath not Fleſh and Bones as you ſee me have. But he calls this a Spirit. What follows? Therefore a Spirit is only an Appearance? I do not think that is your meaning. And no body queſtions but the name of Spirits is ſometimes given to Apparations. But this is far from our caſe, which is, whether that real Spiritual Subſtance we find in our ſelves be Material or not? Doth a Spiritual Subſtance imply Matter in its Idea or not? You cannot ſay it doth: Then it may be Immaterial: But how come we to know things but by their diſtinct Ideas? Is the Idea of Matter and Spirit diſtinct or not? If not, to what purpoſe do we talk of Knowledge by Ideas when we cannot ſo much as know Body and Spirit from each other by them?

P. 73. Is it then any Abſurdity to call a Spiritual Subſtance Immaterial? No, you ſay, You would not be thought to affirm, that Spirit never does ſignifie a purely Immaterial Subſtance; for in that Senſe the Scripture attributes the Notion of Spirit to God, and you have proved from your Principles, that there is a Spiritual Immaterial Subſtance. And this you think proves an Immaterial Subſtance in your way of Ideas. But of that afterwards. We are yet upon the proving an Immaterial Subſtance in our ſelves from the Ideas we have by Senſation and Reflection. Now, I ſay, ſtill this is impoſſible if the ſpiritual Subſtance in us may be material. And at laſt you grant, That what I ſay is true, that it cannot upon P. 74. theſe Principles be demonſtrated. Then ſay I, Your grounds of Certainty from Ideas are plainly given up. But you ſay, it may be proved probable to the high- P. 75. eſt Degree. But that is not the point; for it is not Probability, but Certainty, that we are promiſed in this way of Ideas; and that the Foundation of our Knowledge and real Certainty lies in them; and is it dwindled into a Probability at laſt? The only reaſon I had to engage in this matter was a bold Aſſertion, that the Ideas we have by Senſation or Reflection are the ſole Matter and Foundation of all our Reaſoning: and that our Certainty lies in perceiving the Agreement or Diſagreement of Ideas as expreſſed in any Propoſition; which laſt are your own Words. How can we then be certain where we have no Ideas from Senſation or Reflection to proceed by? As in the preſent caſe. I have a Mind to be reſolved whether the Soul in Man be an Immaterial Subſtance or not; and we are to judge of the Truth of it by our Ideas. I ask then, What Idea you have of the Soul by Reflection? You anſwer, That it is a Thinking Subſtance. But doth this prove it Immaterial? You anſwer, That you cannot be certain, but that it is very probable. Is not this giving up the Cauſe of Certainty? But you ſay, You never offer'd it as a way of Certainty where we cannot reach Certainty. But P. 81. did you not offer to put us into the way of Certainty? What is that, but to attain Certainty in ſuch things, where we could not otherwiſe do it? And what a ſtrange way is this, if it fails us in ſome of the firſt Foundations of the real Knowledge of our ſelves? But you ſay, If I diſlike your way, you deſire me to ſhew you a better way of Certainty as to theſe points.

I am ſenſible that you deſign herein, to draw me out of my way to do you a P. 81. kindneſs; but I will ſo far gratifie you at this time; and to oblige you the more, I will make uſe of no other Principles or Ideas, than ſuch as I meet with in your Book; and from thence I do not deſpair of proving, that we may be certain that a material Subſtance cannot think.

And the method I ſhall proceed in, ſhall be to prove it, by ſuch ways and ſteps as you have directed me to, although you might not think to find them ſo laid together.

1. From your general Principles as to Knowledge and Certainty. You ſay, That all our Knowledge conſiſts in the view the Mind hath of its own Ideas; which Book 4. is the utmoſt Light and greateſt Certainty, we with our Faculties and in our way of Ch. 2. Knowledge are capable of. Sect. 1. Here you reſolve our Knowledge and Certainty into the view of the Ideas in our Minds; therefore by thoſe Ideas we may come to know the Certainty of things; not in the Frame and inward Eſſence of them, as you often tell us; but by the Powers and Properties which belong to them. Whatever, ſay you, be the ſecret and abſtract Nature of Subſtance in general, all the Book 2. Ideas we have of particular diſtinct Subſtances, are nothing but ſeveral Combina- ch. 23. tions of ſimple Ideas. Sect. 6, 14. And you take pains to prove, That Powers make a great part of our complex Ideas of Subſtances: and their ſecondary Qualities are thoſe which Sect. 7. in moſt of them ſerve principally to diſtinguiſh Subſtances one from another; which Sect. 8. ſecondary Qualities, as has been ſhewn, are nothing but bare Powers. So that our Knowledge cannot reach the inward Subſtance of things; and all our Certainty of Knowledge as to them, and their Diſtinction from each other, muſt depend on thoſe Powers and Properties which are known to us.

One would think ſometimes, that you would allow Mankind no more Know- Sect. 12. ledge than ſuits with the Conveniences of Life; but this would overthrow the great deſign of your Book, which is to put us into a way of real Certainty by the the Agreement or Diſagreement of Ideas; and where ever we perceive the Agreement or Diſagreement of any of our Ideas, there is certain Knowledge. Book 4. Ch. 4. Sect. 18. So that here you own we may come to a Certainty of Knowledge (which is beyond mere Probability) and that by perceiving the Agreement or Diſagreement of Ideas.

2. If we can find the Diſagreement of any two Ideas upon your own Princi- B.3.ch.10. Sect. 15. ples, we muſt do thoſe of Body and Spirit. For the Idea of Matter in general, you ſay, That in Truth it contains nothing but the Idea of a ſolid Subſtance, which is every-where the ſame, every-where uniform. And that Body ſtands for a ſolid extended figured Subſtance. So that Solidity, Extenſion and Figure are the inſeparable Properties of Bodies. And in another place you have theſe Words, B. 2. ch. 23 Sect. 17 The primary Ideas we have peculiar to Bodies as contradiſtinguiſhed to Spirit, are the Coheſion of ſolid and conſequently ſeparable Parts, and a Power of communicating Motion by Impulſe. Theſe you think are the original Ideas proper and peculiar to Body, for Figure is but the conſequence of finite Extenſion. Here we have the Idea of Body laid down by your ſelf as contradiſtinguiſhed to Spirit. Therefore by your own confeſſion we may perceive the Diſagreement of theſe two Ideas of Body and Spirit, and conſequently may certainly know their Diſtinction from each other by their inſeparable Properties. But if it be poſſible for Matter to think, then theſe Ideas muſt be confounded: Yet you diſtinguiſh the Ideas of a Material and Immaterial Subſtance in theſe Words, B.2.ch.23. Sect. 15. Putting together the Ideas of Thinking and Willing, and the Power of Motion or Reſt added to Subſtance, we have the Idea of a Spirit; and putting together the Ideas of ſolid coherent Parts, a Power of being moved, joyned with Subſtance, we have the Idea of Matter. The one is as clear and diſtinct an Idea as the other; the Idea of Thinking and Moving a Body being as clear and diſtinct Ideas, as the Ideas of Extenſion, Solidity and being moved. Can any thing now be plainer than the Diſagreement of theſe two Ideas, by the ſeveral Properties which belong to them? But if after all this Matter may Think, what becomes of theſe clear and diſtinct Ideas? And yet you have theſe Words, Thus by putting together the Ideas of Thinking, Perceiving, Liberty and Power of moving themſelves and other things, we have as clear a Perception and Notion of Immaterial Subſtances as we have of Material. Here it is plain, that you make Thinking and Perceiving to be part of the Complex Idea of an Immaterial Subſtance. How is this poſſible, if a Material Subſtance be capable of Thinking as well as an Immaterial? either therefore you muſt renounce your own Doctrine of Certainty by Ideas, or you muſt conclude, that Matter cannot think.

B.2.ch.11. Sect. 8. 3. But I urge this yet further from your Notion of Liberty and Neceſſity. Liberty, you ſay, is the Idea of a Power in any Agent to do or forbear any Action, according to the Determination or Thought of the Mind, whereby either of them is preferr'd to the other. So that Liberty cannot be, where there is no Thought, no Sect. 13. Volition, no Wiſh. And again, Agents that have no Thought, no Volition at all are neceſſary Agents. But you make a Power of Thinking and Liberty to be parts of the Complex Idea of an Immaterial Subſtance, in the Words before cited. But what Liberty can you conceive in mere Matter? For you grant, That Bodies B.2.ch.28. Sect. 11. can operate upon one another only by Impulſe and Motion; that the Primary Qualities of Bodies which are inſeparable from it, are Extenſion, Solidity, Figure and Sect. 10. Mobility from any Body. Now how can the Idea of Liberty agree with theſe ſimple Ideas of Body? To be moved only by Impulſe from another Body; and from the free Determination of our own Thoughts; are two Ideas as diſagreeing with each other, as we can well imagine. But if Matter may Think, it may have Liberty too, becauſe you join theſe together; but if it be uncapable of Liberty, which goes along with Thinking, how can you imagine it ſhould be capable of Thinking?

B.2.ch.27. Sect. 9. I argue, from your Notion of Perſonal Identity, which you place in ſelf-Conſciouſneſs. For you tell us, That a Perſon is a thinking intelligent Being that has Reaſon and Reflection; and can conſider it ſelf, as it ſelf, the ſame thinking thing in different times and places; which it does only by that Conſciouſneſs, which is inſeparable from thinking, and ſeems to you eſſential to it. From whence it follows, that if there can be no Self-conſciouſneſs in Matter, then it cannot think, becauſe it wants that which you ſay is Eſſential to it. It being impoſſible, for any one to perceive, but he muſt perceive that he doth perceive. But what is there like Self-conſciouſneſs in Matter? Or how is it poſſible to apprehend that meer Body ſhould perceive that it doth perceive? For Bodies, you ſay, operate only by Impulſe and Motion: i. e. one Body upon another. But how can a Body operate upon it ſelf without Motion? Thoſe you call the Secondary Qualities of Bodies, are only you ſay, the effect of the Powers in ſome Bodies upon others endued with Senſe and Perception. So that the effects of theſe Powers in Bodies, or of the Primary Qualities of Bulk, Site, Figure, Motion, &c. is not upon themſelves but upon other Bodies, either by changing thoſe Primary Qualities in them by different Site, Figure, Motion, &c. or producing thoſe Effects in us, or which we call Senſible Qualities. But either of theſe ways there is no poſſibility for Matter to operate upon it ſelf in a way of Self-conſciouſneſs. If then every intelligent thinking Being have this ſo inſeparably belonging to it, that you ſay, it is impoſſible for any one to perceive, without perceiving that he doth perceive; and it be impoſſible from the Idea of Matter to make out that a meer Body can perceive that it doth perceive, I think it is more than probable in the way of Ideas that Matter cannot think.

5. I argue from the power of Abſtracting which you make proper to a thinking Subſtance. This is done, ſay you, by conſidering Ideas in the Mind as B.2.ch.14. ſeparate from the Circumſtances of Time and Place. And this power of abſtracting, Sect. 9. you add, puts a perfect diſtinction between Man and Brutes; and is an Excel- Sect. 10. lency which the Faculties of Brutes do by no means attain to.

You tell me, That you did not ſay the chief Excellency of Mankind lies chiefly, Letter, or any ways, in this that Brutes cannont abſtract; for Brutes not being able to do p. 27. any thing cannot be any Excellency of Mankind. But I hope it is the Excellency of Mankind, that they are able to do what the Brutes cannot: And you ſay, This puts a perfect diſtinction between Man and Brutes; and I had thought in comparing Man and Brutes that which put a perfect Diſtinction was the chief Excellency with reſpect to them. But let that be as it will; the thing I inſiſt upon is, the power of Abſtracting following that of Thinking ſo cloſely that you utterly deny it to Brutes; but if it may be in the power of Matter to think, how comes it to be ſo impoſſible for ſuch Organized Bodies as the Brutes have to inlarge their Ideas by Abſtraction? Pomponatius thinks to avoid the Argu- De Immort. ment from Abſtraction to prove the Souls Immateriality, by ſaying, That in the Animæ, moſt abſtract Speculation the Mind reſts upon Particulars; Univerſale in ſingula- c. 9. ri ſpeculatur. But this doth not reach the force of the Argument; which is not, whether the Mind hath not an Eye to Particulars, when it forms Univerſal Notions; but whether the power of forming ſuch Abſtract Ideas from Particulars do not argue a Power which meer Matter can never attain to: And all that Philoſopher hath ſaid, doth not amount to the leaſt Proof of it.

6. Laſtly, I argue from the Reaſon you give, why God muſt be an Immateri- Let.p.139. al Subſtance. For theſe are the words in your Letter. And the Idea of an Eternal, actual, knowing Being is perceived to have a Connection with the Idea of Immateriality, by the Intervention of the Idea of Matter, and of its actual Diviſion, Diviſibility and Want of Perception, &c. Here the want of Perception is owned to be ſo eſſential to Matter, that God is therefore concluded to be Immaterial; and this is drawn from the Idea and Eſſential Properties of Matter; and if it be ſo Eſſential to it, that from thence you conclude God muſt be an Immaterial Subſtance, I think the ſame Reaſon will hold, as to any thinking Subſtance. Becauſe the Argument is not drawn from any thing peculiar to the Divine Perfections, but from P. 73. the general Idea of Matter.

But after all, you tell me, That God being Omnipotent, may give to a Syſtem of very ſubtil Matter Senſe and Motion. Your words before were, a Power to perceive or think; and about that all our debate runs; and here again you ſay, P. 66. That the Power of Thinking joined to Matter, makes it a Spiritual Subſtance. But as to your Argument from God's Omnipotency, I anſwer, That this comes to the ſame Debate we had with the Papiſts about the Poſſibility of Tranſubſtantiation. For, they never imagin'd, that a Body could be preſent after the manner of a Spirit in an ordinary way, but that by God's Omnipotent Power it might be made ſo: but our Anſwer to them was, That God doth not change the Eſſential Properties of things while the things themſelves remain in their own Nature: And that it was as repugnant for a Body to be after the manner of a Spirit, as for a Body and Spirit to be the ſame. The ſame we ſay in this Caſe. We do not ſet bounds to Gods Omnipotency: For he may if he pleaſe, change a Body into an Immaterial Subſtance; but we ſay, that while he continues the Eſſential Properties of Things, it is as impoſſible for Matter to think, as for a Body by Tranſubſtantiation to be preſent after the manner of a Spirit; and we are as certain of one as we are of the other. Theſe things I thought neceſſary on this occaſion to be cleared, becauſe I look on a miſtake herein to be of dangerous Conſequence as to the great Ends of Religion and Morality: which, you think, may be ſecured although the Soul be allowed to be a Material Subſtance; but I am of a very different Opinion: For if God doth not change the Eſſential Properties of things, their Nature remaining; then either it is impoſſible for a Material Subſtance to think, or it muſt be aſſerted, that a Power of thinking is within the Eſſential Properties of Matter; and ſo thinking will be ſuch a Mode of Matter, as Spinoza hath made it: and I am certain you do not think he hath promoted the great Ends of Religion and Morality.

I ſhall now proceed to conſider the Arguments for proving a Supream Immaterial Subſtance, which you freely allow to be ſo. And my Deſign, as I ſaid, was to ſhew, that the certainty of it is not placed upon any clear and diſtinct Ideas, but upon the force of Reaſon diſtinct from it.

P. 87. To this you anſwer, That Knowledge and Certainty in your Opinion, lies in the Perception of the Agreement or Diſagreement of Ideas, ſuch as they are, and not always in having perfectly clear and diſtinct Ideas. But thoſe who offer at clear and diſtinct Ideas, bid much fairer for Certainty than you do; and ſpeak P. 88. more agreeably to your original grounds of Certainty. For your Relative Idea, which you here run to again is no certainty at all from the Idea, but from the plain Evidence of Reaſon, that Accidents cannot ſupport themſelves.

I paſs over all which I think I have ſufficiently anſwered already; as when you ſpend ſo many Pages about my uſing the Plural Number when your words are only mentioned, &c. But I ſhall paſs over nothing which may ſeem to an indifferent Reader to require any Farther Conſideration.

P. 101. Whether you took this way of Ideas from the Modern Philoſopher mentioned P. 103. by you, is not at all material; but I intended no Reflection upon you in it (for that you mean by my commending you as a Scholar of ſo great a Maſter) I never meant to take from you the Honour of your own Inventions; and I do believe you when you ſay, That you wrote from your own Thoughts, and the Ideas you had there. But many things may ſeem New to one that converſes only with his own Thoughts, which really are not ſo; as he may find when he looks into the Thoughts of other Men which appear in their Books. And therefore, although I have a juſt Eſteem for the Invention of ſuch who can ſpin Volumes barely out of their own Thoughts; yet I am apt to think they would oblige the World more, if after they have thought ſo much themſelves, they would examine what thoughts others have had before them concerning the ſame things, that ſo, thoſe may not be thought their own Inventions, which are common to themſelves and others. If a Man ſhould try all the Magnetical Experiments himſelf and publiſh them as his own Thoughts, he might take himſelf to be the Inventor of them; but he that examines and compares them with what Gilbert and others have done before him, will not diminiſh the Praiſe of his Diligence, but may wiſh he had compared his Thoughts with other Mens, by which the World would receive greater Advantage, altho' he loſt the Honour of being an Original.

The Matter of Certainty, you ſay, one cannot imploy too many Thoughts about, P. 106. viz. as to the finding the true Grounds of it, or wherein it is placed. This I was led to conſider, by our Unitarians placing it in clear and diſtinct Ideas; and therefore rejecting the Myſteries of Faith, becauſe they could not have clear and diſtinct Ideas of them. And one wrote purpoſely to ſhew that we were not to believe any Myſteries in the Goſpel, becauſe all our Certainty depended upon the Perception of the Agreement or Diſagreement of thoſe ſimple Ideas which we have by Senſation or Reflection. Now if theſe Principles of Certainty hold good as to all Propoſitions we can have no Certainty of Faith, where we cannot perceive the Connexion of the Ideas contained in them. I own that you ſay, That Faith is an Aſſent to any Propoſition not made out by any Deductions of Reaſon, but upon the Credit of the Propoſer. But this doth not clear the matter; for, is Faith an Unreaſonable Act? Is it not an Aſſent to a Propoſition? Then if all certainty in Acts of Reaſon be derived from the perceiving the Agreement or Diſagreement of the Ideas contained in it, either there can be no Certainty of the Reaſonable Act of Faith, or the Grounds of Certainty muſt be laid ſome other way. But you ſay, Where you want Evidence of things there is yet Ground enough for you to believe becauſe God hath ſaid it. Which doth not yet remove the Difficulty, from the true Ground of Certainty; for, ſay they, Revelation is but a means of Information; and God diſcovers by that ſuch Propoſitions, which we could not have found out without Revelation; but wherever Propoſitions are offered to our Underſtandings, we muſt judge of them by our Perception of the Agreement and Diſagreement of the Ideas contained in them. And Faith doth not overthrow Nature. If therefore the Nature of Certainty lies herein we cannot be certain without it.

Is it not enough for you to diſown the Conſequence, but to ſhew that it doth not follow from your Principles of Certainty? But of this I have ſpoken already, and I love not Repetitions. I only take notice, that you Aſſert and hold to the ſame. I ſtick to my own plain way of Certainty by Ideas. P. 107. And ſo do thoſe who reject the Myſteries of Faith, becauſe not agreeable to their Ideas, and think they proceed upon your Grounds.

But you ſay, That according to my Rules you know not where to place Certainty; Ib. for in the Account I give of Des Cartes, I have theſe words concerning him. “The firſt thing he found any Certainty in, was his own Exiſtence, which he founded upon the Perception of the Acts of his Mind. From hence he proceeded to enquire how he came by this Certainty, and he reſolved it into this, that he had a clear and diſtinct Perception of it. And from hence he formed his general Rule, that what he had a clear and diſtinct Perception of was true. Which in Reaſon ought to go no farther, than where there is the like Degree of Evidence; for the Certainty was not grounded on the clearneſs of the Perception, but on the plainneſs of the Evidence. Which is of that nature that the very doubting of it proves it, ſince it is impoſſible that any thing ſhould doubt or queſtion its own being that had it not. So that here it is not the clearneſs of the Idea, but an immediate Act of Perception, which is the true ground of Certainty. And this cannot extend to things without our ſelves, of which we can have no other Perception, than what is cauſed by the Impreſſion of outward Objects. But whether we are to judge according to thoſe Impreſſions doth not depend on the Ideas themſelves, but upon the Exerciſe of our Judgment and Reaſon about them, which put the difference between true and falſe, and adequate and inadequate Ideas, ſo

“ of Reaſon, that thoſe Ideas are true and juſt, and conſequently, that we “ may build our Certainty upon them.

Theſe I acknowledge to be my words; and yet I ſee no Reaſon why I may not ſtick to them. But you ſay, That I have placed the Grounds of Certainty of our own Exiſtence, ſometimes in the plainneſs of Evidence, in oppoſition to the clearneſs of Perception; ſometimes in the immediate act of Perception in oppoſition to the clearneſs of the Idea and the certainty of other things without us in the Evidence of Reaſon, that theſe Ideas are true and juſt in oppoſition to the Ideas themſelves; ſo that ſuch is your Dulneſs you cannot by theſe Rules tell, where to place Certainty. P. 107.

But all theſe Miſts will eaſily be ſcattered, if you ſet your ſelf a little to conſider the Deſign of my Diſcourſe; which was not, to lay down Rules of Certainty, but to ſhew that the Grounds of Certainty from clear and diſtinct Ideas were not well laid at firſt by Des Cartes himſelf. Becauſe he deduced his Rule as to Certainty of other things, from the Evidence he had as to his own Exiſtence, which he had both from immediate Perception and uncontroulable Evidence, when even the Doubting of it neceſſarily proved it. But the main Queſtion was, whether this would reach to other things without us: Yes ſaid he, the Rule will hold, where-ever there are clear and diſtinct Ideas. But I ſay the Certainty doth not depend upon the Idea but upon inward Perception and the Evidence ſounded upon it; and we have not the ſame as to External Objects: For we have no inward Perception of them, nor any Evidence that reſults from our own Beings; therefore the Rule of Certainty is carried beyond the true Ground of it. I do not oppoſe in the former Caſe the plainneſs of the Evidence to the clearneſs of the Perception; but I ſuppoſe them both as to our own Exiſtence. I ſay indeed after, that it is not the clearneſs of the Idea, but an immediate act of Perception which is the true Ground of Certainty as to our own Exiſtence; but there I take Idea as Des Cartes did, for the clear and diſtinct Perception of our Minds, which might reach to other Objects as well as our ſelves; and ſuch an Idea I deny is the Ground of Certainty as to our own Beings, which is founded on an immediate Act of Perception. And when they prove this as to ſuch outward Objects, which we have the Ideas of, they may then carry the Rule ſo far; but I ſay the Caſe is vaſtly different, as to a clear Perception we have from our own Acts, and that which we have as the Impreſſions from outward Objects; in the former Caſe we have ſuch an Evidence, as it is impoſſible to doubt of, but the very doubting muſt prove it: Is it the ſame as to the Ideas of External Objects? And as to theſe I do not deny, but we may come to a Certainty: but I ſay, it is not from the Ideas, which may be true or falſe, adequate or inadequate, and whether we may be certain of them or not, depends upon the Exerciſe of our Reaſon and Judgment about them. So that I found the Certainty of Ideas upon Reaſon, and not Reaſon upon the Certainty of Ideas.

And ſo I come more cloſely to conſider the Argument from the Ideas as to the Proof of a Supream Immaterial Subſtance.

If our Certainty did ariſe from clear and diſtinct Ideas then it muſt hold, where we have a clear and diſtinct Idea, as it is confeſſed we have concerning God. But this Argument from the Idea will not be allowed in this caſe; it is denied by others plainly; but I do not ſay that it is denied by you, but that it is made a doubtfull thing. Which comes to the ſame, in the point of Certainty: and ſo the force of my Argument doth by no means fail. P. 110.

P. 113. But you ſay, That you intended by your words not to deny that the Idea of a moſt perfect Being doth prove a God, but to blame thoſe who take it for the only proof, and endeavour to invalidate all others. For the Belief of a God being the Foundation of all Religion and genuine Morality, you thought no Arguments that are made uſe of to work the Perſwaſion of a God into mens Minds ſhould be invalidated, which you grant is of a very ill Conſequence. P. 114.

Here you muſt give me leave to ask you, what you think of the univerſal Conſent of Mankind, as to the Being of God? Hath not this been made uſe of, as an Argument not only by Chriſtians, but by the wiſeſt and greateſt Men among the Heathens? And what then would you think of one who ſhou'd go about to invalidate this Argument? And that by proving, that it hath been diſcover'd in theſe latter Ages by Navigation, that there are whole Nations at the Bay of Soldania, in Braſil, in the Carribbe Iſlands, and Paraquaria, among whom there was found no Notion of a God, and even the Author of the Eſſay B. 1. Ch. 4. Sect. 8. of Humane Underſtanding hath done this.

This cannot be thought a mere ſlip of the Pen. For men do not quote Authors ſo punctually then. But if it would not be thought ſtepping too much out of my way, I think I could prove that theſe Inſtances are very ill choſen, becauſe either they were taken from ſuch as were not ſufficiently acquainted with the People and Language of the Country; or that their Teſtimony is contradicted by thoſe who have been longer among them and underſtood them better; or laſtly that the account given of them makes them not fit to to be a ſtandard for the Senſe of Mankind, being a People ſo ſtrangely bereft of common Senſe, that they can hardly be reckoned among Mankind, as appears by the beſt accounts both of the Cafres of Soldania, and the Caiguæ of Paraquaria.

But this would be too much a Digreſſion in this place. I return therefore to the argument for proving the Exiſtence of God; and you may plead for your ſelf that your deſign was only to prove, That there is no Innate Idea of a God. But doth not this however take off from the force of an Argument ſome have uſed to perſwade Men that there is a God? I meddle not with Innate Ideas; but have not ſome Perſons of Note, in theſe Matters, uſed the Argument from the Mark and Character of God imprinted on the Minds of Men to prove his Being? And have you not ſet your ſelf to diſprove it? Ch. 4. Sect. 12.

But I leave this, and come to the argument from the Idea of God, concerning which you ſay, That though the Complex Idea for which the Word God P. 119. (whether containing in it the Idea of neceſſary Exiſtence or no, for the caſe is the ſame) will not prove the real Exiſtence of a Being anſwering that Idea, any more than any other Idea in any ones mind will prove the real Exiſtence of any real Being anſwering that Idea, yet you conceive it does not hence follow, but that there may be other Ideas by which the Being of God may be proved

And afterwards you offer to ſhew that your Proof of a Deity is all grounded on P. 123. Ideas, i. e. from the Ideas of our ſelves, as we are thinking Beings. But you con- P. 125. P. 121. feſs, that you think, that the argument from the Idea will not hold, but however you will not give up the argument from Ideas. Againſt which I urged your own argument, That from the Conſideration of what we find in our ſelves and in our Conſtitutions, our Reaſon leads us to the Knowledge of this certain and evident Truth, that there is an eternal, moſt powerfull, and moſt knowing Being. All which, I ſaid, I did readily yield; but we ſee plainly, the Certainty is not placed in the Idea, but in good and ſound Reaſon from the Conſideration of our ſelves and our Conſtitutions. To which you reply, That you never thought P. 126. the Conſideration of our ſelves and our Conſtitutions excluded the Conſideration of the Idea of Being or of Thinking, two of the Ideas that make a part of the Complex Idea a Man hath of himſelf. But is the Reaſon you ſpeak of, which leads us from thence to the Knowledge of an eternal, moſt powerfull, and moſt knowing Being, contained in the Complex Idea of a Man or not? A Complex Idea is made up of ſimple Ideas, all ſimple Ideas come in by Senſation or Reflection; and upon comparing theſe ſimple Ideas our Certainty you ſay is founded. What ſimple Ideas then are there in Man, upon which you ground the Certainty of this Propoſition, That there is a God? I grant you, that there is a Certainty grounded upon our Beings and the Frame of our Natures; but this ſtill I ſay, is a Certainty of Reaſon and not of Ideas.

P. 128. You ſay, You do not well underſtand what I mean by being not placed in the Idea; for you ſee no ſuch Oppoſition, but that Ideas and ſound Reaſon may ſtand together, i. e. in Reaſon rightly managing thoſe Ideas ſo as to produce Evidence by them. But what need all this great noiſe about Ideas and Certainty, true and real Certainty by Ideas, if after all, it comes only to this, that our Ideas only repreſent to us ſuch things, from whence we bring arguments to prove the Truth of things? But the World hath been ſtrangely amuzed with Ideas of late, and we have been told, that ſtrange things might be done by the help of Ideas, and yet theſe Ideas at laſt come to be only common Notions of P. 127. things, which we muſt make uſe of in our Reaſoning. You ſay, in that Chapter about the Exiſtence of God, you thought it moſt proper to expreſs your ſelf in the moſt uſual and familiar way, by common Words and Expreſſions. I would you had done ſo quite through your Book; for then you had never given that Occaſion to the Enemies of our Faith to take up your new way of Ideas, as an effectual Battery (as they imagin'd) againſt the Myſteries of the Chriſtian Faith. But you might have enjoy'd the ſatisfaction of your Ideas long enough, before I had taken notice of them, unleſs I had found them employ'd in doing Miſchief.

P. 132. But at laſt you tell me, That whether I will call it placing the Certainty in the Idea, or placing the Certainty in Reaſon; or if I will ſay, it is not the Idea that gives us the Argument, but the Argument, it is indifferent to you. And if you mean no more by your Certainty from Ideas, but a Certainty from Reaſon, I am not ſuch an unreaſonable Man to diſagree with you.

The next Argument for the Exiſtence of God ſtands thus, as I have ſumm'd it up.

We find in our ſelves Perception and Knowledge. So that there is ſome Knowing, Intelligent Being in the World. And there muſt have been a Knowing Being from Eternity, or an Unknowing; for ſomething muſt have been from Eternity: but if an Unknowing, then it 'is impoſſible there ever ſhould have been any Knowledge, it being as impoſſible for a thing without Knowledge to produce it, as that a Triangle ſhould make three Angles bigger than two right ones.

To which I added, that allowing the Argument to be good, yet it is not taken from the Idea, but from Principles of true Reaſon, as that no Man can doubt his own Perception; that every thing (we ſee) muſt have a Cauſe; that this Cauſe muſt either have Knowledge or not; if it have, the point is gain'd; if it hath not, nothing can produce nothing, and conſequently a not knowing Being cannot produce a Knowing.

In your Anſwer to this, I muſt firſt take notice of your Exception to that P. 145. Expreſſion, Allowing the Argument to be Good; which you ſay, ſeems to imply that I thought the Argument not to be Good, which was very far from my meaning. For I had ſaid before, That you brought very good Arguments to prove the Exiſtence of a God in that Chapter: and afterwards, That I was far from weakning the force of your Arguments. And ſo I hope that Exception is removed.

P. 136. You except not, you ſay, againſt my Arguments or Principles of Reaſon: but P. 137. you think ſtill, this is an Argument taken from Ideas: if you will think ſo, I cannot help it. But you endeavour to ſhew, That the very Principles you allow are founded upon Ideas: As that a man cannot doubt of his own Perception; This, you ſay, is by perceiving the neceſſary Agreement of the two Ideas of Perception and Self-Conſciouſneſs. But I rather think, it is from that Self-Evidence which attends the immediate Perception of our own Acts, which is ſo great, that as S. Auguſtin obſerves, the Academicks had nothing to ſay againſt that kind of Certainty, but only againſt that which aroſe from things conveyed by our Senſes to our Mind.

Cum enim duo ſint genera rerum quæ ſciuntur, unum earum quæ per ſenſus corporis percipit animus, alterum earum quæ per ſeipſum, multa illi Philoſophi garrierunt contra corporis ſenſus; animi autem quaſdam firmiſſimas per ſeipſum perceptiones rerum verarum, quale eſt illud, Scio me vivere, nequaquam in dubium vocare potuerunt. De Trin. l. 15. c. 12.

The next Principle that every thing muſt have a Cauſe, muſt be underſtoood of the Matter treated of, i. e. the things we ſee and perceive in the World. You ſay, It is a true Principle that every thing that hath a Beginning muſt have a Cauſe, becauſe by contemplating our Ideas we find that the Idea of Beginning is connected with the Idea of ſome Operation; and that with the Idea of ſomething operating which we call a Cauſe, and ſo the Beginning to be, is perceived to agree with the Idea of a Cauſe, as is expreſſed in the Propoſition. Is not here a great ado to make a thing plain by Ideas, which was plainer without them? For is not any Man who underſtands the meaning of plain Words ſatisfied that nothing can produce it ſelf? or, That what is not cannot make it ſelf to be? And ſo the evidence doth not depend on the Agreement of the Ideas of Beginning, and Operation, and Cauſe; but upon the Repugnancy of the contrary Suppoſition. As in that Principle, That it is impoſſible for a thing to be and not to be at the ſame time: If you ſay that this depends upon the Diſagreement of the Ideas of Not-Being and Being, it will be to little purpoſe for me to ſay any more about it.

But there is one thing which deſerves to be conſider'd; which is the Connexion between the Idea of an Eternal, Actual, Knowing Being, with the Idea of Immateriality. P. 139. This was the thing I look'd for. And by what means now doth this Connexion between theſe two Ideas appear? By the help of an Intermediate Idea. What is that? Even the Idea of Matter. How ſo? The Idea of Matter you tell us, implies its Actual Diviſion, Diviſibility, and want of Perception, &c. which are the Arguments you uſe in this Proof. Are they ſo indeed? And will not the ſame Ideas prove our Souls to be Immaterial? If want of Perception be in the very Idea of Matter, how can Matter be made capable of Perceiving? But I find you do not always attend to the Agreement or Diſagreement of your own Ideas. But of this before.

I proceed to the laſt Argument I produced to ſhew, that your Proofs of the Exiſtence of God doth not depend upon Ideas. And the Subſtance of it I thus put together. If we ſuppoſe nothing to be firſt, Matter can never begin to be; if bare Matter without Motion be Eternal, Motion can never begin to be; if Matter and Motion be ſuppoſed Eternal, Thought can never begin to be. For if Matter could produce Thought, then Thought muſt be in the Power of Matter; and if it be in Matter as ſuch, it muſt be the inſeparable Property of all Matter, which is contrary to the Senſe and Experience of Mankind. If only ſome Parts of Matter have a Power of Thinking, how comes ſo great a difference in the Properties of the ſame Matter? What Diſpoſition of Matter is requir'd to Thinking? And from whence comes it? Of which no account can be given in Reaſon. This I took to be the Force of your Argument, which I ſaid, I was far from deſigning to weaken: Only I obſerved that the Certainty of it is not placed upon clear and diſtinct Ideas, but upon Reaſon diſtinct from it; which was the Thing I intended to prove.

P. 142. But you ſay, Tou do not ſee but the ſame proof may be placed upon clear and diſtinct Ideas, and upon Reaſon too. I hope this matter is made a little clearer to you; having ſo fully ſhew'd to you before, that in the way of ideas you can come to no Certainty about any Subſtance, but by Reaſon as it is diſtinct from the Ideas; i. e. as to Material Subſtances that your Certainty is reſolved into this Principle of Reaſon, that Accidents cannot ſubſiſt without a Subſtratum.

As to Spiritual Subſtance in us, that depends on two things.

1. That Thinking is only a Mode, and muſt ſuppoſe a Subſtance.

2. That Matter cannot think, and therefore it muſt be an Immaterial Subſtance; which I have proved from your own Principles.

As to a Supreme Immaterial Subſtance, the evidence depends upon this Reaſon, that Matter and Motion cannot produce Thought; and therefore an Eternal Thinking Being muſt be Immaterial. And that Matter and Motion cannot produce Thought, is proved by this Reaſon, that either it muſt be an inſeparable Property of Matter; or ſome account in Reaſon muſt be given why ſome part of Matter ſhould think and not others. And doth not all this proceed upon Reaſon as diſtinct from Ideas?

And when I ſaid, That the Certainty of it, i. e. the Argument is not placed on clear and diſtinct Ideas, but upon the force of Reaſon diſtinct from it, I meant the Certainty from Ideas, although it were not ſo clearly expreſſed as it might have been; but here I obſerve you call for the Plural Number, which you are ſo offended with in other Parts of your Letter.

The next thing I undertook to ſhew was, that we can have no clear and diſtinct Idea of Nature and Perſon from Senſation or Reflection. Here you ſpend many Pages to ſhew that this doth not concern you. Let it be ſo. But it concerns the Matter I was upon; which was to ſhew that we muſt have Ideas of theſe things which we cannot come to by Senſation or Reflection.

My words are, I grant that by Senſation or Reflection we come to know the Powers and Properties of Things. But our Reaſon is ſatisfied, that there muſt be ſomething beyond theſe, becauſe it is impoſſible that they ſhould ſubſiſt by themſelves. So that the Nature of things properly belongs to our Reaſon, and not to mere Ideas. Still you are at it, That you can find no Oppoſition between Ideas and Reaſon: But Ideas are the Objects of the Underſtanding, and Underſtanding is one of the Faculties imploy'd about them. No doubt of it. But you might eaſily ſee that by Reaſon, I underſtood, Principles of Reaſon, allow'd by Mankind. Which I think are very different from Ideas. But I perceive Reaſon in this Senſe is a thing you have no Idea of, or one as obſcure as that of Subſtance. But if you ſet aſide theſe common Principles of Reaſon, your Ideas will ſignifie very little; and will, like Accidents, want a Subſtratum to ſupport them. P. 157.

But your Notion of Nature and Perſon deſerves to be more throughly conſider'd. Therefore to proceed more clearly in a debate of this Conſequence with reſpect to the Doctrine of the Trinity (what-ever you pretend to the contrary) I ſhall firſt ſet down your Notions of Nature and Perſon from your own Words, and then enter upon the Examination of them.

P. 165. As to Nature, you tell me in ſhort it is this, That it is a Collection of ſeveral Ideas combined into one Complex Abſtract Idea. Which when they are found united in any Individual Exiſting, though joyned in that Exiſtence with ſeveral other Ideas, that Individual is truly ſaid to have the Nature of a Man, or the Nature of Man to be in him: for as much as all theſe ſimple Ideas are found united in him, which anſwer the Complex Abſtract Idea to which the ſpecifick name Man is given by any one; which Abſtract Specifick Idea keeps the ſame, when he applies the Specifick Name ſtanding for it, to diſtinct Individuals, i. e. no body changes his Idea of a Man, when he ſays, Peter is a Man, from that Idea which he makes the Name Man to ſtand for, when he makes John a Man.

P. 216. As to Perſon in the way of Ideas, you tell us, That the Word Perſon in it ſelf ſignifies nothing, and ſo no Idea belonging to it, nothing can be ſaid to be the true Idea of it; but when any Language appropriates it to any Idea, then that is the P. 217. true Idea of a Perſon and ſo of Nature. Theſe are therefore the ſigns of two Ideas they are put to ſtand for; and by enumeration of all the ſimple Ideas that are contained in the Complex Idea that each of them is made to ſtand for, we ſhall immediately ſee the whole difference that is between them.

After which, you conclude, That you muſt content your ſelf with this condemned demned way of Ideas, and deſpair of ever attaining any Knowledge by any other than that, or farther than that will lead you to it.

But this muſt not hinder me from enquiring a little more ſtrictly into theſe Notions of Nature and Perſon, for if theſe hold, I do not ſee how it is poſſible to defend the Doctrine of the Trinity. For if theſe terms really ſignifie nothing in themſelves, but are only Abſtract and Complex Ideas, which the common uſe of Language hath appropriated to be the ſigns of two Ideas; then it is plain, that they are only Notions of the Mind, as all Abſtracted and Complex Ideas are; and ſo one Nature and three Perſons can be no more.

We muſt therefore examine what your Notion is, of Abſtracted and Complex Ideas, and how it can be applied to Nature and Perſon; and whether they are only ſigns of ſuch Ideas as People have agreed to ſignifie by them.

To explain this, I muſt give an account, as well as I can, from your ſelf, how theſe Abſtracted and Complex Ideas come to be formed in our Minds, and what is implied in them. The Underſtanding, you ſay, ſeems to you not to have B. 2. ch. 1. the leaſt glimmering of any Ideas which it hath not by Senſation or Reflection. Sect. 5. Theſe and their ſeveral Modes and the Compoſitions made out of them, we ſhall find contain our whole ſtock of Ideas; and that we have nothing in our Minds which did not come in one of theſe two ways. From hence you conſider the ſeveral ſorts of Ch. 2. Ideas, ſome Simple and ſome Complex. The ſimple Ideas are the Materials of all Sect. 1. our Knowledge; and when the Underſtanding is once ſtored with theſe ſimple Ideas, Sect. 2. it has the Power to repeat, compare and unite them, even to an almoſt infinite variety, and ſo can make at pleaſure new Complex Ideas: But no underſtanding can make one new ſimple Idea, not taken in by the ways before mention'd, nor can it deſtroy thoſe that are there. After you have given an account of the ſimple Ideas both ways, you come to the Faculty of Diſcerning in our Minds, and there you ch. 11. reckon up, Diſtinguiſhing Ideas, Comparing, Compounding and Abſtracting.

The Reaſon of Abſtraction, you ſay, is to have one general Name for many Par- Sect. 9. ticulars, or elſe Names would be endleſs. Which Abſtraction is performed by ſeparating the Ideas of particular Objects from the Circumſtances of real Exiſtence, as Time, Place, &c. Complex Ideas are thoſe ſimple Ideas which the Mind unites as Ch. 12. one Idea. But ſtill it is confin'd to thoſe ſimple Ideas which it received by Senſation Sect. 1. or Reflection, which are the ultimate Materials of all its Compoſitions.

Of theſe you reckon Modes, Subſtances and Relations. Sect. 3.

The Ideas of Subſtances are ſuch Combinations of ſimple Ideas, as are taken to Sect. 6. repreſent particular things ſubſiſting by themſelves. And theſe are of two ſorts, one of ſingle Subſtances as they exiſt ſeparately, as of a Man, &c. the other of ſeveral of theſe put together, as an Army of Men.

In your Chapter of Complex Ideas of Subſtances, you affirm the Ideas of par- Ch. 23. ticular Subſtances to be made by a Combination of ſimple Ideas: and again, that Sect. 3. it is by ſuch Combination of ſimple Ideas as co exiſt in ſome unknown cauſe of their Sect. 6, 14. Union.

That the Complex Ideas we have of God and ſeparate Spirits are made up of the Sect. 33. ſimple Ideas we have by Reflection; by inlarging the Ideas we find in our ſelves.

In your 3d Book you conſider general Terms. And the Reaſon of them, you B. 3. ch. 3. ſay is, becauſe it is beyond the power of Humane Capacity to frame and retain Sect. 2. diſtinct Ideas of all Particulars. And theſe are made by way of Abſtraction from Circumſtances of Time and Place. After which you tell us, That General Natures Sect. 6. are nothing but Abſtract Ideas; and the whole Myſtery of Genera and Species, Sect. 9. which make ſuch a noiſe in the Schools, is nothing elſe but Abſtract Ideas with Names annexed to them. From whence, you ſay, it is plain that General and Sect. 11. Univerſal, belong not to the real Exiſtence of Things, but are the Inventions and Creatures of the Underſtanding; made by it for its own uſe and concern only Signs Sect. 12. whether Words or Ideas. And the Abſtract Idea and the Eſſence of the Species Sect. 14. or Genus of the ſame thing: and every diſtinct, abſtract Idea is a diſtinct Eſſence.

But then you diſtinguiſh the Real and Nominal Eſſence. The former is the Real, Sect. 15. Internal Conſtitution of particular things; and the Nominal is the Abſtract Idea. Sect. 16. But there is ſo near a Connexion between them that the Name connot be attributed to any particular Being, but what has this Eſſence, whereby it anſwers that Abſtract Idea, whereof that Name is the Sign.

Theſe things you repeat and inlarge upon in ſeveral other places, but this I think is the ſubſtance of what you ſay upon this matter: For I would not willingly miſtake or miſrepreſent your Meaning.

The Queſtion now between us comes to this, Whether the common Nature or Eſſence of Things lies only in an Abſtract Idea, or a General Name, and the Real Eſſence conſiſts only in particular Beings from which that Name is abſtracted?

The Queſtion is not, Whether in forming the Notion of Common Nature, the Mind doth not abſtract from the Circumſtances of particular Beings? But it is whether there be not an Antecedent Foundation in the Nature of things upon which we form this Abſtract Idea? For if there be, then it cannot be called an univerſal Name only: or a meer ſign of an Idea, which we have formed from putting many ſimple Ideas together, which Name belongs to all of ſuch a ſort, as have thoſe ſimple Ideas united together. I know not how it comes to paſs, that a Man ſpinning Books out of his own Thoughts ſhould hit ſo luckily upon the Thoughts of another Man: I do not mean now, about clear and diſtinct Ideas, but about this Point of univerſal Names. For Mr. Hobbs in Leviath. ch. 4. his Chapter of Speech, tells us, That Names were to ſerve for Marks or Notes of Remembrance, and therefore were called Signs. Of theſe Names, ſome are proper and ſingular to one thing, as Peter, John, this Man, this Tree; ſome are common to many things, as Man, Horſe, Tree, in reſpect of all which it is called an Univerſal, there being nothing in the World Univerſal but Names; for the things nam'd, are every one of them individual and ſingular.

One univerſal Name is impoſed on many things, for their ſimilitude in ſome Quality or other Accident; and whereas a proper Name bringeth to mind one thing only Univerſals recall any one of thoſe many.

And of Univerſals ſome are of more, or leſs Extent, the larger comprehending the leſs large, and ſome of equal extent, &c.

This is enough to let you ſee that theſe Notions are not ſo peculiar but that another Perſon, from his own Thoughts too, had ſaid much the ſame things.

But whoever ſaid or thought them firſt, we muſt examine how reaſonable theſe Thoughts are.

I know no Body that thinks now-a-days, that Univerſals exiſt any where by themſelves; but I do think, that there is a difference to be made between that and making them meer Names, or ſigns of Ideas.

I. And the Reaſons I go upon are theſe. In the firſt place, we are agreed that there is a ſupream immaterial moſt perfect Being; whoſe Eſſential Attributes do not depend upon our Arbitrary Ideas; nor any Names or Signs of Honour we give him, nor upon the meer Inlarging the Ideas of our own Perfections; or ſuch as we account to be ſo in our ſelves: for we attribute thoſe to God which we are not capable of, as Eternity, or Neceſſary Exiſtence, Immutability, &c. Herein, we take up no Complex Ideas from ſeveral Individuals; but we form a true Idea of a Divine Eſſence, from ſuch Attributes as are Eſſential to an infinitely perfect Being, which being Infinite is thereby Incomprehen- B. 2 ch. 17. Sect. 1. ſible by us. And ſo you own, That the great God of whom and from whom are all things is incomprehenſibly Infinite. And that God is infinitely beyond the reach of our narrow Capacities.

II. In the next place, we look on this Supream Being, as the wiſe Creator of all things, who hath ordered the ſeveral Sorts and Ranks of Beings in the World according to his own Eternal Wiſdom; and hath given them all ſuch Properties as himſelf thought fit, whereby they are really and eſſentially diſtinguiſhed from one another; as appears by Mankind, and Brutes, and Plants. And no man that ever imploys his own Thoughts can think, that theſe are diſtinguiſhed from each other, only by an Act of our Minds.

III. Among theſe it is evident, that there are ſome things, wherein they agree; and ſome wherein they differ. They all agree in being real, created Beings, and having a ſort of Life belonging to them. But they differ, that ſome have Senſe, which others have not; and ſome have Reaſon and Underſtanding which others want. And all this is ſo plain and evident, that one might queſtion, whether thoſe had Underſtanding or not, who could think the difference of theſe from each others was not in their Natures, but only depended on the ſeveral Names that we call them by.

IV. Among the Individuals of the ſame kind, there is an Agreement in the ſame Eſſential Properties; as all Men in being Rational Creatures; and there is a Real Difference from each other in the ſeveral Accidents that belong to them; as to Time, Place, Qualities, Relations, &c. And no Man in his Senſes can call this in queſtion. For his moſt plain and ſimple Ideas will inform him of it.

V. The Queſtion now is, Whether that wherein they do all agree, be a meer Univerſal Name and Abſtract Idea or not.

It is certain, that what God created is no meer Name or Idea: It is certain, that God created not only Individuals but the ſeveral Kinds, with the Differences which they have from each other; it is certain that theſe Differences do not lie in mere Names or Ideas: How comes it then not to be certain that there is a Real Common Eſſence or Nature in the Individuals of the ſame kind?

But it comes not to us in the way of Ideas. If it be ſo, the way of Ideas and Reaſon are two different ways; and I ſhall never forſake one for the other, unleſs I could ſee better Reaſon for it; and even then I ſhould not, but adhere to Reaſon ſtill.

But how doth it appear by Reaſon, that Nature is any thing elſe but a Collection of ſeveral Ideas combined into one Complex Abſtract Idea?

That will be done by conſidering,

1. What theſe Ideas are, which are ſo collected into a Complex Idea; which is called Nature.

2. What that Eſſence is which is implied in this Idea; whether it be a Real or only a Nominal Eſſence.

1. What theſe Ideas are, of which this Complex Idea of Nature conſiſts; and they are ſaid to be, the ſimple Ideas of particular Subſtances united together without the Circumſtances of Time and Place. But thoſe ſimple Ideas may be conſidered two ways.

1. With reſpect to the Qualities of things, and theſe Ideas are ſaid to be true and adequate; but they go no farther than the Qualities; which reaches only to that Senſe of Nature, as it is taken for Properties.

2. With reſpect to the Subject of them, which is the Nature or Subſtance that ſupports them, and of this you confeſs we have only imperfect and inadequate Ideas.

As they are true and adequate; and ſo they are not the true Repreſentations of Things without us, but of the Effects of ſuch Powers in them as produce Impreſſions in us; which are thoſe you call Secondary Qualities. And in that Senſe P. 169. I take your words. And of theſe I ſaid, that we can underſtand nothing really by them but the Effects they have upon us; i. e. the Powers and not the Ideas. The Ideas are the Impreſſions on our Minds; and by theſe we can underſtand nothing but the Effects which the Powers in outward Objects have upon us, and conſequently not the Nature of them. This I take to be plain Senſe.

To this you Anſwer Two things;

1. That we certainly know to diſtinguiſh things by Ideas, ſuppoſing them nothing P. 170.

but Effects produced in us by theſe Powers, as if they were Repreſentations.

P. 171. 2. That we have certainly as much pleaſure and delight by thoſe Ideas one way as the other.

Granting all this to be true, what is it to the Complex Idea of Nature, which ariſes from theſe ſimple Ideas? Nature is a Collection of ſeveral Ideas combined into one Complex Abſtract Idea. But the ſimple Ideas acquaint us not with the Nature of the Objects, but only with the Powers which are in them; by the B 2. ch. 8. Sect. 10. 15, 17, 23. help of Bulk, Size, Figure and Motion; which you call the Primary Qualities. Now theſe, you ſay, are really in the things themſelves; whether the Senſes perceive them or not; and the Ideas of theſe are the true Reſemblances of what exiſts in the Objects; i. e. that by the Impreſſions we find in our ſelves, we are certain that there are Bodies of a determinate Bulk, Size, Figure and Motion. And this is all, we can by theſe ſimple Ideas come to, as the Nature of Corporeal Subſtances. But ſuppoſe one ſhould ask how we can underſtand the Nature of theſe Operations of the Primary Qualities in producing the Secondary; we Sect. 25. are ſoon anſwered, that there is no conceivable Connexion between them, and that Reaſon cannot ſhew how Bodies by their Bulk, Figure and Motion ſhould produce in the Mind the Ideas of Blue, Yellow, &c. And ſo we are extremely helped by theſe ſimple Ideas in underſtanding the Nature of any particular Subſtance. For the ſenſible Qualities in us are only the Effects of certain Powers in the Objects, cauſed by their Bulk, Size, Figure and Motion; but if we ask how they are produced, we are plainly told, that our Reaſon by theſe ſimple Ideas can reach to no knowledge of it. And ſo we are left in as much Ignorance as ever, as to the Manner how Things without us produce Ideas in us.

P. 174. But ſay you, By theſe ſimple Ideas, we can as certainly diſtinguiſh the Beings wherein thoſe Powers are, and receive as certain Advantages from them, as if thoſe ſimple Ideas were Reſemblances.

As to Advantages from them, that is quite out of our Enquiry; which is concerning the Idea of Nature, as it is a Complexion of ſimple Ideas; and all that it amounts to is, that by theſe ſimple Ideas, we underſtand the Diſtinct Powers in ſeveral Bodies to produce Impreſſions in our Minds; and by the ſecondary Qualities we find in our ſelves, we are certain of the primary Qualities in Bodies, from their different Bulk, Size, Figure and Motion. But ſtill we have nothing but an Idea of Qualities, which goes no farther than the Eſſential Properties; but the Idea of Nature goes farther, and implies that Being wherein thoſe Qualities are; and that I ſaid, which is the ſubject of Powers and Properties, is the Nature or Subſtance of it; which in this reſpect is the ſame. Have we any Adequate Idea of this?

To this you ſay:

P. 176. 2. That all Ideas of Subſtances, which are referr'd to Real Eſſences are in that reſpect Inadequate. This is what your ſelf own to be your Senſe; and is as much as I deſire. For, I pray conſider what a fine Abſtract Complex Idea you have given us of Nature. Our Adequate Ideas go no farther than Qualities, and if we enquire into the Real Eſſence, or Subſtance that ſupports them, we are told that they are Inadequate; and conſequently we can have no true Notion or Idea at all of it.

P. 178. But you ſay farther, that you do not affirm, That Abſtract Ideas are only general Names: For you aſſert a Real Eſſence in things; the internal unknown Conſtitution is the Real Eſſence; and the Abſtract Idea is the Nominal Eſſence.

P. 181. The former you tell me, you do readily own; viz. That Eſſence which is in particular Subſtances; but the Queſtion before us is, Whether that which is in more Individuals than one, be a Real or only a Nominal Eſſence.

2. And this is that which we are next to Examine. To clear this, I put the Inſtance of the Sun, where an Eſſence was ſaid by you to be in one Individual; and yet more Suns might agree in it. In this one Sun there is a Real Eſſence, and not a meer Nominal and Abſtracted Eſſence: upon which I asked, If there were more Suns, would not each of them have the Real Eſſence of the Sun? For what is it makes the ſecond Sun, to be a true Sun, but having the ſame Real Eſſence with the firſt? If it were but a Nominal Eſſence, then the Second would have nothing but the Name.

Here I muſt examine your Anſwer, as far as I can underſtand it: For here indeed you may complain of the want of clear and diſtinct Ideas; but I will do what I can to explain that which I conceive to be your Senſe.

You ſay, This doth not at all concern the Real, but the Nominal Eſſence. P. 190.

How is this poſſible? Is there not the Real Eſſence of the Sun in that Individual, we call the Sun? But I put the Caſe, that there were a Multiplication of Individuals; and there were more Suns: would not each of theſe have the Real Eſſence of the Sun? If it were only a Nominal Eſſence, the reſt would have only the Name.

But you ſay, you did not mean the real Eſſence of the Sun was in that Individual. How could you mean otherwiſe, when you acknowledge the Real Eſſence to be in particular Subſtances? And is not the Sun a particular Subſtance? But the Idea of it being a Complex and Abſtracted Idea, could not be the Real Eſſence. I anſwer, That the Eſſence of the Sun being communicated to another is a Real Eſſence; or elſe, the Second is but the Name and nothing elſe. P. 191.

You tell me, That you ſay expreſly, that our diſtinguiſhing Subſtances into Species by Names, is not at all founded on their Real Eſſences. And I think it is clear to any one that underſtands things, and not meer Ideas; that another true Sun muſt have the Real Eſſence of a Sun.

You ask, What I mean by a true Sun. I anſwer, That which hath the Eſſence of a Sun; and that the Name cannot be truly applied to that which hath it not. Yes, ſay you, it may to any thing, which hath united in it that Combination of ſenſible Qualities, by which any thing elſe that is called Sun is diſtinguiſhed from other Subſtances, i. e. by the Nominal Eſſence. So that now the Abſtract Complex Idea is owned to be nothing but a Combination of Qualities in one Idea.

But I muſt ſtill ask, what becomes of this Combination of Qualities in the ſecond Sun, if there be not a Real Eſſence to ſupport them? You grant it when the ſecond Sun comes to exiſt. And if it does not exiſt, how can it be the Second Sun?

Should it be true, ſay you, that the Real Eſſence of the Sun were in any of the fixed Stars, yet it could not be called by us the Sun, whilſt it anſwers not our Complex Idea, or Nominal Eſſence of a Sun. If the Real Eſſence of a Sun be in a fixed Star, it is really a Sun, whether you call it ſo or not; as a Laplander is as really a Man whatever you call him, if he hath the Eſſence of a Man. And it is ſtrange to me to find any Man diſpute ſuch evident things. P. 193.

And ſo I come to the Inſtance of the Individuals among Men. I ſaid, that there muſt be a Real Eſſence in every Individual of the ſame kind. Peter, James and John are all true and real Men; not by attributing a general Name to them; but becauſe the true and real Eſſence of a Man is in every one of them.

But you ſay, I firſt ſuppoſe them to be Men: no otherwiſe than as they are Individuals of the ſame kind. P. 195.

Your Weweena, Cuchepy and Couſheda I have nothing to ſay to, they may be Drills for any thing I know; but Peter, James and John are Men of our own Country, and we know them to be ſeveral Individuals of the Race of Mankind. And what is it makes them Men, but that the true and real Eſſence of a Man is in every one of them? Yes, ſay you, if making be taken for the Efficient Cauſe. Whoever dreamt of a Specifick Eſſence being the Efficient Cauſe? But I ſaid, that it was the true and real Eſſence of a Man, which made every Individual a true and real Man; of which I ſaid we are as certain, as that we are Men. That, ſay you, is only by our Senſes finding thoſe Properties, which anſwer P. 197. P. 198.

ſwer the Abſtract, Complex Idea, which is in our Minds of the Specifick Idea to which we have annexed the Specifick Name Man. I leave to you the Honour of this Scholaſtick Language, which is always moſt proper when there is nothing under it. I love to ſpeak plain Senſe if I can, and ſo as to be underſtood by every one that is acquainted with theſe Matters: but theſe Specifick Names and Abſtract and Complex Ideas, I think tend to confound Mens Apprehenſions; who can never think otherwiſe, but that every Man is ſaid to be a true real Man; not for any Specifick Name, but becauſe his Properties ſhew him to be endued with the true real Eſſence of a Man. I ſaid, that the general Idea is not made from the ſimple Ideas, but by meer Act of the Mind abſtracting from Circumſtances, but from Reaſon and Conſideration of things.

P. 199. You reply, That you thought Reaſon and Conſideration had been meer Acts of the Mind, when any thing was done by them. I hope the Ideas you have of the Acts of your own Mind, are clearer than thoſe you have of other Mens. For it is plain, I oppoſed your General and Abſtract Idea by a meer Act of the Mind, to a Rational Inference from the Nature and Properties of things. For I added; for, when I ſee ſo many Individuals, that have the ſame Powers and Properties, we thence inferr, there muſt be ſomething common to all, which makes them of one kind; and if the difference of Kinds be real, that which makes them of one kind and not of another, muſt not be a Nominal but a Real Eſſence. Is there now no difference between theſe Two Acts of the Mind, viz. Abſtraction and Ratiocination?

P. 201. And you grant, that the Inference is true. But you ſay, it doth not follow, that the general or ſpecifick Idea is not made by the meer Act of the Mind. Where do I deny that Abſtraction is made by an Act of the Mind? But that is not the Queſtion; but whether the Notion of Eſſence in Individuals of the ſame kind, be a meer Act of the Mind by Abſtraction, or have a real Foundation in the Nature of things? i. e. whether it be a Real or a Nominal Eſſence?

Ibid. But you ſay, There may be Objections to the Name of Nominal Eſſence. My Objection is not to the Name, but to the Thing you underſtand by it, viz. that there is nothing beyond Individuals but Names, which utterly overthrows the Difference of Nature and Perſon. For if there be nothing really, but an individuated Eſſence, then it muſt follow, that there can be no difference of Hypoſtaſes in the ſame Nature: For Nature individuated muſt take in the Hypoſtaſis; and Nature being taken as common is affirmed by you to be nothing but an Abſtract and Complex Idea, and a meer Nominal Eſſence.

P. 203. You ſay, That we cannot know the differences of things by their real Eſſences. And what then? Do I ever deny, that the difference of kinds is to be underſtood from the different Properties? But we are not upon our Knowledge of the difference of Species, but upon the Real and Nominal Eſſence.

And I ſhew'd that the real Eſſence doth not depend upon Complex Ideas; becauſe if men miſtake never ſo much in the Combination of Ideas, yet the ſame Eſſence remains; as I inſtanced in the Eſſence of a Man, a Horſe and a Tree.

P. 210. True, you ſay, Our Thoughts or Ideas cannot alter the real Conſtitutions of things that exiſt; but the Change of Ideas can and does alter the ſignification of their Names, and thereby alter the kinds, which by theſe Names we rank and ſort them into.

But this doth by no means reach the point, which is not concerning our ſorting of Things, which is by Names, but God's ſorting them, when he made them of different kinds. For ſo I ſaid, that the Eſſences remain always the ſame, becauſe they do not depend on the Ideas of Men, but on the Will of the Creator, who hath made ſeveral ſorts of Beings.

P. 212. All the Anſwer you give is this, That the real Conſtitution or Eſſence of particular things exiſting, do not depend on the Ideas of Men, but on the Will of the Creator, Creator, but their being ranked into ſorts, under ſuch and ſuch Names does depend and wholly depend upon the Ideas of Men.

But my Argument did not proceed upon particular things exiſting, but upon the ſeveral kinds of God's making, and is it poſſible for you to think that the kinds are not of his making, but that Men only by their Ideas make the ſeveral ſorts? If ſo, I have very little hopes to remove you from your Ideas; but I am bound to do what in me lies to hinder ſuch Notions from overthrowing the Myſteries of our Faith.

And it is a great ſatisfaction to me to find, that theſe Notions of Ideas, as far as they tend that way, have ſo very little Foundation in Reaſon, or rather are ſo manifeſtly repugnant to them.

Before I conclude my ſelf, I muſt take notice of your Concluſion, viz. That you muſt content your ſelf with this condemned way of Ideas, and deſpair of ever attaining any knowledge by any other than that, or farther than that will lead me to it. Which is in effect to ſay, that you ſee no way to avoid Scepticiſm but this: but my great Prejudice againſt it is, that it leads to Scepticiſm, or at leaſt, that I could find no way to attain to Certainty in it upon your own grounds.

For (1.) you ſay, That Knowledge to you ſeems to be nothing but the Perception of the Connexion and Agreement or Diſagreement, and Repugnancy of any of our Ideas. In this alone it conſiſts. Whence it unavoidably follows, that where we can have no Ideas, we can have no Knowledge.

Book 4. Ch. 1. Sect. 1.

But you go about to prove, That there are many more Beings in the World, of which we have no Ideas, than thoſe of which we have any; and that one holds no Proportion to the other. So that we are excluded from any Poſſibility of attaining to knowledge, as to the far greateſt part of the Univerſe for want of Ideas; and yet you ſay, That he that will conſider the infinite Power, Wiſdom and Goodneſs of the Creator of all things, will find Reaſon to think it was not all laid out upon ſo inconſiderable, mean and impotent a Creature, as he will find Man to be, who in all Probability is one of the loweſt of all intellectual Beings. And not long after, you ſay, That the Intellectual World is certainly a greater and more beautiful World than the Material.

Ch. 3. Sect. 23.

Sect. 27.

But whence comes this Certainty, where there can be no Ideas? Is a general Reaſon ſufficient without particular Ideas? Then why not in other caſes as well?

2. Suppoſe we have no Ideas of the Intellectual World, yet ſurely we may have as to the viſible World: No, you ſay, That although we have Ideas of Bulk, Figure and Motion in general; yet not knowing what is the particular Bulk, Figure and Motion of the greateſt part of the Bodies of the Univerſe, we are ignorant of the ſeveral Powers, Efficacies and Ways of Operation, whereby the Effects we daily ſee are produced. Theſe are hid from us in ſome things by being too remote, in others by being too minute.

Sect. 24.

So that you confeſs, We can attain to no Science, either as to Bodies or Spirits. And what a narrow compaſs muſt our Knowledge then be confined to? You confeſs, We have no Ideas of the Mechanical Aſſertions of the minute Particles of Bodies; and this hinders our certain Knowledge of univerſal Truths concerning natural Bodies; and our Reaſon carries us herein very little beyond particular matter of Fact. Certainty and Demonſtration we muſt not in theſe things pretend to. So that all Certainty is given up in the way of Knowledge, both as to the viſible and inviſible World, or at leaſt, the greateſt part of them.

Sect. 26.

Sect. 27.

Sect. 25.

3. But ſtill it is to be hoped, that where we have Ideas, we may come to a Certainty in diſcerning the Connexion between them. No, you ſay, Another Cauſe of our Ignorance is, the want of a diſcoverable Connexion between thoſe Ideas we have. What! are we at a loſs here too, and yet all our Certainty depends on the perceiving the Agreement and Diſagreement of Ideas? Yes, you confeſs, That the Mechanical Affections of Bodies having no Affinity at all with the Ideas they produce in us, we can have no diſtinct Knowledge of ſuch Operations beyond Experience. And the Operations of our Minds on our Bodies is as unconceivable.

4. But by the help of Intermediate Ideas, may we not come to find out the certain Agreement or Diſagreement of Ideas, ſo there be due Application of the B. 4. ch. 2. Sect. 2. Mind to it? Yes, ſay you, This may be done, and this is that we call Reaſoning, and thoſe intervening Ideas are called Proofs: and where the Agreement or Diſagreement is clearly and plainly perceived, it is called Demonſtration. But how if this way of Demonſtration be made impoſſible? What benefit can we have of Sect. 7. it in the way of Certainty? Each ſtep, you tell us, That Reaſon makes in demonſtrative Knowledge muſt have intuitive Evidence; for elſe, you ſay, that Intermediate Idea would need a Proof. And for want of this, Men often embrace Falſhoods for Demonſtrations. But if there be no way of coming to Demonſtration but this, I doubt we muſt be content without it.

5. You give no reaſonable Satisfaction in the way of Ideas, as to the plaineſt Evidence of Senſe concerning the Exiſtence of external Objects. For there is no Intuition of the Mind, nor Demonſtration in this Caſe; and all the evidence in your way muſt be from the Ideas in our Minds, which are ſuppoſed to ariſe from external Objects; but the queſtion is, how from theſe Ideas within our ſelves, we can prove the certain Exiſtence of Objects without our ſelves. Becauſe men may have ſuch Ideas in their Minds by the power of Imagination, Ch. 2. Sect. 14. when there are no Objects to produce them? You ſay, A man is invincibly conſcious to himſelf of a different Perception, in ſeeing the Sun in the Day, and remembring it in the Night, and taſting of Wormwood, and ſmelling of a Roſe, and thinking of it afterwards. But this doth not clear the main difficulty, which is, how from the Idea of the Taſte of Wormwood or Smell of a Roſe I can prove the actual Being of ſuch things without me, ſince you grant, that there is no conceivable Connexion in Reaſon, between the Powers in the Objects and the Ideas in us: and if there be not, how can we be certain in the way of Ideas? I do not ſpeak, as to Pain or Pleaſure, but as to the Evidence from the Ideas in our ſelves. For the moſt that you ſay is, That a Man may perceive a very manifeſt difference between dreaming of being in a Fire, and being actually in it, becauſe of the Pleaſure or Pain that follows the Application of certain Objects; which Certainty is as great as our Happineſs or Miſery, beyond which we have no Concernment to know or to be. But the preſent difficulty is not merely about the difference between ſleeping and waking; and I grant you, that a Man's being ſenſible of Fire touching him, will effectually convince him that he is not in a Dream: but the point before us is, when we are ſenſible we are awake, what it is in the way of Ideas, Ch. 11. Sect. 1. which can ſatisfie us of the real Exiſtence of external Objects. For you confeſs, That the having the Idea of any thing in our Mind, no more proves the Exiſtence of that thing, than the Picture of that Man evidences his being in the World, or the Viſions of a Dream make a true Hiſtory. How then can we come to any Sect. 2. Certainty in the way of Ideas? The Account you give is this, that the actual receiving Ideas from without, makes us know that ſomething doth exiſt at that time without us, which cauſes that Idea within us. Which is in other terms to remove the Certainty from the Idea to the mere Act of Senſation: but all our Diſpute hath been not about the Certainty either of Senſe or Reaſon; (which I freely yield to) but about a particular way of Certainty by the Agreement or Diſagreement of Ideas; and of this I ſhew that you give no ſatisfactory Account, as to the Exiſtence of the plaineſt Objects of Senſe. For you ſay, The Certainty lies in perceiving the Connexion between Ideas; and here you grant, That Reaſon cannot perceive the Connexion between the Objects and the Ideas, how then ſhould we poſſibly attain any Certainty in the way of Ideas? So that your ſelf gives up the way of Certainty by Ideas.

I might eaſily purſue this matter farther; but I think this is ſufficient to let you ſee, you have no ſuch cauſe to be ſo well contented with this condemned way of Ideas as you are pleaſed to call it.

And now to conclude, I am very far from being an Enemy to any free Enquiries into the Nature and Reaſons of Things, and would be glad to find any real Diſcoveries that way. And I can eaſily bear the putting of Philoſophical Notions into a modern and faſhionable Dreſs.

Let Men expreſs their Minds by Ideas if they pleaſe; and take Pleaſure in ſorting and comparing and connecting of them; I am not forward to condemn them; for every Age muſt have its new Modes, and it is very well if Truth and Reaſon be received in any Garb. I was therefore far enough from condemning your way of Ideas, till I found it made the only ground of Certainty, and made uſe of to overthrow the Myſteries of our Faith, as I told you in the beginning. This was it which made me look more narrowly into it at firſt, and now to give you this Trouble of an Anſwer to your Letter.

I hope that in the managing this Debate, I have not either tranſgreſſed the Rules of Civility, or miſtaken your Meaning, both which I have endeavour'd to avoid. And I return you thanks for the Civilities you have expreſſed to me through your Letter; and I do aſſure you, that it is out of no Diſreſpect, or the leaſt ill-will to you, that I have again conſider'd this Matter, but becauſe I am farther convinced, that as you have ſtated your Notion of Ideas, it may be of dangerous conſequence as to that Article of Chriſtian Faith, which I endeavour'd to defend.

I am no Lover of Controverſies, however, I have been often engaged in them; but I have that ſatisfaction in my mind, that my deſign was to promote that, which upon my beſt Enquiries, I thought to be Truth; and by ſuch means as were moſt ſuitable to the purſuit of it, without any Bitterneſs againſt thoſe I oppoſed. But of all Truth, I am convinced, that it is fitteſt for me to employ the Remainder of my Days in what concerns the Vindication of our Holy Religion contained in the Scriptures, which gives us the only ſure Grounds to hope for a Bleſſed Immortality. And in the Defence and Practice of that, I hope, by the Grace of God both to live and die.

I am, Sir,

You Real Friend,

and Humble Servant,

Edw. Wigorn

POSTSCRIPT.

I Had no Thoughts of adding a Poſtſcript to my Anſwer, as you had done to your Letter; but before the Sheets were wrought off, there was ſent to me a new Socinian Pamphlet, wherein there are Reflections (and little more) on my late Treatiſe in Vindication of the Trinity. The reaſon I had to joyn my ſhort Animadverſions on that to theſe Papers, was the advantages he takes from the abſtracted Notion of Nature againſt the Doctrine of the Trinity, which was the thing I told you I apprehended to be of dangerous Conſequence in it.

But before I come to that, I cannot but take notice of their very different way of Writing from yours, which is Grave and Civil, but theirs is trifling, and too ſcurrilous in matters of Religion, for which I had ſo juſtly rebuked them before, but it ſeems to very little purpoſe: which makes me apt to think, their greateſt Hopes ſtill are in ſuch Readers who love to ſee Matters of Religion ridiculed; and the Perſons who are concerned to defend them expoſed to Scorn and Contempt. This was that I told them, which gave ſuch a Reliſh to their late Pamphlets, as though nothing would go down with ſuch vitiated Palates, that had not a Mixture of this Aſſafœtida with it. But becauſe in the Concluſion of his Pamphlet, he charges me as well as others, with uſing them unjuſtly as well as roughly, I ſhall give a Taſt of this man's decent manner of Writing. The firſt thing he inſiſts upon againſt me, is, That I openly profeſs my Method, that I will prove Firſt, then Secondly, then Thirdly, then Fourthly and Fifthly. And what harm is there in uſing the plaineſt Method in a nice and intricate Subject? Should I go about to juſtifie this, by the Rules of the ancient and beſt Maſters of Writing in Arguments of ſuch a Nature; That would be ſhewing too much regard to ſuch pitiful Cavilling. But methinks theſe men ſhould not object this Method againſt us, of Firſt, Secondly and Thirdly, who had before charged us with brutal and inexcuſable Ignorance in Counting or Numbring. But he goes on. And now beloved firſt of the firſt. Have I any words like theſe? No matter for that. But this ſerves well enough for the Farce; when the deſign is to ridicule the Form and Way of modern Sermons; which he knew was an acceptable Subject to his Men of Wit, as he calls them. If they be really ſo, they cannot but deſpiſe ſuch Fooling in ſerious matters. And our Modern Sermons are ſuch, both as to the Structure and Reaſon of them, as will bear the Cenſures of Men of Judgment, (as well, it may be, as of any Age) but his Men of Wit, who love Religion in no dreſs, will always have ſomething or other in Sermons to find fault with. And our Author was hard put to it to bring in this ſmart Reflection on Modern Sermons to pleaſe his Friends, which was very remote from a Debate about the Trinity.

The next thing is, (for I muſt not ſay Secondly) That my Way of Writing is too obſcure; and that he could not take my Meaning under two or three Readings. Which to pleaſe his Men of Wit, he facetiouſly expreſſes after this manner; And when I have ſtrained my Jaws and hazarded my Teeth to break the Shell, moſt commonly it proves nothing but a Shell, that I am tempted to renounce Nuts for ever. And I think he will do wiſely in it. I am certain, I was ſo far from affecting Obſcurity, that I endeavoured to put the darkeſt points into as good a Light as I could; and I am afraid he ſometimes ſhut his Eyes, that he might complain of the darkneſs of the Room.

I dare not go ſo far as Thirdly; and therefore come to conſider the main parts of his Pretence to anſwer my Book.

As to the Contents of my Book, he ſaith, I ſhew, that neither Antiquity, nor Reaſon, nor Scripture is at all for them, they are all againſt them. Wherein he is very much in the right. And I ſhall now examine what he hath ſaid, to take off any part of the Charge.

He begins with Antiquity, and very fairly takes it for granted, That for 4000 Years, The Doctrine of the Unitarians was the true Doctrine; but he obſerves, That I make the Doctrine of the Trinity to have been a part of the Cabala or Oral Tradition among the Jews; upon which he cries out, Where is Conſcience, or is Religion nothing but a Name? Why, what's the matter? How comes Conſcience and Religion to be ſo deeply concerned, whether the Jews had any Anticipation of the Trinity among them? But he ſaith, I do not believe the Jewiſh Cabala, no more than the Alchoran, and yet I produce the Authority of it: and he adds, That it was a Fiction of the Phariſees; and that it is a Prevarication in me to mention it as the unwritten Word of God. I am afraid his Cracking of Nuts hath put him into ſome Diſorder, and made him cry out, without any other Cauſe but the Pain of his Teeth. Where did I ever give the leaſt Cauſe to ſuſpect my owning the Jewiſh Cabala, as the unwritten Word of God? All that I ſaid was this. The Socinians had ſaid, That Chriſt was called the Word, becauſe he he was the Bringer or Meſſenger of God's Word. To which I anſwer'd, That the Jews were to underſtand it in the Senſe it was known among them: which was for a Divine Subſiſtence, as I proved from the Chaldee Paraphraſt, and the Teſtimonies of Philo the Alexandrian Jew, who lived ſo near our Saviour's time. Here is not a word of the Phariſaical Cabala, which every one knows to have been about Traditional Cuſtoms, which they laid as much weight upon, as upon the Law of God, if not more. But the Chaldee Paraphraſt was in very great Eſteem, as giving the true Senſe of the Scripture, and for that only I produced it. And what anſwer doth he give to the Teſtimonies out of it? He ſaith, They relate either to the Law, or to the Command of God to Moſes, or to the Power of God. But I ſhew'd that Rittangel, who managed the Debate on this Argument with a learned Unitarian, proved to his plain Conviction, that theſe places could be underſtood of nothing but a Divine Subſiſtence. But he mightily triumphs, that the moſt pertinent place is falſe printed; for it is ſet down, Gen. 20. 21. and he tells us, There are but 18 Verſes in that Chapter; but a Man of common Ingenuity would ſuſpect an Error in the Preſs in ſuch a Caſe; and if he had pleaſed to have look'd on Gen. 28. 21. he might have found 22 Verſes, and the Words in the 21. Therefore, ſaith he, ſo much for Chaldee and Cabala, deſpiſed by all learned Men, Jews as well as Chriſtians; and never uſed but when the People are to be gulled with noiſy Nothings. One would hardly think it poſſible ſuch mean ſtuff as this ſhould paſs for an anſwer among any that pretend to Senſe or Knowledge. For how can he deny the ſenſe of the Chaldee Paraphraſt, when Philo the Alexandrian Jew concurs in that Interpretation, as is evident by multitudes of places in him? Did I not expreſly mention his Teſtimony as concurring with the other? Why not a word ſaid to it? Did I not add the Conſent of Euſebius concerning the Jews owning the Divinity of the Meſſias, till they fell off from it in oppoſition to the Chriſtians? And are theſe but noiſy Nothings to gull People with? Let what will become of the Diſpute between the Phariſaical Jews and the Karaites; thoſe who know any thing of theſe Matters, do know that I went upon other grounds; viz. whether the Iſraelites did receive from God an Oral Law, which they are bound to obſerve as much as the written Law, and to interpret the written Law, and the force of its obligation by it. And this I never mention'd or intended to plead for it. And as to the 13 ways of Cabaliſtical Interpretations, I look on them as groundleſs and frivolous things; but the thing I aimed at, was only this, There are certainly places of the Old Teſtament, which ſpeak of the Meſſias as the Son of God; Thou art my Son, &c. and call him Lord, The Lord ſaid unto my Lord. The queſtion is, what the Senſe of theſe places was, and how they are to be applied to Chriſt? Now if it appear, that the moſt ancient Jews did underſtand them in ſuch a manner, as to apply them to a Second Subſiſtence in the Divinity, we have great reaſon to follow that Senſe, which is ſo agreeable to the New Teſtament; and about this we have no manner of Reaſon to deſpiſe the Senſe of the ancient Jews, and eſpecially of the Chaldee Paraphraſt, who aſſerts a ſecond and a third Subſiſtence in the Divinity. And this he could not but find without any danger to his Jaws, was the only thing I intended.

The next thing in point of Antiquity which he conteſts, is about the Nazarenes: That Name, I ſaid, was at firſt common to all Chriſtians, as is plain from Act. 24. 5. afterwards it was applied to the Jewiſh Chriſtians at Pella and Decapolis; and to ſuch as admitted no Gentiles to their Communion, but kept to the Ceremonies of the Law; and of theſe I ſaid they might be all Ebionites; but I utterly denied it of ſuch as were Members of the Catholick Chriſtian Church, as it was made up of Jews and Gentiles. This Diſtinction he calls a pure figment, but anſwers not one of the Reaſons I brought for it; although I proved from uncontroulable Evidence, that they made two different Bodies, had different Rules of Faith; and that the Church of Jeruſalem did hold the Divinity and Pre-exiſtence of our Saviour. And is all this Cabala too, and only to be uſed when People are to be gulled with noiſy Nothings? i. e. with empty Pleroma's, and ſilent Thunder-claps. The Alogians were theirs, for any thing I know in all reſpects; and I will give them Theodotion, and Paulus Samoſatenus, and Photinus. But I think not much to their comfort; the two latter were moſt certainly condemned by the Chriſtian Church; and whether the former were a mere Jewiſh Proſelyte, or an Ebionite is not worth contending about; ſince S. Jerom makes him to tranſlate the places about our Saviour like a Jew, and Aquila like a Chriſtian; which ſhews how mean an opinion he had of his Sincerity.

I proved the condemning Paulus Samoſatenus while they were under the power of Zenobia, to be a plain evidence of the ſenſe of the Chriſtian Church againſt his Doctrine; at a time when no intereſt could be ſuppoſed to ſway them. To this he gives a twofold Anſwer, (1.) That be ſure it is falſe, that they were then under the power of Zenobia. But how can we be ſure it is falſe, when I brought proof it was true, and he anſwers nothing at all to it? But it ſeems, all is Cabala and noiſy Nothings that ſtand in his way. (2.) He ſaith, They were all Hereticks. A very ſhort Anſwer. But how is this proved? For a little proof looks well ſometimes, and a man muſt not always ſay, be ſure it is ſo. Well, here is a plain proof; they differ'd from the Council of Nice about Homoouſios. But I had before given a full Anſwer to that, p. 42. to which he gives not the leaſt reply, viz. that they took it in two different Senſes.

As to Lucian, I leave it to the Readers Judgment, if he compares what I have ſaid, and what he anſwers together, and whether he thinks it probable that the Arians ſhould forge a Creed under his Name at Antioch; if he continued in the Doctrine of Paulus Samoſatenus, which was contrary to it.

This is all, he ſaith, that ſeems conſiderable in point of Antiquity; and whether he hath ſaid any thing really conſiderable about it, let the Reader judge.

Come we now to the point of Scripture, which is the main point in the caſe. For I had declared, p. 112. that our Faith as to the Trinity, is built upon that; and that there are many places of Scripture, of which no tolerable Senſe can be given without it. And therefore I examined the Senſe the Unitarians gave of the moſt remarkable Places, and ſhew'd the Weakneſs and Inconſiſtency of it, and then in an entire Chapter proved our Doctrine from the Form of Baptiſm delivered by our Saviour, as it was always underſtood in the Chriſtian Church. This I think was a very plain and eaſie Method of proving our Doctrine.

And now what ſaith our Unitarian to all this? Truly, I have met with few Anſwers like it. In ſhort, he ſaith, That for his part, he is enough perſwaded without further arguing the Matter, that I have ſpent my Breath againſt a Rock. This is juſt the Popiſh way of anſwering by Infallibility and ſuper hanc Petram. But in neither caſe can I ſee the leaſt ground for ſuch mighty Confidence. Alas for them! they ſay, That if we write againſt their Interpretations of Scripture, they are not at leiſure to wipe off every ſmall Soil that may happen to be ſcatter'd in their Books. Not at Leiſure! Whence have come all thoſe Swarms of peſtilent Books which have come abroad of late Years among us, to ſpread their infectious Doctrine over the Nation? And now are they not at Leiſure to defend them? And at the ſame time have Leiſure enough to run into other Matters, about which there may be more Colour for Cavilling. So that this cannot be the true Reaſon, and I leave the Reader to judge what it is.

The laſt thing is the point of Reaſon; and here he finds Leiſure enough to expatiate. But I ſhall keep to that point, upon which he ſuppoſes the whole Controverſie to turn, which is, whether the difference between Nature and Perſon, which we obſerve in Mankind, do ſo far hold with reſpect to the Divine Nature, that it is a Contradiction to ſay, there are three Perſons and not three Gods?

And there are ſeveral things I propoſed, in order to the clearing of this Matter, ter, which I ſhall endeavour to lay down as diſtinctly as I can; and I ſhall not be Hector'd or Banter'd out of that which I account the moſt proper Method, although it happen to be too obſcure for our Men of Wit to underſtand without Hazard of their Jaws.

The Principles or Suppoſitions I lay down are theſe.

I. Nature is One and Indiviſible in it ſelf, wherever it is.

II. The more perfect any Nature is the more perfect muſt its Unity be.

III. Whatever is affirmed of a moſt peſect Being, muſt be underſtoood in a way agreeable to its Perfection.

IV. It is repugnant to the Perfection of the divine Nature, to be multiplied into ſuch Individuals as are among Men; becauſe it argues ſuch a dependence and ſeparation, as is inconſiſtent with the moſt perfect Unity.

V. To ſuppoſe three diſtinct Perſons in one and the ſame Indiviſible Divine Nature, is not repugnant to the Divine Perfections; if they be founded on ſuch relative Properties, which cannot be confounded with each other, and be in themſelves agreeable to the Divine Nature.

VI. Whether there be three ſuch diſtinct Perſons or not, is not to be drawn from our own Imaginations, or Similitudes in created Beings, but only from the Word of God, from whom alone the Knowledge of it can be communicated to Mankind.

Let us now ſee how he proves, that ſince there is no Contradiction for three Perſons to be in one common humane Nature, it muſt be a Contradiction to aſſert three Perſons in the ſame divine Nature. He offers at no leſs than demonſtrative Reaſon, p. 58. c. 2. but I have always had the moſt cauſe to fear the Men that pretend to Infallibility, and Demonſtration. I paſs over his Myſterious Boxes, as Trifles fit only to entertain his Men of Wit, and come immediately to his demonſtrative Reaſon, if it be to be met with. It comes at laſt to no more than this, that Humane Nature, and Angelical Nature, and Camel Nature have no Exiſtence but only in our Conception; and are only Notions of our Minds; but the Perſons in the ſame rational Being are not mere Metaphyſical Perſons or Relative Properties, but they are ſuch as neceſſarily ſuppoſe diſtinct Subſtances as well as diſtinct Properties. But in the Trinity, the Nature is a really exiſting Nature, 'tis a Spiritual Subſtance, and endued with a great number of Divine Attributes, not an abſtracted or mere notional imaginary Nature; and the Divine Perſons are not diſtinct Subſtances or real Beings, but Properties only in a real Being and in an infinite Subſtance. This is the force of the Demonſtration. But now if I can make it appear, that every Nature is not only One and Indiviſible in it ſelf, but endued with Eſſential Attributes and Properties belonging to it as ſuch, then it will be evident, that Nature is not a mere Abſtracted Notion of our Minds, but ſomething which really exiſts ſomewhere; and then the Foundation of this demonſtrative Reaſon is taken away. And I appeal to any Perſons that conſider things, whether the Humane, Angelical, and Camel Nature (as he calls it) do not really differ from each other, and have ſuch Eſſential Properties belonging to them as cannot agree to any other Nature? For elſe it muſt be a mere Notion and Fiction of the Mind, to make any real difference between them. But if Humane Nature and Camel Nature do eſſentially differ from each other, then every Nature hath its Eſſential Unity and Properties which cannot belong to any other, and that without any act of our Minds. And if every Nature is really and eſſentially different from another, it muſt have an Exiſtence ſomewhere independent on our Notions and Conceptions.

It may be ſaid, That no ſuch Nature doth really exiſt by it ſelf, but only in the ſeveral Individuals. But that is not the preſent Queſtion, where or how it exiſts, but whether it depend only on our Imaginations or the acts of our Minds; and if it doth ſo, then there can be no real and eſſential Difference in the Natures of Men and Beaſt, which I think none who have the Underſtanding of a Man can imagine.

But really exiſting Natures, he ſaith, are in ſuch Perſons, as neceſſarily ſuppoſe diſtinct Subſtances, as well as diſtinct Properties; and if they exiſted only in a common Nature, as the Humanity, and had not alſo diſtinct Subſtances, they would never make diſtinct Perſons.

I do allow, that in created and dependent Beings, there muſt be diſtinct Subſtances to make diſtinct Perſons; but he ought to have given an account what that is which makes diſtinct Perſons neceſſarily to ſuppoſe diſtinct Subſtances. For the Nature is One and Indiviſible in them all; or elſe every Individual muſt make a new Species, which is an Abſurdity I ſuppoſe he will not be fond of. If there be then one and the ſame Nature in the Individuals, whence comes the difference of Subſtances to be ſo neceſſarily ſuppoſed? If it be from Diverſity, Diſſimilitude, Dependance and ſeparate Exiſtence, as I aſſerted, then theſe Reaſons can hold only in created Beings; and where they cannot hold, as in the Divine Nature, why may there not be a diſtinction of Perſons founded on relative Properties, without any diſtinction of Subſtances, which is repugnant to the perfect Unity of the Godhead? What demonſtrative Reaſon, nay, what probable Argument hath he offer'd againſt this?

He takes notice p. 60. of what I had ſaid about the diſtinction of Perſonality and Perſon; and that Perſonality is originally only a particular Mode of Subſiſtence; and a Perſon beſides the relative Property takes in the divine Nature together with it. And what Demonſtration have we againſt this? So far from it, that he falls to Trifling again to keep his Men of Wit in good Humour. So much for Madam Perſonality, now for Sir Perſon. Is this a decent way of Writing about theſe Matters; to begin with the Talk of demonſtrative Reaſon, and to end with Burleſquing, and turning them into Ridicule? If this be an agreeable Entertainment for his Men of Wit, it ſhews that they deſerve that Character, as well as he doth that of a Demonſtrator.

But this ſportfull Gentleman hath found ſomething elſe to play with, viz. that my Notion of three Subſiſtences without three Subſtances is really nothing but Sabellianiſm. But I had already ſaid ſo much for the clearing of this, both in the Preface and the Book it ſelf, that I need not to add one Word about it, unleſs he had ſuggeſted ſome new demonſtrative Reaſon to prove it. Which he is far enough from. All that he ſaith, is, That they muſt be called Fools as well as Sabellius, if they aſſerted Relative Properties, or any Properties that were in no Eſſence. But the Author of the Diſcourſe of Real and Nominal Trinitarians, (to whom he is no Stranger) had ſaid That the Sabellians held that the Father, Son and Spirit are but only three Names of God given to him in Scripture by occaſion of ſo many ſeveral Diſpenſations toward the Creature, and ſo he is but one ſubſiſting Perſon and three Relative Perſons. If this be true, here are Relative Properties indeed relating to a Divine Eſſence: but how? not as to any Internal Relations of Father, Son and Holy Ghoſt; but as to External Diſpenſations, which are another kind of Relative Properties.

This is all that I can find in this laſt Effort, that relates to my ſelf: As to what concerns others, they are very able to defend themſelves, and particularly as to Dr. S. and Dr. Sh. I muſt ſtill ſay I think them much his Superiours as to Wit and Learning, (for of them I ſpake without the leaſt Reſpect to my ſelf, however he makes it a Complement to my ſelf and them, I know not for what Reaſon unleſs it be that I ſpeak of thoſe againſt whom they had written with Inſolence and Scorn.) But I hope they will ſhew themſelves ſo much his Superiours too in Wiſdom and Diſcretion, as not to renew their Quarrels upon his Provocations, for he doth what in him lies to inflame them; and he thought it, (and I do not blame him for it) the beſt ſervice he could do to his ſinking Cauſe.

TO Mr. LOCKE's Second Letter;

WHEREIN

His NOTION of IDEAS is prov'd to be Inconſiſtent with it ſelf, and with the ARTICLES of the CHRISTIAN FAITH.

SIR,

I Was not a little ſurpriz'd at the length of your Second Letter, conſidering the ſhortneſs of the Anſwer contained in it: But it put me in mind of the Springs of Modena mention'd by Ramazzini, which riſe up with ſuch a plenty of Water upon opening a Paſſage, that the Undertaker is afraid of being overwhelm'd by it. I ſee how dangerous it is to give occaſion to a Perſon of ſuch a fruitful Invention to write; for Letters become Books, and ſmall Books will ſoon riſe to great Volumes, if no way be found to give a Check to ſuch an Ebullition of Thoughts, as ſome Men find within themſelves. I was apt to think the beſt way were, to let Nature ſpend it ſelf; and although thoſe who write out of their own Thoughts do it with as much Eaſe and Pleaſure as a Spider ſpins his Web; yet the World ſoon grows weary of Controverſies, eſpecially when they are about Perſonal Matters: Which made me wonder that one who underſtands the World ſo well, ſhould ſpend above fifty Pages of a Letter in renewing and enlarging a Complaint wholly concerning himſelf. Suppoſe I had born a little too hard upon you in joyning your Words and anothers Intentions together; had it not been an eaſie and effectual way of clearing your ſelf, to have declared to the World, that you owned the Doctrine of the Trinity, as it hath been Received in the Chriſtian Church, and is by ours in the Creeds and Articles of Religion? This had ſtopt the Mouths of the Clamorous, and had removed the Suſpicions of the Doubtful, and would have given full Satiſfaction to all reaſonable Men. But when you ſo carefully avoid doing this, all other Arts and Evaſions do but leave the Matter more ſuſpicious among the moſt Intelligent and Impartial Readers. This I mention, not that you need be afraid of the Inquiſition, or that I intend to charge you with Hereſie in denying the Trinity; but my preſent Deſign is to ſhew, That your Mind is ſo intangled and ſet faſt by your Notion of Ideas, that you know not what to make of the Doctrines of the Trinity and Incarnation; becauſe you can have no Idea of One Nature and Three Perſons, nor of two Natures and one Perſon; as will fully appear afterwards. And therefore, out of regard to Publick Service, in order to the preventing a growing Miſchief, I ſhall endeavour to lay open the ill Conſequences of your Way of Ideas with reſpect to the Articles of the Chriſtian Faith.

But I ſhall wave all unneceſſary Repetitions, and come immediately to the Matter of your Complaint as it is renewed in this Second Letter, which I ſhall briefly anſwer, before I proceed to that which I chiefly deſign. Your Complaint,

2d. Letter p. 2. plaint, you ſay, was, That you were brought into a Controverſie wherein you had never medled, nor knew how you came to be concerned in. I told you, “ It was Anſw. to firſt Letter, p. 46. “ becauſe the Perſon who opoſed the Myſteries of Chriſtianity went upon your “ Grounds, and made uſe of your Words; although I declared withall, that “ they were uſed to other purpoſes than you intended them; and I confeſs'd, “ that the reaſon why I quoted your Words ſo much, was, becauſe I found “ your Notion as to Certainty by Ideas, was the main Foundation on which “ the Author of Chriſtianity not Myſterious went; and that he had nothing that “ look'd like Reaſon, if that Principle were removed; which made me ſo “ much endeavour to ſhew, that it would not hold, and ſo I ſuppoſed the reaſon why I ſo often mention'd your Words, was no longer a Riddle to you.
2d. Letter, p. 48. “ Theſe Paſſages you ſet down in your Second Letter; but you ſay, all this ſeems to you to do nothing towards the clearing of this matter. Whether it doth
p. 49. or not, I am content to leave it to any indifferent Reader; and there it muſt reſt at laſt, although you ſhould write Volumes about it.

p. 50. But for what cauſe do you continue ſo unſatisfied? You tell us, It is, that the Author mentioned, went upon this Ground, That clear and diſtinct Ideas are neceſſary to Certainty, but that is not your Notion as to Certainty by Ideas; which is, That Certainty conſiſts in the Perception of the Agreement or Diſagreement of Ideas, ſuch as we have, whether they be in all their Parts perfectly clear and diſtinct or no:
And you ſay, that you have no Notions of Certainty more than this one.

Firſt Letter, p. 57. This is no more than what you had ſaid before in your former Letter, and I took particular notice of it, and gave three ſeveral Anſwers to it, which I ſhall here lay together and defend, becauſe you ſeem to think I had not anſwered it.

(1.) “ That thoſe who offer at clear and diſtinct Ideas bid much fairer for “ Certainty than you do (according to this Anſwer) and ſpeak more agreeably
p. 80. “ to your Original Grounds of Certainty. For it is a very wonderfull thing in point of Reaſon, for you to pretend to Certainty by Ideas, and not allow thoſe Ideas to be clear and diſtinct? You ſay, the Certainty lies in the Perception of the Agreement or Diſagreement of Ideas: How can I clearly perceive the Agreement or Diſagreement of Ideas, If I have not clear and diſtinct Ideas? For how is it poſſible for a Man's Mind to know whether they agree or diſagree, if there be ſome parts of thoſe Ideas we have only general and confuſed Ideas of?
And therefore I had great reaſon to ſay, that if Certainty be placed in Ideas we muſt have clear and diſtinct Ideas. You may as well ſay, a Man may be certain of the Agreement and Diſagreement of Colours in a confuſed or uncertain Light. For ſo much as the Idea fails of Clearneſs and Diſtinctneſs, ſo much it fails of that Evidence which it is neceſſary to judge by. Where-ever there is Obſcurity, Confuſion or Imperfection in the Ideas, there muſt be ſo much Uncertainty in the Perception of the Agreement or Diſagreement of them. And to pretend to Certainty by Ideas without pretending to clear and diſtinct Ideas, is to judge without Evidence, and to determine a thing to be certainly true, when we cannot know whether it be ſo or not; for how can you be ſure that your Ideas agree with the Reality of things (wherein you place the Certainty of Knowledge) if there be no ſuch Ideas of thoſe things, that you can perceive their true Nature, and their difference from all others? For therein you will not deny that the Notion of clear and diſtinct Ideas conſiſts.

Letter II. p. 2, 9, 10, 12, 14, 15, 16, 23, 38, 39, 41, 47, 50, 56, 61, 107, 114. But you ſay more than once or twice, or ten times, That I blame thoſe who place Certainty in clear and diſtinct Ideas, but you do it not, and yet I bring you in among them; which is the thing you ſo much complain of. I will give you a full Anſwer to this Complaint. I do not deny, but the firſt occaſion of my Charge was the Suppoſition that clear and diſtinct Ideas were neceſſary in order to any Certainty in our Minds, and that the only way to attain this Certainty was by comparing theſe Ideas together: But to prove this, your Words were produced, and your Principles of Certainty laid down, and none elſe; and I could not imagine that you could place Certainty in the Agreement or Diſagreement of Ideas, and yet not ſuppoſe thoſe Ideas to be clear and diſtinct. But finding your ſelf joyned in ſuch Company which you did not deſire to be ſeen in, you rather choſe to diſtinguiſh your ſelf from them, by denying clear and diſtinct Ideas to be neceſſary to Certainty. But it muſt be here obſerved, that our Debate about Certainty by Ideas is not about any other Certainty, but about Certainty of Knowledge with regard to ſome Propoſition, whoſe Ideas are to be compared as to their Agreement and Diſagreement. For your Words are, Certainty of Knowledge is to perceive the Agreement or Diſagreement of Ideas as expreſſed in any Propoſition. This we uſually call knowing or being certain of the truth of any Propoſition. So that a Propoſition whoſe Ideas are to be compared as to their Agreement or Diſagreement, is the proper Object of this Certainty. And therefore this Certainty is to be diſtinguiſhed, Eſſay, B. 4. ch. 6. Sect. 3.

Firſt Letter, p. 57.

1. From a Certainty by Senſe; or that by which we come to know the Exiſtence of External Objects. For you ſay, That the Knowledge of the Exiſtence of any other thing we can have only by Senſation. For there being no neceſſary Connexion of Real Exiſtence with any Idea a Man hath in his Memory; no particular Man can know the Exiſtence of any other Being, but only when by actual operating upon him it makes it ſelf perceived by him. But that this is quite another Certainty from that of Ideas, appears from theſe following words of yours; For the having the Idea of any thing in our Mind, no more proves the Exiſtence of that thing than the Picture of a Man evidences his being in the World, or the Viſions of a Dream make thereby a true Hiſtory. Therefore this is a very different Certainty from that of Ideas.

B. 4. ch. 11. Sect. 1.

2. From a Certainty by Reaſon; When from the Exiſtence of ſome things evident to Senſe, we inferr the Exiſtence of another thing not evident to Senſe; As to take your own words in your former Letter. As to the Exiſtence of bodily Subſtances, I know by my Senſes, that ſomething extended, ſolid and figur'd does exiſt; for my Senſes are the utmoſt Evidence and Certainty I have of the Exiſtence of extended, ſolid, figured things. Theſe Modes being then known to exiſt by our Senſes, the Exiſtence of them (which I cannot conceive can ſubſiſt without ſomething to ſupport them) makes me ſee the Connexion of thoſe Ideas with a Support, or as it is called, Subject of Inheſion, and ſo conſequently the Connexion of that Support, which cannot be nothing with Exiſtence.

Letter 1. p. 57.

Granting all this, yet it by no means proves that we can have a Certainty in the way of Ideas, where the Ideas themſelves by which we have the Certainty are obſcure and confuſed; but that ſuppoſing the Ideas we have by our Senſes to be true, we may from them inferr the Exiſtence of ſomething of which we have only an obſcure and confuſed Idea; which is the Caſe of bodily Subſtances. Of which I grant you may come to a certain Knowledge, but not a Certainty by Ideas, but by a Conſequence of Reaſon deduced from the Ideas we have by our Senſes. And this can never prove that we may have a Certainty by Ideas, where the Ideas themſelves are not clear and diſtinct: For there is a great difference between having a Certainty by reaſon, of a thing whoſe Idea is confuſed and obſcure, and having that Certainty by obſcure and confuſed Ideas. For in this Caſe the Idea of Subſtance is obſcure: but the way of Certainty is by a clear Deduction of Reaſon from the Ideas we have by our Senſes.

3. From a Certainty by Remembrance; By which I mean the remaining Impreſſion on the Mind of an Original Certainty by Demonſtration. As to uſe your own Inſtance; A Man hath found by Mathematical Evidence, that the three Angles of a Triangle are equal to two Right Angles; The Perception of this at the time of the Demonſtration was clear and diſtinct; but afterwards, the Method of Demonſtration may have ſlipt out of his Mind, yet he retains a Certainty of the thing by vertue of that Demonſtration; but this is not a clear Perception, as you would have it, where the Ideas are confuſed; but it is an obſcure Remembrance membrance of the grounds of that Certainty which he once had; and hath never ſeen any Reaſon ſince, why he ſhould call it in Queſtion.

Theſe things then being put out of the Queſtion, which belong not to it; the Queſtion truly ſtated is, whether we can attain to any Certainty of Knowledge as to the Truth of a Propoſition in the way of Ideas, where the Ideas themſelves by which we come to that Certainty be not clear and diſtinct?

Another thing to be obſerved is, that Des Cartes who firſt ſtarted this way of Certainty by Ideas, thought it a ridiculous thing in any to pretend to it, unleſs Princip. l. 1. n. 44, &c. their Ideas were clear and diſtinct. He ſaith, That when we aſſent without clear Perception, we are either deceived, or fall into Truth by chance, but we do often err when we think we have clear Perception, and have not. But to a certain Judgment, it is neceſſary that our Perception be not only clear but diſtinct: that is, when the thing not only lies open to our view, but we ſee it on all ſides, and ſo can diſtinguiſh it from all other things. You agree with him in placing Certainty in Ideas, but you differ from him in that which alone made his Opinion reaſonable, viz. That theſe Ideas be clear and diſtinct. If it were poſſible for us to come to clear and diſtinct Ideas of the things we pretend to be certain of, it were a juſt Pretence to Certainty in that way; but ſince we cannot come at them, we muſt be content with ſuch Meaſures of Knowledge as we are capable of. But for you to talk ſo much of Certainty by Ideas, and yet to allow Obſcurity and Imperfection in thoſe Ideas, is like a purblind Man who would pretend to judge exactly of the differences of Colours in the Twilight, becauſe another pretended to do it at Noon-day: Or like one, who would undertake to ſhew certainly the Agreement or Diſagreement of two Men at a diſtance from him, in their Habit, Features and Stature, and yet at the ſame time confeſs that he could not clearly diſtinguiſh one from the other. So that if I did think you ſpake more conſiſtently to your Hypotheſis, than you ſay now that you did, I hope you will forgive me that Wrong, if at leaſt it be a Wrong to you; for after all, there are ſeveral Paſſages in your Eſſay, which ſuppoſe clear Ideas neceſſary to Certainty.

B. 4. ch. 18. Sect. 8. For in one place you ſay, That the mind not being certain of the Truth of that it doth not evidently know. What is this but to make clear Ideas neceſſary to Certainty?

B. 4. ch. 4. Sect. 8. In another, yet more plainly, That which is requiſite to make our Knowledge certain is the Clearneſs of our Ideas.

B. 4. ch. 12. Sect. 14. In a third place you ſay, For it being evident that our Knowledge cannot exceed our Ideas; where they are either imperfect, confuſed or obſcure, we cannot expect to have certain, perfect or clear Knowledge.

B. 4. ch. 2. Sect. 15. In a fourth; But obſcure and confuſed Ideas can never produce any clear and certain Knowledge, becauſe as far as any Ideas are confuſed or obſcure, the mind can never perceive clearly whether they agree or diſagree. What can be more expreſs? And yet you have complained of me in near twenty places of your ſecond Letter for charging this upon you. By this the World will judge of the Juſtice of your Complaints and the Conſiſtency of your Notion of Ideas.

Anſw. to Let. 1. p. 36. (2.) I anſwer'd, "That it is very poſſible the Author of Chriſtianity not " Myſterious, might miſtake or miſapply your Notions, but there is too much " reaſon to believe he thought them the ſame, and we have no reaſon to be
" ſorry that he hath given you this occaſion for the explaining your meaning, " and for the Vindication of your ſelf in the matters you apprehend he had " charged you with.

Let. 2. p. 36. Here you enter upon a freſh Complaint, and ſay, This can be no Reaſon why you ſhould be joyned with a Man that had miſapplied your Notions; and that no Man hath ſo much miſtaken and miſapplied your Notions as my ſelf, and therefore you ought rather to be joyned with me. But is this fair and ingenuous dealing, to repreſent this matter ſo, as if I had joined you together, becauſe he had miſunderſtood and miſapplied your Notions? Can you think me a Man of ſo little Senſe to make that the Reaſon of it? No, Sir, it was becauſe he aſſigned no other Grounds but yours, and that in your own Words, however now you would divert the meaning of them another way. And although I was willing to allow you all reaſonable Occaſions for your own Vindication, as appears by my Wotds; yet I was ſenſible enough, that you had given too juſt an Occaſion to apply them in that manner, as appears by the next Page. But becauſe theſe words follow ſome I had quoted out of your Poſtſcript, you fall into a nice piece of Criticiſm about them, which, you ſay, in Grammatical Conſtruction, muſt refer to the Words of the Poſtſcript; but any one that reads without a deſign to cavil, would eaſily interpret them of your Words and Notions about which the Debate was; and not of the Poſtſcript, which comes in but as a Parentheſis. This looks like Chicaning in Controverſie; which no Man, who knows his Cauſe is good, ever falls into.

Anſwer to Letter 1. p. 37. Letter 2. p. 45.

But if, you ſay, by an unintelligible new way of Conſtruction the word Them be applied to any Paſſages in your Book: What then? Why then, whoever they are, you intend to complain of them too. But the words juſt before tell you who they are, viz. The Enemies of the Chriſtian Faith. And is this all that you intend, only to complain of them for making you a Party in the Controverſie againſt the Trinity? But whether you have not made your ſelf too much a Party in it, will appear before we have done.

P. 46

I had with great Kindneſs, as I thought, taken notice of a Paſſage in your Poſtſcript: in which I was glad to find that in general, you owned the Myſteries of the Chriſtian Faith, and the Scripture to be the Foundation and Rule of it: From whence I inferr'd, that I could not believe you intended to give any Advantage to the Enemies of the Chriſtian Faith. This Paſſage, you ſay, you were ſurprized to find in a Paragraph deſign'd to give you ſatisfaction. There are ſome Perſons I find very hard to be ſatisfied. For I ſpeak of my ſatisfaction in this Paſſage, and that I was glad you agreed ſo far with me, although you could not come up in all things to what I could wiſh. But what Reaſon have you to expreſs ſo much diſſatisfaction at theſe Words? You call it an entraordinary ſort of Complement; and that they ſeem to intimate as though I took you for a Heathen before.

How like a cavilling Exception is this? Do not we know that in the Debate about the Myſteries of Faith our Adverſaries are no Heathens; but they deny any Myſteries: I was glad to find that you owned them; and reſolved your Faith into the Scripture as the Foundation of it. Did not this look more like a good Opinion of you as to theſe matters, than any Inclination to ſuſpect you for a Heathen?

But you ſay, It muſt not be taken for granted, that thoſe who do not write or appear in Print in Controverſies of Religion do not own the Chriſtian Faith, and the Scriptures as the Rule of it. I was far enough from any ſuch Apprehenſion; but the caſe is quite otherwiſe, with thoſe who are not ſparing of writing about Articles of Faith, and among them take great care to avoid ſome which have been always eſteem'd fundamental Articles by the Chriſtian Church. And I think it was no want of Humanity or Chriſtian Charity in me, that I was ſo glad to find you own the Myſteries of the Chriſtian Faith in general: which ſhews at leaſt that you cannot object againſt any Articles of Faith, becauſe they contain ſomething myſterious in them.

But I ſaid, That in all things your Anſwer doth not come fully up to what I could wiſh. And I think I gave ſufficient Proof of it, as to your Idea of Subſtance, the Nature of Ideas, the Materiality of the Soul, the diſparaging ſome Arguments to prove the Exiſtence of God, the Tendency of your Principles, and the Ground of Certainty, &c. Which are put off to another Letter, except the laſt, which is therefore now to be examined.

Anſwer to Letter 1. p. 38. (3.) The third Anſwer I gave was, “ That your own Grounds of Certainty “ tend to Scepticiſm; and that in an Age wherein the Myſteries of Faith are too “ much expoſed by the Promoters of Scepticiſm and Infidelity, it is a thing of “ dangerous Conſequence to ſtart ſuch new Methods of Certainty, as are apt Letter 2. p. 46. “ to leave Mens minds more doubtful than before. Theſe words, you ſay, contain a farther Accuſation of your Book, which ſhall be conſider'd in its due place. But this is the proper place of conſidering it. For I ſaid, “ That hereby you “ have given too juſt occaſion to the Enemies of the Chriſtian Faith, to make “ uſe of your Words and Notions, as was evidently proved from your own Con- “ ceſſions. And if this be ſo, however I was willing to have had you explained your ſelf to the general Satisfaction; yet ſince you decline it, I do inſiſt upon it, that you cannot clear your ſelf from laying that Foundation, which the Author of Chriſtianity not Myſterious built upon. For your Ground of Certainty is the Agreement or Diſagreement of the Ideas, as expreſſed in any Propoſition. Which are your own Words. From hence I urg'd, “ That let the Propoſition “ come to us any way, either by Humane or Divine Authority, if our Certainty “ depend upon this, we can be no more certain, than we have clear Perception “ of the Agreement or Diſagreement of Ideas contained in it. And from hence “ the Author of Chriſtianity not Myſterious thought he had Reaſon to reject all “ Myſteries of Faith which are contained in Propoſitions, upon your Grounds “ of Certainty. By this it evidently appears, that although I was willing to allow you all fair ways of interpreting your own Senſe; yet I by no means thought that your Words were wholly miſunderſtood or miſapply'd by that Author: but rather that he ſaw into the true Conſequence of them, as they lie in your Book. And what Anſwer do you give to this? Not a word in the proper place for it. But afterwards (for I would omit nothing that may ſeem to help your Cauſe) you offer ſomething towards an Anſwer. For there you diſtin- Letter 2. p. 95. guiſh the Certainty of Faith, and the Certainty of Knowledge, and you humbly conceive the Certainty of Faith, if I think fit to call it ſo, hath nothing to do with the Certainty of Knowledge; and to talk of the Certainty of Faith ſeems all one to you as to talk of the Knowledge of Believing, a way of ſpeaking not eaſie for you to underſtand. So that if I ſpake never ſo much the Certainty of Knowledge, it doth not at all concern the Aſſurance of Faith, that is quite diſtinct from it, neither ſtands nor falls with Knowledge. Faith ſtands by it ſelf, and upon Grounds of its own, nor can be removed from them and placed on thoſe of Knowledge. Their Grounds are ſo far from being the ſame, or having any thing common, that when it is brought to Certainty, Faith is deſtroy'd, 'tis Knowledge then and Faith no longer. So that, whether you are, or are not miſtaken in the placing Certainty in the Perception of the Agreement or Diſagreement of Ideas, Faith ſtill ſtands upon its own Baſis, which is not at all alter'd by it; and every Article of that hath juſt the ſame unmoved Foundation, and the very ſame Credibility that it had before. This is the Subſtance of what you ſay about this Matter, and is the moſt conſiderable Paſſage in your Book towards clearing this Matter.

Anſwer to Letter 1. p. 83. But I was aware of this, as appears by theſe Words; “ Is Faith an unreaſonable “ Act? Is it not an Aſſent to a Propoſition? Then, If all Certainty in Acts of “ Reaſon be derived from the perceiving the Agreement or Diſagreement of “ the Ideas contained in it; either there can be no Certainty in the reaſonable “ Act of Faith, or the Grounds of Certainty muſt be laid ſome other way.

But this is a Matter of too great Weight and Conſequence to be eaſily paſt over, becauſe the main ſtrength of your Defence lies in it, and therefore I ſhall more ſtrictly examine what you ſay; and ſet this Point of the Certainty of Faith in as good a Light as I can, and ſhew the Inconſiſtency of your Notion of Ideas, with the Articles of the Chriſtian Faith. To talk of the Certainty of Faith, ſay you, ſeems all one to you as to talk of the Kowledge of Believing; a way of ſpeaking not eaſie for you to underſtand.

But how comes the Certainty of Faith to become ſo hard a Point with you? Have not all Mankind, who have talked of Matters of Faith, allow'd a Certainty of Faith as well as a Certainty of Knowledge, although upon different Grounds? In your former Letter you told us, that if we knew the Original of Words, we ſhould be much helped to the Ideas they were firſt applied to and made to ſtand for. Now what is there in the Original of the word Certainty which makes it uncapable of being applied to Faith? I had thought that our Word was taken from the Latin; and that among the Romans it was oppoſed to doubting, Nil tam certum quam quod de dubio certum.

And therefore where the Mind upon examination of the Grounds of Aſſent ſaw no Reaſon for doubting, it might properly be ſaid to be certain: If it ſees no Cauſe to doubt from the Evidence of the Thing it ſelf, or the clear Deduction of Conſequences, that is Certainty of Knowledge; but where it ſees no Reaſon to doubt from the Authority of him that ſpeaks, that is Certainty of Believing; and the greater the Authority of him that ſpeaks, the leſs Reaſon there is to doubt, and therefore the greater Certainty of Faith. And this I think is very eaſie to be underſtood, and ſo have the Generality of Mankind thought to this Day. But it ſeems our old Words muſt not now paſs in the current Senſe; but then it is fit they be called in, and new ſtampt, that we may have none but New milled Words to talk with; but in common Juſtice, a competent time ought to be allow'd for it, that none be ſurprized; and in the mean time they ought to paſs in their current Senſe; and that is all the Favour I deſire in this Matter. But I am utterly againſt any Private Mint of Words; and think thoſe Perſons aſſume too much Authority to themſelves, who will not ſuffer common Words to paſs in their general Acceptation; but will ſet ſuch Bounds and Limits to the Senſe of them, as ſuit beſt with their own Speculations.

But is not this all one as to talk of the Knowledge of Believing? For what Reaſon? Knowledge and Faith are too diſtinct things, the one relates to Evidence, and the other to Teſtimony; but Certainty is common to them both, unleſs you think it impoſſible to be certain upon any Teſtimony whatſoever. You tell us in your Poſtſcript (which I hope may be brought hither without Offence) that it is a ſhame among Chriſtians to raiſe ſuch a Doubt of this, Whether an infinitely powerfull and wiſe Being be veracious or no. Then I ſuppoſe the Veracity of God is a certain and undoubted Principle? and If there be ſufficient Means to aſſure us of Divine Revelation (as I doubt not but you yield there are) what ſhould hinder one, that believes upon ſuch Grounds as are ſufficient to convince him, from attaining to a Certainty of Faith? But you take Certainty as belonging only to Knowledge. So do the Papiſts, as belonging only to Infallibility, and ſay there can be no Certainty of Faith, where there is not an Infallible Proponent; but neither you nor they are to impoſe upon the Underſtandings of Mankind, who know how to diſtinguiſh the Grounds of Certainty both from Knowledge and Infallibility. You allow ſuch a thing as Aſſurance of Faith; and why not Certainty as well as Aſſurance? I know no reaſon, but that you have appropriated Certainty to the Perception of the Agreement or Diſagreement of Ideas in any Propoſition; and now you find this will not hold as to Articles of Faith; and therefore you will allow no Certainty of Faith; which I think is not for the Advantage of your Cauſe.

But you go on and tell us, That if this Way of Certainty by Ideas doth not hold, yet it cannot affect Matters of Faith which ſtand immoveable upon other Grounds; Faith in your own words ſtands ſtill upon its own Baſis; and every Article of it has juſt the ſame unmoved Foundation, and the very ſame Credibility that it had before. This will appear to be an extraordinary Anſwer, when we have throughly examin'd it. Here we ſee Faith is taken not with reſpect to the general Grounds of Certainty, but to the particular Articles of Faith, i. e. the Propoſitions contained in that Revelation which we embrace on the Account of its Divine Authority; now theſe Propoſitions are of ſeveral Kinds.

1. Some that are more clearly expreſſed therein, but ſuch as might be attained to by the Light of Reaſon without Revelation. And ſuch are the fundamental Principles of natural Religion, viz. The Being of God and Providence, and the Rewards and Puniſhments of a future State. Theſe Mankind may attain to a Certainty in, without Revelation, or elſe there can be no ſuch thing as natural Religion in the World; but theſe things are more fully and plainly revealed in the Scriptures. Let us now ſuppoſe a Perſon by natural Reaſon to attain to a Certainty, as to the Being of God and Immortality of the Soul; and he proceeds upon your general Grounds of Certainty, from the Agreement or Diſagreement of Ideas; and ſo from the Ideas of God and the Soul, he is made certain of thoſe two Points before mention'd. But let us again ſuppoſe that ſuch a Perſon upon a farther Examination of your Method of Proceeding finds that the Way of Ideas in theſe Caſes will not do; for no Idea proves the Exiſtence of the thing without it ſelf, no more than the Picture of a Man proves his Being, or the Viſions of a Dream make a true Hiſtory, (which are your own Expreſſions.) And for the Soul he cannot be certain, but that Matter may think, (as you affirm) and then what becomes of the Soul's Immateriality (and conſequently Immortality) from its Operations? But for all this, ſay you, his Aſſurance of Faith remains firm on its own Baſis. Now I appeal to any Man of Senſe, whether the finding the Uncertainty of his own Principles which he went upon in Point of Reaſon, doth not weaken the Credibility of theſe fundamental Articles when they are conſider'd purely as Matters of Faith? For before, there was a natural Credibility in them on the Account of Reaſon; but by going on wrong Grounds of Certainty, all that is loſt; and inſtead of being certain he is more doubtfull than ever. And if the Evidence of Faith falls ſo much ſhort of that of Reaſon, it muſt needs have leſs Effect upon Mens Minds, when the ſubſerviency of Reaſon is taken away, as it muſt be when the Grounds of Certainty by Reaſon are vaniſhed. Is it at all probable, that he who finds his Reaſon deceive him in ſuch Fundamental Points ſhould have his Faith ſtand firm and unmoveable on the account of Revelation? For in Matters of Revelation, there muſt be ſome Antecedent Principles ſuppoſed before we can believe any thing on the Account of it. P. 131.

And the firſt is, that there is a God; but this was the very thing he found himſelf at a loſs in by his way of Certainty by Ideas; and how can his Faith ſtand firm as to Divine Revelation, when he is made Uncertain by his own Way, whether there be a God or no? Beſides, to ſuppoſe Divine Revelation we muſt be certain that there is a Principle above Matter and Motion in the World; but here we find, that upon the Principles of Certainty by Ideas he cannot be certain of this; becauſe he doth not know but Matter may think, and conſequently, all Revelation may be nothing but the Effects of an Exalted Fancy, or the Heats of a diſordered Imagination, as Spinoza affirmed. Again, before there can be any ſuch thing as Aſſurance of Faith upon Divine Revelation, there muſt be a Certainty as to Senſe and Tradition; for there can be no Revelation pretended now without immediate Inſpiration; and the Baſis of our Faith is a Revelation contained in an Ancient Book, whereof the Parts were delivered at diſtant Times, but conveyed down to us by an Univerſal Tradition. But now, what if your Grounds of Certainty can give us no Aſſurance as to theſe things? I do not mean, that they cannot demonſtrate Matters of Fact, which it were moſt unreaſonable to expect; but that theſe Grounds of Certainty make all things uncertain; for I think I have proved, that this way of Ideas cannot give a ſatisfactory account as to the Exiſtence of the plaineſt Objects of Senſe; becauſe Reaſon cannot perceive the Connexion between the Objects and the Ideas. How then can we arrive to any Certainty in perceiving thoſe Objects by their Ideas? And I was in the right, when I ſaid this Way tended to Scepticiſm; and I do not think that conſiſtent with the Aſſurnce of Faith. P. 131.

Letter 2. p. 170. But this is an Imputation you take very ill, and ſay, that I have brought no Argument for it, but only that my great Prejudice againſt this way of Certainty is, that it leads to Scepticiſm. (Scepticiſm is the New Mill'd Word.) This is very ſtrange, when that Expreſſion is only the Introduction to the Arguments from p. 125. to 132. to which no Anſwer is given. And ſo I leave it.

2. There are other Propoſitions or Articles of Faith which wholly depend on the Senſe of Words contain'd in the Scripture, and we are to enquire, whether the Aſſurance of Faith, as you call it, be conſiſtent with the overthrowing your Grounds of Certainty; i e. whether thoſe who embrace the Articles of Faith in the Way of Ideas, can retain their Certainty of thoſe Articles when theſe Ideas are quitted. And this alone will be a plain Demonſtration in the Caſe, that the Certainty of Faith cannot ſtand with ſuch Men, if this way of Certainty by Ideas be deſtroyed. And by this which I am now to make out, let any one judge how true your Words are like to prove, when you ſay, Let the Grounds of Knowledge or Certainty be reſolved into what they pleaſe, it touches not your Faith; the Foundation of that ſtands as ſure as before, and cannot be at all ſhaken by it. Of this we ſhall judge by ſome important Articles of Chriſtian Faith according to your Ideas.

The firſt ſhall be that of the Reſurrection of the Dead. The Reaſon of believing the Reſurrection of the ſame Body upon your Grounds is from the Idea of Identity; which I take to be this from your own words. Eſſay, B.2. ch.27 n 3. 1. That the Identity of living Creatures depends not on a Maſs of the ſame Particles, but on ſomething elſe; for in them the variation of great Parcels of Matter alters not the Identity; for which you inſtance in the growth of an Oak and a Horſe. n. 6. 2. That the Identity of a Man conſiſts in nothing but a Participation of the ſame continued Life by conſtantly fleeting Particles of Matter, in Succeſſion vitally united to the ſame Organized Body. n. 9. 3. That Perſonal Identity, i. e. the ſameneſs of a Rational Being lies in Self-conſciouſneſs, and in that alone, whether it be annexed only to one Individual Subſtance, or can be continued in a Succeſſion of ſeveral Subſtances. n. 11. 4. That thoſe who place Thought in a purely material, animal Conſtitution, void of Spirit, do place Perſonal Identity in ſomething elſe than Identity of Subſtance, as Animal Identity is preſerved in Identity of Life and not of Subſtance. n. 16. 5. That it matters not to this point of being the ſame ſelf, whether this preſent ſelf be made up of the ſame or other Subſtances. n 18. 6. That in this Perſonal Identity of Self-conſciouſneſs is founded all the Right and Juſtice of Reward and Puniſhment, Happineſs and Miſery, being that for which every one is concerned for himſelf, not mattering what becomes of any Subſtance not joined to, or affected with that Conſciouſneſs. n. 26. 7. That the Sentence at the Day of Judgment will be juſtified by the Conſciouſneſs all Perſons ſhall have that they themſelves in what Bodies ſoever they appear, or what Subſtances ſoever that Conſciouſneſs adheres to, are the ſame that committed thoſe Actions and deſerve that Puniſhment for them. This I ſuppoſe to be a true and juſt Account of your Senſe of this Matter; and ſo the Article of the Reſurrection is Reſolved into your Idea of Perſonal Identity. And the Queſtion between us now is, Whether your Certainty of this Matter from your Idea have no influence on the Belief of this Article of Faith? For the main of your Defence lies upon this Point, Whether your Method of Certainty by Ideas, doth at all ſhake, or in the leaſt concern the Aſſurance of Faith? which you abſolutely deny, and affirm, Letter 2. p. 96. That Faith ſtands upon its own Baſis, and is not at all altered by your Method of Certainty; and every Article of that has juſt the ſame unmoved Foundation, and the very ſame Credibility that it had before. Now I take this Article of the Reſurrection of the Dead to be an Article of Faith, and we are to conſider, whether if your Method of Certainty by Ideas do hold in this Matter, it continues as firm, and in the ſame Credibility it had before? I ſhall not urge you with the Senſe of our own or other Chriſtian Churches in this Point of the Sameneſs of the Body in the Reſurrection of the Dead, but I ſhall confine my ſelf to the Scripture as the

the Foundation and Rule of our Faith; and the main Point is, Whether according to that, it be not neceſſary for the ſame Subſtance which was united to the Body to be raiſed up at the laſt Day? I do not ſay the ſame individual Particles of Matter which were united at the Point of Death; for there muſt be a great Alteration in them in a lingring Diſeaſe, as if a Fat Man falls into a Conſumption: I do not ſay, the ſame Particles which the Sinner had at the very time of commiſſion of his Sins; for then a long Sinner muſt have a vaſt Body, conſidering the continual ſpending of Particles by Perſpiration; but that which I ſuppoſe is imply'd in it is, that it muſt be the ſame Material Subſtance which was vitally united to the Soul here. You mention the Hypotheſis of thoſe, who n. 25. place Thought in a purely Material Animal Conſtitution void of Spirit: but you agree, that the more probable Opinion is, that this Conſciouſneſs is annexed to the Affection of one Individual Immaterial Subſtance. It is very well that it is allowed to be the more probable Opinion; but it ſeems without any Certainty as to the Truth of it. For you have told us, what the Effect of Probability is, Eſſay, B 4. ch. 15. Sect. 1. viz. That it is enough to induce the Mind to judge the Propoſition true or falſe rather than the contrary; and that it is converſant about things whereof we have no Certainty, but only ſome Inducements to receive it for true. Thence I cannot but Sect. 4. obſerve, that we have no Certainty upon your Grounds, that Self-conſciouſneſs depends upon an individual immaterial Subſtance, and conſequently that a Material Subſtance may, according to your Principles, have Self-conſciouſneſs in it; at leaſt that you are not certain of the contrary. Now I pray conſider, whether this doth not a little affect the whole Article of the Reſurrection? For, if it may be only a Material Subſtance in us that thinks, then this Subſtance, which conſiſts in the Life of an Organiz'd Body, muſt ceaſe by Death; for how can that, which conſiſted in Life, be preſerved afterwards? And if the Perſonal Indentity conſiſts in a Self-conſciouſneſs depending on ſuch a Subſtance as cannot be preſerved without an Organiz'd Body, then there is no Subſiſtence of it ſeparate from the Body, and the Reſurrection muſt be giving a new Life. To whom? To a Material Subſtance which wholly loſt its Perſonal Identity by Death. So that here can be no Perſonal Identity at all; unleſs you ſay the very ſame Life which was long ſince at an end can be Reproduced. Which I ſuppoſe you will not aſſert.

But let us take the more probable Opinion; which I think certain, viz. That Self-conſciouſneſs depends upon an Immaterial Principle in us; and then the Queſtion is, How far the Scripture determines the ſameneſs of the Body at the Reſurrection, i. e. of that Material Subſtance, which was vitally united with that Immaterial Subſtance in this Life. The Doctrine deliver'd by our John 5. 28, 29. Saviour is, that all that are in the Graves ſhall hear his voice; and ſhall come forth; they that have done good unto the Reſurrection of Life, and they that have done evil to the Reſurrection of Damnation. What is the meaning of all that are in their Graves? Doth this relate to any other Subſtance than that which was united to the Soul in Life? Can a different Subſtance be ſaid to be in the Graves and to come out of them? Is it not material, as you ſay, whether the preſent Self be made up of the ſame or other Subſtances? If it be not ſo to your Idea of Identity, it is as to the Senſe of our Saviour's Words: unleſs you can make it out, that a Subſtance which never was in the Grave may come out of it. But it may be ſaid, That if theſe Words be taken ſtrictly they confine the Reſurrection to thoſe Particles of Matter only which were in the Grave; if not, then they may extend to another Subſtance. I anſwer, that by comparing this with other places we find that the Words are to be underſtood of the Subſtance of that Body to which 2 Cor. 5. 10. the Soul was united; and not to thoſe Individual Particles. So St. Paul, For we muſt all appear before the Judgment-Seat of Chriſt, that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad. Can theſe words be underſtood of any other Material Subſtance, but that Body in which theſe things were done? How could it be ſaid, if any other Subſtance be joyned to the Soul at the Reſurrection, as its Body, that they were the things done in or by the Body? Curcellæus his Copy reads it, ἃ διὰ τοῦ σώματος ἔπραξεν; the Complutenſian τὰ ἴδια τοῦ σώματος, and ſeveral of the Fathers ſo took it; either way, it muſt relate to that which was the real Body in which the Perſon lived and acted, whether Good or Evil. And St. Paul's Diſpute about the manner of raiſing the Body might ſoon have been ended, if there were no neceſſity of the ſame Body. If there be no Reſurrection of the Dead, then is not 1 Cor. 15.

Chriſt raiſed. It ſeems then other Bodies are to be raiſed as his was; and can 16.
there be any doubt whether his Body were the ſame material Subſtance which was united to his Soul before? And the Apoſtle lays ſo much weight upon it, that he ſaith, if Chriſt be not raiſed your Faith is vain; doth he mean, if there 17.
were not the ſame perſonal Identity, as to the Soul of Chriſt and the Matter united to it after the Reſurrection? That cannot be his meaning, for then there would have been no neceſſity of Chriſts own Body being raiſed, which he aſſerts and proves by undoubted Witneſſes. Were they Witneſſes only of ſome material Subſtance then united to his Soul? He ſaith, He was ſeen of five hundred 6.
Brethren at once. What He was this? It was Chriſt that died. Yes, the Perſon 4. of Chriſt; but perſonal Identity doth not require the ſame Subſtance, but the ſame Conſciouſneſs; and ſo if Chriſt were conſcious to himſelf in another Subſtance, there was no neceſſity of the ſame Body. And ſo truly from the ſeeing the Perſon of Chriſt they could not prove it was the ſame Individual Body. But Thomas ſaid, John 20.
Except I ſhall ſee in his hands the print of the Nails, and put my Finger into the 25.
print of the Nails, and thruſt my Hand into his ſide, I will not believe. The doing whereof convinced him it was the ſame Individual Body; but there will be no ſuch proof at the great Day. And there is no Reaſon there ſhould, ſince the Reſurrection of Chriſt was a ſufficient proof of God's Power to raiſe the Dead, and the Diſſimilitude of Circumſtances can be no Argument againſt it, ſince the Power and Wiſdom of God are concerned in it.

But the Apoſtle inſiſts upon the Reſurrection of Chriſt, not meerly as an Argument of the Poſſibility of ours, but of the Certainty of it; becauſe he roſe as the firſt Fruits; Chriſt the firſt Fruits, afterwards they that are Chriſts at his coming. 1 Cor. 15.
St. Paul was aware of the Objections in Mens Minds about the Reſurrection of 20, 23.
the ſame Body; and it is of great Conſequence as to this Article to ſhew upon what Grounds he proceeds. But ſome Man will ſay, How are the Dead raiſed 35.
up, and with what Body do they come? Firſt he ſhews, that the ſeminal parts of Plants are wonderfully improved by the ordinary Providence of God in the manner of their Vegetation. They ſow bare Grain of Wheat, or of ſome other Grain, 36, 37, 38 but God giveth it a Body, as it hath pleaſed him, and to every Seed his own Body. Here is an Identity of the Material Subſtance ſuppoſed; τὸ ἴδιον σῶμα, that proper Body which belongs to it; every Seed having that Body in little, which is afterwards ſo much inlarged; and in Grain the Seed is corrupted before its Germination; but it hath its proper Organical Parts, which make it the ſame Body with that which it grows up to. For although Grain be not divided into Lobes as other Seeds are, yet it hath been found, by the moſt Accurate Obſervations, that upon ſeparating the Membranes theſe Seminal Parts are diſcerned in them; which afterwards grow up to that Body which we call Corn. St. Paul indeed ſaith, that we ſow not that Body that ſhall be; but he ſpeaks not of the Identity but the Perfection of it. And although there be ſuch a difference from the Grain it ſelf, when it comes up to be perfect Corn, with Root, Stalk, Blade and Ear, that it may be ſaid to outward Appearance not to be the ſame Body, yet with regard to the Seminal and Organical Parts, it is as much the ſame as a Man grown up is the ſame with the Embryo in the Womb. And although many Arguments may be uſed to prove, that a Man is not the ſame, becauſe Life which depends upon the courſe of the Blood and the manner of Reſpiration and Nutrition is ſo different in both ſtates, yet that Man would be thought Ridiculous that ſhould ſeriouſly affirm, that it was not the ſame Sect. 4. Man. And you grant, that the variation of great parcels of Matter in Plants, alters not the Identity: and that the Organization of the Parts in one coherent Body partaking of one common Life makes the Identity of a Plant; ſo that in things capable of any ſort of Life, the Identity is conſiſtent with a continued ſucceſſion of Parts; and ſo the Wheat grown up is the ſame Body with the Grain that was ſown. And thus the Alteration of the Parts of the Body at the Reſurrection is conſiſtent with its Identity, if its Organization and Life be the ſame; and this is a Real Identity of the Body which depends not upon Conſciouſneſs. From whence it follows, that to make the ſame Body, no more is required but reſtoring Sect. 6. Life to the Organized Parts of it. And you grant likewiſe, That the Identity of the ſame Man conſiſts in a Participation of the ſame continued Life by conſtantly fleeting Particles of Matter in Succeſſion vitally united to the ſame Organized Body.

So that there is no difficulty as to the ſameneſs of the Body, if Life were continued; and if by Divine Power Life be reſtored to that Material Subſtance which was before united, by a Re-union of the Soul to it, there is no Reaſon to deny the Identity of the Body. Not from the Conſciouſneſs of the Soul, but from that Life which is the Reſult of the Union of Soul and Body. But St. Paul ſtill ſuppoſes that it muſt be that Material Subſtance to which the Soul was
42. before united. For ſaith he, It is ſown in Corruption, it is raiſed in Incorruption:
43. It is ſown in Diſhonour, it is raiſed in Glory; It is ſown in Weakneſs, it is
44. raiſed in Power; It is ſown a Natural Body, it is raiſed a Spiritual Body. Can ſuch a Material Subſtance which was never united to the Body be ſaid to be ſown in Corruption, and Weakneſs, and Diſhonour? Either therefore he muſt ſpeak of the ſame Body, or his meaning cannot be comprehended. For what doth all this relate to a Conſcious Principle? The Apoſtle ſpeaks plainly of that Body which was once quickened and afterwards falls to Corruption; and is to 53, 54. be reſtored with more noble Qualities. For this Corruptible muſt put on Incorruption, and this Mortal muſt put on Immortality. I do not ſee how he could more expreſly affirm the Identity of this Corruptible Body, with that after the Reſurrection, and that without any Reſpect to the Principle of Self-conſciouſneſs; and ſo if the Scripture be the ſole Foundation of our Faith, this is an Article of it, and ſo it hath been always underſtood by the Chriſtian Church. And your Idea of Perſonal Identity is inconſiſtent with it; for it makes the ſame Body which was here united to the Soul not to be neceſſary to the Doctrine of the Reſurrection, but any Material Subſtance being united to the ſame Principle of Conſciouſneſs makes the ſame Body. The Diſpute is not, how far Perſonal Identity in it ſelf may conſiſt in the very ſame Material Subſtance; for we allow the Notion of Perſonal Identity to belong to the ſame Man under ſeveral changes of Matter; but whether it doth not depend upon a Vital Union between the Soul and Body and the Life which is conſequent upon it; and therefore in the Reſurrection the ſame Material Subſtance muſt be reunited; or elſe it cannot be called a Reſurrection, but a Renovation; i. e. it may be a New Life, but not a raiſing the Body from the Dead.

2. The next Articles of Faith which your Notion of Ideas is inconſiſtent with, are no leſs than thoſe of the Trinity and of the Incarnation of our Saviour. The former by the firſt Article of our Church is expreſſed by three Perſons in the Unity of the Divine Nature: the latter is ſaid Art. 2. to be by the Union of the Divine and Humane Nature in one Perſon. Let us now ſee whether your Ideas of Nature and Perſon can conſiſt with theſe. But before I come to that I muſt endeavour to ſet this Matter right, as to the Diſpute about the Notion of Nature and Perſon, which you have endeavour'd with all your Art to perplex and confound, and have brought in ſeveral Interlocoutrs to make it look more like an Entertainment: Of which afterwards. The Original Queſtion was, Whether we could come to any Certainty about the Diſtinction of Nature and Perſon in the Way of Ideas; and my buſineſs was to prove that we could not, becauſe we had no ſimple Ideas by Senſation or Reflection, without which you affirm that our Underſtanding ſeems to you not to have the leaſt Glimmering of Ideas: and that we have nothing in our Minds which did not come in one of theſe two Ways.

Eſſay B. 2 c. 1 Sect. 5

Theſe are your own Words. And then I undertook to ſhew, that it was not poſſible for us to have any ſimple Ideas of Nature and Perſon by Senſation or Reflection: and that whether we conſider'd Nature as taken for Eſſential Properties, or for that Subſtance wherein that Property lies: whether we conſider it in diſtinct individuals, or abſtractly; ſtill my Deſign was to ſhew that in your Way of Ideas, you could come to no Certainty about them. And as to Perſon I ſhew'd, that the Diſtinction of Individuals is not founded meerly on what occurs to our Senſes, but upon a different manner of Subſiſtence, which is in one Individual, and is not communicable to Another. And as to this I ſaid, that we may find within our ſelves an intelligent Subſtance by inward Perception; but whether that make a Perſon or not, muſt be underſtood ſome other way; for if the meer intelligent Subſtance make a Perſon, then there cannot be the Union of two ſuch Natures, but there muſt be two Perſons. Which is repugnant to the Article of the Incarnation of our Saviour.

Vindication of the Trinity, p. 252, &c.

That this was the true State of the Queſtion will appear to any one that will vouchſafe to look into it. But what ſaid you in your firſt Letter in Anſwer to it?

As to Nature you ſay, That it is a Collection of ſeveral Ideas combined into one complex, abſtract Idea, which when they are found united in any Individual exiſting, though joyned in that Exiſtence with ſeveral other Ideas, that individual or particular Being is truly ſaid to have the Nature of a Man, or the Nature of a Man to be in him; foraſmuch as theſe ſimple Ideas are found united in him, which anſwer the complex, abſtract Idea, to which the ſpecifick Name is given by any one: which abſtract ſpecifick Idea, he keeps the ſame when he applies the ſpecifick Name ſtanding for it to diſtinct Individuals.

Letter 1. p. 165.

And as to Perſon, in the way of Ideas, you ſay that the Word Perſon in it ſelf ſignifies nothing, and ſo no Idea belonging to it, nothing can be ſaid to be the true Idea of it. But as ſoon as the common Uſe of any Language has appropriated it to any Idea, then that is the true Idea of a Perſon, and ſo of Nature.

P. 216.

Againſt this I objected in my Anſwer to that Letter, that if theſe Terms really ſignifie nothing in themſelves, but are only abſtract and complex Ideas, which the common Uſe of Language hath appropriated to be the ſigns of two Ideas; then it is plain that they are only Notions of the Mind, as all abſtracted and complex Ideas are; and ſo one Nature and Three Perſons can be no more.

Anſwer to Letter 1. p. 103.

To this you anſwer in your ſecond Letter, That your Notion of the Terms Nature and Perſon is, that they are two ſounds that naturally ſignifie not one thing more than another, nor in themſelves ſignifie any thing at all, but have the ſignification which they have barely by Impoſition. Whoever imagined that Words ſignifie any otherwiſe than by Impoſition?

Letter 2. p. 109.

But the Queſtion is, whether theſe be meer Words and Names, or not? Or whether there be not a real Foundation in things for ſuch a Diſtinction between Nature and Perſon? Of which I gave this evident Proof, that if it were not the ſame Nature in different Individuals, every Individual muſt make a different Kind.

And what Anſwer do you give to this plain Reaſon? Nothing particular that I can find. But in the general you ſay, that all that you can find that I except againſt in your Notion of Nature and Perſon is nothing but this, viz. that theſe are two ſounds which in themſelves ſignifie nothing. And is this all indeed? Did not I tell you in theſe Words, (which I am forced to repeat on this occaſion, although I am very unwilling to fill Pages with Repetitions.) "The Queſtion "now between us comes to this, whether the common Nature or Eſſence of

Anſwer to Letter 1. p. 107.

“ things lies only in an abſtract Idea, or a general Name, and the real Eſſence “ conſiſts only in particular Beings from which that Nature is abſtracted? The “ Queſtion is not whether in forming the Notion of common Nature, the Mind “ doth not abſtract from the Circumſtances of particular Beings; but it is whe-“ ther there be not an Antecedent foundation in the Nature of things, upon “ which we form this abſtract Idea? For if there be, then it cannot be “ called an Univerſal Name only; or a meer ſign of an Idea, which we have “ formed from putting many ſimple Ideas together, which Name belongs to “ all of ſuch a ſort, as have thoſe ſimple Ideas united together.

In theſe Words, which you cannot deny to be in the place mention'd, I thought I had ſtated the Caſe fairly between us. And why do you not return an Anſwer to them? But inſtead of that you only mention another Paſſage more liable to cavilling, where I ſay, “That upon your Notions of Nature and Perſon, I do not P. 103. “ ſee how it is poſſible to defend the Doctrine of the Trinity. For if theſe Terms “ really ſignifie nothing in themſelves, but are only abſtract and complex I-“ deas, which the common uſe of Language hath appropriated to be the ſign “ of two Ideas; then it is plain that they are only Notions of the Mind, as “ all abſtract and complex Ideas are; and ſo one Nature and three Perſons can “ be no more.

Upon this you charge me with affirming that of you which you never ſaid, Letter 2. p. 112. viz. that theſe Terms are only abſtract or complex Ideas: but your Words are, Taking therefore Nature and Perſon for the ſign of two Ideas they are put to ſtand for: Letter 1. p. 27. and by enumerating all the ſimple Ideas, that are contained in the complex Idea, that each of them is made to ſtand for, we ſhall immediately ſee the whole difference that is between them.

Theſe are your own Words. Now from thence it appears, that Nature and Perſon are Terms which are the ſigns of two Ideas by your own Confeſſion: but you never made theſe, or any other Terms to be Ideas: and you ſhould be aſhamed of ſuch Jargon.

Eſſay B. 4. c.6.Sect.1. But have not you ſaid in your Eſſay, that it is a very common Practice for Names to be made uſe of inſtead of the Ideas themſelves, eſpecially if the Ideas be very complex. Nature and Perſon you grant to be complex Ideas; and theſe Terms you confeſs are appropriated to be the ſigns of two Ideas: Therefore here is an Ambiguity in the Uſe of theſe Words, for they are complex Ideas themſelves, and they are made the ſigns of them; and ſo the Words of the Sentence are cable of both thoſe Senſes.

For it is true, according to you, that theſe Terms, Nature and Perſon, really ſignifie nothing in themſelves, but are only complex and abſtract Ideas; and thoſe Terms are appropriated to be the ſigns of two Ideas. So that Nature and Perſon are both Ideas themſelves, and thoſe Terms are the Signs of two Ideas: and the Senſe had not been liable to Exception, if And had been inſerted; “For if theſe “ Terms really ſignifie nothing in themſelves, but are only abſtract and com-“ plex Ideas; And which the common Uſe had appropriated to be the Signs of two Ideas, &c. But whether this be properly expreſſed or not, according to your Senſe of Ideas, the Weight of the Controverſie depends not at all upon it; but whether Nature and Perſon can be any other but abſtract Ideas, according to your own plain Expreſſions; and if they are ſo, they are no more than Notions of the Mind, and then the Conſequence muſt hold, that One Nature and three Perſons can be no more. Upon which I ſaid, I did not ſee how it was poſſible to defend the Doctrine of the Trinity, (and I now add of the Incarnation) which was the thing I undertook to make out.

Letter 2. p. 113. But you very freely ſay, whether I rightly deduce from it this Conſequence, viz. And ſo one Nature and three Perſons can be no more; is what you neither know nor are concerned to examine. Which I think is an Expreſſion could hardly drop from a Perſon, who did know how to declare his Belief of three Perſons in the Unity of the Divine Nature. But you pretend theſe are none of your Notions of Nature and Perſon, nor indeed any thing you can underſtand. But it is plain, that this Conſequence follows from your own Notions of Nature and Perſon; as they are ſet down expreſly by your ſelf in the former Letter.

You tell me, I made this Inference a little in haſte! Whether a Man write in P. 109.
haſte or not, the World will judge by what appears, and not by what he or any other ſaith. And I think it will appear, that I did not make this Inference in haſte, but from a deliberate Conſideration of your Notion of the Ideas of Nature and Perſon. But by thoſe Terms ſignifying nothing in themſelves, you ſay, that you P. 109.
meant, that they are two ſounds that naturally ſignifie not one thing more than another, nor in themſelves ſignifie any thing at all, but have the ſignification which they have barely by Impoſition. And was this truly all that you meant by it? And do you think that Peter, and James, and John, ſignifie any thing by Nature? Are not all Words made ſignificative by Impoſition? But is there no difference in the ſignification of Words as they ſtand for ſigns of Things? If they be Words for particular Subſtances, then you grant, that there is ſomething really exiſting which is meant by thoſe Words; but if they relate only to the Conceptions of the Mind, then they ſignifie them and no more. And the Queſtion is, which of theſe two you meant by thoſe Words Nature and Perſon? And you plainly affirm both of them to be complex Ideas, which are made only by an Act of the Mind, and therefore your meaning can be no otherwiſe underſtood.

You preſume, that upon more leiſurely thoughts, both my ſelf and the reſt of Mankind will concur with you. I never affected Singularity, and am ready to comply with the reſt of Mankind in any reaſonable thing. But you ſay, that this P. 110.
Notion of Nature and Perſon, That they are two Words that ſignifie only by Impoſition, is what will hold in the common Senſe of Mankind. No doubt of it: But I muſt again and again tell you, that is not the Point in Queſtion, but whether they are only abſtract and complex Ideas, which have no other Being but in the Mind? And to this you anſwer not a Word. I do not in the leaſt think as you ſuggeſt, P. 111.
that it is neceſſary to the Defence of the Trinity, that theſe two Articulate ſounds ſhould have Natural ſignifications, and that unleſs they are uſed in thoſe ſignifications, it were impoſſible to defend the Doctrine of the Trinity. But I do affirm that thoſe who make Nature and Perſon to be only abſtract and complex Ideas; can neither defend nor reaſonably believe it. And this is making no extraordinary Suppoſi- P. 112.
tion neceſſary to the Belief or Defence of it; but only that which in the common Senſe of Mankind is neceſſary to it. For, if you have expreſſed your own Mind in your former Letter; that muſt guide us in your Notion of Nature and Perſon, where you undertook to explain them. For if Nature and Perſon be abſtract, and complex Ideas, as you ſay, and ſuch are only Acts of the Mind, I do not ſee how it is poſſible for you to reconcile theſe Notions with the Articles of the Trinity and Incarnation.

I do not go about to accuſe you of denying theſe Doctrines; I hope you do not. But I impute all this Heſitancy and doubting only to your Notions of Ideas; which you had been ſo long forming in your Mind, that as it often happens in ſuch Caſes, one darling favourite Notion proves too hard for ſome Points of far greater Conſequence, when they are found inconſiſtent with it. And becauſe you had firſt fixed your Notion of Ideas, and taken much Pains about them, you thought all other thigns were to be entertained as they appear'd conſiſtent with them. But you could not but find, that the Articles of three Perſons, and one Nature; and two Natures, and one Perſon, were not reconcileable with your Ideas of Nature and Perſon; which is that they are complex Ideas, which depend upon the Act of the Mind; for this were to make the two Natures in Chriſt to be only two complex Ideas. For if Nature, as you ſay, be a Collection of ſeveral Ideas combined into one complex abſtract Idea; then two Natures can be nothing elſe but two ſuch Collections, or two abſtracted and complex Ideas.

It may be ſaid, that when you make Nature an abſtracted and complex Idea, you ſpeak of a ſpecifick Idea, but the Humane Nature in Chriſt was a particular Subſtance, and this you aſſert to be a real thing, and not to depend on the Act of the Mind.

Letter 1. p. 32. But this doth not clear the matter. For in your former Letter you ſaid, that all the Ideas we have of particular diſtinct Subſtances, are nothing but ſeveral Combinations of ſimple Ideas: which in Corporeal Subſtances are ſenſible Qualities, in Incorporeal are Operations of the Mind. The utmoſt then which the Idea of Humane Nature in Chriſt comes to is, that there were in him the ſenſible Qualities and Intellectual Operations of a Man, with an unknown Subſtance to ſupport them: which belongs not to the ſimple Ideas, but is ſuppoſed by them. This is all I can make of your way of Ideas: and ſo the Incarnation of Chriſt is the aſſuming the ſenſible Qualities, and intellectual Operations of a Man, to which a Subſtratum doth belong: but is no part of the ſimple Ideas. So that we can have no Idea at all of the Humane Nature of Chriſt; but only an Inference, that ſince thoſe are but Accidents, there muſt be a Subſtratum to ſupport them; and conſequently there was a particular Subſtance in him made up of Mind and Body. But if this had come in the way of Ideas, yet it cannot make out the Humane Nature of Chriſt. For if it were in him no otherwiſe than in other Men, then the Myſtery of the Incarnation is quite gone, and Chriſt is to be conſider'd but like other Men; which doth not anſwer to what the Scripture ſaith of the Word's being made Fleſh, and that God was manifeſt in the Fleſh. There muſt be therefore ſomething beyond the meer Humane Nature in him; and either it muſt be only ſome Divine Operation upon, and with it, and that is no Subſtance; or if it be a Subſtance, it muſt either co-habit with it, or elſe be united to it. If it only co-habits, then there are two Perſons dwelling together in one Body, and the Actions of one cannot be attributed to the other; if there be a real Union between them, ſo as the Acts belong to one Perſon; then there muſt be ſuch a Manner of Exiſtence in the Humane Nature of Chriſt, which is different from it in other Perſons. For in all others, the Acts belong to the Humane Perſon; but if it were ſo in Chriſt, then the Divine Acts of Chriſt muſt flow from the Humane Nature as the Principle of them; which is to confound the Divine and Humane Nature, and Operations together: If they come from the Divine Perſon, then the Humane Nature muſt have another kind of Subſiſtence than it hath in others, or elſe there muſt be two Perſons; and Perſon being as you Eſſay l. 2. ch. 27. Sect. 26. ſay, a Forenſick Term, there muſt be two different Capacities of Rewards and Puniſhments; which is ſo abſurd an Opinion as I think no one will aſſert.

If there be then but one Perſon and two Natures, how can you poſſibly re- Letter 1. p. 216. concile this to your way of Ideas? Perſon, ſay you, in it ſelf ſignifies nothing; but as ſoon as the common uſe of any Language has appropriated it to any Idea, then that is the true Idea of a Perſon, i. e. Men may call a Perſon what they pleaſe, for there is nothing but common uſe required to it. They may call a Horſe, or a Tree, or a Stone a Perſon if they think fit; but ſince the common uſe of Language hath appropriated it to an Intelligent Being, that is, a Perſon.

Eſſay, l. 2. ch. 27. Sect. 9. And ſo you tell us, That Perſon ſtands for a Thinking Intelligent Being that hath Reaſon and Reflection, and can conſider it ſelf as it ſelf, the ſame thinking Being in different times and places. How comes Perſon to ſtand for this and nothing elſe? From whence comes Self-conſciouſneſs in different times and places to make up this Idea of a Perſon? Whether it be true or falſe, I am not now to enquire, but how it comes into this Idea of a Perſon? Hath the common uſe of our Language appropriated it to this Senſe? If not, this ſeems to be a meer Arbitrary Idea; and may as well be denied as affirmed. And what a fine paſs are we come to in the Way of Ideas, if a meer Arbitrary Idea muſt be taken into the only true Method of Certainty? But of that afterwards. We now proceed in the Way of Ideas as you give it us. But if this be the true Idea of a Perſon, then there can be no Union of two Natures in one Perſon: For if an Intelligent Conſcious Being be the Idea of a Perſon; and the Divine and Humane Nature be Intelligent Conſcious Beings, then the Doctrine of the Union of two Natures and one Perſon is quite ſunk, for here muſt be two Perſons in this way of Ideas. Again, if this be the Idea of a Perſon, then where there are three Perſons, there muſt be three diſtinct Intelligent Beings; and ſo there cannot be three Perſons in the ſame individual Eſſence. And thus both theſe Doctrines of the Trinity and Incarnation are paſt recovery gone, if this Way of Ideas hold. So great a difference there is, between forming Ideas firſt, and then judging of Revelation by them; and the believing of Revelation on its proper Grounds, and interpreting the Senſe of it by the due Meaſures of Reaſon. You may pretend what you pleaſe, that you hold the Aſſurance of Faith, and the Certainty by Ideas to go upon very different Grounds; but when a Propoſition is offered you out of Scripture to be believed, and you doubt about the Senſe of it, is not Recourſe to be made to your Ideas? As, in the preſent Caſe, whether there can be three Perſons in one Nature, or two Natures and one Perſon; what Reſolution can you come to upon your Principles, but in the way of Ideas? You may poſſibly ſay, That where Ideas are clear and diſtinct, there you are to judge of Revelation by them; and this is what you aſſert in your Eſſay, That in Propoſitions whoſe Certainty is built on clear and perfect Ideas and evident Deductions of Reaſon, there no Propoſition can be received for Divine Revelation which contradicts them; from hence you conclude it impoſſible for the ſame Body to be in two Places at once. And yet there is a Perſon who hath lately told the World, that there is one certain ſecret way how by Divine Power, the ſame Body, but not the ſame Perſon, may be in very diſtant places at once; but he is adviſed to keep it up as a Secret; which was good friendly Advice: But till it be diſcovered there is no judging of it. Here I obſerve, that you require clear and diſtinct Ideas; and yet we find, if a Man's Word may be taken, theſe clear and diſtinct Ideas do not prove the thing impoſſible. But what is to be ſaid when the Ideas are not clear and diſtinct? You ſay, Your Method of Certainty is by the Agreement or Diſagreement of Ideas, where they are not in all their Parts perfectly clear and diſtinct. And this is your Secret about Certainty; which I think had been better kept up too: For I pray, in the Caſe now before us, Are your Ideas of Nature and Perſon clear and diſtinct or not? if they are, then it is plain from your own Doctrine, that if Revelation be pretended, you are to reject it. How then comes the Certainty of Faith to be preſerved firm and immoveable, although the Grounds of Certainty be diſputed? But ſuppoſe they are not clear and diſtinct? What is to be done in a Matter of Revelation contrary to your Ideas? Are you to ſubmit to the Revelation or not? Whatever God hath Revealed is moſt certainly true, no doubt can be made of it. This is the proper Object of Faith; but whether it be a Divine Revelation or no, you ſay, Reaſon muſt judge. Yes, Reaſon proceeding upon clear and diſtinct Ideas. But ſuppoſe you have Ideas ſufficient for Certainty in your Way, but not clear and diſtinct; what is to be done then? In things that are above Reaſon, you ſay, when they are Revealed, they are proper Matters of Faith. What is here being above Reaſon? Either above the Diſcovery of Reaſon, as the Fall of Angels, the Reſurrection of the Body, &c. and about theſe, you ſay, Reaſon hath nothing to do. (What not if there be an Idea of Identity as to the Body?) Or ſuch as are above the Comprehenſion of Reaſon when diſcovered. And they are either ſuch as we have no Natural Ideas of; and then you grant, that they are pure Matters of Faith; or they are ſuch, as you have certain Ideas of, but not clear and diſtinct. Now here lies the pinching Difficulty, as to your Way of Ideas. You ſay indeed, That Revelation muſt carry it againſt meer Probabilities to the contrary; becauſe the Mind not being certain of the Truth of that it doth not evidently know, but is only probably convinced of, is bound to give up its Aſſent to ſuch a Teſtimony, which it is ſatisfied comes from one who cannot err and will not deceive. I pray obſerve your own Words, you here poſitively ſay, That the Mind not being certain of the Truth of that it doth not evidently know: So that it is plain here, that you place Certainty only in Evident Knowledge, or in clear and diſtinct Ideas; and yet your great Complaint of Me was, that I charged this upon you, and now I find it in your own Words (which I obſerved before.) But let us allow you all you deſire, viz. That there may be Certainty by Ideas, where they are not clear and diſtinct; and let us now ſuppoſe that you are to judge of a Propoſition delivered as a Matter of Faith, where you have a Certainty by Reaſon from your Ideas, ſuch as they are: Can you aſſent to this as a Matter of Faith, when you are already certain by your Ideas of the contrary? How is this poſſible? Can you believe that to be true, which you are certain is not true? Suppoſe it be that there are two Natures in one Perſon; the Queſtion is, Whether you can Aſſent to this as a Matter of Faith? If you had ſaid, there had been only Probabilities on the other ſide, I grant that you then ſay, Revelation is to prevail; but when you ſay you have Certainty by Ideas to the contrary, I do not ſee how it is poſſible for you to Aſſent to a Matter of Faith as true, when you are certain from your Ideas that it is not true: For how can you believe againſt Certainty? The Evidence is not ſo great as when the Ideas are clear and diſtinct, but the Bar againſt Aſſent is as ſtrong; becauſe the Mind is actually determined by Certainty. And ſo your Notion of Certainty by Ideas muſt overthrow the Credibility of a Matter of Faith in all ſuch Propoſitions which are offered to be believed on the account of Divine Revelation.

I ſhall now ſumm up the Force of what I have ſaid about this Matter.

Your Anſwer is, That your Method of Certainty by Ideas, ſhakes not at all, nor in the leaſt concerns the Aſſurance of Faith. Againſt this I have pleaded, (1.) That your Method of Certainty ſhakes the Belief of a Revelation in general. (2.) That it ſhakes the Belief of Particular Propoſitions or Articles of Faith, which depend upon the Senſe of Words contained in Scripture. Becauſe you do not ſay, that we are to believe all that we find there expreſſed; but in caſe we have any clear and diſtinct Ideas which limit the Senſe another way than the words ſeem to carry it, we are to judge that to be the true Senſe. But in caſe our Ideas are not clear and diſtinct, yet you affirm as your proper Doctrine, That we may come to Certainty by Ideas, although not in all reſpects perfectly clear and diſtinct. From whence I infer, That where you have attained to a Certainty by your imperfect Ideas, you muſt judge of a Matter of Faith, by thoſe Ideas, and conſequently, if the Union of two Natures and one Perſon, or three Perſons in one Nature be repugnant to your Ideas (as I have ſhewed that they are) you muſt by vertue of your own Principles reject theſe from being Matters of Faith. And thus I hope I have proved what I undertook, viz. That your Notion of Certainty by Ideas is inconſiſtent with theſe Articles of the Chriſtian Faith.

But you have this Comfort left, that you are not the firſt Perſon who hath run himſelf into inſuperable Difficulties as to Matters of Faith, by this way of Ideas. For Des Cartes himſelf did ſo in a remarkable manner: He was a Perſon of a great Reach and Capacity, and ſpent many Thoughts in laying the Foundations of Certainty from Ideas, both as to Incorporeal and Corporeal Subſtances; and yet was miſerably foiled as to both of them. His Demonſtrations from his Ideas in his Metaphyſical Meditations, did not meet with the Entertainment he promiſed himſelf from the Inquiſitive part of Mankind; for his Objective Reality from his Idea gave no Satisfaction; and his other Argument was thought to have no Force, unleſs it were taken off from the Idea and placed upon the Neceſſity of Exiſtence in the Nature of the Thing. As to Corporeal Subſtances, his fundamental miſtake was in a wrong Idea of Matter, which he made to be the ſame with Extenſion; and upon this he built his Syſteme of Nature. But againſt this firſt falſe ſtep many things were objected by his Adverſaries, as may be ſeen by the late Diſputes in France about his Principles; they objected, that his Notion or Idea of Matter made it neceſſary, and impoſſible for God to Annihilate it; and his Defenders are driven to ſuch ſhifts as to God's Will and Power, that an indifferent Perſon might thereby ſee how dangerous it is to take up with Ideas as to the Ground of Certainty, although neither himſelf nor his Followers pretend to place it in any thing but clear and diſtinct Ideas. But when they came to reconcile their Ideas with Matters of Faith, they were ſo plunged, that they could ſee no way to get through their Difficulties. For as Monſieur Huet obſerves, Although Des Cartes profeſſes great ſubmiſſion to Divine Revelation, yet when it came to the Trial, he judged his Opinions could not be repugnant to it, becauſe he was certain of the Truth of them; which ſhews, that he judged of Revelation by his Rules of Certainty, and whatever he pretended, he did not take his Meaſures of Truth from Revelation. Cenſur. Philoſ. Carteſ. c. 8. Sect. 3. n. 4. A late Defender of Des Cartes in anſwer to this, produces the Words uſed by him in his Principles, wherein he owns, That in caſe of Divine Revelation if God declares any thing concerning himſelf or others which exceed our Capacity, as the Myſteries of the Trinity and Incarnation, he would not refuſe to believe them, although he could not clearly underſtand them.

This Monſieur Huet denies not, viz. That he made ſuch a general Profeſſion of Submiſſion to Revelation and owning the Myſteries of Faith; but, ſaith he, when it comes to particular Points, then Ideas are to be the Standard by which we are to judge of Revelation. Monſieur Regis in his Reply ſaith, That Matters of Faith and Philoſophical Truths are of different kinds; and that there can be no Contrariety but between things of the ſame kind. Which makes him run into that great Abſurdity, that although in a Philoſophical Senſe God cannot do things repugnant to Reaſon, yet in the Way of Faith he may; and all this to preſerve the Certainty by Ideas, when nothing can be more repugnant to all kinds of Certainty than ſuch a Suppoſition. But another great Admirer of Des Cartes thinks this way unreaſonable; But Des Cartes, he ſaith, hath ſhewn the right Method of Certainty by clear and diſtinct Ideas, and therefore he calls it no leſs than a Divine Certainty; and he adds, that Truth cannot be contrary to it ſelf, and he laughs at the Diſtinction of Philoſophical and Theological Truths; or the two ways of Certainty by Knowledge and Faith: For, Truth is always one and the ſame, and changes not its Countenance: and if Truth be an Agreement of Words with Things, how can the ſame Words agree in one Book and differ in another? for the ſame God is the Author of Truth where-ever it is: and therefore he calls it, A moſt abſurd Opinion of thoſe who ſay, that God who is immutable ſhould teach that as Truth in Philoſophy, which is falſe in Divinity. But I return to you.

Philoſophia Scripturæ Interpres, c. 5. n. 56.

You ſeem to be not a little concerned that I ſay, "That as you have ſtated your Notion of Ideas it may be of dangerous Conſequence to that Article "of the Chriſtian Faith which I had endeavour'd to defend. Such an Accuſation, you ſay, brought into any Court in England, would be thought to ſhew a great Inclination to have the Accuſed be ſuſpected rather than any Evidence of being guilty of any thing; and ſo would immediately be diſmiſſed without hearing any Plea to it. But you muſt give me leave to ſay, that you have quite miſtaken my Deſign, which was not to accuſe you, but to ſhew my own Diſſatisfaction, as to the Way you had taken to clear your ſelf. I hoped you would have ſaid ſo much for your own Vindication, as would have ſatisfied the World, that your Notion of Ideas was far from any Tendency that way to which it was carried by him who made uſe of your Expreſſions: But, inſtead of that you explained it in ſuch a manner as made it far more ſuſpicious that he had not perverted your meaning. And that made me to ſay, That as you had ſtated it, it may be of dangerous Conſequence. It may be, ſay you, this is no Evidence, but only an Inclination to accuſe you. So far from it, that it ſhewed an Inclination to favour you, when I only ſaid it may be; for now you

p. 58.

ſee,

ſee, that I think it is of ſuch dangerous Conſequence, and I muſt think ſo till you have cleared it better.

But the Notion of Ideas as you have ſtated it, relates to your whole Book: Why ſhould you carry it farther than I intended it? The ſtating of it I mentioned was in your firſt Letter; where you told us what you meant by Nature and P. 60. Perſon. But you have found out two Particulars wherein it may be of dangerous Conſequence, firſt in making ſo much uſe of the word Ideas, and your placing Certainty in Ideas. As to the Term of Ideas, I have no Objection to the uſe of the word it ſelf; provided it be uſed in a common Senſe, and no Weight be laid upon it more than it can bear; for I am for no new affected Terms which are apt to carry mens Minds out of the way; they are like Ignes fatui, which ſeem to give Light, but lead thoſe that follow them into Bogs: Like Fontanges, which ſeem to ſet Peoples Heads that wear them higher, but their Underſtandings are juſt what they were before. I always diſlik'd the Stoical Improvements by New Words, or giving New Senſes to Old ones. But I told you, "I ſhould never have mention'd this Way of Ideas, but for the ill uſe I found made of them; and you might have enjoy'd the Satisfaction you had in them long P. 63. enough, unleſs I had found them imploy'd in doing Miſchief. Which as you humbly conceive amounts to thus much and no more; that I fear Ideas; i. e. the Term Ideas may ſome time or other be of dangerous Conſequence. Can you poſſibly think this was my Meaning? I know of no Antipathy I have to the Term Ideas; nor do I underſtand any Miſchief that lies in the bare uſe of the Term. If it gives you any Satisfaction I pray make what uſe you pleaſe of it, ſo you do not ſet it up in your Way of Ideas for a new Method of Certainty; nor weaken Mens Belief as to Matters of Faith by it. Theſe were my Prejudices againſt your Ideas, and they are increaſed by your Defences; for I can find nothing that hath any force to remove them.

You tell me, my Quarrel muſt be with the Term Ideas as of dangerous Conſequence: But why ſo? It was the Way of Certainty by Ideas which I inſiſted upon, and the new Terms as imploy'd to that purpoſe. I confeſs, I ſay, "The World had been ſtrangely amuzed with Ideas of late, and we have been told what ſtrange things might be done by the help of Ideas, i. e. as to Matter of Cer- P. 65, 79. tainty. But you tell me more than once, that I own, That theſe come only to be common Notions of things, which I have no Averſion from. This is a way of turning things upon Me, which I could not expect from You. For thoſe Words are brought in by me on this Occaſion. You had ſaid, that you ſee no ſuch Oppoſition, but that Ideas and ſound Reaſon may ſtand together, i. e. Reaſon rightly managing thoſe Ideas, ſo as to produce Evidence by them. Upon this, I uſed theſe Words. "But what need all this great Noiſe about Ideas and Certainty? true and real Certainty by Ideas, if after all it comes only to this, that our Ideas only repreſent ſuch things, from whence we bring Arguments to prove the Truth of things? But the World hath been ſtrangely amuſed, &c. Judge now how fair and ingenuous this Anſwer is. That which I bring in as a Conſequence of your Aſſertion, you make to be my own Senſe as to your Notion of Ideas: when I all along diſtinguiſh the Way of Reaſon, by deducing one thing from another, from your Way of Certainty in the Agreement and Diſagreement of Ideas; and I therefore mention it as an Argument of your own departing from your beloved Notion of Ideas. I never ſaid any thing againſt Reaſon rightly managing Ideas, ſo as to produce Evidence by them. I was glad you came ſo far towards my own Apprehenſion as to the Uſe of Ideas, and I declare ſoon after, "That if you mean no more by your Certainty from Ideas, but a Certainty from Reaſon, I was not ſo unreaſonable a Man to diſagree with From p. 63. to p. 73. you. And yet you ſpend many Pages to juſtifie your Uſe of the Term Ideas: which is all loſt upon me. For in ſhort, it is not your Way of Ideas, but your Way of Certainty by Ideas, which I was unſatisfied about, and am ſo much the more by the Method you have taken to defend your ſelf. And this was the thing I found fault with, as you could not but ſee; but you found it much eaſier to run into a long Diſcourſe, to no purpoſe, about the Uſe of the Word Ideas. How far your Uſe of the Term is new I will not diſpute with you; be it new or old the thing you do pretend to by your Ideas is that which I diſliked, and am forced to do ſo ſtill; for you give me no manner of ſatisfaction about it, as will appear by the Examination of what you ſay, about the p. 87. new Method of Certainty, which is the matter in Queſtion: You deſire to know whether there be any other or older Method of Certainty? That is not the Point, but whether yours be any at all? Which I deny. If there be no Older, you ſay, the World is obliged to you for this New one: Very true, if it were what it pretends. But you tell me, I ought to ſet the World right in a thing of that great P. 88. Concernment, and to overthrow yours, and thereby prevent the dangerous Conſequence of your unſeaſonable ſtarting this new Method of Certainty. I did never pretend to inform the World of new Methods, and therefore am not bound to go any farther than to that I found fault with, which was your new Method; and although I thought I had ſaid enough before, to ſhew how far it was from what it pretended; yet becauſe you call me to it in ſuch a manner, I ſhall endeavour more freely to repreſent to you the Unſatisfactorineſs and Inconſiſtency of it. For it is ſtill to me a ſtrange thing, that you ſhould talk ſo much of a new Method of Certainty by Ideas; and yet allow, as you do, ſuch a Want of Ideas, ſo much Imperfection in them, and ſuch a want of Connexion between our Ideas, and the things themſelves. One would think, that he that owned theſe things rather deſign'd to prove there could be no Certainty by Ideas. And when I had objected theſe things in the Concluſion of my former Anſwer, you do not deny them; and all the Return you make is, that it is better to have ſome way p. 171, 172. of Certainty (though it will not lead us to it in every thing) than no way at all. As though the Diſpute between us had been, Whether any Certainty be not better than none. No doubt any true Certainty is deſirable, but it is, as I have often ſaid, of ill Conſequence to ſet up ſuch a Method of Certainty, as if it hold, will overthrow our Faith, and if it doth not, muſt deceive all thoſe that follow it. And it is the Certainty of Faith which I defend againſt your pretended Certainty of Knowledge. But to let you ſee what Ground I had to be unſatiſfied with it, I ſhall now wave all the Inſtances of Ideas I inſiſted on before, as to Subſtances and ſenſible Qualities; and I ſhall ſingle out one remarkable Idea, by which the Uncertainty of your way of Ideas will be fully diſcover'd. And that is the Idea of Space; upon which a famous Syſteme of Natural Philoſophy hath been built, and as upon a clear and diſtinct Idea; and yet you will by no means allow it to be ſo; and think you have a clear Idea to the contrary; although thoſe who will not allow it to be true cannot deny it to be conſiſtent with it ſelf, and that the Ideas in it have an Agreement with one another.

As to ſpace, you ſay, that we have it both by Sight and Touch, which inform us Eſſay, B. 2. ch. 13. Sect. 2. of the Diſtance between Bodies: which in ſeveral Reſpects may be called Diſtance, Capacity and Extenſion; and ſo Extenſion, you ſay, is an Idea belonging to Body only, but Space may, as is evident, be conſider'd without it. But here now ariſes a great difficulty to me in the way of Certanity by Ideas: viz. that ſome very thinking Men in this way of Ideas, have look'd on the Idea of Space and extended Matter to be the ſame; for, ſay they, it appears to us from clear Ideas, that Body and Extenſion are the ſame thing, and therefore if there be Extenſion in Space there muſt be Body. But, you ſay, thoſe that do ſo, either change Sect. 12. the ſignification of Words, and ſo render it a doubtfull Idea; or they confound very different Ideas with one another, and ſo can never come to Certainty by the Agreement or Diſagreement of Ideas. But you conclude, that the clear and di- Sect. 14. ſtinct Idea of ſimple Space diſtinguiſhes it plainly and ſufficiently from Body. Here we ſee you pretend to a clear and diſtinct Idea. But it falls out very unluckily for the Way of Ideas, that the firſt ſtarter of this Way of Certainty is as poſi- Princip. p.11.n.16. tive, that the Idea of Space and extended Body are the ſame. So that here we have clear and diſtinct Ideas both ways. And is not this an admirable Method of Certainty, when in one of the plaineſt Ideas which depend upon our Senſes, the greateſt Defenders of Ideas differ ſo fundamentally? What can other Men hope for in this Way of Ideas, if ſuch Men can agree no better in one of the moſt evident to our Senſes? But then we muſt conſider, who hath the better Reaſon? This is not Certainty by Ideas, but by Reaſon upon them, which is another thing. Let us go to Reaſon. Is that Reaſon built only on ſome intermediate Idea, which makes it clear? I find intermediate Ideas on both ſides, and urged with equal Aſſurance. Des Cartes ſaith, that from Extenſion we rightly conclude a Body to be a Subſtance; becauſe it is a Repugnancy that there ſhould be an Extenſion of Nothing; and therefore, if there be Extenſion in Space there muſt be Body. And he proves it from the Idea of Body; for, if we caſt off all ſuch things as are not neceſſary to Body, as Hardneſs, Colour, Gravity, Heat, and Cold, and all other Qualities, we ſhall find nothing to remain but Extenſion, and therefore nothing but Extenſion is in the Idea of Body, which being likewiſe in Space the Idea of Body Eſſay, l. 2. ch. 13. Sect. 12. and Space are the ſame. But ſay you on the other ſide, I appeal to every Man's own Thoughts, whether the Idea of Space be not as diſtinct from that of Solidity, as it is from the Idea of a Scarlet Colour. 'Tis true, That Solidity cannot exiſt without Extenſion; but this hinders not but they are diſtinct Ideas. One appeals to Thoughts, and the other to Reaſon: Had Des Cartes no Thoughts? Yet his Reaſon convinced him, that whatever Thoughts he had, he muſt be perſwaded by Reaſon, which was the true Idea. You ſay, that is a clear and diſtinct Idea that a Man's thoughts dictate to him to be ſo. No, ſaith Des Cartes, that only is the true Idea, which a Man comes to by the Exerciſe of his Reaſon; and he look'd upon thoſe others as meer Ideas of Imagination, and not Rational Ideas. So that here we have another Work to do, and that no eaſie one, which is to diſtinguiſh the Ideas of Imagination from thoſe of Reaſon: and what way have you laid down to prevent ſo great a Miſtake? Or what Rules have you to judge, how far Imagination is to be allowed in the Matter of Ideas? For in all Objects of Senſe the Impreſſion is made upon the Imagination; which is the Seat of Ideas, that come in by Senſation: now here lies a very conſiderable Difficulty, how far Reaſon is to judge of theſe Ideas of Imagination? For if all our ſimple Ideas of things without us come in by Senſation, then one would think thoſe Ideas are to be allowed which come in that way; and ſo the Impreſſions of Fancy are to be the Standard and Rule of Certainty, which I think you will not affirm. But what Rule then have you when, and where, and how far, you are to correct the erroneous Ideas of Imagination?

I cannot deny but you were ſenſible of the Difficulty from the Ideas of Ima- B.4. ch.4. Sect. 1. gination, and thus you propoſe it. To what purpoſe is all this ſtir? Knowledge, ſay you, is only the Perception of the Agreement or Diſagreement of our own Ideas, but who knows what thoſe Ideas may be? Is there any thing ſo extravagant as the Imagination of Men's Brains? Where is the Head that hath no Chimæra's in it? Or if there be a ſober and wiſe Man, what difference will there be by your Rules between his Knowledge, and that of the moſt extravagant Fancy in the World? They both have their Ideas, and perceive their Agreement and Diſagreement one with another. Let us now conſider the Anſwer you give to it, and by that we ſhall better judge of your Way of Certainty.

Sect. 2. Your general Anſwer is, That if our Knowledge of our Ideas terminate in our Fancies, our Aſſurance would go no farther than that of Dreams, or the Viſions of a heated Fancy. But our Knowledge is real, only ſo far, as there is a Conformity between our Ideas, and the Reality of Things.

All this is undoubtedly true. But you ſay, How ſhall the Mind, when it perceives nothing but its own Ideas, know that they agree with Things themſelves.

There indeed lies the Difficulty, but how do you remove it?

There are two ſorts of Ideas, you ſay, we may be ſure, agree with things. And theſe are worth the knowing.

1. The firſt are ſimple Ideas, which ſince the Mind can by no means make to it ſelf, muſt neceſſarily be the Product of Things operating on the Mind in a natural way, and producing therein thoſe Perceptions which by the Wiſdom and Will of our Maker they are adapted to. From whence it follows, that ſimple Ideas are not Fictions of our Minds. Sect. 4.

All that can be proved from hence is no more, but that the Objects of our Senſes do make thoſe Impreſſions upon them, that from them we may be certain there are ſuch things without us, which produce thoſe Impreſſions. And this is all you mean when you ſay, that you are certain theſe Ideas are no Fictions of our Brains. But let us apply this to the preſent Caſe. Our Senſes truly inform us of a Diſtance between Bodies; and ſo far we are certain of an Idea of Space, but the Queſtion about the Idea of Space goes farther; viz. Whether the Idea of Space imply ſomething or nothing? How can nothing be extended? If it be ſomething extended it muſt be Body; and ſo Space and Body are the ſame.

2. All our complex Ideas, except thoſe of Subſtances, you ſay, being Archetypes of the Mind's own making, not referr'd to the Exiſtence of any thing, cannot want any Conformity neceſſary to real Knowledge; for that which is not deſigned to repreſent any thing but it ſelf, can never be capable of a wrong Repreſentation, nor miſlead us from the true Apprehenſion of any thing by its diſlikeneſs to it. Sect. 5.

Where are we now? What in the Way to Certainty ſtill? Methinks it ſeems to be too intricate and winding to be that plain Way. What is meant by theſe Archetypes in the Mind which cannot deceive us? I confeſs here are ſuch things ſaid in order to Certainty, which are above my Underſtanding, if taken with reſpect to Things; as how we cannot but be infallibly certain, that all the Knowledge we attain concerning theſe Ideas is real, and reaches things themſelves, and yet they are Archetypes of the Mind's own making, not intended to be the Copies of any thing, nor referr'd to the Exiſtence of any thing. How can the Certainty by theſe Ideas reach the things themſelves, if they are Archetypes of the Mind, not referr'd to the Exiſtence of any thing? But I ſuppoſe all this is meant of Mathematical Truths, and ſo reaches not the Caſe, which is concerning the Certainty of our Knowledge of things that really exiſt.

3. You ſay, there is another ſort of complex Ideas, which being referr'd to Archetypes without us may differ from them, and ſo our Knowledge about them may come ſhort of being real. Now theſe were the things we deſired to be made certain in; and to find out ſuch Rules as would make our Knowledge real. But for all that I can ſee, the hopes of any Criterion is quite loſt, as to the point in Queſtion: How ſhall the Mind when it perceives nothing but its own Ideas, know that they agree with the things themſelves? Sect. 11.

For upon theſe Grounds we can have no Certainty as to ſimple Ideas, but only as to the Power of making Impreſſions on our Senſes; but as to complex Ideas, as of Subſtances, our Knowledge about them may come ſhort of being real, i.e. we cannot arrive to Certainty about them in the way of Ideas; becauſe, they may differ from the Archetypes without us. And you confeſs, that our Ideas are not very exact Copies, and yet are the Subjects of real, (as far as we have any) Knowledge of them; which will not be found to reach very far. But to make it real concerning Subſtances, the Ideas muſt be taken from the real Exiſtence of things. And if our complex Ideas may deceive us as to the things from whence they are ſuppoſed to be taken, what an Account of Certainty in the way of Ideas is here? And yet you conclude this Chapter in that Triumphant manner; I think I have ſhewn wherein it is that Certainty, real Certainty conſiſts, which whatever it was Sect. 12.

to others was to me heretofore one of thoſe Deſiderata's, which I found great want of: And for all that I can ſee may do ſo ſtill. For here is nothing ſaid to diſtinguiſh the ſtrong Impreſſions of Fancy from the Appearances of things, from that Certainty of Knowledge which comes from the things themſelves. For, a confident Opiniator will talk with greater Aſſurance of the Agreement and Diſagreement of things with his Ideas, than a Man of far greater Judgment and more Modeſty. And you have given us no Rules to make a difference between Opinion and rational Certainty; eſpecially when the Ideas of Fancy are found to agree with one another.

But I ſhall go a ſtep farther to ſhew, that the Agreement of Ideas is no Ground of Certainty, and that from a Suppoſition relating to the preſent Caſe.

We have ſeen how poſſible it is for an ingenious Perſon skilled in the Phænomena of Nature to contrive ſuch an Hypotheſis, that one part may agree with another, ſo as that no diſcernible Inconſiſtency may be found in it, and yet all this may be built on ſuch a Foundation, as cannot be conſiſtent with your Certainty by Ideas; nay, ſuch as you are certain cannot be true.

The Hypotheſis, I mean, is that of Des Cartes; for allowing him his Laws of Motion, and his three Elements, the Phænomena of Nature, or the Ideas of it agree with one another, and yet all this is built upon Space being the ſame with Body; and conſequently, that there can be no Vacuum: upon which his Laws of Motion, and his Solution of the Phænomena is all built. And therefore, when a learned Man of our own objected that to him, and thought it of no great Conſequence to his Philoſophy; he replied with ſome ſmartneſs, that he was miſtaken, for he took it for one of the moſt certain Principles of his Philoſophy. What Certainty then can there be in Ideas, when ſo abſurd a Principle as that ſhall be look'd on by ſo great a Man, as ſo certain a thing in the Way of Ideas, as to build his whole Syſtem of Natural Philoſophy upon it? and his followers to this day ſtifly defend it, who are otherwiſe ingenious Men.

Des Cartes Epiſt. T. 1. Ep. 87, 88.

Nothing now remains to be anſwer'd in your Second Letter, but what relates to the Defence of what I had ſaid in my Book concerning Nature and Perſon. For I cannot but obſerve, that inſtead of clearing ſome preſſing Difficulties in my Anſwer to your former Letter, you run back to my Book, and begin a new Critique upon that part of it; and take in the help of ſome ingenious Perſons of your Acquaintance, to whom I muſt ſhew ſo much Civility as to take notice of their Objections. Which I ſhall the rather do, becauſe the Doctrine of the Trinity is expreſſed in the firſt Article of our Religion by one Nature and three Perſons, and ſo it hath been underſtood by the Chriſtian Church long before. And it is the Senſe of the Chriſtian Church which I am bound to defend, and no particular Opinions of my own.

P. 117. You tell me, that there hath not been one of your Acquaintance who owned that he underſtood my Meaning; but confeſſed that the farther he look'd into what I had ſaid, the more he was at a loſs about Nature and Perſon. But I hope I am not to anſwer for other Men's want of Underſtanding in theſe Matters: which requires greater Application of Mind, than moſt Men are willing to allow themſelves about them. But I am to judge no otherwiſe of their Senſe and Capacity, than as you have repreſented them.

P. 118. One ſaid I began with giving two ſignifications of the word Nature : One of them, as it ſtood for Properties; and this he underſtood; but the other wherein Nature was taken for the thing it ſelf, wherein thoſe Properties were, he ſaid he did not underſtand. But he ſaid he was not very well acquainted with Greek, and Ariſtotle was brought to explain and ſettle the Senſe of Nature.

But why did not this Gentleman in the firſt place conſider what it was I undertook to ſhew, which was, that we had an Idea of Nature, which came not in by our Senſes; and in the very next words I ſaid, "That Nature and Subſtance are of an equal Extent; and ſo, that which is the Subject of Powers and Proper“ ties is the Nature, whether it be meant of bodily or ſpiritual Subſtances. And “ although by Senſation and Reflection we know the Powers and Properties of “ things; yet it is by Reaſon we are ſatisfied there muſt be ſuch a Nature or “ Subſtance, becauſe it is impoſſible that they ſhould ſubſiſt by themſelves.

Methinks if the Gentleman were ſo much at a loſs as you repreſent him, you ſhould have helped him out by your relative Ideas: For hard things go down much better with ſome mens Minds in the Way of Ideas, (which is a ſort of gilding the Pills) and I doubt not but you could have ſatisfied him, that the Underſtanding may by virtue of a relative Idea be very well ſatisfied of the Being of Nature, as well as Subſtance, when I declared that I took them to be of equal Extent; as they were the Subject of Powers and Properties. But he ſaith, that this he underſtood not, becauſe Nature extended to things that were not Subſtances. P. 120. Did I not ſay, that Nature was ſometimes taken only for Properties, but that there muſt be another Senſe proved, becauſe there muſt be a Subject wherein theſe Properties are, and in that reſpect, I ſaid, that Nature and Subſtance were of equal Extent. But he doth not underſtand the Deduction; Ariſtotle takes Nature for a corporeal Subſtance, and therefore Nature and Subſtance are of an equal Extent. What a hard Fate doth that Man lie under, that falls into the hands of a ſevere Critick! He muſt have a care of his But, and For, and Them, and It; for the leaſt Ambiguity in any of theſe will fill up Pages in an Anſwer, and make a Book look conſiderable for the Bulk of it. And what muſt a Man do, who is to anſwer to all ſuch Objections about the Uſe of Particles? But let any indifferent Reader judge, how I am uſed in this place. My words are, “ Sometimes Nature is “ taken for the Thing it ſelf in which thoſe Properties are; and ſo Ariſtotle “ took Nature for a Corporeal Subſtance, which had the Principles of Motion “ in it ſelf; but Nature and Subſtance are of an equal Extent. Doth not any Man of Common Senſe ſee, that I oppoſe this to Ariſtotle's Senſe of Nature for a Corporeal Subſtance? He confines it to that only; I ſay, That it is of equal Extent with Subſtance whether Bodily or Spiritual: and thoſe very words follow after. If you had really ſuch a Converſation with a Gentleman, I am ſorry for him; and I think you did not deal ſo like a Gentleman by him, to expoſe him thus to the World.

But I perceive he is a Philoſopher too; for he proves, That Ariſtotle's Notion of Nature for a Corporeal Subſtance will not hold. P. 119. Did I ever ſay that it would? I am far enough from thinking, that a Corporeal Subſtance hath a Principle of Motion from it ſelf; But might not I mention Ariſtotle's taking Nature for a Subſtance, although I preſently add, his Senſe was too ſhort and narrow, becauſe Nature and Subſtance were of equal extent? But did not his Notion of Nature imply that it was a Principle of Motion in it ſelf? Whatever Ariſtotle thought, the Notion of Nature doth not depend upon a Principle of Motion from it ſelf; but it was conſidered, not as in it ſelf as the Cauſe, but in it ſelf as the Subject. And that Philoſophical Gentleman might be pleaſed to conſider, that Ariſtotle did not make Motion to ariſe from Matter, but aſſerted it to come from a firſt Mover, and ſaid, That thoſe Philoſophers talked like Men not well in their Wits, who attributed Motion to Matter of it ſelf; as I could eaſily prove, if it were needful. And methinks you ſhould not have been ſuch a Stranger to Ariſtotle, to let your Acquaintance run into ſuch Blunders, and then to print them for him.

But the Gentleman is farther plunged and knows not how to get out. He cannot for his Life underſtand Nature to be Subſtance, and Subſtance to be Nature. P. 121. Where lies the Difficulty? Is the Repugnancy in the Words or in the Senſe? Not in the Words or Senſe either in Greek or Latin. For the Greek, (if I may have leave to mention that language in this Caſe) thoſe who have been very well acquainted with the force of Words therein, have made Nature of the ſame importance with Subſtance. So Heſychius renders it by ȣ̓σία, Subſtance; but I ſhall not bring the Teſtimony of Criticks but of Philoſophers. And Ariſtotle

Ariſt. Metaph. l. 5. c. 4. may be allowed to underſtand his own Language, he ſaith poſitively, πᾶσα οὐσία φύσις λέγεται; every Subſtance is called Nature, and the Reaſon he gives for it is, ὅτι καὶ ἡ φύσις οὐσία τίς ἐστιν, becauſe Nature is a Subſtance. It may be ſaid, That Ariſtotle ſaid this, becauſe he took Nature for ſuch a Subſtance as had the Power of Motion in it ſelf; I do not deny, but he look'd on that as the proper Acception of Nature; but from hence it follows, that whatever Subſtance had ſuch a Principle of Motion in it ſelf was truly and properly Nature; not as excluſive of a Superiour Principle of Motion, but as having an internal ſelf-moving Principle. And herein Ariſtotle differed from ſome modern Philoſophers, who make all Motion to come from the Impulſe of another Body, and to be a meer Mode of Matter continued from one Body to another. I confeſs Ariſtotle was of another Opinion from thoſe Gentlemen, and look'd on Motion as an Effect of an inward Principle; and not meerly of an External Impulſe: but whether Ariſtotle were miſtaken herein is not the Queſtion; and it is poſſible he was not; however, it plainly appears, that Subſtance with a Power of Motion in it ſelf, and Nature, had the ſame Senſe; and none of thoſe who have been the moſt ſevere Criticks upon Ariſtotle have diſputed, that I remember, againſt this Senſe of Nature in him. One of them finds this fault, that it was but a Repetition of what he had ſaid in his Phyſicks; where he doth likewiſe treat of the Senſe of Nature. And there he takes it for ſuch a Subſtance which hath the Principle of Motion and Reſt within it ſelf and by it ſelf; which he oppoſes to artificial things, as a Bed or a Garment. And as much as this Definition hath been run down by ſome Men, if we ſet aſide ſome affected Obſcurity in his Philoſophical Writings, there is no ſuch Abſurdity in it; when he explains himſelf not to underſtand it of meer Local Motion, or change of Place, but of all Alterations incident to Bodies. So that Nature in his Senſe, was a Subſtance endued with a Principle of Life and Action. And all thoſe things which did partake of Nature in this Senſe, he ſaid, were Subſtances; καὶ ἔστι ταῦτα πάντα οὐσία. For Nature is always a Subject and in a Subject; i. e. the Subſtance it ſelf is Nature, and that which is in it is according to Nature. And this Senſe of Ariſtotle Plutarch relies upon, as the true Notion of Nature, which he ſaith is the Principle of Motion and Reſt; becauſe the beginning and ending of things depend upon it: But Plutarch by no means approves of thoſe Mens Opinion who made Nature to be an Original Self-moving Principle; For, ſaith he, Matter of it ſelf cannot move without an Efficient Cauſe, no more than any Metal can frame it ſelf into a particular Form without an Artificer. From whence we ſee that Ariſtotle's Notion of Nature was very conſiſtent with an Efficient Cauſe of Nature. But your Gentleman ſaith, That to thoſe who admit not Matter and Motion to be Eternal, no Nature in that Senſe will be left, ſince Nature is ſaid to be a Corporeal Subſtance which hath the Principles of Motion in it ſelf, and ſuch a ſort of Corporeal Subſtance thoſe Men have no Notion of at all, and conſequently none of Nature, which is ſuch a Corporeal Subſtance. But if Ariſtotle did not ſuppoſe Matter to move it ſelf, without an Efficient Cauſe, (as certainly he did not) then all this falls to the Ground, and his Notion of Nature for a Subſtantial Principle of Life and Action may remain good.

But it may be ſaid, That this was one of his ſingular Notions, and that no other Philoſophers took it ſo. Which is ſo far from being true, that a great Enemy of Ariſtotle's confeſſes, That the Name of Nature among the Writers before him extended to all kinds of Beings, and not only to individual but to Specifick Natures. Ariſtotle's fault lay in applying Nature only to Corporeal Subſtances; and whatever was above them he look'd on as above Nature; but the Pythagoreans and Platoniſts took Nature to extend to Spiritual as well as Bodily Subſtances. Which appears by Timæus Locrus his Book of Nature; in the beginning whereof he divides Things into two kinds, Intellectual and Corporeal; and the former, whoſe Nature was more excellent, he derives immediately from the beſt Principle, viz. God himſelf.

Fr. Patrit. Diſcuſſ. Peripat. T. II. l. 2. p. 207.

But to make this plainer, we are to conſider, that there were four Opinions among the Old Philoſophers about Nature. Some held Nature to be the ſame with Matter, and attributed the Beginning of all things to that alone; ſuch were the followers of Anaximander and Democritus. Others rejected this Doctrine as abſurd and impious, and held a Divine Being above Matter, which gave the beginning to Motion and framed the World, and they aſſerted Spiritual as well as Corporeal Natures, and theſe were the followers of Pythagoras and Anaxagoras. Others aſſerted the Beginning of Motion and of the World from a firſt Cauſe; but confined the Senſe of Nature to the Courſe of things eſtabliſhed in this Viſible World by an Univerſal Providence at firſt. And this was the Notion of Ariſtotle and his followers to the time of Strato who attributed all to meer Nature. Laſtly, there were ſome who made Nature to be the firſt Principle which formed all things; which ſometimes they called God, and ſometimes Nature, as is obvious in all the Writings of the Stoicks; Vis illum Naturam vocare? non peccabis; ſaith Seneca: and in another place, Quid aliud eſt Natura, quam Deus & divina Ratio? and again, Nec Deus ſine Naturâ eſt, nec Natura ſine Deo, ſed idem eſt utrumque, which he elſewhere calls, Incorporalis Ratio ingentium operum Artifex. With which Balbus in Cicero agrees, when he defines Nature from Zeno, to be an Intelligent Fire that produces all things. For what he calls Ignem artificioſum ad gignendum, &c. Laertius calls πνεῦμα πυροειδὲς ϗ τεχνοειδὲς; and it is called in Cicero, Natura Artifex, Conſultrix & Provida, &c. which can agree to nothing but a Spiritual Subſtance; and when he explains what Nature is, he ſaith, That Epicurus called all by the Name of Nature; and divided it into Matter and Vacuity and the Accidents of both: but we (ſaith he of the Stoicks) by Nature underſtand no Inanimate Things which have no Principle within to unite them, as Earth and Stones; but a living Subſtance, as an Animal, in which is no Chance, but Order and Contrivance. And ſo Plato ſaid, That Nature ordered all things with Reaſon and Underſtanding. By which he underſtood the Divine being. If we come lower down among the Philoſophers, we ſhall find Nature taken for a Principle of Life. So Sextus Empiricus diſtinguiſhes the Union of Matter in Stones and Wood from that which is in Plants, and this he calls Nature, which is the loweſt degree of it; for afterwards, he ſpeaks of Rational and Intellectual Natures, and places God in the head of them. Antoninus diſtinguiſhes Nature in Plants from a heap of the Particles of Matter in Wood and Stone. But in another place he diſtinguiſhes that which is meer Nature in Man, viz. what he hath in common with Plants, from the Nature of an Animal in him; and that again from the Nature of a Rational Creature in him. Here indeed he ſpeaks of the Properties of thoſe Natures; but he ſtill ſuppoſes, that where they are ſeparate, they are founded in diſtinct Subſtances.

So that I hope, if the Philoſophers of old, of all kinds did underſtand the Senſe of Nature and Subſtance, the Gentleman may not continue in ſuch a peremptory Humour of ſaying, That for his Life he cannot underſtand Nature to be Subſtance, nor Subſtance to be Nature. For they all agreed in this, however they differed in their Opinions of Nature.

But I have ſomething farther to add concerning the Senſe of the Chriſtian Church in this Matter; which I think is by no means to be deſpiſed.

It is obſerved by Damaſcen, that ſome of the Philoſophers made this difference between οὐσία and φύσις; that the former was taken for ſimple Eſſence, but the latter for Eſſence with a Specifical Difference; but that the Chriſtian Writers took both of them for that which was common to more than one; as an Angel, a Man, a Horſe, &c. So St. Chryſoſtom calls Angels ἀσωμάτους οὐσίας, and ἀσωμάτους φύσεις, and Theodoret ἀοράτους φύσεις, St. Baſil λογικὰς ϗ ἀοράτους φύσεις, but they all agree, that Incorporeal and Inviſible Subſtances are are real Natures. And the Reaſon Damaſcen gives is, That they have both the ſame Original (and you know that it is a good way to find out the true Idea) for as ȣ̓σία is from εἶ, ſo φύσις is from πεφυκέναι, both which are the ſame. So that if Real Exiſtence belong to Subſtance, and Nature hath its Name from thence too, then Subſtance and Nature muſt be of the ſame Importance. And this Notion of Nature they do not take up meerly from the Etymology of the Word, but from the Senſe of it in Scripture; as when St. Paul ſaith, Gal. 4. 8. They worſhipped thoſe which by Nature are no Gods; τοῖς φύσει μὴ ȣ̓σι θεοῖς, as the Alexandrian Copy hath it more clearly; i. e. which are not really and ſubſtantially Gods. They had the Names of Gods, and the Divine Properties were attributed to them; but becauſe they had not the Divine Eſſence, they are ſaid not to be Gods by Nature. And what Senſe would this Gentleman make of the Apoſtle's words, who cannot for his Life underſtand that Nature is the ſame with Subſtance? He muſt underſtand this only of the Properties which belong to God. But theſe Properties muſt be ſomewhere, and ſo a Subſtance muſt be ſuppoſed as the Subject of them; and what Reaſon can there be to exclude that which is the Subject of thoſe Properties? For there muſt be a Divine Being as well as Properties; and that Being muſt have Eſſential Properties belonging to it; and what imaginable Reaſon can there be, why that ſhould not be called the Divine Nature? And if it be, then Subſtance and Nature are the ſame. I might eaſily purſue this farther, but I deſign to bring things into as litttle a compaſs as I can.

But it may be there is ſomething in our own Language which hinders Nature from being taken for a Subſtance; and for this I appeal to a late Ingenious and Honourable Perſon and Philoſopher of our own; I mean Mr. Boyle, who hath written a Philoſophical Enquiry into the Notion of Nature; and he tells us of the various Acceptations of it. (1.) For the Author of Nature. (2.) For the Eſſence of a Thing. (3.) For what comes to Men by Birth; as a Man is Noble by Nature. (4.) For an Internal Principle of Motion; as that a Stone is carried downwards by Nature. (5.) For the eſtabliſhed courſe of things; as that Nature makes the Night to ſucceed the Day. (6.) For an Aggregate of Powers belonging to a Living Body; as that Nature is ſtrong or weak. (7.) For the Syſtem of the Univerſe; as when we ſay of a Chimæra, there is no ſuch thing in Nature. (8.) For a Semi-Deity; which is the Notion he oppoſes. But we may obſerve, that he allows God and all the real Beings of the Univerſe to have Nature belonging to them; and he ſaith, The Word Eſſence is of great Affinity to it, if not of an adequate Import. But the Real Eſſence of a thing is a Subſtance; and therefore Nature and Subſtance are of the like Importance.

Mr. Boyle of the Notion of Nature, p. 27.

P. 35.

The next thing fit to be conſidered is, How far your Certainty by Ideas and the Certainty by Reaſon differ from each other.

The occaſion of this Debate ſtands thus.

Diſcourſe of the Trinity, p. 25.

I had ſaid in my Book, "That I granted, that by Senſation and Reflection we come to know the Powers and Properties of things; but our Reaſon is ſatisfied, that there muſt be ſomething beyond theſe, becauſe it is impoſſible that they ſhould ſubſiſt by themſelves. So that the Nature of things properly belongs to our Reaſon and not to meer Ideas.

In anſwer to this you ſaid, That you can find no Oppoſition between Ideas and Reaſon; but Ideas are the Objects of the Underſtanding, and Underſtanding is one of the Faculties imployed about them.

To which I replied, "No doubt of it. But you might eaſily ſee, that by Reaſon I underſtood Principles of Reaſon, allow'd by Mankind; which I think are very different from Ideas. But I perceive Reaſon in this Senſe is a thing you have no Idea of, or one as obſcure as that of Subſtance.

If there be any thing which ſeems too ſharp and reflecting in the Manner of Expreſſion, I do not go about to defend it; but the worſt of it is, That your Idea of Reaſon is as obſcure as that of Subſtance. And whether there were not a juſt Occaſion for it, the Reader muſt judge when the Faculty was put for the Principles of Reaſon. Could any Man judge otherwiſe, but that you had a very obſcure Idea of Reaſon, who could miſtake the Vnderſtanding for it?

P. 114. But Reaſon, you ſay, taken for the Faculty is as different from Ideas in your Apprehenſion. But what is that to the Point in Diſpute, whether the Notion of Nature be to be taken from Ideas or from Reaſon? You ſay, the Vnderſtanding is imploy'd about them. And what then? I ſhewed that the Nature of things belongs to Reaſon and not to bare Ideas; becauſe Ideas come in by Senſation and Reflection; by which we come to know the Powers and Properties of things; but we cannot come to know the Notion of Nature as the Subject of them, but by this Reaſon that we are convinced they cannot ſubſiſt of themſelves. And is this no more than to ſay, the Vnderſtanding is imployed about Ideas? But now you anſwer farther, That if Reaſon be taken for the Faculty or the Principles of Reaſon allowed by Mankind, Reaſon and Ideas may conſiſt together. This leads me to the Examination of that which may be of ſome uſe, viz. To ſhew the Difference of your Method of Certainty by Ideas, and the Method of Certainty by Reaſon.

And the Way of Certainty by Reaſon lies in two things;

1. The Certainty of Principles.
2. The Certainty of Deductions.

Ibid. As to the former, the Gentleman your Defender in your Book ſaith, That in your Eſſay, in more places than one, you have ſpoken, and that pretty largely, of Self-evident Propoſitions and Maxims; ſo that if I have ever read them, I cannot doubt, but you have Ideas of thoſe common Principles of Reaſon.

Book 4. ch. 7. Sect. 20. What Ideas you have of them muſt appear from your Book. And I do there find a Chapter of Self-evident Propoſitions and Maxims; which I cannot but think extraordnary for the Deſign of it; which is thus ſummed up in the Concluſion, viz. That it was to ſhew, That theſe Maxims, as they are of little uſe where we have clear and diſtinct Ideas, ſo they are of dangerous uſe, where our Ideas are not clear and diſtinct. And is not this a fair way to convince me that your Way of Ideas is very conſiſtent with the Certainty of Reaſon; when the Way of Reaſon hath been always ſuppoſed to proceed upon General Principles; and you aſſert them to be Vſeleſs and Dangerous?

Sect. 4. Your firſt Deſign you ſay is to prove, that the Conſideration of theſe General Maxims can add nothing to the Evidence or Certainty of Knowledge; which overthrows all that which hath been accounted Science and Demonſtration, and muſt lay the Foundation of Scepticiſm. Becauſe our true Grounds of Certainty depend upon ſome general Principle of Reaſon. To make this plain, I ſhall put a Caſe grounded upon your Words, which are, that you have diſcourſed with very rational Men, who have actually denied that they are Men. Book 4. ch. 7. Sect. 17. Theſe Word, J. S. underſtands as ſpoken of themſelves, and charges them with very ill Conſequences; but I think they are capable of another meaning: Solid Philoſ. aſſerted Preface, Sect. Reflex. 19. P. 378. However, let us put the Caſe that Men did in earneſt queſtion, whether they were Men or not? and then I do not ſee, if you ſet aſide general Maxims, how you can convince them that they are Men. For, the way I look on as moſt apt to prevail upon ſuch extraordinary Sceptical Men, is by general Maxims and Principles of Reaſon. As in the firſt place, that Nothing can have no Properties; which I take to be the Fundamental Principle of Certainty, as to real Beings. For, all our inward Perceptions are only of ſome Acts or Properties, as of Thinking, Doubting, Reaſoning, &c. and if a Man proceeds ſo far as to queſtion every thing, in order to the diſcovering the true Ground of Certainty, he cannot be ſatisfied with finding out only ſome Modes of Being; but that which he aims at is, ſatisfaction as to his real Exiſtence.

But this wholly depends upon the Truth and Certainty of this Fundamental Maxim; That Nothing can have no Operations; and therefore, whatever thinks, or doubts, or reaſons, muſt certainly be. And ſince by another Fundamental Maxim, it is impoſſible for the ſame Thing to be and not to be; he cannot entertain any poſſible doubt of his own Exiſtence.

It may be ſaid, that this reaches only to bare Exiſtence, and not to the being Men. I anſwer, that for the Certainty as to that, there are other general Maxims of neceſſary Uſe; as, That all different ſorts of Beings are diſtinguiſhed by Eſſential Properties; That the Eſſential Properties of a Man are to Reaſon, Diſcourſe, &c. That theſe Properties cannot ſubſiſt by themſelves without a real Subſtance: And therefore, where theſe Properties are found, thoſe who have them muſt be real and ſubſtantial Men.

Book 4. ch. 9. Sect. 3. You may poſſibly ſay, That theſe Maxims are uſeleſs, becauſe you affirm that nothing can be more evident to us, than our own Exiſtence; and that we have an internal infallible Perception that we are.

But I anſwer, that theſe Maxims do not at all appear to be uſeleſs, becauſe the Certainty we enquire after is a Certainty of Reaſon, and not of bare Perception. And if it be a Certainty of Reaſon, ſome Ground of Reaſon muſt be aſſigned for it: but all that the Perception reaches to, are thoſe Acts mentioned by you. I think, I reaſon, I feel pleaſure and pain: but the Queſtion goes farther as to the Subject of thoſe Acts, and the Nature of that Subject, whether it be a Man or not.

Now here lies the main Difficulty, whether without the help of theſe Principles you can prove to any that doubt, that they are Men? And I ſhall now ſhew, that in your Way of Ideas you cannot. For,

(1.) You ſuppoſe that we muſt have a clear and diſtinct Idea of that which we are certain of in the Way of Ideas.

(2.) You deny that we have any ſuch clear and diſtinct Idea of Man.

1. You ſuppoſe, that we muſt have a clear and diſtinct Idea of that we are certain of. Book 4. ch. 7. Sect. 4. For in your Chapter of Maxims, you ſay, that every one knows the Ideas that he has, and that diſtinctly and unconfuſedly one from another. Which always being ſo (I pray mark that, and judge whether you do not make clear and diſtinct Ideas neceſſary to Certainty) he can never be in doubt when any Idea is in his Mind, that it is there, and is that Idea it is, and that two diſtinct Ideas when they are in his Mind are there, and are not one and the ſame Idea: From whence you infer the Neceſſity of Certainty, when the Ideas are clear and diſtinct. This is ſo plain and clear, that I wonder how you came to forget it, and to think that I did you wrong when I charged you with holding clear and diſtinct Ideas neceſſary to Certainty. But of that in the Beginning of this Diſcourſe.

2. But let us now examine your Idea of Man, whether that be clear and diſtinct or not; and if not, then according to your Principles very rational Men cannot be certain that they are Men. For if they have no Way of Certainty but by Ideas, and you allow no clear and diſtinct Idea of Man, then they can come to no Certainty; and I hope you will not deny them to be very rational Men, if they follow the Way of Ideas.

Book 4. ch. 7. Sect. 16. Firſt, you ſhew, that there can be no Demonſtration in the Way of Principles what Man is.

Sect. 17. Secondly, that there are very different Ideas of Man, ſome, you ſay, make the Idea of a Man without a Soul; as Children do. Others add Laughter and rational Diſcourſe, and theſe may demonſtrate by general Principles that Ideots and Infants are no Men by this Maxim, that it is impoſſible for the ſame thing to be, and not to be; and you have diſcourſed with very rational Men, who have actually denied that they are Men.

Others take in the Idea of Body in general, and the Powers of Language and Reaſon, and leave out ſhape; and ſo a Man may be a Four-footed Creature, or in whatever Body or Shape he found Speech and Reaſon joined, that was a Man.

But where is the clear and diſtinct Idea of a Man all this while? We can have no Certainty by Principles, you ſay, and you offer none in the Way of Ideas; for the Ideas are very confuſed, imperfect and repugnant to each other; and ſo in this new Method of Certainty by Ideas, we cannot be ſo much as certain that we are Men.

But is it poſſible to ſuppoſe, that a rational Man ſhould talk of Certainty by Ideas, and not be able to fix the Idea of a Man? One would have thought this had been only an Omiſſion in this place out of pure Zeal againſt Principles: but certainly in other places this Idea of a Man muſt be made clear and diſtinct. So far from it, that in other places, you induſtriouſly ſet your ſelf to diſprove the common Idea of a Man. It could not poſſibly be, ſay you, that the abſtract Idea to which the Name Man is given, ſhould be different in ſeveral Men, if it were of Natures making; and that to one it ſhould be animal rationale; to another animal implume bipes latis unguibus. From whence it is plain, that you allow no clear and diſtinct Idea of Man; and you endeavour to expoſe the ſacred Definition, as you call it, of animal rationale; which was never expoſed by any Man without Cauſe. But you conclude, That we are far from knowing certainly what Man is, though perhaps it will be judged great Ignorance to doubt about it. And yet you think you may ſay, That the certain Boundaries of that Species are ſo far from being determined, and the preciſe Number of ſimple Ideas, which make that nominal Eſſence ſo far from being ſettled and perfectly known, that very material Doubts may ſtill ariſe about it. So that I begin to think J. S. was in the right, when he made you ſay, That you had diſcourſed with very rational Men who denied themſelves to be Men. But this is a little too hard to deny themſelves to be Men. If it had been only, who doubted whether they were Men or not; you could not deny them to be very rational Men, becauſe they went upon your Grounds, that we can have no Certainty either by Principles, or by any clear and diſtinct Ideas, what a Man is.

Book 3. ch. 6.
Sect. 26.

Sect. 17.

Thus I have ſhew'd how inconſiſtent your way of Ideas is with true Certainty; and of what Uſe and Neceſſity theſe general Principles of Reaſon are.

I now come to the Certainty of Reaſon in making Deductions. And here I ſhall briefly lay down the Grounds of Certainty, which the Ancient Philoſophers went upon, and then compare your way of Ideas with them.

Ariſtotle obſerves, that Socrates firſt brought in Definitions and Inductions in order to Certainty; and went no farther. Plato allowed no Certainty, but only Opinion, as to External Objects; but he ſaid, that Certainty depended upon abſtract and ſeparate Ideas, which were always the ſame. This he took, (as I obſerved in my former Letter) from the Pythagoreans, only changing Numbers into Ideas. For by Numbers, they underſtood firſt Principles, not groſs and material; but immaterial and eternal, as Jamblichus ſaith; and thereſore Moderatus Gaditanus, one of the moſt underſtanding Men among them ſaith, the Pythagoreans brought in Numbers. 'Ευσήμου διδασκαλίας χάριν, for a more decent Way of Inſtruction, following the Practice of Geometricians, who make uſe of Figures to repreſent things to the Mind; and therefore their Doctrine of Numbers was the Philoſophy of Principles, or the general Grounds of Certainty; but this was ſo abſtruſe and ſo little underſtood, that it ſoon loſt its Reputation, as Porphyry obſerves, or was mixed with Platoniſm; and therefore Photinus joins the Pythagorean and Platonick Principles together. But Ariſtotle was a great great Enemy to theſe abſtracted Speculations, and therefore ſet himſelf ſo much on all occaſions againſt Ideas and Numbers, eſpecially in his Metaphyſicks. But inſtead thereof, he endeavour'd to bring down Certainty to material Things, and to real Beings. In order to this, he ſaw it neceſſary to avoid Confuſion, by explaining doubtfull Terms, and by ranking things under ſeveral Heads, which he called Categories; wherein all things are reduced to Subſtance, and Accidents belonging to them; to which he joins ſome general Diſcourſes about the right Apprehenſion of things ſimply conſider'd. But it is obſervable, that in all the Categories from Archytas the Pythagorean downwards, (who firſt placed them in that Order,) Subſtance was firſt ranked, as the moſt proper Idea of the Mind, and all Accidents or Modes were conſider'd with reſpect to that. And the French Carteſians in their Logick, place Subſtance as the firſt Object of their Ideas: and do not leave us a relative Idea, to be ſuppoſed only, becauſe Accidents cannot ſubſiſt without a Subject. Then follows the Way of underſtanding the Truth and Falſhood of Propoſitions; after which, he purſues the Way of Reaſoning, or inferring one thing from another, which he calls Syllogizing, wherein he profeſſes to go upon this common Principle of Reaſon, That what things do agree in a third muſt agree among themſelves. But being not content with the ordinary Dialectical Way, which proceeded upon the Conceſſions of the Party, he attempted to bring in true Demonſtration. To which he ſuppoſes general Axioms neceſſary, and Definitions, and Poſtulata: and he diſtinguiſhes between a neceſſary Concluſion, and a Demonſtration; for the former may ariſe from the manner of reaſoning; but a Demonſtration ſuppoſes a neceſſary Cauſe, and that the Propoſitions are ſuch as that the Concluſion neceſſarily follows from them. So that Demonſtration according to him muſt be of an inſeparable Property, and by the moſt immediate and neceſſary Cauſe. How far Ariſtotle's Notion of Demonſtration can be applied to Phyſical matters is not my buſineſs to enquire; it being only to ſhew what his Method of Certainty was.

But beſides Ariſtotle, the Stoicks took upon them to lay down the true Method of Certainty; and they went another Way to work about it, viz. (1.) By finding out the Criterion of Truth and Falſhood. (2.) By examining the Conſequences and Deductions of Reaſon.

As to things which had ſome Degree of Evidence to Senſe or Reaſon, they made the Criterion neceſſary, but for thoſe which had not, but muſt be proved, the Examination of that Proof was neceſſary in order to Certainty.

The Criterion was agreed to be μέτρον καταλήψεως, the Meaſure whereby we are to judge of things. But as in the Uſe of Balances for Weight, there muſt be one to hold them and the Balances themſelves, and the Poſition of them; and as in the judging of a Line, whether ſtreight or crooked, there muſt be the Artificer, the Rule and the Application of it; ſo in judging of Truth and Falſhood, there muſt be the Faculty of Underſtanding as the Artificer, Senſe and Reaſon as the Rule; and the inward Ideas of the Mind, which anſwer'd to the Poſition of the Balances, or the Application of the Rule. Now that which they placed their Notion of Certainty in, was that inward and comprehenſive Idea, which was called by them ἡ καταληπτικὴ φαντασία. If it were a weak Aſſent, they called it Opinion; for they made the Aſſent voluntary, notwithſtanding the Criterion; but if it were a firm and immoveable Aſſent, that they called Knowledge and Certainty.

Arrian. l. 1. c. 22. l. 3. c. 26. Simplic. in Epict. c. 33.

But beſides theſe comprehenſive Ideas they did allow of common Notions, which they called προλήψεις, or Anticipations: of which Arrian ſpeaks; and Simplicius ſaith, they are thoſe wherein all are agreed, and are planted in us by right Reaſon, and confirmed by Time aud Obſervation.

As to the other Part, they took great pains about the true ſignification of Words, the rank and order of Things, the nature and kind of Propoſitions, and the difference of Signs, whereof ſome were Monitory, and others Demonſtrative. And the proving a thing uncertain, by ſomething granted to be certain, was that which they called Demonſtration. According to the Principles of the Eleatick School, the moſt ſimple and natural way of reaſoning was ſuppoſed to be by drawing Conſequences upon Suppoſitions, and the way the Stoicks took to judge of reaſoning, was by judging what approached neareſt to the firſt Principles of reaſoning; ſuch as that every thing we talk about either muſt be or not be; and in ſuch disjunct Propoſitions, one Part or other muſt be taken, and then a Train of Conſequences follows.

And Plutarch, no friend to the Stoicks, thinks this faculty of drawing Conſequences, lays the beſt Foundation for Demonſtration. For the Principle of it, he ſaith is the τὸ συνημμένον, the connex way of reaſoning; that is, as Simplicius explains it, when two things are ſo joyned together as antecedent and conſequent, that by Poſition of the Antecedent, the Conſequent follows, and by taking away the Conſequent the Antecedent is removed. Thus I have, in as few Words, as I could, laid together thoſe old Methods of Certainty, which have obtained greateſt Reputation in the World.

Plut. de Ei Delph. Simplic. Epict. c. in 58.

But your way of Certainty by Ideas is ſo wholly New, that here we have no general Principles; no Criterion, no Antecedents and Conſequents; no Syllogiſtical Methods of Demonſtration; and yet we are told of a better way of Certainty to be attained, meerly by the help of Ideas. But how comes there to be ſuch a way of Certainty by Ideas, and yet the Ideas themſelves are ſo uncertain and obſcure? I confeſs, that the more I look into it, the farther it appears to be from a way of Certainty to me. For in your Chapter of the Improvement of Knowledge, you have theſe Words; for it being evident that our Knowledge cannot exceed our Ideas, where they are imperfect, confuſed or obſcure, we cannot expect to have certain, perfect, or clear Knowledge. And yet how often do you confeſs, that our Ideas are imperfect, confuſed, and obſcure? How then is it poſſible to attain to any Certainty by them? And notwithſtanding theſe plain Words, you aſſert it over and over in your ſecond Letter, as appears in the Beginning, that you do do not place Certainty in clear and diſtinct Ideas, (as I obſerved in the Beginning.) How can theſe things conſiſt? Can Certainty be had with imperfect and obſcure Ideas, and yet no Certainty be had by them? I cannot blame you for finding fault with common Principles of Reaſon, if both Parts of a Contradiction may be true: But I forbear. However I cannot but join other Words of yours to ſhew how reſolved you were to be inconſiſtent with your ſelf: But obſcure and confuſed Ideas can never produce any clear or diſtinct Knowledge; becauſe as far as any Ideas are confuſed or obſcure, ſo far the Mind can never perceive clearly, whether they agree or diſagree.

Eſſay, B. 4. ch. 12. Sect. 14.

Book 4. ch. 2. Sect. 15.

And yet in the ſame Place, you ſay, that our Knowledge conſiſting in the Perception of the Agreement or Diſagreement of any two Ideas, its Clearneſs or Obſcurity conſiſts in the Clearneſs or Obſcurity of that Perception, and not in the Clearneſs or Obſcurity of the Ideas themſelves. How is it poſſible for us to have a clear Perception of the Agreement of Ideas, if the Ideas themſelves be not clear and diſtinct?

If the Mind can never perceive clearly the Agreement or Diſagreement of obſcure and confuſed Ideas, how can its Knowledge lie in the Perception of that which is not to be perceived?

This is a thing which I cannot make conſiſtent.

But beſides, I have another Charge upon your way of Certainty, viz. that you have no Criterion to diſtinguiſh falſe and doubtfull Ideas from true and certain; how then can any Man be ſecure that he is not impoſed upon in this way of Ideas?

The Academicks went too far in the way to Scepticiſm, but they differ'd from the Scepticks in two Things. 1. They aſſerted, that there was no abſolute Certainty to be had, which the Scepticks would not. 2. They held a far greater Probability in ſome things than others, and that Men were bound to follow the greateſt Probability in what concern'd their own Welfare: but the Scepticks ſaid, that they would do as others did, or follow Inclination, and the Laws of their Country, but they held no Opinion in their Minds, as they ſaid.

The Academicks went much upon Ideas, or Repreſentations of things to their Minds, but they did not proceed upon every Idea, but they examin'd and weighed all the Circumſtances belonging to it, before they allow'd it to prevail upon them to give an Aſſent as to a greater Probability. Carneades, one of the ſubtileſt of them, as appears by Sextus Empiricus, diſtinguiſhed a three-fold Idea.

Sext. Empiric. adverſ. Mathem. l. 7.

1. Πιθανὴ φαντασία, a probable Idea; which the Academicks called Ἔμφασις. For, ſaid he, neither that which appears falſe of it ſelf; nor that which is true, but doth not appear ſo, can perſwade a Man's Mind. And of thoſe things which do appear to be true, ſome have a very ſlender Appearance, others have a mighty ſtrong one, and therein he placed his Criterion.

2. Ἀπερίσπαστος φαντασία, an undiſtracted Idea; i. e. when no Circumſtances diſturb or ſhake the firſt Impreſſion, ſo as to make us queſtion the Truth of it; which Sextus Empiricus calls συνδρομὴ φαντασιῶν, a Concurrence of Ideas and none diſagreeing, and yet he would not allow this to be a ground of certainty but only of Probability.

3. Διεξοδευομένη φαντασία, a well examin'd Idea, by the beſt Reaſon a Man hath and the greateſt Application of Mind. And this was the Foundation of the higheſt Probability a Man's Mind could reach to. Now to apply this to your Caſe; You tell us of a way of Certainty by Ideas, and never offer any ſuch Method for Examining them, as the Academicks required for their Probability. As for inſtance, Your firſt Idea which you go upon, is that of Solidity, which you ſay, of all others ſeems the moſt intimately connected with and eſſential to Body: And therefore muſt be of great Moment. Solidity, you ſay, conſiſts in Repletion and Reſiſteuce; and by this Idea of Solidity the Extenſion of Body, you ſay, is diſtinguiſhed from that of Space; ſo that of pure Space and Solidity you have clear and diſtinct Ideas. Now here in the way of Certainty I have two Queſtions to ask. 1. How this Idea comes to be clear and diſtinct to you, when others who go in the ſame way of Ideas have quite another Idea of it, and think they have as plain and diſtinct an Idea that the Extenſion of Space and Body are the ſame? Now what Criterion is there to come to any Certainty in this Matter? I ſee none ſo much as offer'd, but only that they ſeem to you to be clear and diſtinct, but to others the contrary. So that here we are at a loſs as to any Certainty in the way of Ideas. And the blind Man who fanſied the Idea of Scarlet to be like the ſound of a Trumpet, could hardly be convinced of his Error in the way of Ideas. This you mention to ſhew the different Ideas men may fall into; which I think is enough to ſhew that they have no way of Certainty in themſelves, if it be poſſible for Men, even for Philoſophical and Rational Men, to fall into ſuch contrary Ideas about the ſame thing; and both ſides think their Ideas clear and diſtinct. 2. But I have another Queſtion to propoſe; viz. Whether by this Idea of Solidity we may come to know what it is? This is a very reaſonable Queſtion in the way of Certainty, which is to lead us to the certain knowledge of Things. I pray therefore tell me from your Idea, what it is, and wherein it conſiſts? The Queſtion you ſuppoſe might be very well asked; and you give a moſt ſatisfactory Anſwer to it. If any ask me what this Solidity is, I ſend him to his Senſes to inform him. I had thought by the Deſign of your Book you would have ſent him to his Ideas for Certainty; and are we ſent back again from our Ideas to our Senſes? What do theſe Ideas ſignifie then? But you ſay farther; That if this be not a ſufficient Explication of Solidity, you promiſe to tell him him what it is, when he tells you, what Thinking is, or explains to you what Extenſion and Motion are. Are we not now in the true way to Certainty, when ſuch things as theſe are given over, of which we have the cleareſt Evidence by Senſation and Reflection? For here you make it as impoſſible to come to certain, clear and diſtinct Notions of theſe things, as to diſcourſe into a blind Man the Ideas of Light and Colours. Is not this a rare way of Certainty?

Eſſay, B. 2. ch. 4. Sect. 5.

Thus I have ſhewed that you have no Security againſt falſe and uncertain Ideas, no Criterion to judge them by; no Light into the Nature of Things by them, as will farther appear by what you ſay of the Ideas of ſenſible Qualities. To diſcover, ſay you, the Nature of our Ideas the better, and to diſcourſe of them intelligibly, it will be convenient to diſtinguiſh them, as they are Ideas or Perceptions in our Minds; and as they are Modifications of Matter in the Bodies that cauſe ſuch Perceptions in us: that ſo we may not think (as perhaps is uſually done) that they are exactly the Images and Reſemblances of ſomething inherent in the Subject: moſt of thoſe of Senſation being in the Mind no more the likeneſs of ſomething exiſting without us, than the Names that ſtand for them are the likeneſs of our Ideas, which yet upon hearing they are apt to excite in us. Now here again our Ideas deceive us, in the way of Certainty. We deſire to know ſomething of the Nature of thoſe Objects of which we have the Ideas in our Minds, becauſe theſe we are told, will bring us to a Certainty of Knowledge. Of what? Of what we feel? No certainly, but of that which cauſes theſe inward Perceptions. Can we then by theſe Ideas know the Nature of things without us? No, you ſay we cannot; for moſt of thoſe of Senſation are no more the likeneſs of ſomething without us, than Names are for things which they ſtand for. So that theſe Ideas are really nothing but Names, if they be not Repreſentations of Things; and if they be not, how can we underſtand Things by them; and if we cannot, what Certainty is attainable by them?

Book II. ch. 8. Sect. 7.

But I will do you no wrong; and therefore I muſt conſider what you ſay about Demonſtration: For it cannot be denied that you own the thing, although you deny it to be ex præcognitis & præconceſſis, and ſay, it is a miſtake that they are ſuppoſed to be the Foundations of all our Knowlege and Reaſonings. We muſt therefore examine your way of Demonſtration without Principles.

B. IV. ch. 2. Sect. 8.

Certainty, you ſay, depends ſo wholly on Intuition, that in Demonſtrative Knowledge, this Intuition is neceſſary in all the Connexion of the Intermediate Ideas, without which we cannot attain Knowledge or Certainty. By Intuition you mean Self-Evidence. For you ſay, in this the Mind is at no pains of proving or examining, but perceives the Truth as the Eye doth Light only by being directed towards it. For hence you muſt ſuppoſe Self-Evidence to be in the Ideas of your Mind; and that every Intermediate Idea which you take to demonſtrate any thing by, muſt have a Self-Evident Connexion with the other Idea: which is ſuch a way of Demonſtration, as the old Philoſophers never thought of. For upon this Ground every Demonſtration carries its own Light with it; and can no more be queſtioned, than whether two and two make four; and I would be glad to ſee any Demonſtration (not about Figures and Numbers) of this kind, which I think is not to be expected in the way of Ideas. But becauſe in this lies the chief Point as to a way of Certainty by Ideas, I ſhall more carefully examine the Grounds you proceed upon, and ſhew them to be very Inſufficient for the purpoſe you intend them.

Your principal Ground is from Mathematical Demonſtrations, and your Examples are brought from them. But his is quite a different Caſe from yours. For you grant, that thoſe Ideas on which Mathematical Demonſtrations proceed, are wholly in the Mind, and do not relate to the Exiſtence of Things; but our Debate goes upon a Certainty of the Knowledge of Things as really exiſting; ſo that, although we ſhould grant all that you ſay, about the Intuition of Ideas in Mathematical Demonſtrations, yet it comes not at all to your Buſineſs, unleſs you can prove that we have as clear and diſtinct Ideas of Beings, as we have of Numbers and Figures. And yet herein you are not conſiſtent with you ſelf; for your deſign to prove Demonſtrations without General Principles; and yet every one knows, that General Principles are ſuppoſed in Mathematicks, and that Perſon would be thought Ridiculons, who ſhould go about to prove, that General Principles are of little, or of dangerous uſe in Mathematical Demonſtrations. And ſo in Morality, which you place among the Sciences B. IV. ch. 3. Sect. 18. capable of Demonſtration; you confeſs, That the way of Demonſtration therein is from Principles, as thoſe of the Mathematicks, by neceſſary Conſequences. This is a very intelligible way of Demonſtration: But how Ch. 7. Sect. 10. then comes it to paſs, that in the way of Certainty by Ideas as to other Points of Knowledge, you deny general Maxims to be the Foundation we Sect. 9. are to proceed upon? And the Method you lay down, is this, that Ideas of particular things are firſt in the Mind, which are firſt received and di- Sect. 10. ſtinguiſhed, and ſo Knowledge got by them; but general Ideas are Fictions and Contrivances of the Mind, which carry Difficulty with them; but that it is true of our particular diſtinct Ideas, that they are all known by their Native evidence, are wholly independent, receive no Light, nor are capable of Proof one from another; much leſs the more particular from the more general, or the more ſimple from the more compounded, the more ſimple and leſs Abſtract being the moſt familiar, and the eaſier and earlier apprehended. But which ever be the cleareſt Ideas, the Evidence and Certainty of all ſuch Propoſitions is in this, that a Man ſees the ſame Idea to be the ſame Idea, and infallibly perceives two different Ideas to be two different Ideas. For when a Man has in his Underſtanding the Ideas of One and of Two, the Idea of Yellow and of Blue, he cannot but certainly know, that this Idea of One is the Idea of One, and not the Idea of Two; and that the Idea of Yellow is the Idea of Yellow, and not of Blue. For a Man cannot confound the Ideas in his Mind, which he has diſtinct; that would be to have them confuſed and diſtinct at the ſame time, which is a Contradiction: and to have none diſtinct is to have no uſe of our Faculties, to have no knowledge at all. And therefore what Idea ſoever is affirmed of it ſelf, or whatſoever two entire diſtinct Ideas are denied one of another, the Mind cannot but aſſent to ſuch a Propoſition, as infallibly true, aſſoon as it underſtands the Terms without Heſitation, or need of Proof, or regarding thoſe made in more gegeneral Terms, and called Maxims. Theſe are your own Words, which I have ſet down at large, that you may not complain that I miſrepreſent your Senſe. And if I underſtand the force of them, you take off the way of Demonſtration from general Principles and Conſequences deduced from them, and place it in the Self-Evidence of Ideas.

But that it is impoſſible to come to a Demonſtration about real Beings, in this way of Intuition of Ideas, I ſhall now make appear from your ſelf, which will farther diſcover the Inconſiſtency of your Notion of Ideas.

And the Reaſons I go upon are theſe;

1. That you confeſs, that ſome of the moſt obvious Ideas are far from being Self-evident.

2. That there may be contradictory Opinions about ſome Ideas, which you account moſt clear and diſtinct.

3. That granting the Ideas to be true, there is no Self-evidence of the Connexion of them, which is neceſſary to make a Demonſtration.

1. That ſome of the moſt obvious Ideas, are far from being Self-evident by your own Confeſſion. Among theſe you cannot deny thoſe of Matter and Motion, of Time and Duration, and of Light, to be very conſiderable. But I ſhall prove from your ſelf, that we can have no Intuition of theſe things, which are ſo obvious to us; and conſequently can have no Self-evident Ideas of them.

As to the Idea of Matter: That you tell us, conſiſts in a ſolid Subſtance every where the ſame; and a Body is a ſolid extended figured Subſtance. Book 3. ch. 10. Sect. 15.

Now there are two things concerning Matter, which I would be glad to come to a certain Knowledge of. And thoſe are,

1. The Manner of Coheſion of the Parts of Matter, concerning which you have theſe words. For ſince no Body is no farther, nor otherwiſe extended, than by the Union and Coheſion of its ſolid Parts, we ſhall very ill comprehend the Extenſion of Body, without underſtanding, wherein conſiſts the Union and Coheſion of its Parts, which ſeems to me as incomprehenſible as the Manner of Thinking, and how it is performed. Book 2. ch. 23. Sect. 24. I would have any one intelligibly explain to me, how the Parts of Gold or Braſs (that but now in fuſion were as looſe from one another, as the Particles of Water, or the Sands of an Hour-glaſs) come in a few Moments to be ſo united, and adhere ſo ſtrongly one to another, that the utmoſt force of Men's Arms cannot ſeparate them. A conſidering Man will I ſuppoſe be here at a loſs, to ſatisfie his own or another Man's Underſtanding. Sect. 25. And can you then imagine that we have Intuition into the Idea of Matter? Or that it is poſſible to come to a Demonſtration about it by the help of any intervening Idea? The Idea of Solidity, or firm Coheſion of Parts cannot be ſaid to come from the Idea of Matter it ſelf, for then there could be no ſuch thing as fluid Matter. Whence then comes the diſtinction between theſe Ideas of ſolid and fluid Matter? That there is ſuch a Coheſion of the ſolid Parts of Matter is evident: now what other Ideas do you compare and connect with this to make it evident, how this Solidity and Matter came to have this Agreement with each other?

Is it by the Denſity or Compactedneſs of the Matter in a little Compaſs? But that is as hard to give an account of; viz. how ſome Parts of Matter come to take up ſo much leſs Room, and to ſtick cloſer than others. Is it by bare Reſt of the Parts? But how comes the Reſiſtance of ſolid Bodies to come only from Reſt? Is it from the Preſſure of the Ambient Air? No, you ſay, that in Truth the Preſſure of an ambient Fluid how great ſoever, can be no intelligible Cauſe of the Coheſion of the ſolid Parts of Matter. Book 2. ch. 23. Sect. 24. So that we are not to look for any thing like a Demonſtration of the Coheſion of the Parts of Matter.

2. And as little are we to expect it, as to the Diviſibility of it; which was the other thing I hoped to find demonſtrated in the way of Ideas. For you tell us, that the Notion of Body is cumbred with ſome Difficulties which are very hard, and perhaps impoſſible to be explained, or underſtood by us. Ch. 23. Sect. 31. And among theſe you particularly inſtance in the Diviſibility of Matter; which you ſay, whether we grant or deny it to be in infinitum, it involves us in Conſequences impoſſible to be explicated or made conſiſtent. Conſequences that carry greater Difficulty, and more apparent Abſurdity than any thing can ſollow from the Notion of an immaterial knowing Subſtance. So that I think it is vain to expect a Demonſtration in the way of Ideas as to this Matter.

Book 3. ch. 4. Sect. 8. ·The next is that of Motion. Concerning which you tell us, that the Definition of the Schools is exquiſite Jargon: That of the Atomiſts is but putting Sect. 9. one Synonimous Word for another; viz. that Motion is a Paſſage from one Place to another: for Paſſage may as well be defined a Motion from one Place to another. And the Carteſian Definition, that it is the ſucceſſive Application of the Parts of the Superficies of one Body to thoſe of another, will not prove a much better Definition of Motion when well examin'd. And what is there ſo evident as Motion? So that if our Ideas fail us in ſo plain a Caſe, what help can we hope from them in things more abſtruſe and remote from our Senſes?

Book 2. ch. 14. Sect. 2. As to Time and Duration, you ſay, that the Anſwer of a great Man (to one who asked what Time was, Si non rogas, intelligo, which amounts to this, the more I ſet my ſelf to conſider it, the leſs I underſtand it) might perhaps perſwade one, that Time, which reveals all other things, is it ſelf not to be diſcover'd. This ſhews, that there is no Self-evident Idea of Time. But here you offer to furniſh us with as clear and diſtinct Ideas, as of many other which are thought much leſs obſcure. However, then it is plain, that we have not the Knowledge by Intuition, but by rational Sect. 32. Deduction. For you proceed from the Idea of Succeſſion to that of Duration, by obſerving a Diſtance in the Parts of Succeſſion; and then from obſerving Periodical Motions, we get Ideas of the Meaſures of Duration; as Minutes, Hours, Days, Years, &c. From hence we proceed to imagine Duration not yet come; and ſuch to which we can always add; from which comes the Idea of Eternity: and by conſidering any Part of Duration with Periodical Meaſures, we come to the Idea of what we call Time in general. So that the Idea of Time in general is ſo far from being known by Intuition, that many Steps are to be taken in order to it; and ſome ſuch as Sect. 4. one would hardly have thought of. As how the Idea of Succeſſion ſhould ariſe from a Train of Ideas in our Minds: You ſay it is, becauſe we have no Perception of Duration, but by conſidering the Train of Ideas, that take their Turns in our Underſtandings.

What think you of thoſe People that fail'd not in reckoning the Succeſſion of Time right for many Years together by Knots, and Notches on Sticks, and Figures, without ever ſo much as thinking of Ideas, or any thing like them? But beſides, ſuch Arbitrary Meaſures of Time, what need any Recourſe to Ideas, when the Returns of Days, and Months, and Years by the Planetary Motions, are ſo eaſie and ſo univerſal? If a Man hath no Perception of Duration when he ſleeps, yet the Time runs on, and Nights have as much their ſhare in Succeſſion as Days have. And although you ſay, it ſeems very clear to you, that Men derive their Ideas of Duration from their Reflection on the Train of the Ideas they obſerve to ſucceed one another, yet I think the contrary ſo clear, that Men may have a clear Idea of Succeſſion without it, that I rather wonder how you came to think of this Way. But it is ſufficient to my purpoſe, that you could never know this Idea of Time by Self-evidence.

The laſt I ſhall mention is Light, and one would think, if any Idea be Self-evident, it ſhould be that. But let us ſee what you ſay about it; you explode the Peripatetick Definition of it as unintelligible; and the Carteſian you allow to be but little better. For when they make it to be a Number of little Globules ſtriking briskly on the bottom of the Eye, you ſay, to a Man that underſtands it not before, theſe Words would make the Idea of Light no more known to him, than if one ſhould tell him, that Light was nothing but a Company of little Tennis-balls, which Fairies all day long ſtrook with Rackets againſt ſome Men's Foreheads while they paſs by others. And is this a Self-evident Idea of Light? Thus we have ſeen what Account your ſelf have given of theſe Self-evident Ideas, which are the ground-work of Demonſtration.

Book 3. ch. 4. Sect. 10.

2. But ſuppoſe an Idea happen to be thought by ſome to be clear and diſtinct, and others ſhould think the contrary to be ſo, what hopes of Demonſtration by clear and diſtinct Ideas then? As ſuppoſe a Man entertain Des Cartes his Idea of Space, as the ſame with Body, or extended Matter, which he affirms to be clear and diſtinct; the Conſequence from hence is, as your ſelf confeſs, that he may from thence demonſtrate that there can be no Vacuum: but again, let us ſuppoſe another to have a clear and diſtinct Idea of Space from Body, this Man, you ſay, may demonſtrate as eaſily that there may be a Vacuum, or Space, without a Body, as Des Cartes demonſtrated the contrary. Say you ſo? What Demonſtrations on both ſides, and in the way of Ideas too? This is extraordinary indeed. But if we may be allowed the Uſe of common Principles, we may be ſure, that both Parts of a Contradiction cannot be true, and therefore there muſt be a fundamental Miſtake ſomewhere. You ſay, it is in wrong Application of that general Maxim, What is, is. But there is no fault in the Principle, which is the true meaning of the other; that it is impoſſible for the ſame thing to be and not to be, which undoubtedly holds true; but it is in ſuppoſing the Reality of the thing to be according to what you call a clear and diſtinct Idea. So that the general Principles of Reaſon ſtand firm and good; but your Self-evidence of clear and diſtinct Ideas is ſuch a Principle, we ſee, as ſerves for Demonſtrations of both Parts of a Contradiction.

Book 4. ch. 7. Sect. 12.

3. But granting the Ideas to be true, yet when their Connexion is not Self-evident, then an intermediate Idea muſt complete the Demonſtration. But how doth it appear that this middle Idea is Self-evidently connected with them? For, you ſay, if that intermediate Idea be not known by Intuition, that muſt need a Proof; and ſo there can be no Demonſtration. Which I am very apt to believe in this way of Ideas; unleſs theſe Ideas get more Light by being put between two others. This will beſt appear by a remarkable Inſtance already mentioned, viz. in the Ideas of Space and Body; the Queſtion ſuppoſed is, whether they be the ſame or not? ſome we ſee affirm it, and others deny it. So that here we muſt uſe an intermediate Idea, and that is of Motion, and we are to conſider whether this hath a Self-evident Connexion with the other Ideas? The Motion of Bodies, you ſay, that are in our view and neighbourhood, ſeems to you plainly to evince a Vacuum. But how? Is it by Intuition or Self-evidence? No, you do not pretend to it. But by Reaſon: Becauſe there muſt be a void Space equal to the Bulk of that Body, which moves within the Bounds of ſuch a Superficies. And if there be a Space without Body there muſt be a Vacuum. But Gaſſendus attempted to prove Motion impoſſible, if there were no Vacuum: For every

Book 4. ch. 2. Sect. 7.

Eſſay, B. 2. ch. 13. Sect. 22.

Body muſt go into the place of another, and ſo in infinitum; which he ſaid was ridiculous and impoſſible.

The Carteſians anſwer'd, that the Motion was Circular, Gaſſendus urged, that ſtill it was impoſſible: For ſuppoſe A the firſt Body, and X the laſt; A cannot move, unleſs X can be moved: but X cannot move, becauſe the Place is filled with A.

Joh. Bapt. Morini Diſſert. de Atomis & vacuo, p. 14.

The Carteſians ſay, this proves nothing, becauſe in the ſame inſtant, that X goes into the place of A, that gives way. Joh. Bapt. Morinus (Profeſſor of the Mathematicks at Paris, at the ſame time with Gaſſendus) anſwers to Gaſſendus his Argument, that the Separation of two Bodies and Succeſſion are at the ſame time; and ſo there can be no Vacuum.

Bernier Favilla Ridiculi Muris, p. 99.

Bernier defends Gaſſendus his Argument, and ſaith, that no Motion can begin without a Vacuum; but other Philoſophers and Mathematicians as ſtifly deny it. And is it poſſible to imagine, that there ſhould be a Self-evident Connexion of Ideas in this Caſe?

Sect. 2. Ch. 17. Sect. 1. Sect. 2.

But what hath Reaſon now to do in this way of Intuition? Yes, ſay you, Reaſon is to diſcover the Agreement or Diſagreement of Ideas. But this is nothing but an imploying the Faculty of Reaſon in ſuch a manner: And ſo in the beginning of your Chapter of Reaſon, you tell us, that it is ſometimes taken for true and clear Principles, and ſometimes for clear and fair Deductions from thoſe Principles; but you take it for a faculty in Man. But why, in a Chapter of Reaſon, are the other two Senſes neglected? We might have expected here full Satiſfaction as to the Principles of Reaſon as diſtinct from the faculty, but you wholly avoid it; and only ſhew how it is uſed in finding out the certain Connexion of Ideas in Demonſtration; and the probable Connexion in other things. So that the Difference lies between us, as to this Matter of Reaſon, in theſe two things.

(1.) You affirm, that general Principles and Maxims of Reaſon are of little or no uſe; I ſay that they are of very great uſe, and the only proper Foundations of Certainty.

(2.) You ſay, That Demonſtration is by way of Intuition of Ideas, and that Reaſon is only the Faculty imploy'd in diſcovering and comparing Ideas with themſelves, or with others intervening; and that this is the only way of Certainty.

I affirm, and have proved, that there can be no Demonſtration by Intuition of Ideas; but that all the Certainty we can attain to, is from general Principles of Reaſon, and neceſſary Deductions made from them.

Eſſay, B. 4. ch. 2. Sect. 3. Sect. 7, 8. Ariſtot. Metaph. l. 4. c. 4.

But before I conclude this Diſcourſe, I muſt obſerve that you prove that Demonſtration muſt be by Intuition, in an extraordinary manner, from the ſenſe of the Word. For you ſay, it is called Demonſtration, it being ſhewn to the Underſtanding, and the Mind made ſee, that it is ſo. I have told you formerly, how very uncertain a way of Arguing it is, which is taken from the original ſignification of Words; and if it would hold in this Caſe, it would be moſt proper for Ocular Demonſtrations, or by the Finger. But in the Philoſophical Senſe of the Word, Demonſtration was never taken for Intuition, or the knowing of a thing by its Self-evidence. But you aſſert the Neceſſity of intuitive Knowledge, [illegible] every Step of a Demonſtration. Whereas, Ariſtotle ſaith, things that are Self-evident cannot be demonſtrated; and that it is Weakneſs and Folly not to know what things are capable of Demonſtration, and what not.

It ſeems there were ſome Philoſophers, who would have firſt Principles demonſtrated; This, ſaith Ariſtotle, cannot be done without running in infinitum, which is abſurd. Whence it is plain, that Demonſtration was ſuppoſed to lie in ſome antecedent Proof; and where any thing was Self-evident it was abſurd to look for it: So that the way of Intuition and Demonſtration were thought inconſiſtent. For what a Man ſees by its own Light, he needs no Proof of. But you ſay, that in a Demonſtration the intervenient Ideas are called Proofs; and where by the help of theſe the Agreement or Diſagreement is plainly perceived, that is Demonſtration: And that in every ſtep there is an intuitive Knowledge of the Agreement or Diſagreement it ſeeks with the next intermediate Idea, which it uſes as a Proof; for, if it were not ſo, that would need a Proof. So that according to your Method of Demonſtration, that which is uſed as a Proof muſt need no Proof, but muſt be known by immediate Intuition. Of which kind of Demonſtration, I would fain ſee any one inſtance in the Knowledge of Things, and not in abſtracted and mathematical Demonſtrations. For it may be, it hath been the occaſion of ſome great Miſtakes in the Philoſophy of this Age, that ingenious and mathematical Men have labour'd ſo much to accommodate the Principles of that Science to the Nature of material Things; of which we have a remarkable Inſtance in the Syſtem of Des Cartes. And ſuppoſing we could come to a Certainty about the Nature and Tendency of Bodies here within our Reach, (I mean with reſpect to the Earth) I do not know how far the greateſt Mathematician can proceed in making Demonſtrations as to the Nature and Tendency of thoſe Bodies which are ſo much out of our Reach, as the Heavenly Bodies are, both in themſelves and with reſpect to one another. For, if the Phænomena depend upon a force given them by the Great and Wiſe Creator, how can we know in what Manner or Degree that force is given to Bodies at ſuch a wonderful Diſtance from us, as the fixed Stars are? For, if God can alter the Laws of Motion in another Syſtem, as it is not denied; how can we be mathematically certain, that the Laws of Motion in Bodies, ſo much above us, are the very ſame that we find them here; I do not by any means take off from the laudable Endeavours of thoſe who have gone about to reduce natural Speculations to mathematical Certainty: but I mention it to ſhew, that it is a very eaſie way for Thinking Men to deceive themſelves, in talking ſo much of demonſtrative Certainty about natural Things, when all their Inſtances are brought from Mathematical Demonſtrations. Ariſtotle, whom I cannot deſpiſe ſo much as ſome do (I do not ſay for want of reading him) hath a Diſcourſe on purpoſe in the Beginning of his Books of Animals, in what way natural Things are to be handled; and he ſaith, there are two ways. 1. By way of Science. 2. By way of Inſtruction, which muſt be ſuitable to the Nature of the things. So that in natural Hiſtory he ſaith, there muſt be certain bounds ſet for Enquiry, without proceeding to ſtrict Demonſtration. And, ſaith he, the Manner of Demonſtration as to natural Things is different from what it is in ſpeculative or mathematical Things. In another place he laments the want of Experiments as to natural Hiſtory, (although he made far more than any before him, and was better able to do it by the plentifull Aſſiſtance of Phili[illegible]d Alexander, while he lived at Court) and he looks on that as the [illegible]ſt way of ſatisfying our Reaſon about ſuch things; and our Reaſons, ſaith he, are then good, when they agree with the Phænomena.

De Gen. Anim. l. 3. c. 10.

And

De Meteor. *l.*1.*c.*7.

And he was ſo far from thinking he had made Demonſtrations in Phyſicks, that in one place he ſaith, that in things not evident to Senſe, he thought it ſufficient to ſhew the Poſſibility of it; and therefore he ought not to be run down for his Modeſty; however his phyſical Notions fall far ſhort of Demonſtrations.

Moral. Magn. *l.*1. c. 1.

In his Morals, he ſaith, all Principles muſt be ſuitable to the Nature of the Science; for it would be abſurd for a Man to go about to prove the three Angles of a Triangle equal to two right Angles; and take this for his Principle, that the Soul is immortal. For the Proof muſt be proper and connected with it. And from hence he excludes Plato's Idea from being a Principle in Morals.

Eudem. l. 1. c. 6.

In his Eudemia, the way of Proceeding in Morals, he ſaith, is by Reaſons, Teſtimonies, and Examples; and he looks on it as great want of Judgment for Men not to conſider what Reaſons are proper for every Science. So that according to him, Morality is not uncapable of Demonſtration; ſo it be upon Moral Principles: For that he lays down in the Beginning of his Ethicks, and afterwards, that the ſame Exactneſs is not to be required in all ſorts of Reaſoning: but that it ought to be ſuitable to the Matter it is about. Οἱ κατα τὴν ὕλην οἱ λόγοι ἀπαιτητέοι.

Ethic. ad Nicom. l. 1. c. 1, 7. l. 2. c. 2.

If therefore the Principles in Morality be clear and proper, and the Deductions be plain and natural, I do not ſee, but that it is as capable of Demonſtration as any other Science; if Men were as willing to be convinced in Morals, as they are in Mathematicks. And therein I fully agree with you: But the way of Demonſtration by Ideas will not do, either there or any where elſe. I mean by this intuitive Knowledge in every Step of the Demonſtration: when the intervening Ideas are far from being capable of this intuitive Certainty.

And as to your Argument from the Notation of the Word, it is certain that after the Philoſophical Uſe of it, it ſignified no more among ſome Philoſophers than the Concluſion of an Argument; whereby we are brought from ſomething we did perceive, to ſomething we did not.

Itaque Argumenti Concluſio quæ eſt Græcè Ἀπόδειξις ità definitur; Ratio quæ ex rebus perceptis ad id quod non percipiebatur adducit. Cicero in Lucullo, c. 8.

Not by way of Intuition, but by a Deduction of Reaſon. And Plato makes uſe of the Word Demonſtration in his Phædrus, for ſuch a Reaſon which wiſe Men would believe, and others would not. But there could be no intuitive Certainty in ſuch a Demonſtration.

Ἡ δὲ δὴ Ἀπόδειξις ἔσται δεινοῖς μὲν ἄπιστος, σοφοῖς δὲ πιστή, Plato in Phædro. V. Dialect. Ciceron. Adam Burſii, l. 6. c. 10.

I have been longer a clearing this Matter than I thought I ſhould have been; but it is the main Point as to Certainty by Ideas, and what remains will admit of an eaſier Diſpatch. I now return to the Difference between Nature and Perſon; and I ſhall only ſingle out what is material and pertinent; and now leave the interlocutory Gentlemen to maintain their Converſation by themſelves.

I had ſaid in my Vindication, "That Nature may be conſider'd two " Ways. (1.) As it is in diſtinct Individuals. (2.) Abſtractly with" out reſpect to individual Perſons.

(1.) " As it is in diſtinct Individuals, as the Nature of a Man is " equally in Peter, James, and John, and this is the common Nature " with a particular Subſiſtence belonging to each of them. For the " Nature of Man, as in Peter, is diſtinct from the ſame Nature, as it " is in James and John; otherwiſe they would be but one Perſon, as " well as have the ſame Nature. Which to my underſtanding is plain and clear Reaſon. And if ſo, then here we have an Identity of Nature, and a Diſtinction of Perſons in the ſame Nature.

But to this you object theſe three Things:

(1.) That you cannot put together one and the ſame, and diſtinct; and conſequently there is no Foundation for the Diſtinction of Nature and Perſon. P. 127.

(2.) That what I ſay about common Nature, and particular Subſiſtence and Individuals, is wholly unintelligible to you and your Friends. P. 131, 132, 134, 138, &c.

(3.) That to ſpeak truly and preciſely of this Matter, as in reality it is, there is no ſuch thing as one common Nature in ſeveral Individuals; for all that is Truth in them is particular, and can be nothing but particular. But the meaning is, that every particular individual Man or Horſe, &c. has ſuch a Nature or Conſtitution as agrees, and is conformable to that Idea which that general Name ſtands for. P. 154.

This is the Subſtance of what I can gather out of your Diſcourſe in ſeveral Pages, but as to the general Reflections I paſs them over, having no other Deſign but to ſet Truth in as good a Light as I can. And if I have the Misfortune not to be underſtood, I cannot help it; I wiſh it were in my Power to help other Men's Capacities as well as to help my own.

But you ſay, the Notioniſts and Ideiſts, (as they are called) ſeem to have their apprehenſive Faculties very differently turned. I do not think, that there is any different Turn in their Faculties; but there may be a very wrong Turn in the Method of Reaſoning in thoſe, who go in this way of Ideas, from what there is in thoſe who purſue the general Principles of Reaſon, and from thence draw particular Concluſions. P. 144.

If any Man takes it for granted, that your way of Ideas is the only way to Certainty (and he muſt take it for granted, if he will believe it) then I cannot ſee how he can apprehend one and the ſame common Nature in different Perſons or Individuals, becauſe all his Ideas are taken from Particulars; and therefore a common Nature is no more but one common Name; and every Individual is conſider'd as ranked under thoſe Names. But herein lies the fundamental Miſtake, that you preſume that we are not to judge of things by the general Principles of Reaſon, but by particular Ideas. For if Men ſet aſide this new way of Judging only by theſe Ideas, things would appear in another Light to them; But I find it is to very little purpoſe to argue with ſuch Men, who are reſolved to ſtick to this way of Ideas; for they can apprehend nothing but juſt in their own way: And let us ſay what we will, it is jargon, and unintelligible to them; although very rational Men have ſaid the ſame things that we do, and have been thought by the reſt of Mankind to have ſpoken intelligibly. But now it ſeems nothing is intelligible, but what ſuits with this new way of Ideas, however repugnant it be to the common Principles of Reaſon; which muſt be the Standard to Mankind, whatever becomes of this way of Ideas.

And therefore in this Debate I ſhall proceed upon theſe Principles of Reaſon, which have been receiv'd among Mankind; and from them I hope to make it appear, that the Difference of Nature and Perſon is not imaginary and fictitious, but grounded upon the real Nature of things.

The Principles of Reaſon which I go upon are theſe;

1. That Nothing hath no Properties.

2. That all Properties being only Modes or Accidents muſt have a real Subject to ſubſiſt in.

3. That Properties eſſentially different, muſt ſubſiſt in different Eſſences.

4. That where there is an Agreement in Eſſential Properties and a Difference in Individual, there muſt be both an Identity and Diverſity in ſeveral Reſpects.

Now upon theſe Principles I build my Aſſertion, that there is one real and common Nature or Eſſence in Mankind, and a Difference of Perſons in the ſeveral Individuals. For, that there are ſuch Eſſential Properties in Mankind which are not in Brutes, I ſuppoſe you will not deny. Now theſe Eſſential Properties muſt ſubſiſt ſomewhere; for Nothing can have no Properties, and theſe Properties cannot ſubſiſt (where Individuals are multiplied) in any one Individual: For that is to exclude all the reſt from the Eſſential Properties which belong to them; and if they have them in common, there muſt be ſome common Subject wherein they ſubſiſt, and that can be nothing but the common Eſſence of Mankind. For the Eſſence of Brutes or Plants have them not; and therefore theſe Eſſences muſt be really different from one another.

But becauſe Individuals of the ſame kind, have ſomething to diſtinguiſh, as well as to unite them, therefore there muſt be a different Subſiſtence in every Individual: and ſo one and the ſame, and yet diſtinct, may very eaſily and intelligibly conſiſt together.

P. 131. But you ſay, I have not told you what Nature is; I think my Diſcourſe ſufficiently ſhew'd it, if you had a mind to underſtand it; for you could not but ſee that I meant the Subject of the Eſſential Properties, whether you call it Nature, Subſtance, or Eſſence. Your Objection about Nature and Subſtance being of equal Extent, I hope I have ſufficiently removed in the foregoing Diſcourſe.

P. 132. You tell me, that it is more than you know, that the Nature of a Man is equal in Peter, James and John. I am ſorry for it. For I thought you had Ideas of particular Subſtances. But they may be Drills or Horſes for any thing you know. I am again ſorry that you know particular Men no better; but that for ought you know, they may be Drills or Horſes.

P. 133. But you know a Horſe that was called Peter, and you do not know but the Maſter of the ſame Team might call other of his Horſes, James and John. Suppoſe all this. And could you not in the Way of Ideas diſtinguiſh them from thoſe of your Acquaintance who had the ſame Names? I confeſs, this tempts me to think that Ideiſts (as you call them) have a particular Turn of their Underſtandings about theſe Matters. For I cannot but think, that thoſe who were not very rational Men, might underſtand the Difference between Men and Horſes; without being told, that although Horſes might be called by their Names; yet that th[illegible] were real Men, and their Conſtitution and Nature was conformable to that Idea, which the general Name Man ſtands for. But this is no more than to ſay, that he that has the Nature of a Man is a Man, or what has the Nature of a Drill is a Drill; and what has the Nature of a Horſe is a Horſe; whether he be called Peter, or not called Peter. If this were really the Diſcourſe of your Friends in private Converſation, you have been very obliging to them to publiſh it to the World: For Mankind are not ſo ſtupid, as not to know a Man from a Horſe or a Drill, but only by the Specifick Name of Man. You may have a Horſe called Peter if you pleaſe, and another James, and a third John; but for all that, there is no one that hath the Underſtanding of a Man, but will be able without your Specifick Names to tell the Difference of your Horſe Peter from your Man Peter; and call them by what Names you pleaſe the Difference will not depend upon them, but upon the Eſſential Properties which belong to them; and ſo it will be owned by all that have not this New turn of their Underſtandings. But I plainly ſee, that a new Notion when it hath got deep into a Man's Head doth give a ſtrange Turn to his Underſtanding; ſo that he cannot ſee that which every one elſe can, that hath not the ſame Tincture upon his Mind. And I remember an Obſervation of yours, How dangerous it is to a Man's Book 2. Reaſon to fix his Fancy long upon one ſort of Thoughts. ch. 11. Sect. 13. Theſe Ideas are a very odd ſort of Spectacles to our Underſtandings, if they make them ſee and underſtand leſs, than People of very ordinary Capacities do. For even the Man who had the Horſe with the Name Peter, and might have others by the Names of James and John, would not a little wonder at a grave Philoſopher that ſhould ſeriouſly ſay to him; You ſee, Friend, that your Horſes have the Names of Men, how do you know but that they are Men? Know, ſaith the Country-man, I hope you are wiſer than to ask me ſuch a Queſtion? Or what do you take me for, if I cannot tell the Difference of Men from Horſes whatever Names they have. Do not tell me of your Specifick Names, and Conformity to your Ideas, I know well enough the Difference between my Horſe Peter and my Man Peter without ſuch Gibberiſh. My Man Peter and I can ſit and chop Logick together about our Country Affairs, and he can Write and Read, and he is a very ſharp Fellow at a Bargain; but my Horſe Peter can do none of theſe things, and I never could find any thing like Reaſon in him, and do you think I do not know the Difference between a Man and a Beaſt? I purſue this no farther leſt the Country-man ſhould be too rude to the Gentlemen, with whom you had this Learned Converſation, about the Difference of Men, and Horſes, and Drills.

But you or your Friend, or both, are very hard ſet again about a P. 124. Common Nature with a particular Subſtance proper to each Perſon. For ſuch is your Misfortune, you ſay, that for your Life you cannot find it P. 125. out. This is a hard Caſe; before, for your Life you could not underſtand Nature and Subſtance to be the ſame; and now again, for your Life you cannot find out this. Where lies the monſtrous Difficulty of it? You ſay, You repeated, and this twenty times to your ſelf; and your weak Underſtanding always Rejolts. At what? My Words are, "Nature may be conſidered, as it is in diſtinct Individuals, as the "Nature of Man is equally in Peter, James and John. And this is "the common Nature with a particular Subſiſtence proper to each "of them.

You ſay, That the Nature of Man in Peter is the Nature of a Man, P. 135. if Peter be ſuppoſed to be a Man; but if it be the Name of a Horſe, your Knowledge vaniſhes. Cannot you, for your Life, know the Difference between a Man and a Horſe, by their Eſſential Properties, whatever their Names be? If ſo, there is a greater turn of Mens Underſtandings, than I imagined. But again, ſay you, Let it be impoſſible to give that Name to a Horſe (whoever had ſaid or thought ſo) yet you cannot underſtand theſe Words, the common Nature of a Man is in Peter; for whatſoever is in Peter exiſts in Peter; and whatever exiſts in Peter is particular; but the common Nature of Man is the general Nature of Man, or elſe you underſtand not what is meant by Common Nature; and it confounds your Underſtanding to make a General a Particular.

To this I anſwer, That the Common Nature of Man may be taken two ways. In the way of Ideas, and in the way of Reaſon. In your way of Ideas it is not at all to be wondered at, that you cannot underſtand ſuch a Common Nature, as I ſpake of, which ſubſiſts in ſeveral Perſons, becauſe you ſay, You can have no Ideas of Real Subſtances but ſuch as are Particular; all others are only Abſtract Ideas, and made only by the Act of the Mind. But I ſay, That in the Way of Reaſon you may come to a better underſtanding of this Matter. Which is by conſidering the Nature of Beings, and the Cauſes of the Differences Anſw. to Letter I. p. 110. amongſt the ſeveral kinds of them. I had told you before, in my Anſwer to your firſt Letter, that we are to conſider Beings as God hath ordered them in their ſeveral Sorts and Ranks, and that he hath diſtinguiſhed them by Eſſential Properties from each other, as appears by Mankind, and Brutes, and Plants: And that although the Individuals of the ſeveral kinds agree in Eſſential Properties, yet there is a real Difference between them in ſeveral Accidents that belong to them, as to Time, Place, Qualities, Relations, &c. Now that wherein they agree is the Common Nature; and that wherein thy differ, is the Particular Subſiſtence. And if this be ſo hard to be underſtood, why was it not anſwered here in the proper place for it? Is not that a Real Nature that is the Subject of Real Properties? Is not that Nature really in all thoſe who have the ſame Eſſential Properties? And therefore the Common Nature of Man muſt exiſt in Peter, becauſe he is a Man, and ſo in James and John: and yet every one of theſe is ſo diſtinguiſhed from the other, that we may juſtly ſay he hath a Particular Subſiſtence with that Common Nature. And this is no making a General a Particular, but diſtinguiſhing one from the other; which is a Diſtinction ſo eaſie and neceſſary, that I cannot but wonder at thoſe who ſay, that for their Lives they cannot find it out.

I had ſaid, “For the Nature of Man as in Peter, is diſtinct from that “ſame Nature, as it is in James and John, otherwiſe they would be “but One Perſon as well as One Nature. And what Reply is made P. 137. to this? You cannot underſtand what this is a Proof of. It is plain that I meant it of a Particular Subſiſtence; and if you cannot for your Life underſtand ſuch eaſie things, how can I for my Life help it? Read the Words over again which are before them, and joyn them together. “And this is the Common Nature with a Particular Subſiſtence pro“per to each of them; for the Nature of Man as in Peter is diſtinct “from that ſame Nature as it is in James and John. But I am really aſhamed to be put to explain ſuch things; I hope Ideas do not give P. 138. another Turn to Common Senſe. But you ſay, That otherwiſe they could not be three Perſons, is to prove it by a Propoſition unintelligible to you, becauſe you do not yet apprehend what a Perſon is. Of that in its proper place. Theſe Words of mine follow, " And this Diſtinction of Perſons in them, is diſcerned both by our Senſes as to their different Accidents, and by our Reaſon becauſe they have a ſeparate Exiſtence, not coming into it at once and in the ſame manner. And is this unintelligible too? You ſay, It will hold as well for three Phyſical P. 140. Atoms, which are three diſtinct Individuals, and have three diſtinct Natures in them, as certainly as three diſtinct Men. But are three Atoms as much three Perſons as three Men? But you cannot diſcern the diſtinction by our Senſes as to their Accidents, nor by your Reaſon as to ſeparate Exiſtence, becauſe God might create them at once. Therefore we cannot diſtinguiſh three Humane Perſons that way? Is this Reaſoning in the way of Ideas? Or in any way?

P. 141. Suppoſe we put the Common Nature of an Animal for the Common Nature of Man. What follows? Therefore three Animals are three diſtinct Perſons, as well as three Men? I thought there was ſome cauſe for your diſliking the Common Principles and Methods of Reaſoning. I am forced to give but ſhort touches at ſuch things, which I cannot anſwer more largely, without being thought to make Marks of Diſtinction.

Come we now therefore to the Second Senſe of Nature, " as it is taken abſtractly without Reſpect to Individual Perſons; and then I ſaid, it makes an entire Notion of it ſelf. For however the ſame Nature may be in different Individuals, yet the Nature in it ſelf remains one and the ſame; which appears from this evident Reaſon, that otherwiſe every Individual muſt make a different kind.

Is this to be underſtood any better? No. An entire Notion of it ſelf is an Expreſſion never met with before. An entire Idea of it ſelf P. 144. had been very plain and eaſie; but this is not to talk with Men in their own Dialect. But if we put it ſo, the Difficulty remains. What Difficulty? It then makes no more an entire Notion than the Nature of Peter. Is it not the ſame Nature conſidered as common to all Individuals, diſtinct from that Nature as in Peter? I wiſh among all the ways of inlarging Knowledge, you could think of ſome new way of conveying Notions into Mens Minds, for I find your Way of Ideas will never do it. For you cannot be brought one ſtep beyond the firſt Caſt of Ideas. And you will not allow, that which I give for an Evident Reaſon, to prove P 146. any thing towards clear Apprehenſions of one Common Nature. But if Nature be one and the ſame in different Individuals, then there muſt be one Common Nature, which makes an entire Notion of it ſelf: If it be not one and the ſame, then every Individual muſt make a Diſtinct Kind? P. 147. Can any thing be more evident? But you give one common Anſwer; I underſtand not any thing that is meant in this whole Paragraph, as to the right Apprehenſion of one Common Nature. And ſo I am very well content to leave it to the Reader's Underſtanding.

And now I come at laſt to the Idea of a Perſon. And here I am glad to find ſomething you do underſtand: Which is great News. This, ſay P. 149. you, I underſtand very well, that ſuppoſing Peter, James and John to be all three Men, and Man being a Name for one Kind of Animals, they are all of the ſame Kind. Do you mean that they have the ſame common Eſſence, or have only the ſame common Name? If you mean the former, there muſt be a common Nature; if only the latter, that cannot make them of the ſame Kind. For Kind ſignifies nothing but a meer Name without it. If it be asked you, whether Men and Drills be of the ſame Kind or not? Could you give no other Anſwer, but that the Specifick Name Man ſtands for one ſort, and the Specifick Name Drill for the other; and therefore they are not of the ſame Kind? Are thoſe Names arbitrary, or are they founded on real and diſtinct Properties? If they be arbitrary, they have no other Difference, but what a Dictionary gives them. If they are founded on real and diſtinct Properties, then there muſt be a real Difference of Kinds founded in Nature; which is as much as I deſire. But to go on. You underſtand too very well, that Peter is not James, and James is not John, but that there is a Difference in theſe Individuals. You underſtand alſo, that they may be diſtinguiſhed from each other by our Senſes, as to different Features and Diſtance of Place, &c. But what follows, you ſay, You do not underſtand, viz. that ſuppoſing there were no ſuch external Difference, yet there is a Difference between them as Individuals of the ſame Nature. For all that this comes to, as far as you can underſtand, is that the Ground of the Diſtinction between ſeveral Individuals in the ſame common Nature is P. 152. that they are ſeveral Individuals in the ſame common Nature. You underſtand, it ſeems, that they are ſeveral Individuals, that Peter is not James, and James is not John; and the Queſtion is, what this Diſtinction is founded upon? Whether upon our obſerving the Difference of Features, Diſtance of Place, &c. or on ſome antecedent Ground? I affirm, that there is a Ground of the Diſtinction of Individuals antecedent to ſuch accidental Differences as are liable to our Obſervation by our Senſes.

And the Ground I go upon is this, that the true Reaſon of Identity in Man is the vital Union of Soul and Body: And ſince every Man hath a different Soul united to different Particles of Matter, there muſt be a real Diſtinction between them, without any reſpect to what is accidental to them. For, if Peter have a Soul and Body different from James, and James from John, they muſt have different Principles of Individuation, without any reſpect to Features or Place, &c.

P. 149. You ſay, You cannot ſuppoſe a Contradiction, viz. that there is no difference of Place between them. But that is not the Point, whether when we conſider them with reſpect to Place, there can be ſuch a thing as Identity of Place to two different Bodies; But whether we cannot conſider two ſeveral Individuals of Mankind without particular regard to Place? Which I ſay, we may, and for this Reaſon; becauſe Relation to Place, is an external Difference, but the real Diſtinction of Individuals doth not relate to any Accident of the Body; becauſe the Individual conſiſts of the Union of Soul and Body; and you cannot judge of Eſſay, B. 2. ch. 27. Sect. 1. the Exiſtence of the Soul by the Place of the Body. You ſay, that when we ſee any thing to be in any place in any inſtant of Time, we are ſure (be it what it will) that it is that very thing, and not another which at that Time exiſts in another Place, how like and undiſtinguiſhing ſoever it may be in all other Reſpects. And in this conſiſts Identity. But I think the Identity of Man depends neither upon the Notion of Place for his Body, nor upon the Soul conſider'd by it ſelf, but upon both theſe, as actually united and making one Perſon. Which to me ſeems ſo clear and intelligible, that I can imagine no Objection againſt it. I am certain you produce none.

My next Words are, " And here lies the true Idea of a Perſon, which " ariſes from that manner of Subſiſtence, which is in one Individual, and " is not communicable to another.

P. 155. In your Anſwer to this, I paſs over the trifling Exceptions, about the Diſſyllable Perſon, and the true Idea and Signification of the articulate Sound; and about here and herein, &c. being reſolved to keep to what appears material. P. 156. And the only thing of that kind is, that according to my Senſe of Perſon, it will as well agree to Bucephalus as to Alexander; and the difference will be as great between Bucephalus and Podargus, as between Alexander and Hector, all being ſeveral Individuals in the ſame common Nature: but for your part you cannot underſtand that Bucephalus and Podargus are Perſons in the true ſignification of the Word Perſon in the Engliſh Tongue. And whoever deſired you ſhould? For I expreſly ſay, that a Perſon is a compleat intelligent Subſtance, with a peculiar manner of Subſiſtence. And again, For a Perſon relates to ſomething which doth diſtinguiſh it from another intelligent Subſtance in the ſame Nature. So that it is impoſſible to apply my Notion of Perſon to any irrational Creatures, although they be Bucephalus and Podargus: And I think a Man muſt ſtrain hard to make ſuch Objections, ſo directly againſt that Idea of a Perſon which I ſet down. And it is very eaſie to underſtand the Difference between a Diſtinction of Individuals as ſuch, and of intelligent Individuals, and that manner of Subſiſtence in them, which makes them diſtinct Perſons.

P. 159. But you ſay, that I affirm, that an individual intelligent Subſtance is rather ſuppoſed to the making of a Perſon, than the proper Definition of it: and yet afterwards I make it to be the Definition of a Perſon, that it is a compleat intelligent Subſtance.

To this I anſwer, That in the former place I give an Account of the Reaſon of Perſonality, which I ſay lies in the Manner of Subſiſtence, and not in the intelligent individual Subſtance; which is rather ſuppoſed to the making of a Perſon: For that which critically diſtinguiſhes the Perſon is the Reaſon of Perſonality; but when we come to give a common Definition of it, there is no ſuch neceſſity of inſiſting upon the Reaſon of the Difference, but upon the common Acception of it Perſon. And upon that account I call it a complete intelligent Subſtance, becauſe, although the Soul be ſo in it ſelf; yet we take Perſon with Relation to Soul and Body united together. And ſo the Identity of Perſon muſt take in both, not only here, but at the Reſurrection.

And thus I have gone through all that I could find, that ſeem'd material in the Dialogue between you and your Friends as to this Subject, and I aſſure you, I have omitted nothing which I apprehended had any Appearance of Difficulty in it. And I find not the leaſt Reaſon to be unſatisfied in the Account I had given of the Difference of Nature and Perſon: but I ſtill think that it doth tend very much to the right Apprehenſion of the Doctrine of the Trinity; as I hope doth farther appear by the foregoing Diſcourſe.

And now to come to a Concluſion of this whole Debate. (For I intend not to draw this Saw any longer, having done as much as I think fitting for my ſelf to do.)

I ſaw no Neceſſity of writing again for my own Vindication as to your firſt Charge, which I was contented to leave to the Reader's Judgment. But in the Concluſion of my former Anſwer, I had ſaid, " That " as you had ſtated your Notion of Ideas, it may be of dangerous Con-

“ ſequence to that Article of the Chriſtian Faith, which I endeavoured
P. 57. “ to defend. This you call a new Charge againſt your Book; and you
59. complain, that I do not ſpecifie the Particulars, wherein I apprehend it
84. may be of ſuch dangerous Conſequence; and you blame me for this ſaying,
85. without ſhewing that it is ſo: and that all the Reaſon I give is, that it is
57. made uſe of by ill Men to do miſchief: that when I ſay, it may be, it
84. ſhews only an Inclination to accuſe, and proves nothing; that Danger may be
85. apprehended where no Danger is; that if any thing muſt be laid aſide, becauſe it may be ill uſed, you do not know what will be innocent enough to 170. be kept; and laſtly, that the Imputation of a Tendency to Scepticiſm, and to the overthrowing any Article of the Chriſtian Faith are no ſmall Charge;
171. and that you cannot ſee any Argument I have brought, that your Notion of Ideas tends to Scepticiſm. Theſe things laid together, made me think it neceſſary to do that which I was unwilling to do, till you had driven me to it; which was to ſhew the Reaſons I had, why I look'd on your Notion of Ideas, and of Certainty by them, as inconſiſtent with it ſelf, and with ſome important Articles of the Chriſtian Faith.

What I have now done, I thought it my Duty to do, not with reſpect to my ſelf, but to ſome of the Myſteries of our Faith; which I do not charge you with oppoſing, but with laying ſuch Foundations as do tend to the Overthrow of them; of which we have had too much Experience already; and may have more, if your Way of Certainty by Ideas ſhould obtain. Which I cannot think it will among ſuch as are capable, and willing, to judge impartially. I have now done with this Matter: And as ſome may think it the firſt part of Wiſdom not to begin in ſuch Diſputes (and I am of their Mind if they did not touch the Chriſtian Faith) ſo they cannot but judge it the next (as I do) to know when to make an End.

I am, Sir,

To the Reverend CLERGY

My Brethren,

THE following Diſcourſes do of Right belong to You; the Subſtance of them being contained in what I delivered to You in ſeveral Times and Places, in the Courſe of my Viſitations: In which I endeavoured to lay open the Nature and Dignity of your Function, the Rules you are to obſerve in the Diſcharge of it, and to ſtate and reſolve the moſt important Caſes, which relate to your Duties and Rights, according to the Principles both of Law and Conſcience. For I obſerved, that ſome had ſpoken very well of the General Nature of the Eccleſiaſtical Function, without a particular regard to the Limitations of the Exerciſe of it by our Laws. Others had endeavoured to give Advice and Counſel in Point of Law, who meddle not with the Obligation of Conſcience. And therefore I thought it neceſſary to joyn both theſe together, that you might have a clear and diſtinct View of your Duties in both Reſpects. For in a matter of poſitive Inſtitution, where only the General Duties are preſcribed in Scripture, and the Bounds of the Exerciſe of them depend upon the Laws of the Land, I could not ſee how any Perſon could ſatisfie himſelf in the Diſcharge of his Duty, without a regard to both. For the Care of Souls in General, is a matter of wonderful Weight and Importance, and can never be ſufficiently conſidered by thoſe who are concerned in it. But no Man among us takes upon him an indefinite Care of Souls, without regard to Perſons or Places; for that would produce Confuſion and endleſs Scruples, and Per-

Perplexities of Conſcience about the Nature and Obligation to particular Duties.

Which cannot be prevented or removed without a right underſtanding the different Reſpect all that have taken our Holy Function upon them, do ſtand in both to the Church in General, and to that particular Cure of Souls which they are admitted to. The beſt way I know to repreſent them, is to conſider the Caſe of Dominion and Property; and how far the Univerſal Obligation of Mankind to promote each others Good, is conſiſtent with the Care of their own and Families Welfare. Adam had in himſelf the Entire and Original Dominion over all thoſe Things, which after became the Subject of particular Property; when his Poſterity found it neceſſary to make and allow ſeveral Shares and Allotments to diſtinct Families, ſo as they were not to incroach, or break in upon one another. But the Law of Nature did not preſcribe the Way and Method of Partition, but left that to Occupancy or Compact: And ſo the Heads of Families upon their Settlement in any Countrey, had a twofold Obligation upon them; the firſt was to preſerve the Intereſt of the whole Body, to which they ſtill were bound, and were to ſhew it upon ſuch Occaſions as required it. The next was to take particular Care of thoſe Shares which belonged to themſelves, ſo as to improve them for their Service, and to protect them from the Invaſion of others. And although this Diviſion of Property was not made by any Antecedent Law, yet being once made, and ſo uſeful to Mankind, the Violation of it, by taking that which is anothers Right, is a manifeſt Violation of the Law of Nature.

I do not think, that the Diſtribution of Eccleſiaſtical Cures, for the greater Benefit of the People, is of ſo ſtrict a Nature; becauſe the Matter of Property doth not extend to this Caſe in ſuch a manner. But ſince an Univerſal Good is carried on by ſuch a Diviſion far better than it could be without it, there is an Obligation lying on all Perſons who regard it, to preſerve that Order which conduces to ſo good an End. And I cannot ſee how any Perſons can better juſtifie the Breach of Parochial Communion as ſuch, than others can juſtifie the altering the Bounds of Mens Rights and Properties, becauſe they apprehend that the common Good may be beſt promoted by returning to the firſt Community of all things.

If our Bleſſed Saviour, or his Holy Apoſtles in the firſt founding of Churches, had determined the Number of Perſons, or fixed the Bounds of Places within which thoſe who were ordained to ſo holy a Function, were to take care of the Souls committed to them, there could have been no Diſpute about it among thoſe who owned their Authority. But their Buſineſs was to lay down the Qualifications of ſuch as were fit to be imployed in it; to ſet before them the Nature of their Duties, and the Account they muſt give of the Diſcharge of them; and to Exhort all ſuch as undertook it to a Watchfulneſs, and Diligence in their Places; but they never go about to limit the Precincts, within which they were to Exerciſe the Duties incumbent upon them.

When Churches were firſt planted in ſeveral Countries, there could be no ſuch things expected as Parochial Diviſions; for theſe were the Conſequents of the General ſpreading of Chriſtianity among the People. As is evident in the beſt Account we have of the Settlement of the Parochial Clergy among us, after Chriſtianity was received by the Saxons. Which was not done all at once, but by ſeveral Steps and Degrees. It cannot be denied by any, that are converſant in our Hiſtories, that the Nation was gradually converted from Paganiſm by the ſucceſsful Endeavours of ſome Biſhops and their Clergy in the ſeveral Parts of England.

Not by Commiſſion from one Perſon (as is commonly ſuppoſed) but ſeveral Biſhops came from ſeveral Places, and applied themſelves to this Excellent Work, and God gave them conſiderable Succeſs in it. Thus Birinus did great Service among the Weſt-Saxons; and Felix the Burgundian among the Eaſt-Saxons; and the Northern Biſhops in the Midland-Parts, as well as Auguſtin and his Companions in the Kingdom of Kent. And in theſe Midland-Parts, as Chriſtianity increaſed, ſo the Biſhop's Sees were multiplied (Five out of One) and placed in the moſt convenient Diſtances for the farther inlarging and eſtabliſhing Chriſtianity among the People. The Biſhops were Reſident in their own Sees, and had their Clergy then about them, whom they ſent abroad, as they ſaw cauſe, to thoſe Places where they had the faireſt Hopes of Succeſs. And according thereto they either continued or removed them, having yet no fixed Cures or Titles. All the firſt Titles were no other than being entred in the Biſhop's Regiſter, as of his Clergy, from which Relation none could diſcharge himſelf, without the Biſhop's Conſent. But as yet the Clergy had no Titles to any particular Places, there being no fixed Bounds of Pariſhes, wherein any Perſons were obliged to be Reſident for the better Diſcharge of their Duties. This State of an unfixed and itinerant Clergy was ſoon found to be very inconvenient; and therefore all Incouragement was given, where Chriſtianity moſt prevailed, for the building Churches at a convenient Diſtance from the Cathedral, and ſetling a Number of Preſbyters together there, which were after called Collegiate Churches; and the Great and Devout Men of that Time gave them Liberal Endowments that they might the better attend the Service of God there, and in the Countrey about them.

But after that the ſeveral Parts grew to be more populous, and Lords of Mannors, for the Conveniency of themſelves and their Tenants, were willing to erect Churches within their Precincts; Laws were then made that they might detain one Share of the Tythes for the Supply of this New Church; the other two remaining due to the Mother-Church. And I can find nothing like any Allowance for the Lords of Mannors to appropriate the other Two Parts as they thought fit. For thoſe Mannors themſelves were but Parcels of larger Pariſhes; and the Tythes were due from thoſe Eſtates, which were no part of their Mannors, and therefore they had nothing to do with them.

But after the Norman Invaſion, the poor Parochial Clergy being Saxons, and the Nobility and Biſhops Normans, they regarded not how much they reduced the Inferiour Clergy, to enrich the Monaſteries belonging to the Normans, either at home or abroad. And this I take to be the true Reaſon of the Multitude of Appropriations of Two Thirds of the Tythes in the Norman Times, and too often with the Conſent of the Biſhops, who ought to have ſhewed more Regard to the Intereſt of the Parochial Clergy than they generally did.

But of this I have diſcourſed more at large in one of the following Caſes. P. 277, &c.

In the latter end of the Saxon Times, if we believe thoſe called the Confeſſor's Law, after all the Daniſh Devaſtations, there were Three or Four Churches where there had been but One before. By which it appears that the Parochial Clergy were Numerous before the Conqueſt. And within this Dioceſs, in Two Deanaries of it, there are to be found in Doomſday-Book above Twenty Pariſh-Churches: In the Deanary of Warwick, Ten; and in the Deanary of Kington, Fifteen: But of the former Seven were Appropriated in the Norman Times; and of the latter

Ten; by which we may ſee to how low a Condition they then brought the Parochial Clergy. One Church in the former Deanary I find built in that time, and that was at Exhal; which was before a Chapel to Salford, but was Erected in the time of H. 1. by the Lord of the Mannor and Freeholders, who gave the Glebe and Tythes, as appears by the Confirmation of Simon, Biſhop of Worceſter. Many other Parochial Churches, I doubt not, were built and endowed after the ſame manner, although the Records of them are loſt. And as Churches were new Erected, the Parochial Bounds were fixed, that the People might certainly know whither they were to reſort for Divine Worſhip, who were bound to attend them as part of their Charge, from whoſe Hands they were to receive the Holy Sacraments; and whoſe Advice and Counſel they were to take in Matters which related to the Salvation of their Souls. Now here lies the main Difficulty with ſome People; they cannot think that Parochial Bounds are to determine them in what concerns the Good of their Souls; but if they can edifie more by the Parts and Gifts of another, they conclude, that it is their Duty to forſake their own Miniſter, and go to ſuch a one as they like. I meddle not with extraordinary Occaſions of Abſence, nor with the Caſe of Scandalous Incumbents, becauſe it is the Peoples Fault if they be not proſecuted, and the Place ſupplied by better Men. But the Caſe, as it ought to be put, is, how far a Regard is to be ſhewed to a Conſtitution ſo much for the General Good, as that of Parochial Communion is. We do not ſay, That Mens Conſciences are bound by Perambulations, or that it is a Sin at any time to go to another Pariſh; but we ſay, That a conſtant fixed Parochial Communion, tends more to preſerve the Honour of God, and the Religion Eſtabliſhed among us, to promote Peace and Unity among Neighbours, and to prevent the Miſchief of Separation. And what advances ſo good Ends, is certainly the beſt Means of Edification: Which lies not in moving the Fanſie, or warming the Paſſions, but in what brings Men to a due Temper of Mind, and a holy, peaceable, and unblameable Converſation. And as to theſe Excellent Ends, it is not only your Duty with great Zeal and Diligence to perſwade your People to them; but to go before them your ſelves in the Practice of them. For they will never have any hearty Regard or Eſteem for what any one ſays, if they find him to contradict it in the Courſe of his Life. Suppoſe it be the Peoples Fault to ſhew ſo little Regard to your Profeſſion; yet you are bound to conſider how far you may have given too much Occaſion for it, and their Fault can be no Excuſe for you, if any of your own were the true Occaſion of theirs.

We live in an Age wherein the Converſations of the Clergy are more obſerved than their Doctrines. Too many are buſie in finding out the Faults of the Clergy, the better to cover their own; and among ſuch Prieſt-craft is become the moſt popular Argument for their Infidelity. If they could once make it appear, that all Religion were nothing but a Cheat and Impoſture of ſome cunning Men for their own Advantage, who believed nothing of it themſelves; and that all the buſineſs of our Profeſſion was to ſupport ſuch a Fraud in the World for our own Intereſt, they were very excuſable in their moſt bitter Invectives againſt ſuch Prieſt-craft. For nothing is more to be abhorred by Men of Ingenuous Minds, and Natural Probity, than to be the Inſtruments of Deceiving Mankind in ſo groſs a manner. But, thanks be to God, this is very far from being the Caſe among us; for our Profeſſion is built upon the Belief of God and Providence, the Differences of Good and Evil, and the Rewards and Puniſhments of another Life. If theſe Things have no Foundations, we are certain that the beſt, and wiſeſt, and moſt diſintereſted Men in all Ages have been in the ſame fundamental Miſtakes. And it is now ſomewhat too late for any Perſons to ſet up for Sagacity and true Judgment in theſe Matters above all thoſe of foregoing Ages. There is a mighty Difference between ſlight and ſuperficial Reaſonings, (although ſome may be vain enough to cry them up for Oracles) and thoſe which are built on the Nature of Things, and have born the Teſt of ſo many Ages, and remain ſtill in the ſame Degree of Firmneſs and Strength, notwithſtanding all the Batteries of Profane and Atheiſtical Wits. For it cannot be denied, that ſuch there have been in former times as well as now; but that makes more for the Advantage of Religion, that our modern Pretenders are fain to borrow from the old Stock; and ſcarce any thing worth anſwering hath been ſaid by them, but hath been often ſaid and with more Force by their Maſters. And the beſt Philoſophers of this Age have given up the Cauſe of Atheiſm as indefenſible: So that the Being of God and Providence ſeems to be eſtabliſhed by a General Conſent; and if any ſecretly be of another Mind, they think it not for their Reputation to own it.

The main Pretence now is againſt Revealed Religion; but without offering to ſhew how ſo great and conſiderable a part of Mankind as the Chriſtian Church hath been made up of came to be ſo impoſed upon, as to a Doctrine which advances Morality to the greateſt Height, and gives Mankind the moſt aſſured Hopes of a Bleſſed Immortality, when nothing like Intereſt and Deſign as to this World, could be carried on by the firſt and greateſt Promoters of it. But we are told in a late Complaint made abroad by a Friend of our Deiſts, (wherein I am particularly concerned) That we make Objections for them which are moſt eaſy to anſwer, and paſs over their moſt conſiderable Difficulties. Which is a very unjuſt Charge, and cannot be made good but by producing thoſe conſiderable Difficulties which we have taken no notice of. For my part, I know of none ſuch, and we make no Objections for them, however we may think it our Duty to lay open the Weakneſs of them, when we are importuned to do it; which was my Caſe in the Treatiſe I ſuppoſe he refers to. If they keep their conſiderable Difficulties to themſelves, I know not how we ſhould be able to anſwer them. But it is the common way in a baffled Cauſe ſtill to pretend that the main Difficulties were not produced.

Hiſtoire desDuvrages des Scavans, Dout, 1697. p. 551.

But this is not a proper Occaſion to inſiſt longer on theſe Matters; my preſent Buſineſs is to anſwer the Objection which immediately regards the Clergy; and the Sum of it is, That our Profeſſion rather hinders than confirms the belief of Religion, becauſe they would plead for what makes for their Intereſt, are always ſuſpected to be ſwayed more by Intereſt than by Reaſon. To give a full and clear Anſwer to this, we muſt conſider, That however Mankind are apt to be ſwayed by Intereſt, yet the Truth and Reaſon of Things do not at all depend upon them; for a Thing is not true or falſe in it ſelf, becauſe it makes for or againſt a Man; and the Meaſures of judging Truth and Falſhood, are quite of another Nature, and ſo Mens Intereſts come not into Conſideration. So that in this Caſe they are not to examine whoſe Turn is ſerved, whether ſuch a thing be true or falſe; but whether there be ſufficient Evidence to convince an impartial Mind of the Truth of it; for let the Reaſons be produced by whom they pleaſe, the grounds of Conviction are the ſame. If a Man in a Diſpute about Surveying a piece of Land, which he claimed a Right to, ſhould appeal to the Elements of Geometry in his Caſe, would the Evidence be leſs becauſe he was concerned in the Land?

But we proceed farther: Suppoſe it be for the Intereſt of Religion in a Nation, for an Order of Men to be ſet apart on purpoſe to attend the Services of it; and that there ſhould be great Encouragements for their Education, and a Maintenance ſet apart for their Subſiſtence afterwards, that they may not live in dependance on the Humours and uncertain Fancies of the People; how can ſuch a Conſtitution take off from the Credibility of that Religion which they are to ſupport? Was it any leſſening to the Authority of the Law of Moſes, that the Tribe of Levi was ſo plentifully provided for by God's own Appointment? They were to teach the Law to the People in the Places where they were diſperſed among the ſeveral Tribes: And ſuppoſe it had been then ſaid, Why ſhould we believe what you ſay, when you live by it? You have Cities, and Lands, and Tythes, and Oblations, and Dignities among you, no wonder you ſet up this Law as Divine and Holy; but we get nothing by it, but part with a ſhare of our Profits to maintain you. What then? Was the Law therefore falſe, and Moſes an Impoſtor? Theſe are hard Conſequences, but they naturally follow from ſuch a Suppoſition. And if ſuch an Inference were not reaſonable then, neither will it appear to be ſo now.

But we do not pretend, that the Parochial Settlement of our Clergy is by ſuch a Divine Law as the Levitical Prieſthood was; but this we do inſiſt upon, That the Chriſtian Religion being owned and eſtabliſhed in the Nation, there was a neceſſary Reaſon from the Nature of it, and the Obligation to preſerve and ſupport it, that there ſhould be an Order of Men ſet apart for that End, that they ſhould inſtruct the People in it, and perform the ſeveral Offices belonging to it; and that a ſufficient Maintenance be allowed them by the Law of the Land to ſupport them in doing their Duties. And I appeal to any Men of Senſe or of common Underſtanding, whether on Suppoſition that our Religion is true, theſe be not very juſt and reaſonable Things? How then can that make a Religion ſuſpected to be falſe, which are very reaſonable, ſuppoſing it to be true? If it be true, as moſt certainly it is, are not they bound to maintain it to be true? And can it be the leſs ſo, becauſe their Subſiſtence depends upon it? Therefore all the impertinent Talk of our Profeſſion being a Trade, can ſignify nothing to any Men that underſtand the Difference between Scarron and Euclid, or the way of Burleſquing and of Demonſtration.

There is ſtill one common Prejudice to be removed, and that is, That too many of thoſe who preach up our Religion as true, do not live as if they believed it to be ſo. We are very ſorry there ſhould be any Occaſion given for ſuch a Reproach as this; and we hope there are not ſo many Inſtances of it as ſome would have it believed. Woe be to thoſe by whom ſuch Offences come. But ſuppoſing the Inſtances true, is there any Religion in the World, conſidering the Follies and Infirmities of Mankind, which can ſecure all the Profeſſors of it from acting againſt the Rules of it? But if ſuch Inſtances are ſufficiently proved, there ought to be the greater Severity uſed in ſuch Caſes, becauſe Religion it ſelf, as well as the Honour of our Church, ſuffers ſo much by them.

But it will ſtill be ſaid, That theſe Perſons are ſecret Infidels, and believe nothing of what they profeſs.

This is another Point, how far bad Lives are conſiſtent with ſound Opinions: Some that think that Men act conſiſtently, will not allow that bad Men can be any other than meer Infidels; but others, who conſider the Prevalency of Mens Luſts and Paſſions over their Reaſons, are apt to think, that they may retain their good Opinions, even when they act contrary to them: But then their Conſciences fly in their Faces, and they condemn themſelves for their evil Actions. And then theſe very Inſtances are an Argument againſt Infidelity; for we may juſtly preſume, that they would ſhake off their Fears of another World, if they could. But why ſhould ſome Inſtances of this Nature ſignify more againſt Religion, than the many remarkable Examples of a Godly, Righteous and Sober Life among the Clergy, to a ſtronger Confirmation of it? For they have had greater Occaſion of ſearching into all the conſiderable Difficulties about Religion, than others can pretend to; and I do not know any that have imployed moſt Time and Pains about it, but have had greater Satisfaction as to the Truth and Excellency of it.

Thus I have endeavoured to remove the moſt common Prejudices of our Times againſt our Profeſſion. It would now be proper for me to give ſome particular Directions to you, but that is ſo much the Buſineſs of the following Diſcourſes, that I ſhall refer you to them; and commend you to the Grace and Bleſſing of Almighty God, that you may ſo carefully diſcharge your Duties in this World, that it may advance your Happineſs in another. I am

BISHOP of WORCESTER's CHARGE
CLERGY of his DIOCESE;

In his Primary Viſitation, begun at Worceſter, September 11th, 1690.

My Brethren,

THIS being my Primary Viſitation, I thought it fitting to acquaint my ſelf with the ancient, as well as modern Practice of Epiſcopal Viſitations; and, as near as I could, to obſerve the Rules preſcribed therein, with reſpect to the Clergy who are now ſummoned to appear. And I find there were two principal Parts in them, a Charge and an Enquiry.

Regino l. 2. p. 205. Hiſpan. Concil. p. 29. Regino Collect. Canon. l. 2. p. 204. Burchard. l. 1. c. 91, 92. Gratian 35. q. 5. c. 7.

The Charge was given by the Biſhop himſelf, and was called Admonitio Epiſcopi, or Allocutio: wherein he informed them of their Duty, and exhorted them to perform it.

The Enquiry was made according to certain Articles drawn out of the Canons, which were generally the ſame; according to which the Juratores Synodi (as the ancient Canoniſts call them, or Teſtes Synodales) were to give in their Anſwers upon Oath; which was therefore called Juramentum Synodale; for the Biſhop's Viſitation was accounted an Epiſcopal Synod.

The former of theſe is my preſent buſineſs; and I ſhall take leave to ſpeak my Mind freely to you this firſt time, concerning ſeveral things which I think moſt uſeful, and fit to be conſidered and practiſed by the Clergy of this Dioceſe.

For ſince it hath pleaſed God, by his wiſe and over-ruling Providence, (without my ſeeking) to bring me into this Station in his Church, I ſhall eſteem it the beſt Circumſtance of my preſent Condition, if he pleaſe to make me an Inſtrument of doing good among you. To this end, I thought it neceſſary in the firſt place, moſt humbly to implore his Divine Aſſiſtance, that I might both rightly underſtand, and conſcientiouſly perform that great Duty which is incumbent upon me; for without his help, all our Thoughts are vain, and our beſt Purpoſes will be ineffectual. But God is not wanting to thoſe who ſincerely endeavour to know and to do their Duty; and therefore in the next place I ſet my ſelf (as far as my Health and other Occaſions would permit) to conſider the Nature and Extent of my Duty, with a Reſolution not to be diſcouraged, although I met with Difficulties in the performance of it. For ſuch is the State and Condition of the World, that no Man can deſign to do good in it, but when that croſſes the particular Intereſts and Inclinations of others, he muſt expect to meet with as much Trouble as their unquiet Paſſions can give him.

If we therefore conſulted nothing but our own Eaſe, the only way were to let People follow their Humours and Inclinations, and to be as little concerned as might be, at what they either ſay or do. For if we go about to rouze and awaken them, and much more to reprove and reform them, we ſhall ſoon find them uneaſy and impatient; for few love to hear of their Faults, and fewer to amend them.

But it is the peculiar Honour of the Chriſtian Religion, to have an Order of Men ſet apart, not meerly as Prieſts to offer Sacrifices, (for that all Religions have had) but as Preachers of Righteouſneſs, to ſet Good and Evil before the People committed to their Charge; to inform them of their Duties, to reprove them for their Miſcarriages, and that not in order to their Shame, but their Reformation; which requires not only Zeal, but Diſcretion, and a great Mixture of Courage and Prudence, that we may neither fail in doing our Duty, nor in the beſt means of attaining the end of it.

If we could reaſonably ſuppoſe, that all thoſe who are bound to tell others their Duties, would certainly do their own, there would be leſs need of any ſuch Office in the Church as that of Biſhops; who are to inſpect and govern, and viſit and reform thoſe who are to watch over others. But ſince there may be too great Failings even in theſe, too great neglect in ſome, and diſorder in others; too great proneneſs to Faction and Schiſm, and impatience of Contradiction from mere Equals. Therefore St. Jerom himſelf grants, That to avoid theſe Miſchiefs, there was a neceſſity of a ſuperiour Order to Presbyters in the Church of God; ad quem omnis Eccleſiæ cura pertineret, & Schiſmatum ſemina tollerentur, as he ſpeaks, even where he ſeems moſt to leſſen the Authority of Biſhops. But whatever ſome Expreſſions of his may be, (when the Biſhop of Jeruſalem and the Roman Deacons came into his Head) his Reaſons are very much for the Advantage of Epiſcopal Government. For can any Man ſay more in point of Reaſon for it, than that nothing but Faction and Diſorder followed the Government of Presbyters, and therefore the whole Chriſtian Church agreed in the neceſſity of a higher Order, and that the Peace and Safety of the Church depends upon it; that if it be taken away, nothing but Schiſms and Confuſions will follow. I wiſh thoſe who magnify St. Jerom's Authority in this matter, would ſubmit to his Reaſon and Authority both as to the Neceſſity and Uſefulneſs of the Order of Biſhops in the Church.

Hieron. Comment. ad Titum. Epiſt. ad Evagr.

Adverſ. Luciferian

But beyond this, in ſeveral places, he makes the Biſhops to be Succeſſors of the Apoſtles, as well as the reſt of the moſt eminent Fathers of the Church have done. If the Apoſtolical Office, as far as it concerns the Care and Government of Churches, were not to continue after their Deceaſe, how came the beſt, the moſt learned, the neareſt to the Apoſtolical Times, to be ſo wonderfully deceiv'd? For if the Biſhops did not ſucceed by the Apoſtles own Appointment, they muſt be Intruders and Uſurpers of the Apoſtolical Function; and can we imagine the Church of God would have ſo univerſally conſented to it? Beſides, the Apoſtles did not die all at once; but there were Succeſſors in ſeveral of the Apoſtolical Churches, while ſome of the Apoſtles were living: Can we again imagine thoſe would not have vindicated the Right of their own Order, and declared to the Church, That this Office was peculiar to themſelves? The Change of the Name from Apoſtles to Biſhops would not have been ſufficient Excuſe for them; for the Preſumption had been as great in the Exerciſe of the Power without the Name. So that I can ſee no Medium, but that either the Primitive Biſhops did ſucceed the Apoſtles by their own Appointment and Approbation, (which Iren. l. 3. c. 3. Irenæus expreſly affirms, Qui ab Apoſtolis ipſis inſtituti ſunt Epiſcopi in Eccleſiis) or elſe thoſe who governed the Apoſtolical Churches after 3 John 9, 10. them, out-went Diotrephes himſelf; for he only rejected thoſe whom the Apoſtles ſent, but theſe aſſumed to themſelves the Exerciſe of an Apoſtolical Authority over the Churches planted and ſettled by them.

But to let us ſee how far the Apoſtles were from thinking that this part of their Office was peculiar to themſelves, we find them in their own time, as they ſaw occaſion, to appoint others to take care of the Government of the Churches, within ſuch bounds as they thought fit. 1 Tim. 3. 2, 3, &c. Thus Timothy was appointed by St. Paul at Epheſus, to examine the Qualifications of ſuch as were to be ordained; 5. 22. and not to lay hands ſuddenly on any; 19. to receive Accuſations, if there were cauſe, even againſt Elders; to proceed judicially before two or three Witneſſes; 20. and, if there were Reaſon, to give them a publick Rebuke. And that this ought not 21. to be thought a ſlight matter, he preſently adds, I charge thee before God, and the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and the elect Angels, that thou obſerve theſe things, without preferring one before another, doing nothing by partiality. Here is a very ſtrict and ſevere Charge for the impartial Exerciſe of Diſcipline in the Church upon Offenders. And although in the Epiſtle Titus 1. 5. to Titus, he be only in general required to ſet in order the things that are wanting, and to ordain Elders in every City, as he had appointed him; yet we are not to ſuppoſe, that this Power extended not to a Juriſdiction over them when he had ordained them. For if any of thoſe whom he ordained (as believing them qualified according to the Apoſtles Rules) ſhould afterwards demean themſelves otherwiſe, and be ſelf-willed, froward, given to Wine, Brawlers, Covetous, or any way ſcandalous to the Church, can we believe that Titus was not as well bound to correct them afterwards, as to examine them before? And what was this Power of Ordination and Juriſdiction, but the very ſame which the Biſhops have exerciſed ever ſince the Apoſtles Times? But they who go about to Unbiſhop Timothy and Titus, may as well Unſcripture the Epiſtles that were written to them, and make them only ſome particular and occaſional Writings, as they make Timothy and Titus to have been only ſome particular and occaſional Officers. But the Chriſtian Church preſerving theſe Epiſtles, as of conſtant and perpetual uſe, did thereby ſuppoſe the ſame kind of Office to continue, for the ſake whereof thoſe excellent Epiſtles were written: And we have no greater Aſſurance that theſe Epiſtles were written by St. Paul, than we have that there were Biſhops to ſucceed the Apoſtles in the Care and Government of Churches.

Having ſaid thus much to clear the Authority we act by, I now proceed to conſider the Rules by which we are to govern our ſelves.

Every Biſhop of this Church, in the time of his Conſecration, makes a ſolemn Profeſſion among other things, "That he will not only maintain and ſet forward, as much as lies in him, quietneſs, love and " peace among all Men; but that he will correct and puniſh ſuch as be " unquiet, diſobedient, and criminous within his Dioceſe, according to " ſuch Authority as he hath by God's Word, and to him ſhall be committed by the Ordinance of this Realm.

So that we have two Rules to proceed by, viz. The Word of God, and the Eccleſiaſtical Law of this Realm.

(1.) By the Word of God; and that requires from us, Diligence, and Care, and Faithfulneſs, and Impartiality, remembring the Account we muſt give, that we may do it with Joy and not with Grief. And we are not meerly required to correct and puniſh, but to warn and inſtruct, and exhort the Perſons under our Care, to do thoſe things which tend moſt to the Honour of our holy Religion, and the Church whereof we are Members. And for theſe Ends there are ſome things I ſhall more particularly recommend to you.

(1.) That you would often conſider the ſolemn Charge that was given you, and the Profeſſion you made of your Reſolution to do your Duty at your Ordination.

I find by the Provincial Conſtitution of this Church, that the Biſhops were to have their ſolemn Profeſſion read over to them twice in the Year, to put them in mind of their Duty. And in the Legatine Conſtitutions of Otho, (22 H. 3.) the ſame Conſtitution is renewed; not meerly by a Legatine Power, but by Conſent of the Archbiſhops and Biſhops of both Provinces; wherein it is declared, That Biſhops ought to viſit their Dioceſes at fit times, Correcting and Reforming what was amiſs, and ſowing the Word of Life in the Lord's Field; and to put them the more in mind of it, they were twice in the Year to have their ſolemn Profeſſion read to them. It ſeems then, That Profeſſion contained theſe things in it; or elſe the reading that could not ſtir them up to do theſe things. What the Profeſſion was which Presbyters then made at their Ordination, we have not ſo clear an Account, but in the ſame Council at Oxford, 8 H. 3. it is ſtrictly enjoined, That all Rectors and Vicars ſhould inſtruct the People committed to their Charge, and Feed them, Pabulo Verbi Dei, with the Food of God's Word; and it is introduced with that Expreſſion, that they might excite the Parochial Clergy to be more diligent in what was moſt proper for thoſe times. And if they do it not, they are there called Canes muti: and Lyndwood beſtows many other hard terms upon them, which I ſhall not mention; but he ſaith afterward, thoſe who do it not, are but like Idols, which bear the ſimilitude of a Man, but do not the Offices proper to Men. Nay, he goes ſo far as to ſay, That the Spiritual Food of God's Word is as neceſſary to the Health of the Soul, as Corporal Food is to the Health of the Body. Which Words are taken out of a Preface to a Canon in the Decretals de Officio Jud. Ordinarii, inter cætera. But they ſerve very well to ſhew how much even in the dark times of Popery, they were then convinced of the Neceſſity and Uſefulneſs of Preaching. Theſe Conſtitutions were ſlighted ſo much, that in 9 Edw. 1. the Office of Preaching was ſunk ſo low, that in a Provincial Conſtitution at that time, great Complaint is made of the Ignorance and Stupidity of the Parochial Clergy, that they rather made the People worſe than better. But at that time the Preaching Friars had got that Work into their Hands by particular Privileges, where it is well obſerved, That they did not go to Places which moſt needed their help, but to Cities and Corporations, where they found moſt Incouragement. But what Remedy was found by this Provincial Council? Truly, every Parochial Prieſt four times a Year was bound to read an Explication of the Creed, Ten Commandments, the two Precepts of Charity, the Seven Works of Mercy, the Seven deadly Sins, the Seven principal Vertues, and the Seven Sacraments. This was renewed in the Province of York, (which had diſtinct Provincial Conſtitutions) in the time of Edw. 4. And here was all they were bound to by theſe Conſtitutions.

But when Wickcliff and his Followers had awakened the People ſo far, that there was no ſatisfying them without Preaching, then a new Provincial Conſtitution was made under Arundel, Archbiſhop of Canterbury; and the former Conſtitution was reſtrained to Parochial Prieſts, who officiated as Curates; but ſeveral others were authorized to Preach; as (1.) The Mendicant Friars were ſaid to be authorized Jure communi, or rather Privilegio ſpeciali, (but therefore Lyndwood ſaith, it is ſaid to be Jure communi, becauſe that Privilege is recorded in the Text of the Canon Law) theſe were not only allowed to preach in their own Churches, but in Plateis publicis, ſaith Lyndwood, out of the Canon Law (wherein thoſe words were expreſſed) and at any hour, unleſs it were the time of preaching in other Churches; but other Orders, as Auguſtinians and Carmelites, had no ſuch general Licence. Thoſe Preaching Friars were a ſort of Licenſed Preachers at that time, who had no Cures of Souls; but they were then accounted a kind of Paſtors. For Jo. de Athon. diſtinguiſheth two ſorts of Paſtors; Thoſe who had Eccleſiaſtical Offices, and thoſe who had none, but were ſuch only Verbo & Exemplo; but they gave very great diſturbance to the Clergy, as the Pope himſelf confeſſes in the Canon Law. (2.) Legal Incumbents authorized to preach in their own Pariſhes Jure ſcripto. All Perſons who had Cures of Souls, and Legal Titles, were ſaid to be miſſi à Jure ad locum & populum curæ ſuæ, and therefore might preach to their own People without a ſpecial Licence; but if any one preached in other parts of the Dioceſs, or were a Stranger in it, then he was to be examined by the Dioceſan, and if he were found tam Moribus quam Scientia idoneus, he might ſend him to preach to one or more Pariſhes as he thought meet; and he was to ſhew his Licence to the Incumbent of the Place, before he was to be permitted to preach, under the Epiſcopal Seal. And thus, as far as I can find, the Matter ſtood as to Preaching, before the Reformation.

After it, when the Office of Ordination was reviewed and brought nearer to the Primitive Form; and inſtead of delivering the Chalice and Patten, with theſe Words, Accipe poteſtatem offerre Deo Sacrificium, &c. the Biſhop delivered the Bible with theſe words, Take thou Authority to Preach the Word of God, and to Miniſter the Holy Sacraments in the Congregation, &c. The Prieſts Exhortation was made agreeable thereto, wherein he exhorts the Perſons in the "Name of our Lord Jeſus "Chriſt, to conſider the Weight and Importance of the Office and "Charge they are called to; not barely to inſtruct thoſe who are already of Chriſt's Flock, but to endeavour the Salvation of thoſe who "are in the midſt of this naughty World. And therefore he perſwades "and charges them from a due regard to Chriſt, who ſuffered for his "Sheep, and to the Church of Chriſt, which is ſo dear to him, to omit no Labour, Care or Diligence in inſtructing, and reforming "thoſe who are committed to their Charge. And the better to enable them to perform theſe things, there are ſome Duties eſpecially "recommended to them, viz. Prayer, and Study of the Holy Scriptures, according to which they are to inſtruct others, and to order "their own Lives, and of thoſe who belong to them. And that they "might the better attend ſo great a Work, they are required to forſake "and ſet aſide (as much as they may) all worldly Cares and Studies, " and apply themſelves wholly to this one thing, that they may ſave " themſelves and them that hear them. After which follows the ſolemn Profeſſion, wherein they undertake to do theſe things.

This is that, my Brethren, which I earneſtly deſire of you, that you would often conſider. You are not at liberty now, whether you will do theſe things or not; for you are under a moſt ſolemn Engagement to it. You have put your Hands to the Plough, and it is too late to think of looking back; and you all know the Husbandman's Work is laborious and painful, and continually returning. It is poſſible after all his Pains, the Harveſt may not anſwer his Expectation; but yet if he neither Plows nor Sows, he can expect no Return; if he be idle and careleſs, and puts off the main of his Work to others, can he reaſonably look for the ſame Succeſs? Believe it, all our Pains are little enough to awake the ſleepy and ſecure Sinners, to inſtruct the Ignorant, to reclaim the Vitious, to rebuke the Profane, to convince the Erroneous, to ſatisfie the Doubtful, to confirm the Wavering, to recover the Lapſed, and to be uſeful to all, according to their ſeveral Circumſtances and Conditions. It is not to preach a Sermon or two in a Weeks time to your Pariſhioners, that is the main of your Duty; that is no ſuch difficult Task, if Men apply their minds as they ought to do to Divine Matters, and do not ſpend their Retirements in uſeleſs Studies; but the great Difficulty lies in Watching over your Flock, i. e. knowing their Condition, and applying your ſelves ſuitably to them. He that is a Stranger to his Flock, and only viſits them now and then, can never be ſaid to watch over it; he may watch over the Fleeces, but he underſtands little of the State of his Flock, viz. of the Diſtempers they are under, and the Remedies proper for them.

Non poteſt eſſe Paſtoris excuſatio, ſi lupus oves comedit, & Paſtor neſcit. Extr. de Reg. Juris c. 10.

The Caſuiſts ſay, That the Reaſon why there is no Command for Perſonal Reſidence in Scripture, is, becauſe the Nature of the Duty requires it; for if a Perſon be required to do ſuch things which cannot be done without it, Reſidence is implied. As a Pilot to a Ship, needs no Command to be in his Ship; for how can he do the Office of a Pilot out of it? Let none think to excuſe themſelves by ſaying, that our Church only takes them for Curates, and that the Biſhops have the Paſtoral Charge; for by our old Provincial Conſtitutions (which are ſtill in force ſo far as they are not repugnant to the Law of the Land) even thoſe who have the ſmalleſt Cures are called Paſtors; and Lyndwood there notes, that Parochialis Sacerdos dicitur Paſtor; and that not merely by way of Alluſion, but in reſpect of the Cure of Souls. But we need not go ſo far back. For what is it they are admitted to? Is it not ad curam Animarum? Did not they promiſe in their Ordination, To teach the People committed to their Care and Charge?

The Caſuiſts diſtinguiſh a three-fold Cure of Souls. 1. In foro interiori tantum, and this they ſay is the Parochial Cure. 2. In foro exteriori tantum, where there is Authority to perform Miniſterial Acts, as to ſuſpend, excommunicate, abſolve, (ſine Paſtorali Curâ:) and this Archdeacons have by Virtue of their Office. 3. In utroque ſimul, where there is a ſpecial Care, together with Juriſdiction: this is the Biſhops'. And every one of theſe, ſay they, ſecundum commune Jus Canonicum, is obliged to Reſidence, i. e. by the common Law Eccleſiaſtical; of which more afterwards. The Obligation is to perpetual Reſidence, but as it is in other poſitive Duties, there may other Duties intervene, which may take away the preſent force of it; as care of Health, neceſſary Buſineſs, publick Service of the King or Church, &c. But then we are to obſerve, that no Diſpenſation can juſtifie a Man in point of Conſcience, unleſs there be a ſufficient Cauſe; and no Cuſtom can be ſufficient againſt the natural Equity of the Caſe, whereby every one is bound from the Nature of the Office he hath undertaken.

Joh. Athon. ad Conſtit. Othon. f. 14. Reginald. ib. n. 53.

I confeſs the caſe in Reaſon is different, where there is a ſufficient Proviſion by another fit Perſon, and approved by thoſe who are to take care that Places be well ſupplied, and where there is not; but yet, this doth not take off the force of the Perſonal Obligation, ariſing from undertaking the Cure themſelves, which the Eccleſiaſtical Law underſtands to be, not meerly by Promiſe, but cum effectu, as the Canoniſts ſpeak; which implies perſonal Reſidence. Not that they are never to be away; Non ſic amare intelligi debet, ut nunquam inde recedat, ſaith Lyndwood; but theſe Words are to be underſtood civili modo, as he expreſſes it, i. e. not without great Reaſon. There muſt not be, ſaith he, callida Interpretatio, ſed talis ut ceſſent fraudes & negligentiæ, i. e. There muſt be no Art uſed to evade the Law, nor any groſs Neglect of it. It's true, the Canoniſts have diſtinguiſhed between Rectories and Vicarages, as to Perſonal Reſidence; but we are to conſider theſe things. 1. The Canon Law ſtrictly obliges every one that hath a Parochial Cure to perpetual Reſidence, and excepts only two Caſes, when the Living is annexed to a Prebend or Dignity; and then he who hath it, is to have a perpetual Vicar inſtituted, with a ſufficient Maintenance. 2. After this Liberty obtained for dignified Perſons to have Vicars endowed in their Places, the Point of Reſidence was ſtrictly enjoined to them: and we find in the Provincial Conſtitutions a Difference made between Perſonatus and Vicaria; but this was ſtill meant of a Vicarage endowed. This was in the time of Stephen Langton, Archbiſhop of Canterbury; and in another Conſtitution he required an Oath of Perſonal Reſidence from all ſuch Vicars, altho' the Place were not above the Value of Five Marks; which as appears by Lyndwood elſewhere, was then ſufficient for Maintenance and Hoſpitality. And to cover the ſhameful Diſpenſations that were commonly granted to the higher Clergy, under pretence of the Papal Power; the poor Vicars by a Conſtitution of Otho, were bound to take a ſtrict Oath of continual Reſidence; and without it their Inſtitution was declared to be Null. But even in that Caſe the Gloſs there ſaith, That they may be ſome time abſent for the Benefit of the Church or State; but not for their own particular Advantage. 3. The Obligation in point of Conſcience remains the ſame, but diſpenſing with Laws may take away the Penalty of Non-reſidence in ſome caſes. Joh. de Athon. Canon of Lincoln, who wrote the Gloſſes on the Legatine Conſtitutions, doth not deny, but that Rectors are as well bound to Reſidence as Vicars; but theſe are moſt ſtrictly tied by their Oath; and becauſe a Vicar cannot appoint a Vicar, but a Parſon may. And altho' that Name among ſome be uſed as a Term of Reproach, yet in former Ages Perſonatus and Dignitas were the ſame thing; and ſo uſed here in England in the time of Henry II. but afterwards it came to be applied to him that had the Poſſeſſion of a Parochial Benefice in his own immediate Right; and was therefore bound to take care of it. For the Obligation muſt in Reaſon be ſuppoſed to go along with the Advantage; however Local Statutes may have taken off the Penalty.

II. When you have thus conſidered the Obligation which lies upon you, to take Care of your Flock, let me in the next place recommend to you a plain, uſeful, and practical way of Preaching among them. I mean ſuch as is moſt likely to do good upon them, (which certainly ought to be the juſt Meaſure of Preaching.) I do not mean therefore a looſe and careleſs way of Talking in the Pulpit, which will neither profit you, nor thoſe that hear you. He that once gets an ill Habit of ſpeaking extempore, will be tempted to continue it by the Eaſineſs of it to himſelf, and the Plauſibleneſs of it to leſs judicious People. There is on the other ſide, a Cloſeneſs and Strength of Reaſoning, which is too elaborate for common Underſtandings; and there is an affected Fineneſs of Expreſſion, which by no means becomes the Pulpit; but it ſeems to be like ſtroaking the Conſciences of People by Feathers dipt in Oil. And there is a way of putting Scripture-Phraſes together without the Senſe of them, which thoſe are the moſt apt to admire, who underſtand them leaſt: But for thoſe who have not improved their Minds by Education, the plaineſt way is certainly the beſt and hardeſt, provided it be not flat, and dry, and incoherent, or deſultory, going from one thing to another, without purſuing any particular point home to Practice, and applying it to the Conſciences of the Hearers. And give me leave to tell you, That meer general Diſcourſes have commonly little Effect on the Peoples Minds; if any thing moves them, it is particular Application as to ſuch things which their Conſciences are concerned in.

And here I muſt recommend to you the purſuing the Deſign of his Majeſty's Letter, which hath been ſome time ſince communicated to you; by it you are required to preach at ſome times on thoſe particular Vices which you obſerve to be moſt prevalent in the Places you relate to; ſuch as Drunkenneſs, Whoredom, Swearing, Profaning the Lord's Day, &c. If ever we hope to reform them, you muſt throughly convince them, that what they do is diſpleaſing to God.

And there are two ſorts of Men you are to deal with.

1. Profane Scoffers at Religion. Theſe ſeldom trouble you; but if any good be to be done upon them, it is by plain and evident Proofs of the Good and Evil of Moral Actions. For as long as they think them indifferent, they will never regard what you ſay, as to the Rewards or Puniſhments of them.

2. Stupid and ſenſeleſs People, whoſe Minds are wholly ſunk into the Affairs of the World, buying, and ſelling, and getting Gain. It is a very hard thing to get a Thought into them about theſe Matters. And whatever you talk of meer Religion and another Life, is like Metaphyſicks to them; they underſtand you not, and take no care to do it: But if you can convince them, that they live in the Practice of great Sins, which they ſhall certainly ſuffer for, if they do not repent, they may poſſibly be awakened that way; if not, nothing but immediate Grace can work upon them, which muſt work on the Will, whatever becomes of the Underſtanding.

III. After Preaching, let me intreat you to look after Catechizing and inſtructing the Youth of your Pariſhes. He that would reform the World to purpoſe, muſt begin with the Youth, and train them up betimes in the Ways of Religion and Vertue. There is far leſs probability of prevailing on thoſe who have accuſtomed themſelves to vicious Habits, and are hardened in their Wickedneſs. It ſeems ſtrange to ſome, that conſidering the ſhortneſs of human Life, Mankind ſhould be ſo long before they come to Maturity; the beſt Account I know of it is, that there is ſo much longer time for the Care of their Education, to inſtil the Principles of Vertue and Religion into them, thereby to ſoften the Fierceneſs, to direct the Weakneſs, to govern the Inclinations of Mankind. It is truly a ſad Conſideration, that Chriſtian Parents are ſo little ſenſible of their Duties, as to the Education of their Children, when thoſe who have had only natural Reaſon to direct them, have laid ſo much Weight upon it. Without it, Plato ſaith, that Mankind grew the moſt unruly of all Creatures. Ariſtotle, That as by Nature they are capable of being the beſt, ſo being neglected, they become the worſt of Animals, i. e. when they are brought up without Vertue. Education and Vertue, ſaith he, is a great thing ; yea, it is all in all, and without it they will be much worſe than Beaſts. The main Care of the Education of Children muſt lie upon Parents ; but yet Miniſters ought not only to put them in mind of their Duty, but to aſſiſt them all they can, and by publick Catechizing, frequently to inſtruct both thoſe who have not learned, and thoſe who are aſhamed to learn any other way. And you muſt uſe the beſt means you can to bring them into an Eſteem of it ; which is by letting them ſee, that you do it, not meerly becauſe you are required to do it, but becauſe it is a thing ſo uſeful and beneficial to them and to their Children. There is a great deal of difference between Peoples being able to talk over a Set of Phraſes, about Religious Matters, and underſtanding the true Grounds of Religion, which are eaſieſt learned and underſtood, and remembred in the ſhort Catechetical way. But I am truly ſorry to hear, that where the Clergy are willing to take pains this way, the People are unwilling to ſend their Children. They would not be unwilling to hear them inſtructed, as early as might be, in the way to get an Eſtate, but would be very thankful to thoſe who would do them ſuch a Kindneſs ; and therefore it is really a Contempt of God and Religion, and another World, which makes them ſo backward to have their Children taught the way to it. And methinks thoſe who have any Zeal for the Reformation, ſhould love and purſue that which came into Requeſt with it. Indeed the Church of Rome it ſelf hath been made ſo ſenſible of the Neceſſity of it, that even the Council of Trent doth not only require Catechizing Children, but the Biſhops to proceed with Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures againſt thoſe who neglect it. But in the old Provincial Conſtitutions, I can find but one Injunction about Catechizing ; and that is when the Prieſt doubts whether the Children were baptized or not ; and if they be born eight days before Eaſter and Whitſontide, they are not to be baptized till thoſe days, and in the mean time they are to receive Catechiſm. What is this receiving Catechiſm by Children, before they are eight days old ? It is well Exorciſm is joined with it ; and ſo we are to underſtand by it the Interrogatories in Baptiſm: and Lyndwood ſaith, the Catechiſm is not only required for Inſtruction in Faith, but propter ſponſionem, when the God-father anſwers, De Fidei Obſervantiâ.

It is true, the Canon Law requires in adult Perſons Catechizing before Baptiſm ; but I find nothing of the Catechizing Children after it ; and no wonder, ſince Lyndwood ſaith, the Laity are bound to no more, than to believe as the Church believes ; nor the Clergy neither, unleſs they can bear the Charges of ſtudying, and have Maſters to inſtruct them. This was good Doctrine, when the Deſign was to keep People in Ignorance. For Learning is an irreconcilable Enemy to the Fundamental Policy of the Roman Church ; and it was that which brought in the Reformation, ſince ſince which a juſt Care hath ſtill been required for the Inſtruction of Youth; and the fifty ninth Canon of our Church is very ſtrict in it, which I deſire you often to conſider, with the firſt Rubrick after the Catechiſm, and to act accordingly.

IV. After Catechizing, I recommend to you the due Care of bringing the Children of your Pariſhes to Confirmation. Which would be of excellent uſe in the Church, if the ſeveral Miniſters would take that pains about it which they ought to do. Remember that you are required to bring or ſend in Writing, with your Names ſubſcribed, the Names of all ſuch Perſons in your Pariſh, as you ſhall think fit to be preſented to the Biſhop to be confirmed. If you take no care about it, and ſuffer them to come unprepared for ſo great, ſo ſolemn a thing, as renewing the Promiſe and Vow made in Baptiſm, can you think your ſelves free from any Guilt in it? In the Church of Rome indeed great care was taken to haſten Confirmation of Children all they could: Poſt Baptiſmum quam citius poterint, as it is in our Conſtitution Provincial; in another Synodical, the Parochial Prieſts are charged to tell their Pariſhioners, that they ought to get their Children confirmed as ſoon as they can. In a Synod at Worceſter, under Walter de Cantilupo, in the time of Henry III. the Sacrament of Confirmation is declared neceſſary for Strength againſt the Power of Darkneſs, and therefore it was called Sacramentum Pugnantium: And no wonder then that the Parochial Prieſts ſhould be called upon ſo earneſtly to bring the Children to Confirmation; and the Parents were to be forbidden to enter into the Church, if they neglected it for a Year after the Birth of the Child, if they had opportunity. The Synod of Exeter allowed two Years; and then if they were not confirmed, the Parents were to faſt every Friday, with Bread and Water, till it were done. And to the ſame purpoſe, the Synod of Wincheſter, in the time of Edw. I. in the Conſtitutions of Richard Biſhop of Sarum, two Years were allowed; but that time was afterwards thought too long; and then the Prieſt as well as the Parents was to be ſuſpended from Entrance into the Church. But what preparation was required? None that I can find: But great Care is taken about the Fillets to bind their Heads to receive the Unction, and the taking them off at the Font, and burning them, leſt they ſhould be uſed for Witchcraft, as Lyndwood informs us. But we have no ſuch Cuſtoms, nor any of the Reformed Churches: We depend not upon the Opus operatum, but ſuppoſe a due and ſerious preparation of Mind neceſſary, and a ſolemn Performance of it. I hope, by God's Aſſiſtance, to be able in time to bring the Performance of this Office into a better Method; in the mean time I ſhall not fail doing my Duty, have you a care you do not fail in yours.

V. As to the Publick Offices of the Church, I do not only recommend to you a due Care of the Diligent, but of the Devout Performance of them. I have often wondered how a fixed and ſtated Liturgy for general Uſe, ſhould become a matter of Scruple and Diſpute among any in a Chriſtian Church, unleſs there be ſomething in Chriſtianity which makes it unlawful to pray together for things which we all underſtand beforehand to be the Subject of our Prayers. If our common Neceſſities and Duties are the ſame; if we have the ſame Bleſſings to pray, and to thank God for in our ſolemn Devotions, why ſhould any think it unlawful or unfitting to uſe the ſame Expreſſions? Is God pleaſed with the Change of our Words and Phraſes? Can we imagine the Holy Spirit is given to dictate new Expreſſions in Prayers? Then they muſt pray by immediate Inſpiration, (which I think they will not pretend to, leſt all the Miſtakes and Incongruities of ſuch Prayers be imputed to the Holy Ghoſt) but if not, then they are left to their own Conceptions, and the Spirit's Aſſiſtance is only in the exciting the Affections and Motions of the Soul towards the things prayed for; and if this be allowed, it is impoſſible to give a Reaſon why the Spirit of God may not as well excite thoſe inward Deſires, when the Words are the ſame as when they are different. And we are certain, that from the Apoſtles times downwards, no one Church or Society of Chriſtians can be produced, who held it unlawful to pray by a Set-Form. On the other ſide, we have very early Proofs of ſome common Forms of Prayer, which were generally uſed in the Chriſtian Churches, and were the Foundations of thoſe ancient Liturgies, which, by degrees, were much enlarged. And the Interpolations of later times do no more overthrow the Antiquity of the Groundwork of them, than the large Additions to a Building do prove there was no Houſe before. It is an eaſy matter to ſay, that ſuch Liturgies could not be St. James's or St. Mark's, becauſe of ſuch Errors and Miſtakes, and Interpolations of Things and Phraſes of later times; but what then? Is this an Argument there were no ancient Liturgies in the Churches of Jeruſalem and Alexandria, when ſo long ſince, as in Origen's time, we find an entire Collect produced by him out of the Alexandrian Liturgy? And the like may be ſhewed as to other Churches, which by degrees came to have their Liturgies much enlarged by the devout Prayers of ſome extraordinary Men; ſuch as St. Baſil and St. Chryſoſtom in the Eaſtern Churches.

But my Deſign is not to vindicate our uſe of an excellent Liturgy, but to put you upon the uſing it in ſuch a manner, as may moſt recommend it to the People; I mean with that Gravity, Seriouſneſs, Attention and Devotion, which becomes ſo ſolemn a Duty as Prayer to God is. It will give too juſt a cauſe of Prejudice to our Prayers, if the People obſerve you to be careleſs and negligent about them; or to run them over with ſo great haſt, as if you minded nothing ſo much as to get to the end of them. If you mind them ſo little your ſelves, they will think themſelves excuſed if they mind them leſs. I could heartily wiſh that in greater Places, eſpecially in ſuch Towns where there are People more at liberty, the conſtant Morning and Evening Prayers were duly and devoutly read, as it is already done with good Succeſs in London, and ſome other Cities. By this means Religion will gain ground, when the publick Offices are daily performed; and the People will be more acquainted with Scripture, in hearing the Leſſons; and have a better eſteem of the Prayers, when they become their daily Service, which they offer up to God as their Morning and Evening Sacrifice; and the Deſign of our Church will be beſt anſwered, which appoints the Order for Morning and Evening Prayer daily to be ſaid and uſed throughout the Year.

VI. As to the Diſſenters from the Church; the preſent Circumſtances of our Affairs require a more than ordinary Prudence in your Behaviour towards them. It is to no purpoſe to provoke or exaſperate them, ſince they will be but ſo much more your Enemies for it; and if you ſeem to court them too much, they will interpret your Kindneſs to be a liking their Way better than your own; ſo that were it not for ſome Worldly Intereſt, you would be juſt what they are; which is in effect to ſay, you would be Men of Conſcience, if ye had a little more Honeſty. For they can never think thoſe honeſt Men, who comply with things againſt their Conſciences, only for their temporal Advantage; but they may like them as Men of a Party, who under ſome ſpecious Colours, promote their Intereſt. For my own part, as I do ſincerely value and eſteem the Church of England (and I hope ever ſhall) ſo I am not againſt ſuch a due temper towards them, as is conſiſtent with the preſerving the Conſtitution of our Church. But if any think, under a pretence of Liberty, to undermine and deſtroy it, we have Reaſon to take the beſt care we can, in order to its preſervation. I do not mean by oppoſing Laws, or affronting Authority, but by countermining them in the beſt way, i. e. by out-doing them in thoſe things which make them moſt popular, if they are conſiſtent with Integrity and a good Conſcience. If they gain upon the People by an Appearance of more than ordinary Zeal for the good of Souls, I would have you to go beyond them in a true and hearty Concernment for them; not in irregular Heats and Paſſions, but in the Meekneſs of Wiſdom, in a calm and ſedate Temper; in doing good even to them who moſt deſpitefully reproach you, and withdraw themſelves and the People from you. If they get an Intereſt among them by Induſtry, and going from Place to Place, and Family to Family; I hope you will think it your Duty to converſe more freely and familiarly with your own People. Be not Strangers, and you will make them Friends. Let them ſee by your particular Application to them, that you do not deſpiſe them. For Men love to value thoſe who ſeem to value them; and if you once ſlight them, you run the hazard of making them your Enemies. It is ſome Trial of a Chriſtians Patience, as well as Humility, to condeſcend to the Weakneſſes of others; but where it is our Duty, we muſt do it, and that chearfully, in order to the beſt End, viz. doing the more good upon them. And all Condeſcenſion and Kindneſs for ſuch an End, is true Wiſdom as well as Humility. I am afraid Diſtance and too great Stiffneſs of Behaviour towards them, have made ſome more our Enemies than they would have been. I hope they are now convinced, that the Perſecution which they complained lately ſo much of, was carried on by other Men, and for other Deſigns than they would then ſeem to believe. But that Perſecution was then a popular Argument for them; for the complaining ſide hath always the moſt Pity. But now that is taken off, you may deal with them on more equal Terms. Now there is nothing to affright them, and we think we have Reaſon enough on our ſide to perſwade them. The Caſe of Separation ſtands juſt as it did in Point of Conſcience, which is not now one jot more reaſonable or juſt than it was before. Some think Severity makes Men conſider; but I am afraid it heats them too much, and makes them too violent and refractary. You have more reaſon to fear now, what the Intereſt of a Party will do, than any Strength of Argument. How very few among them underſtand any Reaſon at all for their Separation! But Education, Prejudice, Authority of their Teachers ſway them; remove theſe, and you convince them. And in order thereto, acquaint your ſelves with them, endeavour to oblige them, let them ſee you have no other Deſign upon them, but to do them good; if any thing will gain upon them, this will.

But if after all, they grow more headſtrong and inſolent by the Indulgence which the Law gives them; then obſerve, whether they obſerve thoſe Conditions on which the Law gives it to them. For theſe are known Rules in Law, That he forfeits his Privilege who goes beyond the Bounds of it; That no Privileges are to be extended beyond the Bounds which the Laws give them; for they ought to be obſerved as they are given. I leave it to be conſidered, whether all ſuch who do not obſerve the Conditions of the Indulgence, be not as liable to the Law, as if they had none.

But there is a very profane Abuſe of this Liberty among ſome, as though it were an Indulgence not to ſerve God at all. Such as theſe, as they were never intended by the Law, ſo they ought to enjoy no Benefit by it: For this were to countenance Profaneneſs and Irreligion, which I am afraid, will grow too much upon us, unleſs ſome effectual Care be taken to ſuppreſs it.

VII. There is another Duty incumbent upon you, which I muſt particularly recommend to your Care, and that is, of Viſiting the Sick. I do not mean barely to perform the Office preſcribed, which is of very good Uſe, and ought not to be neglected; but a particular Application of your ſelves to the State and Condition of the Perſons you viſit. It is no hard matter to run over ſome Prayers, and ſo take leave; but this doth not come up to the Deſign of our Church in that Office. For after the general Exhortation and Profeſſion of the Chriſtian Faith, our Church requires, That the ſick Perſon be moved to make ſpecial Confeſſion of his Sins, if he feel his Conſcience troubled with any weighty matter; and then, if the ſick Perſon humbly and heartily deſires it, he is to be abſolved after this manner, Our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, who hath left Power in his Church to abſolve all Sinners who truly repent and believe in him, &c. Where the Power of Abſolution is grounded upon the Suppoſition of true Faith and Repentance; and therefore when it is ſaid afterwards, And by his Authority committed to me, I abſolve thee from the ſame, &c. It muſt proceed on the ſame Suppoſition. For the Church cannot abſolve when God doth not. So that all the real Comfort of the Abſolution depends upon the Satisfaction of the Perſon's Mind, as to the Sincerity of his Repentance and Faith in Chriſt. Now here lies the great Difficulty of this Office; how to give your ſelves and the wounded Conſcience ſatisfaction, as to the ſincerity of thoſe Acts; I do not mean as to the ſincerity of his preſent Thoughts, but as to the Acceptableneſs of his Faith and Repentance with God, in order to Remiſſion of Sins. But what if you find the Perſons ſo ignorant, as not to underſtand what Faith and Repentance mean? What if they have led ſuch careleſs and ſecure lives in this World, as hardly ever to have had one ſerious Thought of another? Is nothing to be done but to come and pray by them, and ſo diſmiſs them into their Eternal State? Is this all the good you can, or are bound to do them? I confeſs it is a very uncomfortable thing to tell Men how they are to begin to live, when they are liker to die than to live (and the People generally have a ſtrange ſuperſtitious Fear of ſending for the Miniſter, while there is any hope of Recovery.) But at laſt you are ſent for; and what a melancholy Work are you then to go about? You are, it may be, to make a Man ſenſible of his Sins, who never before conſidered what they were, or againſt whom they were committed, or what eternal Miſery he deſerves by committing them. But I will ſuppoſe the beſt I can in this Caſe, viz. That by your warm and ſerious Diſcourſe, you throughly awaken the Conſcience of a long and habitual Sinner; what are you then to do? Will you preſently apply all the Promiſes of Grace and Salvation to one whoſe Conſcience is awakened only with the Fears of Death, and the Terrors of a Day of Judgment? This, I confeſs, is a hard Caſe; on the one ſide, we muſt not diſcourage good Beginnings in any; we muſt not caſt an awakened Sinner into Deſpair; we muſt not limit the infinite Mercy of God: But on the other ſide, we muſt have a great care of incouraging preſumptuous Sinners to put off their Repentance to the laſt, becauſe then upon Confeſſion of their Sins, they can ſo eaſily obtain the Churches Abſolution; which goes no farther, than truly Repenting and Believing. But here is the difficulty, how we can ſatisfie our ſelves that theſe do truly Repent and Believe, who are out of a Capacity of giving Proof of their Sincerity by Amendment of Life? I do not queſtion the Sincerity of their preſent Purpoſes; but how often do we find thoſe to come to nothing, when they recover and fall into the former Temptations? How then ſhall they know their own Sincerity till it be tried? How can it be tried, when they are going out of the State of Trial? The moſt we can do, is to encourage them to do the beſt they can in their preſent Condition, and to ſhew as many of the Fruits of true Repentance as their Circumſtances will allow; and with the greateſt Humility of Mind, and moſt earneſt Supplications to implore the infinite Mercy of God to their Souls. But beſides theſe, there are many Caſes of ſick Perſons, which require very particular Advice, and ſpiritual Direction, which you ought to be able to give them, and it cannot be done without ſome good Meaſure of Skill and Experience in caſuiſtical Divinity. As, How to ſatisfie a doubting Conſcience, as to its own Sincerity, when ſo many Infirmities are mixed with our beſt Actions? How a Sinner who hath relapſed after Repentance, can be ſatisfied of the Truth of his Repentance, when he doth not know, but he may farther relapſe upon freſh Temptations? How he ſhall know what Failings are conſiſtent with the State of Grace, and the Hopes of Heaven, and what not? What Meaſure of Conviction and Power of Reſiſtance is neceſſary to make Sins to be wilful and preſumptuous? What the juſt Meaſures of Reſtitution are in order to true Repentance, in all ſuch Injuries which are capable of it? I might name many others, but theſe I only mention to ſhew how neceſſary it is for you to apply your ſelves to Moral and Caſuiſtical Divinity, and not to content your ſelves barely with the Knowledge of what is called Poſitive and Controverſial. I am afraid there are too many who think they need to look after no more than what qualifies them for the Pulpit; (and I wiſh all did take ſufficient care of that) but if we would do our Duty as we ought, we muſt inquire into, and be able to reſolve Caſes of Conſcience. For the Prieſt's Lips ſhould keep this kind of Knowledge; and the People ſhould ſeek the Law at his Mouth; for he is the Meſſenger of the Lord of Hoſts, Mal. 2. 7. If this held in the Levitical Prieſthood, much more certainly under the Goſpel, where the Rates and Meaſures of our Duties are not to be determined by Levitical Precepts, but by the general Reaſon and Nature of Moral Actions.

VIII. Among the Duties of Publick Worſhip, I muſt put you in mind of a frequent Celebration of the Lord's Supper. There is generally too great a Neglect of this, which is the moſt proper part of Evangelical Worſhip. The Duties of Prayers and Praiſes, are excellent and becoming ing Duties, as we are Creatures with reſpect to our Maker and Preſerver. The Duty of hearing the Word of God read and explained, is conſequent upon our owning it to be the Rule of our Faith and Manners; and all who deſire to underſtand and practiſe their Duty, can never deſpiſe or neglect it. But that ſolemn Act of Worſhip wherein we do moſt ſhew our ſelves Chriſtians, is the celebrating the Holy Euchariſt. For, therein we own and declare the infinite Love of God in ſending his Son into the World to die for Sinners, in order to their Salvation; and that this is not only a true Saying, but worthy of all Men to be credited. Therein, we lift up our Hearts, and give Thanks to our Lord God; we joyn with Angels and Archangels in lauding and magnifying his glorious Name. Therein, we not only commemorate the Death and Sufferings of our Lord, but are made Partakers of his Body and Blood, after a Real, but Sacramental Manner. Therein we offer up our ſelves to God, to be a Reaſonable, Holy and Lively Sacrifice unto him. Therein we Adore and Glorifie the ever Bleſſed Trinity; and humbly implore the Grace and Aſſiſtance of our ever Bleſſed Mediator. And what now is there in all this, which is not very agreeable to the Faith, Hope and Charity of Chriſtians? Nay, what Duty is there, which ſo much expreſſes all theſe together, as this doth? Nor, whereby we may more reaſonably expect greater Supplies of Divine Grace to be beſtowed upon us? What then makes ſo many to be ſo backward in this Duty, which profeſs a Zeal and Forwardneſs in many others? If we had that Warmth and Fervor of Devotion, that Love to Chriſt, and to each other, which the Primitive Chriſtians had, we ſhould make it as conſtant a part of our publick Worſhip, as they did; but this is not to be expected. Neither did it always continue in the Primitive Church, when Liberty, and Eaſe, and worldly Temptations made Perſons grow more remiſs and careleſs in the ſolemn Duties of their Religion.

In Hebr. Hom. 17. In Epheſ. Hom. 3.

St. Chryſoſtom takes notice in his time of the different Behaviour of Perſons, with reſpect to the Holy Euchariſt. There were ſome who pretended to greater Holineſs and Auſterity of Life than others, who withdrew from the common Converſation of Mankind, and ſo by degrees from joining in the Acts of publick Worſhip with them. Which did unſpeakable Miſchief to Chriſtianity; for then the Perfection of the Chriſtian Life, was not ſuppoſed to conſiſt in the active Part of it, but in Retirement and Contemplation. As tho' our higheſt Imitation of Chriſt lay in following him into the Wilderneſs to be tempted of the Devil; and not in walking as he walked, who frequented the Synagogues, and went about doing good.

But this way of Retirement happening to be admired by ſome great Men, the Publick Worſhip came to be in leſs eſteem; and others upon Reaſons of a different Nature, withdrew themſelves from ſuch Acts of Devotion as required a ſtricter Attendance, and a more prepared Temper of Mind. And there were ſome who did abſtain, becauſe they were not ſo well ſatisfied with themſelves as to their own Preparations; and ſuch as theſe St. Chryſoſtom ſeems to favour, rather than ſuch who came often without due care, as to the whole Courſe of their Lives; only out of cuſtom, or out of regard to the Orders of the Church. From hence many thought it better to forbear, as long as they did it not out of Contempt. And ſo by degrees the People were content to look on it as a Sacrifice for them to be performed by others, rather than as an Office, wherein they were to bear a part themſelves; at leaſt, they thought once or thrice a Year ſufficient for them. And to this, as, appears by our old Provincial Conſtitutions, they were forced by ſevere Canons.

When the Reformation began, this Diſuſe of this holy Sacrament was looked on, by the chief Reformers, as a great Abuſe and Corruption crept into the Church, which ought by all means to be reformed, and the frequent Celebration of it ſet up in the Reformed Churches. But unreaſonable Scruples in ſome, and Miſapprehenſions in others, and a general Coldneſs and Indifference, as to Matters of Religion, have hitherto hindered the reviving this primitive part of Devotion among us.

I do not go about to determine the Frequency in your Pariſhes, which the Scripture doth not as to the Chriſtian Church, but ſuppoſes it to be often done; but I may require you to take care that Chriſt's Inſtitution be obſerved among you, and that with your utmoſt Care, both as to the Decency and Purity of it.

Calv. Inſt. l. 4. c. 17. n. 44. Pet. Martyr. L. C. l. 4. c. 10. n. 48. In 1 Cor. 11. p. 55. Bucer in Matth. 16. p. 186.

The laſt thing I recommend to you all is, To have a great Care of your Converſations. I do not ſpeak it out of a diſtruſt of you; I hope you do it already; and your Caſe will be ſo much worſe, if you do it not, becauſe you very well know how much you ought to do it: For the Honour of God and Religion, and the Succeſs of your Miniſtry, as well as your own Salvation, depend very much upon it. Lead your Flock by your Example, as well as by your Doctrine, and then you may much better hope that they will follow you; for the People are naturally Spies upon their Miniſters, and if they obſerve them to mind nothing but the World all the Week, they will not believe them in earneſt, when on the Lord's Days they perſwade them againſt it. And it takes off the Weight of all Reproof of other Mens Faults, if thoſe they reprove have reaſon to believe them guilty of the ſame. I do not think it enough for a Preacher of Righteouſneſs merely to avoid open and ſcandalous Sins, but he ought to be a great Example to others in the moſt excellent Vertues which adorn our Profeſſion, not only in Temperance and Chaſtity, in Juſtice and ordinary Charity, but in a readineſs to do good to all, in forgiving Injuries, in loving Enemies, in evenneſs of Temper, in Humility and Meekneſs, and Patience, and Submiſſion to God's Will, and in frequent Retirements from the World, not merely for Study, but for Devotion. If by theſe and ſuch things you ſhine as Lights among your People, they will be more ready to follow your Conduct; and in probability you will not only ſtop their Mouths, but gain their Hearts. For among all the Ways of advancing the Credit and Intereſt of the Church of England, one of the moſt ſucceſsful will be the diligent Labours, and the exemplary Lives of the Clergy in it.

But if Men will not regard their own or the Churches Intereſt in this matter; if they will break their Rules in ſuch a manner, as to diſhonour God, and the Church, and themſelves by it; then you are to conſider the next thing I was to ſpeak to, which is,

II. What Authority is given to us for the puniſhing Offenders in our Dioceſſes by the Eccleſiaſtical Law of this Realm. For this we are to conſider, That our Authority herein is not derived from any modern Canons or Conſtitutions of this Church, (although due Regard ought to be ſhewed to them) but from the ancient Common Law Eccleſiaſtical in this Realm, which ſtill continues in force. For as there is a common Law with reſpect to Civil Rights, which depends not on the Feudal Conſtitutions, although in many things it be the ſame with them; but upon ancient Practice and general Conſent of the People from Age to Age. So, I ſay, there is a Common Law Eccleſiaſtical, which altho' in many things it may be the ſame with the Canon Law, which is read in the Books, yet it hath not its force from any Papal or Legatine Conſtitutions, but from the Acceptance and Practice of it in our Church. I could eaſily ſhew (if the time would permit) that Papal and Legatine Conſtitutions were not received here, although directed hither; that 2 Inſt. 632. ſome Provincial Conſtitutions never obtained the Force of Eccleſiaſtical Laws; but my buſineſs is to ſhew what did obtain and continue ſtill to have the Force of ſuch Eccleſiaſtical Laws among us.

By the Statute of 25 H. 8. c. 19. it is declared, "That ſuch Canons, Conſtitutions, Ordinances, and Synodals Provincial being already made, which be not contrariant nor repugnant to the Laws, Statutes, and Cuſtoms of this Realm, nor to the Damage or Hurt of the King's Prerogative Royal, ſhall now ſtill be uſed and executed as they were afore the making of this Act, &c. It's true, a Review was appointed, but ſuch Difficulties were found in it, as to the ſhaking the Foundations of the Eccleſiaſtical Law here, that nothing was ever legally eſtabliſhed in it, and therefore this Law is ſtill in force.

In the Statute 25 H. 8. c. 21. it is ſaid, "That this Realm recognizing no Superiour under God but the King, hath been and is free from ſubjection to any Man's Laws but only to ſuch as have been deviſed, made, and obſerved within this Realm, for the Wealth of the ſame; or ſuch other, as by the Sufferance of the King and his Progenitors, the People of this Realm have taken at their free Liberty, by their own Conſent to be uſed amongſt them, and have bound themſelves by long Uſe and Cuſtom to Obſervance of the ſame, not as to the Obſervance of the Laws of any Foreign Prince, Potentate, or Prelate, but as to the Cuſtoms and ancient Laws of this Realm originally eſtabliſhed as Laws of the ſame, by the ſaid Sufferance, Conſent, Cuſtom, and none otherwiſe.

All that I have now to do, is to ſhew what Authority the Biſhops had over the Clergy by the ancient Eccleſiaſtical Law of this Realm; and what Cenſures they were liable to for ſome particular Offences.

I. By the Eccleſiaſtical Law the Biſhop is Judge of the Fitneſs of any Clerk preſented to a Benefice. This is confeſſed by the Lord Coke in 2 Inſt. 632. theſe Words: And the Examination of the Ability and Sufficiency of the Perſon preſented belongs to the Biſhop, who is the Eccleſiaſtical Judge, and in the Examination he is a Judge, and not a Miniſter, and may and ought to refuſe the Perſon preſented, if he be not Perſona idonea. But this is plain to have been the ancient Eccleſiaſtical Law of this Realm, by the Articul. Cleri in Edw. II. time, De Idoneitate Perſonæ præſentatæ ad Beneficium Eccleſiaſticum pertinet Examinatio ad Judicem Eccleſiaſticum, & ita eſt hactenus uſitatum, & fiat in futurum.

Provinc. Conf. quum ſecund. f. 71. By the Provincial Conſtitutions at Oxford in the time of Hen. III. the Biſhop is required to admit the Clerk who is preſented, without Oppoſition, within two Months, dum tamen ideonus ſit, if he thinks him fit. So much time is allowed, propter Examinationem, ſaith Lyndwood, even when there is no Diſpute about Right of Patronage. The main thing he is to be examined upon, is his Ability to diſcharge his Paſtoral ral Duty, as Coke calls it; or as Lynwood ſaith, whether he be commendandus Scientia & Moribus. As to the former, the Biſhop may judge himſelf; but as to the latter, he muſt take the Teſtimonials of others; and I heartily wiſh the Clergy would be more careful in giving them, by looking on it as a Matter of Conſcience, and not merely of Civility; for otherwiſe it will be impoſſible to avoid the peſtering the Church with ſcandalous and ignorant Wretches. If the Biſhop refuſes to admit within the time (which by the Modern Canons is limited to twenty eight Days after the Preſentation delivered) he is liable to a Duplex Querela in the Eccleſiaſtical Courts, and a Quare impedit at Common Law; and then he muſt certifie the Reaſons of his Refuſal. In Specot's Caſe it is ſaid, That in 15 H. 7. 7, 8. all the Judges agreed, that the Biſhop is Judge in the Examination, and therefore the Law giveth Faith and Credit to his Judgment. But becauſe great Inconveniencies might otherwiſe happen, the general Allegation is not ſufficient, but he muſt certifie ſpecially and directly; and the general Rule is, and it was ſo reſolved by the Judges, That all ſuch as are ſufficient Cauſes of Deprivation of an Incumbent, are ſufficient Cauſes to refuſe a Preſentee. But by the Canon Law more are allowed. In the Conſtitutions of Othobon, the Biſhop is required particularly to enquire into the Life and Converſation of him that is preſented; and afterwards, that if a Biſhop admits another who is guilty of the ſame Fault for which he rejected the former, his Inſtitution is declared null and void. By the Canon Law, if a Biſhop maliciouſly refuſes to admit a fit Perſon, he is bound to provide another Benefice for him; but our Eccleſiaſtical Law much better puts him upon the Proof of the Cauſe of his Refuſal. But if the Biſhop doth not examine him, the Canoniſts ſay it is a Proof ſufficient that he did it malitioſé. If a Biſhop once rejects a Man for Inſufficiency, he cannot afterwards accept or admit of him; as was adjudged in the Biſhop of Hereford's Caſe. If a Man brings a Preſentation to a Benefice, the Biſhop is not barely to examine him as to Life and Abilities, but he muſt be ſatisfied that he is in Orders. How can he be ſatisfied, unleſs the other produce them? How can he produce them, when it may be they are loſt? What is to be done in this Caſe? The Canon is expreſs, That no Biſhop ſhall inſtitute any to a Benefice, who hath been Ordained by any other Biſhop, (for if he Ordained himſelf, he cannot after reject him, becauſe the Law ſuppoſes him to have examined and approved him) except he firſt ſhew unto him his Letters of Orders, and bring him a ſufficient Teſtimony of his former good Life and Behaviour, if the Biſhop ſhall require it; and laſtly, ſhall appear upon due Examination to be worthy of the Miniſtry. But yet in Palmes and the Biſhop of Peterborough's Caſe, it was adjudged, That no Lapſe did accrue by the Clerk's not ſhewing his Orders, for the Biſhop upon his not coming to him again, collated after ſix Months. But the Court agreed, That the Clerk ought to make Proof of his Orders; but they differed about the manner of their Proof. Anderſon ſaid, The Biſhop might give him his Oath. But if a Proof were neceſſary, and the Clerk did not come to make Proof, it ſeems to me to be a very hard Judgment.

II. The Biſhop by the Eccleſiaſtical Law, is to viſit his Dioceſs, and to take an account of the Clergy how they behave themſelves in the Duties of their Places. By the eldeſt Canons I can find, the Biſhop's Viſitation is ſuppoſed as a thing implied in his Office; whereby he is obliged to look after the good Eſtate of his whole Dioceſs, and eſpecially of the Clergy in it. In the time of Hubert Archbiſhop of Canterbury, in the beginning of King John's time, care is taken in the Canons then made, That Biſhops ſhould not be burdenſom to the Clergy in the Number of the Attendants in their Viſitations, which then were Parochial, and the Number allowed of Twenty or Thirty Horſe, was too heavy for the Clergy to bear. And therefore by degrees it was thought fit to turn that Charge into a Certainty, which was the Original of Procurations. By the Fourth Council of Toledo, the Biſhop was to viſit his whole Dioceſs, Parochially, every Year. The Gloſs ſaith, if there were occaſion for it; and that the Biſhop may viſit as often as he ſees cauſe; but if he be hindered, the Canon ſaith, he may ſend others (which is the Original of the Arch-Deacon's Viſitation) to ſee not only the Condition of the Churches, but the Lives of the Miniſters. The Council of Braga in the latter end of the ſixth Century, makes this the firſt Canon, That all Biſhops ſhould viſit their Dioceſſes by Pariſhes, and there ſhould firſt examine the Clergy, and then the People; and in another Canon he was required to receive only his Cathedraticum, i. e. a certain Sum in lieu of Entertainment; which came to be ſettled by Preſcription. The Council of Cavailon in France, A. D. 831, fixed no Sum, but deſired the Biſhops to be no Burdens to the Clergy in their parochial Viſitations. Lynwood ſaith, the ancient Procuration here, was a Day and Nights Entertainment; which after came to be a cuſtomary Payment: But however it was paid, it is an evident Proof of the Right of the Biſhops Viſitations by the ancient Eccleſiaſtical Law; and by ſuch a Cuſtom as is allowable by the Rules of our common Law.

III. There are ſome Faults which make the Clergy liable to Deprivation by virtue of the Eccleſiaſtical Law, which was here received. I ſhall name only ſome of them, and conclude; theſe being ſufficient for my preſent purpoſe.

I. Exceſſive Drinking. All drinking (ad Potus æquales) was abſolutely forbidden to Clergymen, on pain of Suſpenſion after Admonition; not only by a Synodical, but by a Provincial Conſtitution under Edmund, Archbiſhop of Canterbury. The Canon Law ſaith in that caſe, ab Officio vel Beneficio ſuſpendatur: But our Conſtitution is more ſevere, à Beneficio & Officio. The Council of Oxford not only ſtrictly forbids all Clergymen whatever tends to Gluttony and Drunkenneſs; but it requires the Biſhops to proceed ſtrictly againſt thoſe who are guilty, according to the Form of the General Council, i. e. the Lateran, 4. viz. by Admonition firſt, and then Suſpenſion. Lynwood complains, That this was not ſo much looked after as it ſhould be, becauſe it brought no Profit; I hope that Reaſon will not hold among thoſe who pretend to Reformation; which will be very defective, if it extend not to our Lives as well as our Doctrines: For there can be no greater Reproach than to ſee thoſe looſe and diſſolute in their Converſations, who think it their Honour to be Miniſters of a Reformed Church. It was a ſtinging Reflection upon our Church by the Archbiſhop of Spalato, (who was no very ſtrict Man himſelf) That he ſaw nothing Reformed among us but our Doctrines. I hope there was more of Satyr than of Truth in it; for I do not queſtion, but there were many then (as there are now) of Exemplary Lives, and unblameable Converſations; but if there be any others, it will be the more ſhame not to proceed againſt them; ſince even before the Reformation, the Canons were ſo ſtrict and ſevere in this matter. Richard, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, all Clergymen are forbidden going into Taverns to eat or drink, unleſs upon Travelling; and the Sanction of this Canon is, aut ceſſet, aut deponatur. The ſame was forbidden in the Council at York, in the time of Richard I. in the Council at London under Hubert, in the time of King John. And ſince the Reformation the ſame Canon is renewed, That no Eccleſiaſtical Perſons ſhall at any time, other than for their honeſt Neceſſities, reſort to any Taverns or Alehouſes. And there have been Inſtances of the Severity of our Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures againſt Drunkenneſs in Clergymen.

In 9 Jac. another was deprived for the ſame fault; and the Judges at Common Law allowed the Sentence to be good.

No doubt there are other Inſtances, but we had not known of theſe, if they had not been preſerved in Books of Reports.

Since the Reformation, we have Inſtances of Deprivation for Adultery in our Law Books, one 12 Eliz. another 16 Eliz. a third 27 Eliz. Theſe are enough to ſhew that the Eccleſiaſtical Law is allowed by the Judges of Common Law, to continue in ſufficient Force for Deprivation in this Caſe.

III. Simony. Which is the Name given by the Eccleſiaſtical Law, to all Contracts for Gain in the diſpoſing or obtaining any Eccleſiaſtical Promotion or Miniſtry. It is true, theſe do not come up to the very Sin of Simon Magus, which related to the immediate Gifts of the Holy Ghoſt; but becauſe the whole Miniſterial Office in all the parts of it (eſpecially the Cure of Souls) is of a Spiritual Nature; and all Bargains are ſo repugnant to the Deſign of it, therefore the Eccleſiaſtical Law hath fixed that deteſtable Name upon it: For, all Contractus non gratuiti in theſe things, ſavour of turpe Lucrum, and tend to bring in turpe Commercium into the Church; which would really overturn the whole Deſign of that Miniſtry, which was deſigned for the Salvation of Souls. And therefore it was neceſſary, that when Perſons had received (by the Favour of Temporal Princes and other Benefactors, who were Founders of Churches) ſuch Endowments as might encourage them in their Function, that ſevere Laws ſhould be made againſt any ſuch ſordid and miſchievous Contracts. And ſuch there were here in England long before the excellent Stat. of 31. Eliz. c. 6. although it ſeems the Force of them was ſo much worn out, as to make that Statute neceſſary for avoiding of Simony; which is there explained to be Corruption in beſtowing or getting Poſſeſſion of Promotions Eccleſiaſtical.

In a Council at London under Lanfranc, in the Conqueror's time, Simony was forbidden, under the Name of Buying and ſelling of Orders. And it could be nothing elſe before the Churches Revenue was ſettled: But in the time of Henry I. Eccleſiaſtical Benefices were forbidden to be bought or ſold, and it was Deprivation then to any Clergyman to be convicted of it; and a Layman was to be Out-lawed, and Excommunicated, and Deprived of his Right of Patronage. And this was done by a Provincial Synod of that time.

nage of that Church; and this was not meerly a Provincial Conſtitution, but two Kings were preſent (Hen. II. and his Son) and added their Authority to it. This was not depriving a Man of his Free-hold by a Canon, as a Learned Gentleman calls it; ſo here was the greateſt Authority, Temporal as well as Eccleſiaſtical, added to it.

But we are told, theſe Canons were of as little Effects as that of Othobon, which made all Simoniacal Contracts void; but ſome of the moſt judicious Lawyers have held, that Simony being contractus ex turpi causâ, is void of Parties.

IV. Dilapidations. By which the Eccleſiaſtical Law underſtands any conſiderable Impairing the Edifices, Woods, and Revenues belonging to Eccleſiaſtical Perſons, by Virtue of their Places. For it is the greateſt Intereſt and Concernment of the Church to have things preſerved for the good of Succeſſors; and it is a part of common Juſtice and Honeſty ſo to do. And the Lord Cooke poſitively affirms, That Delapidation is a good Cauſe of Deprivation. And it was ſo reſolved by the Judges in the Kings-Bench, 12 Jac. Not by Virtue of any new Law or Statute but by the old Eccleſiaſtical Law. For which Cooke refers to the Year-Books, which not only ſhew what the Eccleſiaſtical Law then was, but that it was allowed by the Common Law of England; and we are told, that is never given to change; but it may be forced to it by a New Law, which cannot be pretended in this caſe. And by the old Conſtitutions he received, the Biſhops are required to put the Clergy in mind of keeping their Houſes in ſufficient Reparations, and if they do it not within two Months, the Biſhop is to take care it be done out of the Profits of the Benefice. By the Injunctions of Ed. VI. and Queen Elizabeth, all Perſons having Eccleſiaſtical Benefices, are required to ſet apart the Fifth of their Revenue to repair their Houſes; and afterwards to maintain them in good Condition.

V. Pluralities. By the Eccleſiaſtical Law, which was here received, the actual receiving Inſtitution into a ſecond Benefice made the firſt void ipſo Jure; and if he ſought to keep both above a Month, the ſecond was void too. Lyndwood obſerves, that the Eccleſiaſtical Law had varied in this matter. And it proceeded by the Steps, (which are more than Lyndwood mentions.)

V. The

V. That by taking a ſecond, the firſt is void; which is the famous Canon of the Fourth Lateran Council. Ex. de Præb. c. de Multa.

VI. That if he were not contented with the laſt, but endeavour to keep both, he ſhould be deprived of both. And this was the Eccleſiaſtical Law as it was declared in our Provincial Conſtitutions. But the general Practice was to avoid the former according to the Lateran Council. Theſe were very ſevere Canons, but that one Clauſe of the Pope's Diſpenſing Power, made them to ſignifie little unleſs it were to advance his Power and Revenue. For when the Diſpenſing Power came to be owned, the Law had very little Force; eſpecially as to the Conſciences of Men. For if it were a Law of God, how could any man diſpenſe with it? Unleſs it were as apparent that he had given a Power in ſome Caſes to Diſpenſe, as that he had made the Law. Thoſe Caſuiſts are very hard put to it, who make Reſidence Jure Divino, and yet ſay the Pope may diſpenſe it; which at laſt comes only to this, That the Pope can authoritatively declare the ſufficiency of the Cauſe: So that the whole matter depends upon the Cauſe; whether there can be any ſufficient to excuſe from Perſonal Reſidence.

It is agreed on all hands, that the habitual Neglect of a Charge we have taken upon our ſelves, is an evil thing, and that it is ſo to heap up Preferments meerly for Riches, or Luxury, or Ambition; but the main Queſtion in point of Conſcience is, What is a ſufficient Cauſe to juſtifie any Man's breaking ſo reaſonable and juſt a Rule as that of Reſidence is.

It cannot be denied, that the eldeſt Canons of the Church were ſo ſtrict and ſevere, that they made it unlawful for any Man to go from that Church in which he firſt received Orders; as well as to take another Benefice in it: And ſo for any Biſhop to be tranſlated from that Place he was firſt Conſecrated to; as well as to hold another with it. But the Good of the Church being the main Foundation of all the Rules of it; when that might be better promoted by a Tranſlation, it was by a tacit Conſent looked on, as no unjuſt Violation of its Rules. The Queſtion then is, whether the Churches Benefit may not in ſome Caſes make the Canons againſt Non-Reſidence as Diſpenſible, as thoſe againſt Tranſlations? And the Reſolution of it doth not depend upon the voiding the particular Obligation of the Incumbent to his Cure; but upon ſome more general Reaſon with reſpect to the State of the Church; as being imployed in the Service of it, which requires a Perſons having (not a bare Competency for Subſiſtence, but) a Sufficiency to provide Neceſſaries for ſuch Service: For thoſe ſeem to have very little regard to the flouriſhing Condition of a Church, who would confine the Sufficiency of a Subſiſtence, meerly to the Neceſſaries of Life. But it ſeems to be reaſonable, that Clergymen ſhould have Incouragement ſufficient, not only to keep them above Contempt, but in ſome reſpect agreeable to the more ample Provifion of other Orders of Men. And by God's own Appointment the Tribe of Levi did not fall ſhort of any of the reſt, if it did not very much exceed the Proportion of others. We do not pretend to the Privileges they had, only we obſerve from thence, that God himſelf did appoint a plentiful Subſiſtence for thoſe who attended upon his Service. And I do not know what there is Levitical or Ceremonial in that. I am ſure the Duties of the Clergy now require a greater Freedom of Mind from the anxious Cares of the World, than the Imployments of the Prieſts and Levites under the Law. But we need not go ſo far back; if the Church enjoyed all her Revenues as entirely, as when the ſevere Canons againſt Pluralities were made, there would not be ſuch a Plea for them, as there is too much Cauſe for in ſome Places, from the Want of a competent Subſiſtence But ſince that time, the Abundance of Appropriations (ſince turned into Lay-Fees) hath extremely leſſened the Churches Revenues, and have left us a great Number of poor Vicarages, and Arbitrary Cures, which would hardly have afforded a Maintenance for the Nethinims under the Law, who were only to be Hewers of Wood, and Drawers of Water. But this doth not yet clear the Difficulty: For the Queſtion is, Whether the Subſiſtence of the Clergy can lawfully be improved by a Plurality of Livings? Truly, I think this (if it be allowed in ſome Caſes lawful) to be the leaſt deſirable way of any; but in ſome Circumſtances it is much more excuſable than in others; as, when the Benefices are mean, when they lie near each other, when great care is taken to put in ſufficient Curates with good Allowance; when Perſons take all Opportunities to do their Duties themſelves, and do not live at a diſtance from their Benefices in an idle and careleſs manner. But for Men to put in Curates merely to ſatisfy the Law, and to mind nothing of the Duties of their Places, is a horrible Scandal to Religion and our Church, and that, which if not amended, may juſtly bring down the Wrath of God upon us. For the looſeſt of all the Popiſh Caſuiſts look upon this as a very great Sin, even thoſe who attributed to the Pope the higheſt diſpenſing Power in this Caſe.

But when the great Liberty of Diſpenſing had made the Eccleſiaſtical Laws in great meaſure uſeleſs, then it was thought fit by our Law-makers to reſtrain and limit it by a Statate made 21 H. VIII. wherein it is enacted, “ That if any Perſon or Perſons having one Benefice with Cure of Souls, being of the yearly Value of eight Pounds or above, accept or take any other with Cure of Souls, and be inſtituted and inducted in Poſſeſſion of the ſame, that then and immediately after ſuch Poſſeſſion had thereof, the Benefice ſhall be adjudged to be void. And all Licences and Diſpenſations to the contrary are declared to be void and of none effect.

This, one would have thought, had been an effectual Remedy againſt all ſuch Pluralities and Diſpenſations to obtain them; and this, no doubt, was the primary Deſign of the Law; but then follow ſo many Proviſo's of qualified Men to get Diſpenſations, as take off a great deal of the Force and Effect of this Law. But then it ought well to be conſider'd, Whether ſuch a Licence being againſt the chief Deſign of a Law, can ſatisfy any Man in point of Conſcience, where there is not a juſt and ſufficient Cauſe? For if the Pope's Diſpenſation, with the ſuppoſed Plenitude of his Power, could not ſatisfy a Man's Conſcience without an antecedent Cauſe, as the Caſuiſts reſolve, much leſs can ſuch Proviſo's do it.

Leſſ. l. 2. c. 34. Dub. 27.

It is the general Opinion of Divines and Lawyers, ſaith Leſſius, That no Man is ſafe in Conſcience by the Pope's Diſpenſation for Pluralities, unleſs there be a juſt Cauſe for it.

Pan. c. dudum. 2. de Elect. Sylv. Benef. 4. Sum. Angel. Ben. 35.

No Man can with a ſafe Conſcience take a Diſpenſation from the Pope for more Benefices than one, merely for his own Advantage, ſaith Panormitan; and from him Sylveſter and Summ. Angelica.

A Diſpenſation, ſaith Cardinal Tolet, ſecures a Man as to the Law; but as to Conſcience there muſt be a good Cauſe for it; and that is, when the Church hath more Benefit by it, than it would have without it.

Tolet Summa Caſuum 5. c. 8.

But the Pope's Diſpenſing Power went much farther in point of Conſcience in their Opinion, than that which is ſettled among us by Act of Parliament; for it is expreſſed in the Statute of 21 Hen. VIII. That the Diſpenſation is intended to keep Men from incurring the Danger, Penalty, and Forfeiture in the Statute comprized. So that the moſt qualified Perſon can only ſay, that the Law doth not deprive him; but he can never plead that it can ſatisfy him in point of Conſcience, unleſs there be ſome Cauſe for it, which is of more Moment to the Church than a Mans ſole and conſtant Attendance on a particular Cure is. But this Statute is more favourable to the Clergy than the Canon Law was before, in two Particulars.

1. In declaring that no ſimple Benefices, or meer Dignities, as the Canoniſts call them, are comprehended under the Name of Benefices, having Cure of Souls, viz. no Deanary, Arch-deaconry, Chancellorſhip, Treaſurerſhip, Chanterſhip, or Prebend in any Cathedral or Collegiate Church, nor Parſonage that hath a Vicar endowed, nor any Benefice perpetually appropriate. But all theſe before were within the reach of the Canon Law, and a Diſpenſation was neceſſary for them: Which ſhews that this Law had a particular Reſpect to the neceſſary Attendance on Parochial Cures, and looked on other Dignities and Preferments in the Church, as a ſufficient Encouragement to extraordinary Merit.

2. That no notice is taken of Livings under the Valuation of 8 l. which, I ſuppoſe, is that of 20 E. 1. for that of H. 8. was not till five years after that Statute. But after that Valuation it was to be judged according to it, and not according to the real Value, as the Judges declared 12 Car. I. in the Caſe of Drake and Hill. Now here was a regard had to the Poorneſs of Benefices ſo far, that the Statute doth not deprive the Incumbent upon taking a ſecond Living, if the former be under 8 l. The Queſtion that ariſes from hence is, Whether ſuch Perſons are allowed to enjoy ſuch Pluralities by Law, or only left to the Eccleſiaſtical Law as it was before? It is certain, that ſuch are not liable to the Penalty of this Law; but before any Perſon might be deprived by the Eccleſiaſtical Law for taking a ſecond Benefice without Diſpenſation, of what Value ſoever the former were; now here comes a Statute, which enacts, That all who take a ſecond Benefice, having one of 8 l. without Qualification, ſhall loſe his legal Title to the firſt; but what if it be under? Shall he loſe it or not? Not by this Law. But ſuppoſe the Eccleſiaſtical Law before makes him liable to Deprivation; doth the Statute alter the Law without any Words to that purpoſe? The Biſhop had a Power before to deprive, where is it taken away? The Patron had a Right to preſent upon ſuch Deprivation; how comes he to loſe it? And I take it for granted, That no antecedent Rights are taken away by Implications, but there muſt be expreſs Clauſes to that purpoſe. So that I conclude, the ancient Eccleſiaſtical Law to be ſtill in Force, where it is not taken away by Statute.

C. 4. 75. Holand's Caſe.

And thus, my Brethren, I have laid before you the Authority and the Rules we are to act by; I have endeavoured to recommend to you the moſt uſeful parts of your Duty, and I hope you will not give me occaſion to ſhew what Power we have by the Eccleſiaſtical Law of this Realm to proceed againſt Offenders. Nothing will be more uneaſy to me, than to be forced to make uſe of any Severity againſt you. And my Hearts deſire is, That we may all ſincerely and faithfully diſcharge the Duties of our ſeveral Places, that the Bleſſing of God may be upon us all; ſo that we may ſave our ſelves, and thoſe committed to our Charge.

OF THE NATURE of the TRUST Committed to
The Parochial Clergy

At a Viſitation at Worceſter, October 21th. 1696.

My Brethren,

I Have formerly, on the like Occaſion, diſcourſed to you of the General Duties of your Function, and the Obligation you are under to perform them; and therefore I ſhall now confine my Diſcourſe to theſe Two things:

I. To conſider the particular Nature of the Truſt committed to you.

II. The Obligation you are under to your Parochial Cures.

I. The firſt is neceſſary to be ſpoken to; for while Perſons have only ſo confuſed and cloudy Apprehenſions concerning it, they can neither be ſatisfied in the Nature of their Duties, nor in their Performance of them. And there is danger as well in ſetting them ſo high as to make them Impracticable, as in ſinking them ſo low as to make, not only themſelves, but their Profeſſion Contemptible. For the World (let us ſay what we will) will always eſteem Men, not meerly for a Name and Profeſſion, but for the Work and Service which they do. There is, no doubt, a Reverence and Reſpect due to a Sacred Function on its own Account; but the higheſt Profeſſion can never maintain its Character among the reſt of Mankind, unleſs they who are of it, do promote the General Good, by acting ſuitably to it. And the greater the Character is, which any bear, the higher will the Expectations of others be concerning them; and if they fail in the greateſt and moſt uſeful Duties of their Function, it will be impoſſible to keep up the Regard which ought to be ſhew'd unto it. We may complain as long as we pleaſe of the Unreaſonableneſs of the Contempt of the Clergy in our Days, (which is too general, and too far ſpread) but the moſt effectual Means to prevent or remove it, is for the Clergy to apply themſelves to the moſt neceſſary Duties, with Reſpect to the Charge and Truſt committed to them.

But here ariſes a conſiderable Difficulty, which deſerves to be cleared; viz. concerning the juſt Meaſures of that Diligence which is required. For, there are ſome who will never be ſatiſfied that the Clergy do enough, let them do what they can; and it is to no purpoſe to think to ſatisfie them who are reſolved not to be ſatisfied: But on the other ſide, ſome care not how little they do, and the leſs, the better they are pleaſed with them; and others again, have raiſed their Duties ſo high, that ſcarce any Man can ſatisfie himſelf that he hath done his Duty.

It is a matter therefore of the higheſt Conſequence to us, to underſtand, What Rule and Meaſure is to be obſerved, ſo as we may neither wilfully neglect our Duty, nor deſpair of doing it.

Here we are to conſider two Things;

1. How far the Scripture hath determined it.

2. What Influence the Conſtitution of our Church is to have upon us concerning it.

1. The Scripture doth ſpeak ſomething relating to it, both in the Old and New Teſtament.

In the Old Teſtament we have the Duties enjoyned to the Levitical Prieſthood, and the extraordinary Commiſſions given to the Prophets.

As to the Levitical Prieſthood, we can only draw ſome general Inſtructions, which may be of uſe, altho' that Prieſthood hath been long ſince at an end; Chriſt being our High-Prieſt after another Order, viz. of Melchiſedeck; and our Duty now is to obſerve his Laws, and to offer that Reaſonable Service which he requires.

But even from the Levitical Prieſthood, we may obſerve theſe things.

1. That although the main of their Duty of Attendance reſpected the Temple and Sacrifices; yet at other times they were bound to inſtruct the People in the Law. For ſo Moſes leaves it as a ſpecial Charge to the Tribe of Levi, to teach Jacob his Judgments, and Iſrael his Law. Deut. 33. 10. Levit. 10. 11. And to encourage them to do it, they had a liberal Maintenance, far above the Proportion of the other Tribes. For by Computation it will be found, that they were not much above the 60th part of the People; for when the other Tribes were numbred from twenty years old, they made ſix hundred thouſand, and three thouſand five hundred and fifty. Num. 1. 3, 46. But the Children of Levi were reckoned by themſelves from a Month old; and they made but two and twenty thouſand; 3. 15. 39. ſo that if the Males of the other Tribes had been reckoned, as they were, it is agreed by Learned Men, who had no Fondneſs for the Clergy, that they did not make above a fiftieth or ſixtieth part; Selden's Review, p. 450. and yet they had near a fifth of the Profits, beſides accidental Perquiſites, as to Sacrifices, and Ranſoms of the Firſt-born. Thus, ſay they, God was pleaſed to enrich that Tribe which was devoted to his Service. But it was not certainly, that they ſhould ſpend their time in Idleneſs and Luxury, but that they might with the greater freedom apply themſelves to the Study of the Law, that they might inſtruct the People. For the Cities of the Levites were as ſo many Colleges diſperſed up and down in the ſeveral Tribes, to which the People might upon occaſion, more eaſily reſort.

2. That if the People erred thro' Ignorance of the Law, God himſelf laid the Blame on thoſe who were bound to inſtruct them. My People, Hoſea 4. 6. ſaith God by the Prophet, are deſtroyed for lack of Knowledge. If People are reſolved to be ignorant, who can help it? Had they not the Law to inform them? But it is obſervable, that the Peoples Errors are laid to the Charge of the Prieſts, and the Puniſhment is denounced againſt them. Becauſe thou haſt rejected Knowledge, I will alſo reject thee, that thou ſhalt be no Prieſt unto me. It ſeems the Prieſts were grown careleſs and negligent, as to their own Improvements; they did not know to what purpoſe they ſhould take ſo much pains in ſtudying the Law, and the difficult Points of it; they were for a freedom of Converſation, and hoped to keep up their Intereſt among the People that Iſa. 56.11. Way. Therefore Iſaiah calls them Shepherds that cannot underſtand; but were very intent upon their Profits, they all look to their own Way, every one for his Gain from his Quarter. But this was not all, for the Prophet charges them with a Voluptuous Careleſs, Diſſolute Life. Come 12. ye, ſay they, I will fetch Wine, and we will fill our ſelves with ſtrong Drink, and to morrow ſhall be as this day, and much more abundant. Was not this a very agreeable life for thoſe who were to inſtruct the People in the Duties of Sobriety and Temperance? It was Death for the Prieſts by Lev. 10. 8, 9. the Law to Drink Wine or ſtrong Drink, when they went into the Tabernacle of the Congregation; and the Reaſon given is, 10. That ye may put a difference between holy and unholy, and between unclean and clean; 11. and that ye may teach the Children of Iſrael all the Statutes, which the Lord hath ſpoken to thee by the Hand of Moſes. Which implies, That thoſe who are given to drinking Wine or ſtrong Drink, are very unfit to inſtruct others in the Law of God. And God looked on them as ſuch a Diſhonour to his Worſhip, that he threatens immediate Death to them that approached to his Altar, when they had drank Wine; and the Jews ſay, that was the Reaſon why Nadab and Abihu were deſtroyed. And Lev. 10.3. then God ſaid, I will be ſanctified in them that come nigh me. All Nations have abhorred ſottiſh and drunken Prieſts, as moſt unfit to approach to God when they were not themſelves; or to offer Sacrifices for others, when they made Beaſts of themſelves. But this was not all; for God required from them who were to teach others the Law, that they ſhould be always in a Capacity of underſtanding and practiſing it themſelves.

But if we proceed to the Prophets, nothing can be more dreadful, Ezek. 3. 18, 20. 33. 7. than what God ſaith to Ezekiel, That if he did not warn the People as he commanded them, their Blood will I require at thy hand. Is this Charge now lying upon every one of you, as to every Perſon under your Care? Who would not rather run into a Wilderneſs, or hide himſelf in a Cave, than take ſuch a Charge upon him?

But we muſt diſtinguiſh what was peculiar to the Prophet's immediate Commiſſion to go to any particular Perſon in God's Name, from a General Charge to inform Perſons in their Duties, and to tell them the Danger of continuing in their Sins. If any fail for want of Information, when you are bound to give it, the Neglect muſt fall heavy, and therefore you are bound to take all juſt Opportunities in publick and private to inform thoſe under your Care of ſuch Sins as you know them to be guilty of; not with a Deſign to upbraid, but to reform them.

1 Pet. 5. 2, 3. In the New Teſtament the Charge is General to feed the Flock of God; and to do it willingly, not for filthy Lucre, but of a ready mind; and to be Examples to the Flock. But St. Peter, who gives this Advice, doth not determine who belong to the Flock; nor within what Bounds it is to be limited; and there were many Flocks in the Jewiſh Diſperſion, and many Elders ſcattered up and down among them in Pontus, Aſia, Galatia, Cap-

Cappadocia, and Bithynia; ſo that here we have only general and excellent Advice for ſuch who had care of the ſeveral Flocks, to carry themſelves towards them with great Humility and Tenderneſs, with Charity and Goodneſs, as thoſe that made it their buſineſs to do good among them, and conduct them in the Way to Heaven.

St. Paul, in his Charge to thoſe whom he ſent for to Miletus, tells them, That they muſt take heed to themſelves, and to all the Flock, over which the Holy Ghoſt hath made them Over-ſeers, to feed the Church of Acts 20. 28. God, which he hath purchaſed with his own Blood. It's poſſible here might be a particular Deſignation of the Flock they were to overſee, by the Direction of the Holy Ghoſt; but yet the Charge is general to take heed to themſelves and to the Flock, and to promote the good of the Church of God, which Chriſt hath purchaſed with his own Blood. Which are the moſt weighty Conſiderations in the World to excite us to the utmoſt Care and Diligence in Diſcharge of our Duties.

In the Epiſtle to the Theſſalonians they are ſaid to be over them in the 1 Theſſ. 5. 12. Lord, and to admoniſh them. In that to the Hebrews, to watch for their Heb. 13. 17. Souls, as they that muſt give an account. No doubt, very great Care and Wathfulneſs is required in all that take ſo great and ſolemn an Office upon them; but where are the Bounds and Limits ſet, as to the People, and Nature of the Duties required from them? Muſt every Man be left to his own Conſcience and Judgment, what, and how far he is to go? Or can we ſuppoſe all Men equally careful of doing their Duties, if no particular Obligation be laid upon them? Some of the Eloquent Fathers of the Church, as St. Chryſoſtom, St. Jerom, St. Gregory Nazianzen, and others, have allowed themſelves ſo much in the Flights of Fancy, and Figures of ſpeaking about the Height and Dignity of the Sacred Function, as if they had a mind to diſcourage all Men of modeſt and humble Diſpoſitions from undertaking it. I do not wonder that they ran into Solitudes, and withdrew from the World upon it; but I do wonder how they came from thence and undertook the ſame Charge afterwards, without giving an anſwer to their own Arguments. For the World remained juſt as it was when they left it. Mankind were ſtill as impatient of being governed, or told of their Faults, as fickle and humourſome, as prone to evil, and untractable to Good, as it was before. And could they hope it would ever mend by their running away from it? Or, was their Duty become more eaſie by declining it; I think it was very well for the Church of God, that, notwithſtanding their own many Arguments, they took the Sacred Office upon them at laſt, and did God and the Church good Service in it. But if Men were to judge by their Writings upon this Argument, one would think none but thoſe who had a mind to be damned, would undertake it. And their great Strains of Wit and Eloquence, if they had any Force, would keep the beſt Men out of the Church, who were moſt likely to do God Service in it; and we need no other Inſtances than theſe very Perſons themſelves. And if all good, and humble, and conſcientious Men ſhould for the ſake of the Hardneſs of the Work, decline the Church's Service, and take any other lawful Imployment, what would become of the Church of God? For none that had, or intended to keep a good Conſcience, could undertake the Cure of Souls; and ſo they muſt be left to ſuch as had no Regard to their own; but were either ignorant, ſtupid and ſenſeleſs Creatures, or ſuch as regarded not their own Salvation, who durſt undertake ſuch a Task, as would not only add to their own Guilt, but bring the heavy Load of other Men's Faults upon them too.

What is now to be done in this Caſe? Hath God really impoſed ſuch a Task upon all thoſe who enter into this Sacred Function, that it it is morally impoſſible for an honeſt Man to diſcharge it with a good Conſcience? How then can any ſuch undertake it? But if it may be done, what are thoſe Bounds and Rules we are to obſerve, ſo as a good Man may ſatisfie himſelf in a competent Meaſure, that he hath done his Duty?

II. And this is that which I ſhall now endeavour to clear. For every one who is in Orders hath a double Capacity: One with Reſpect to the Church of God in general; another to that particular Flock which is allotted to him, by the Conſtitution of this Church, and the Law of the Land. For although the Nature of our Duty in general be determined by the Word of God, as I have already ſhewed, yet the particular Obligation of every one to his own Flock, is according to that Power and Authority, which by the Rules and Orders of this Church is committed to him, and is fully expreſſed in the Office of Ordination. By which it plainly appears, that the Care of Souls committed to Perſons among us, is not an abſolute, indefinite, and unaccountable thing; but is limited, as to Place, Perſons, and Duties, which are incumbent upon them. They are to teach the People committed to their Charge; By whom? By the Biſhop when he gives Inſtitution.

They are to give private as well as publick Monitions and Exhortations, as well to the ſick, as to the whole: What, to all? No, but to thoſe within their Cure.

They are to baniſh erroneous Doctrines, and to promote Peace and Love, eſpecially among them committed to their Charge.

And laſt of all, they are to obey thoſe who have the Charge and Government over them.

Theſe things are ſo expreſs and plain in the very Conſtitution of this Church, and owned ſo ſolemnly by every one that enters into Orders, that there can be no Diſpute concerning them.

And from thence we obſerve ſeveral things that tend to the Reſolution of the main Point, as to the Satisfaction of doing your Duties, as Incumbents on your ſeveral Places.

Ad probandam Eccleſiam Parochialem, primo eſt neceſſe quod habeat locum certis finibus conſtitutum in quo degat populus illi Eccleſiæ deputatus. Rebuff. ad Concord. de Collat. Sect. Stat. n. 2.

I. That it is a Cure of Souls limited as to Perſons and Place, i. e. within ſuch a Precinct as is called a Pariſh.

II. That it is limited as to Power, with Reſpect to Diſcipline.

Therefore I ſhall endeavour to clear theſe two Things:

I. What the juſt Bounds and limits of Parochial Cures are.

II. What is the Meaſure of that Diligence which is required within thoſe Bounds.

As to the former, we are to begin with the Limitation as to Place.

I. That it is a Cure of Souls limited within certain Bounds which are called Pariſhes, which are now certainly known by long Uſage and Cuſtom, and ought ſtill to be preſerved with great care; for otherwiſe Confuſion and Diſputes will ariſe between ſeveral Miniſters, and ſeveral Pariſhes with one another. For ſince the Duties and the Profits are both limited, it is neceſſary that thoſe Bounds ſhould be carefully preſerved, as they generally are by Annual Perambulations.

But there are ſome who will underſtand nothing of this bounding of Miniſterial Duties by diſtinct Pariſhes, who think they are at liberty to exerciſe their Gifts where-ever they are called; and that it were better that theſe Parochial Incloſures were thrown open, and all left at liberty to chuſe ſuch whom they liked beſt, and under whom they can improve moſt.

Theſe things ſeem to look plauſible at the firſt Appearance, and to come neareſt to the firſt gathering of Churches, before any ſuch thing as Pariſhes were known.

But to me this Arguing looks like Perſons going about now to overthrow all Dominion and Property in Lands and Eſtates, becauſe it ſeems not ſo agreeable with the firſt natural Freedom of Mankind; who, according to the Original Right of Nature, might pick and chuſe what ſerved moſt to their own Conveniency. But although this were the firſt State of things, yet the great Inconveniencies which followed it, upon the Increaſe of Mankind, made Diviſion and Property neceſſary; and although there be no expreſs Command of God for it, yet being ſo neceſſary for the Good of Mankind, it was not only continued every where, but thoſe Perſons were thought fit to be puniſhed by ſevere Laws, who invaded the Rights and Properties of others, either by open Violence and Rapine, or by ſecret Stealth and Purloining.

I grant, that at firſt there were no ſuch Parochial Diviſions of Cures here in England as there are now. For the Biſhops and their Clergy lived in common; and before that the Number of Chriſtians was much increaſed, the Biſhops ſent out their Clergy to preach to the People, as they ſaw Occaſion. But after the Inhabitants had generally embraced Chriſtianity, this itinerant and occaſional going from Place to Place, was found very inconvenient, becauſe of the conſtant Offices that were to be adminiſtred, and the Peoples knowing to whom they ſhould reſort for Spiritual Offices and Directions. Hereupon the Bounds of Parochial Cures were found neceſſary to be ſetled here by degrees, by thoſe Biſhops who were the great Inſtruments of converting the Nation from the Saxon Idolatry. But a Work of this Nature could not be done all at once, as by a kind of Agrarian Law, but ſeveral Steps were taken in order to it.

At firſt, as appears by Bede, they made uſe of any old Britiſh Chur- Bed. l. 1.

Britiſh Churches. But Ethelbert gave all Incouragement both to repair
Old Churches and to build New. However, the Work went on ſlowly; Auguſtin conſecrated but two Biſhops, which were ſettled at London and Rocheſter, where Ethelbert built and endowed two Churches for the L. 2. c. 3.

built ſeveral Churches about Dorcheſter, where his See was fixed. Wil- fred converted the South-Saxons, and ſettled Presbyters in the Iſle of Wight, but they were but two. In the Kingdom of Mercia there were five L. 4. c. 13, a Church with a ſmall Glebe, and there he ended his Days. In the Northern Parts we read of two Churches built by two Noblemen, (Puch L. 5. c. 4, 5. and Addi) upon their own Manors. And the ſame might be done elſewhere; but Bede would never have mentioned theſe, if the thing had been common. But in his Epiſtle to Egbert, Archbiſhop of York, Bed. Epiſt. ad Egbert. p. 64.

a little before his Death he intimates the great Want of Presbyters and Parochial Settlements, and therefore earneſtly perſwades him to procure more. And if Egbert's Canons be genuine (of which there are ſeveral ancient MSS.) the Duties of Presbyters in their ſeveral Churches are ſet down. However, the Work went not on ſo faſt, but in his Succeſſor Eanbaldus his time, the Biſhops were required to find out convenient places to build Churches in, and the ſame paſſed in the Southern parts by general Conſent. In the Council of Cloveſhoe, we read of Presbyters placed up and down by the Biſhops in the Manors of the Laity, and in ſeveral parts diſtinct from the Epiſcopal See; and there they are exhorted to be diligent in their Duties. In the times of Edgar and Canutus, we read of the Mother Churches, which had the Original Settlement of Tithes, (after they were given to the Church by ſeveral Laws) and of the Churches built upon their own Lands by the Lords of Manors; to which they could only apply a third part of the Tithes. But in the Laws of Canutus, we find a fourfold Diſtinction of Churches 1. The Head Church, or the Biſhop's See. 2. Churches of a ſecond Rank, which had Right of Sepulture, and Baptiſm, and Tithes. 3. Churches that had Right of Sepulture, but not frequented. 4. Field-Churches or Oratories, which had no Right of Burial. The ſecond ſort ſeem to be the Original Parochial Churches which had the Endowment of Tithes, and were ſo large, that ſeveral other Churches were taken out of them by the Lords of Manors; and ſo the Pariſhes came to be multiplied ſo much, that in the Laws of Edward the Confeſſor, c. 9. it is ſaid, That there were then three or four Churches, where there had been but one before. In this Dioceſs I find by an Epiſtle of Wulſtan, Biſhop of Worceſter, to Anſelm, that before the Conqueſt there were Churches in Vills, or upon particular Manors that were conſecrated. And if William the Conqueror demoliſhed ſix and thirty Pariſh-Churches in the Compaſs of the New Foreſt, as is commonly ſaid, there muſt be a very great Number before the Conqueſt, although ſo few are ſaid to appear in Doomſday Book, (yet there are many parochial Churches of this Dioceſe in it, above twenty in two Deanaries) but the Normans almoſt ruined the parochial Clergy, by ſeizing the Tithes, and making Appropriations of them. But in the Saxon times the Number ſtill encreaſed, as Lords of Manors and others were willing to erect new Churches, and to have a ſetled Parochial Miniſter among them, who was to take Care of the Souls of the People within ſuch a Precinct, as hath obtained the Name of a Pariſh. But Pariſhes now are of a very different Extent and Value; but the Obligation which the Law puts upon them is the ſame, only where the Maintenance is greater, they may have the more Aſſiſtants. And from hence came the Difference among the Parochial Clergy; for thoſe whoſe Pariſhes were better endowed, could maintain inferior Clerks under them, who might be uſeful to them in the publick Service, and aſſiſt them in the Adminiſtration of Sacraments. And this was the true original of thoſe we now call Pariſh-Clerks, but were at firſt intended as Clerks-Aſſiſtant to him that had the Cure; and therefore he had the Nomination of them, as appears by the Eccleſiaſtical Law, both here and abroad. And Lynwood ſaith, Every Vicar was to have enough to ſerve him, and one Clerk or more; and by the Canon-Law, no Church could be founded, where there was not a Maintenance for Aſſiſting Clerks. In the Synod of Worceſter, under Walter Cantelupe, in Henry the Third's time, they are called Capellani Parochiales, and the Rectors of of Pariſhes were required to have ſuch with them. And the Canon Law doth allow a Rector to give a Title to another to receive Orders as an Aſſiſtant to him; and this without any prejudice to the Patron's Right; becauſe but One can have a Legal Title to the Cure. But Lynwood obſerves very well, That thoſe who give Titles to others, as their Aſſiſtants or Curates, are bound to maintain them if they want. Theſe are called Vicarii Parochiales, & Stipendiarii; but Conductitii Presbyteri, who are forbidden, were thoſe who took Livings to farm, without a Title. But after Appropriations came in, then there were another ſort of Vicars called Perpetui, and were endowed with a certain Portion of the Temporalities, and were admitted ad Curam Animarum: But ſuch could not Perſonam Eccleſiæ ſuſtinere in an Action at Law about the Rights of the Church, but as to their own Right they might. But ſtill there is another ſort of Vicars, who are Perpetual, but not Endowed any otherwiſe than the Biſhop did allow a congrua Portio; and this was in Appropriations where the Biſhop conſented only upon thoſe Terms, as they generally were ſo made, till the Neglect made the Statutes neceſſary, 15 R. 2. 6. and 4 H. 4. 12. The Biſhops were to make, or enlarge the Allowance, ſay the Canoniſts, after Preſentation, and before Inſtitution, and were to ſee that it were a ſufficient Subſiſtence.

But there were ſome Cures which had Chapels of Eaſe belonging to them; and they who officiated in them, were called Capellani, and had their Subſiſtence out of the Oblations and Obventions, and were often Perpetual and Preſentative. And where the Incumbents had ſeveral Chapels of Eaſe, and only Aſſiſtants to ſupply them, the Canon Law doth not call them Rectores, but Plebani; who had a ſort of peculiar Juriſdiction in leſſer Matters; but ſtill they were under the Biſhops Authority in Viſitations and other Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures, becauſe the Care of the whole Dioceſs belonged to him Jure Communi; and ſo it was taken for granted in all Parts of the Chriſtian World: And eſpecially in this Kingdom, where Parochial Epiſcopacy was never heard of till of late Years. For, nothing can be plainer in our Hiſtory, than what is affirmed in two of our Laws, Stat. of Carliſle, 25. E. 1. and the Stat. of Proviſors, 25. E. 3. That the Church of England was founded in Prelacy, or Dioceſan Epiſcopacy. For our firſt Biſhops were ſo far from being confined to one Church or Town, that at firſt in the Saxon-Diviſion of Kingdoms, every Biſhop had his Dioceſs equal with the Extent of the Kingdom, except in Kent, where one Suffragan to the Archbiſhop at Rocheſter was confirmed.

The firſt Converſion of the Engliſh Nation to Chriſtianity from Paganiſm, was by the Dioceſan Biſhops, who were ſent hither from ſeveral Parts, and the Presbyters imployed by them; and as the Number of Chriſtians increaſed, the Number of Biſhops did ſo too; ſo that in the Parts of Mercia one Dioceſs was divided into five, that they might the better look after the Government of them; and every Biſhop, as appears by the Saxon Councils, was bound to ſee parochial Churches built, and the Clergy to be ſettled in them to attend upon the Duties of their Function among the People committed to their Charge.

That which I have aimed at in this Diſcourſe, was to ſhew, That the Original Conſtitution of this Church, was Epiſcopal; but yet that the Biſhops did ſtill deſign to fix a Parochial Clergy under them, as Churches could be built and endowed.

It remains now to ſhew, That this Conſtitution of a Parochial Clergy, is more reaſonable, than that of an unfixed, and unſettled Clergy by Law; which will eaſily appear, if we conſider.

1. The greater Advantage as to Unity, and real Edification among the People. For this makes them to be as one Body within certain Bounds: And the People know whither to reſort for publick Worſhip and Sacraments; and the Inconveniencies, as to the difference of Mens Abilities, is not ſo great, as the Inconveniency of a broken, divided People, as to Religion; which always creates Suſpicions and Jealouſies, and generally Contempt and Hatred of each other. And I think every wiſe and good Chriſtian will conſider, that which tends to Peace and Unity, is really more Edifying than a far better Talent of Elocution, or the moſt moving Way of exciting the Fancies and Paſſions of Hearers. For St. Paul tells us, Charity is beyond miraculous Gifts. It is eaſie to obſerve, that the wiſeſt Methods are ſeldom the moſt popular; becauſe the generality of Mankind do not judge by Reaſon, but by Fancy, and Humour, and Prejudices of one kind or other. From hence the Heats of Enthuſiaſm, and odd Geſtures, and vehement Expreſſions, with no deep or coherent Senſe, take much more with ordinary and injudicious People, than the greateſt ſtrength and clearneſs of Reaſon, or the ſoundeſt Doctrine, and the moſt pious Exhortation, if they be not ſet off in ſuch a Way as ſtrikes their Imaginations, and raiſes their Paſſions. And this is that which ſuch do commonly call the moſt Edifying Way of Preaching, which is like the coming up of the Tide with Noiſe and Violence, but leaves little Effect; whereas the other is like a conſtant Stream which goes on in a ſteady and even Courſe, and makes the Earth more fruitful. The one is like a Storm of Thunder and Lightning, which ſtartles, and confounds, and amuſes more; but the other is like a gentle Rain which ſoftens and mellows the Ground, and makes it more apt to produce kindly and laſting Fruit. We are to judge of true Edification, not by the ſudden Heat and Motion of Paſſions, but by producing the genuine Effects of true Religion; which are fixing our Minds on the greateſt and trueſt Good, and calming and governing our diſorderly Paſſions, and leading a godly, righteous and ſober Life. But we too often find violent and boiſterous Paſſions, an ungovernable Temper, Envy, Strife and Uncharitableneſs, growing up with greater Pretences to Zeal, and better Ways of Edification.

I never expect to ſee the World ſo wiſe, as to have Perſons and Things univerſally eſteemed according to their real Worth. For there will be a Tincture in moſt Perſons, from Temper, and Inclination, and the Principles of Education; but generally ſpeaking Matters of Order and Decency, and Things which tend to a publick Good, affect thoſe moſt, who have the beſt Judgment and Temper; and irregular Heats, and diſorderly Methods of praying and preaching, thoſe whoſe Religion makes more Impreſſion upon their Fancies, than their Judgments, and is ſeen more in the inflaming their Paſſions, than in keeping them in their due Order.

2. There is a greater Advantage as to Diſcipline: For, if among the Teachers they are under no Bounds nor Subjection to a Superiour Authority, it is very eaſie to avoid any kind of Cenſure for the moſt corrupt Doctrines or Practices. We cannot boaſt much of the ſtrict Exerciſe of Diſcipline among us; and one great Reaſon is, That many have more mind to complain of the Want of it, than to do their Endeavour to amend it. We hear of many Complaints of the Clergy in general, and ſometimes by thoſe who have more mind to have them thought guilty, than to prove them ſo, for fear they ſhould acquit themſelves, or at leaſt the Church ſhould not bear the blame of their Miſcarriages. But we cannot proceed arbitrarily, we muſt allow them timely notice, and ſummon them to appear, and a juſt Liberty of Defence; but if upon Proof, and ſufficient Evidence we have not proceeded againſt them with the juſt Severity of the Law, then we ought to bear the Blame, but not otherwiſe. But whatſoever perſonal Neglects or Faults there have been, or may be, my Buſineſs is to ſhew, that our Way is much better fitted for the juſt Exerciſe of Diſcipline, than that of Independent Congregations, altho' the Managers of them pick and cull out the beſt they can for their Purpoſe; and one would think, when they had made choice of Members to their Mind, and bound them together by an explicit Covenant, they ſhould be very eaſie, and tractable, and ſubmiſſive to their own Diſcipline. But they have found the contrary by their ſad Experience; they grow too heady and wilful to bear any ſuch thing as ſtrict Diſcipline; for when they had the Courage to exerciſe it, their Congregations were ſoon broken to pieces, and the ſeveral divided Parts, were for ſetting up new Heads one againſt another, till at laſt they found it was much eaſier to be Teaching than to be Ruling Elders. And ſo they have let the Reins of Diſcipline fall to keep their Congregations together. But ſuppoſe the Teachers ſhould fall out among themſelves; as, to give a freſh and late remarkable Inſtance: Suppoſe ſome ſet up Antinomianiſm, and preach ſuch Doctrines to the People or Flocks they go to, which others think of dangerous Conſequence, What is to be done in ſuch a Caſe? They may ſend ſome Brethren to enquire whether the matters of Fact be true. Suppoſe they find them true, What then? What is to be done next? It may be, ſome would have them come up to their Brethren and anſwer to the Accuſations brought againſt them. But ſuppoſe they will not; and others of the Brethren ſay, they ought not; and ſo fall into Heats and Diſputes among themſelves about it, and make new Parties and Diviſions: Is not this an admirable Way of preſerving Peace, and Order, and Diſcipline, in a Church? And I am as certain, this is not the Way of Chriſt's appointing, as I am, that God is the God of Order, and not of Confuſion; and that when Chriſt left the Legacy of Peace to his Church, he left a Power in ſome to ſee his Will performed. But theſe things can never be objected againſt us; for all are Members of the ſame Body, and are governed by certain and known Rules; and if any be guilty of open Violation of it, the Way is open to accuſe and proſecute them; and if they be found guilty, the Cenſures of the Church will render them uncapable of doing it in ſuch a Station; or at leaſt, to bring them to Confeſſion of their Fault, and Promiſe of future Amendment. And now I leave any one to judge, whether the Parochial Clergy are not under greater and better Diſcipline, than the Teachers of the ſeparate Congregations.

II. But the great Complaint of ſuch Men is, That we want Parochial and Congregational Diſcipline, ſo that Faults ſhould be examined and puniſhed where they have been committed; but inſtead of that, all Matters are drawn into the Eccleſiaſtical Court, and there Cauſes are managed ſo, as looks rather like a Deſign to puniſh Men in their Purſes, than for their Faults; and the Delays are ſo great, that the Court it ſelf ſeems to be deſigned for Penance, and grows very uneaſie, even to thoſe who are Members of our Church. And ſome think that the proceeding againſt Men upon Articles of Enquiry, is not ſo agreeable to the Rights and Liberties of Mankind. In anſwer to this, I ſhall conſider, (1.) The Proceedings upon Enquiry at Viſitations. (2.) The Method of Proceeding in the Eccleſiaſtical Courts. (3.) The Inconveniencies of Parochial Diſcipline.

1. As to Enquiries at Viſitations. They were grounded upon one of the main Pillars of our Law, viz. an ancient, immemorial Cuſtom founded upon good Reaſon: In the firſt Canons that ever were made in this Church under Theodore, Archbiſhop of Canterbury; the ſecond is, That every Biſhop is to look after the Government of his own Dioceſs, and not to invade anothers. And that in ſo doing they went about their Dioceſſes in order to an Enquiry and Correction of Miſcarriages, is evident from the Council under Cuthbert, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Can. 3. 25. the firſt Council at Calechyth, Can. 3. the Conſtitutions of Odo, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Can. 3. and the Canon of Edgar, Can. 3. But in the Saxon times, the Viſitations were annual, which were found inconvenient; and therefore in the Norman times, the Archdeacons were taken into a part of the Juriſdiction under the Biſhop, and viſited thoſe years the Biſhop did not. But we meet with no Archdeacons with any kind of Juriſdiction in the Saxon times; we read indeed ſometimes of the Name of Archdeacons, but they had nothing to do in the Dioceſs, but only attended the Biſhop at Ordinations, and other publick Services in the Cathedral. Lanfranc was the firſt who made an Archdeacon with juriſdiction in his See. And Thomas firſt Archbiſhop of York, after the Conqueſt, was the firſt who divided his Dioceſs into Archdeaconries; and ſo did Remigius, Biſhop of Lincoln, his large Dioceſs into Seven Archdeaconries, ſaith H. of Huntingdon: And ſo it was with the reſt; of which there were two Occaſions, 1. The laying aſide the Chorepiſcopi in the Weſtern Parts, as aſſuming too much to themſelves. 2. The publick Services which the Biſhops were more ſtrictly tied to, as the King's Barons in the Norman times: Which was the Reaſon not only of taking in Archdeacons, but likewiſe of Archpresbyters or Rural-Deans, who had ſome Inſpection into the ſeveral Deanaries, and aſſiſted the Biſhop in ſuch things, as they were appointed to do; and then came in the other Eccleſiaſtical Officers, as Vicar-General, Chancellors, Commiſſaries, &c. for we read not of them here at all in the Saxon times; but about the time of Henry II. the Biſhops took them for their Aſſiſtance in Diſpatch of Cauſes, when the King required their ſtrict Attendance on the publick Affairs in the Supreme Court of Parliament.

Concil. Angl. I. p. 183.

2. As to the Method of Proceeding in the Eccleſiaſtical Courts, it is no other than hath been continued here without Interruption, till of late years, ever ſince the Conqueſt. For the Conſiſtory-Court, and the Rules of Proceeding there, were eſtabliſhed by a Law in the time of William the Firſt. As far as I can find by King Edward's Laws, c. 4. the Biſhops did then proceed by the Eccleſiaſtical Laws, although they then ſat in the County-Court; but this cauſed ſo much Confuſion, that William, by a general Conſent, and a Charter directed to all the People of England, doth ſeparate the Eccleſiaſtical from the Temporal Courts; which was enrolled as good Law, 2 R. 2. upon occaſion of a Suit of the Dean and Chapter of Lincoln; and therefore the Charter of Remigius, Biſhop of Lincoln, is more mentioned than others, but the ſame was to all the Biſhops and Counties of England, as appears by Seld. 14. 1. 4 Inſt. 259. other Copies of it. Thus the Conſiſtory-Court was firſt eſtabliſhed, as a diſtinct Court from the County-Court, which it was not in the Saxon times, for then the Biſhop ſate with the Civil Magiſtrate in the ſame Tit. H. 1. c. 7. Court; and Eccleſiaſtical Cauſes were firſt heard and decided there. It ſeems the People were very unwilling to go to a new Place; and therefore the Law is inforced with ſevere Penalties for Contempt. And thoſe who object againſt the Reaſonableneſs of the Method of Proceeding in thoſe Courts, muſt reflect upon ſome of the wiſeſt Nations in the World, who have gone upon the ſame Grounds, in all that have received the Civil Law, and upon ſome of the greateſt Courts at this time in the Kingdom, as the Chancery and Admiralty, which go by the ſame Fundamental Rules. As to any Objections which ariſe from the perſonal Faults of thoſe who are imployed in them, that reaches, I am afraid, to all Courts; and it ought to be the Work and Buſineſs of thoſe who look after them, to do what in them lies, to reform them, that others Faults may not be laid at their Doors.

3. But for thoſe who would have a Parochial or Congregational Diſcipline ſet up, as much better, and more effectual, I ſhall deſire them to conſider, that ſince Matters of Diſcipline are ſuch, as that in them the Reputation and Intereſt of Perſons is very much concerned, they ought not to be left to Arbitrary Proceedings of any Perſons, but they ought to be managed by the certain and common Rules of Juſtice; ſince every Man hath a Right to defend himſelf, when he is accuſed. And unleſs there be known and eſtabliſhed Methods of Proceedings agreeable to natural Juſtice, and the Laws of the Land, nothing would be more grievous and intolerable than the common Exerciſe of a Parochial Diſcipline. For,

1. It cannot be preſumed, that there will be competent Judges. For every one who hath a Faculty of Preaching, hath not a Faculty of Judging in ſuch Caſes. And where Diſcretion and a Judgment of Circumſtances is wanting, an honeſt Mind will not ſecure Men from doing Injury, and expoſing their Judicature to Contempt.

2. They have no fixed and eſtabliſhed Rules of proceeding, as there are in the Eccleſiaſtical Courts, which have been continued down from time to time, and allowed by the Laws of the Land. And what miſerable Diſorder muſt follow an Arbitrary Method, when Humour, and Will, and Paſſion may over-rule Juſtice, and Equity, and Conſcience?

3. They are not under the Check of the Law, as the Eccleſiaſtical Courts are. For, if they exceed their Bounds, either as to the Nature of the Cauſe, or the Manner of proceeding, they are liable to Prohibitions from the King's Courts of Juſtice; but the Law can take no notice of Parochial or Congregational Judicatures, and ſo Men may ſuffer without Remedy.

4. They have no way to judge of Legal Evidence, which is very material when a Perſon is accuſed. It is one of the niceſt Points in all criminal Proceedings to determine what is good and ſufficient Evidence. For ſeveral things are to be weighed before either Witneſſes or Teſtimonies can be allowed. As to Witneſſes, it is required that they be perſons of Reputation, and free from Infamy of Law and Fact; that they be diſintereſted, and ſo not liable to the juſt Suſpicion of Partiality; that they be Men of Diſcretion and ſane Memory; and all reaſonable Exceptions are to be allowed againſt them. As to Teſtimonies; they muſt be by our Law upon Oath; and what Authority have ſuch Perſons to give an Oath, and why ſhall a Man be liable to ſuffer by a Teſtimony without one, when the Law requires it? They muſt be deliberate, and not given to Paſſion, conſiſtent as to Time, Place, and other Circumſtances: They muſt be certain and poſitive, and not upon Hear-ſay, or the Believing of other Perſons: They muſt be free from any juſt Suſpicion of Contrivance and Conſpiracy, or any ſort of Corruption or Partiality. And now is every parochial Miniſter, or ſelect Congregation fit to judge of theſe Matters, whereon the Reputation, and conſequently the Intereſt of every Perſon may be ſo deeply concerned?

5. They have no way to prevent a precipitate and haſty Sentence. Suppoſe a Man be accuſed by one of Intereſt and Paſſion, who poſſeſſes others with the ſame Opinion before-hand, and the Judges are all prejudiced before the Matter comes to be heard; and in popular Aſſemblies ſome few Men ſway the reſt, what a Caſe is a Perſon accuſed unjuſtly in? He hath no Liberty for others that are not of the Congregation, although more diſintereſted, either to come in to judge, or to plead for him: He can have no Advocate to defend him, or to ſhew the Weakneſs or Inconſiſtency of the Evidence againſt him. In all Eccleſiaſtical Courts, they may ſometimes proceed ſummarily, but even then the Fundamental Rules of the Court muſt be obſerved, as to Proofs and Witneſſes, or elſe the Sentence is void; but here the Sentence will take place, although there hath not been the leaſt Colour of Juſtice in the whole Proceedings.

6. Here is no ſettled courſe of Appeals in caſe of a wrong Sentence. But where Men are liable to Miſtake and Paſſion, a Right of Appeal is one of the Fundamental parts of Juſtice. And therefore Independent and Arbitrary Courts of Judicature, as all Congregational Churches are, are inconſiſtent with the common Rights of Mankind, and that due Subordination which ought to be in all Societies, in order to the preſerving Order and Juſtice among Men. But ſuppoſe Parochial Diſcipline ſo ſettled among us, as to allow a Liberty of Appeal, how would the Trouble, and Vexation, and Expence be increaſed, by going from the Parochial Sentence to the Biſhop's Court, and from thence ſtill further? So that if there be ſome Inconveniencies in point of Diſtance, for Perſons to be ſummoned to appear at firſt ſo far from home, yet there is ſome Compenſation by the leſs Trouble and Charges, if due care be taken to prevent Delays and unneceſſary Expences; which ought to be done: And thoſe who do make the greateſt Clamour againſt our Courts, are rather willing they ſhould continue ſuch as they may have Cauſe to complain of, than to do their Endeavours to reform them.

Thus I have endeavoured to ſhew the juſt Bounds and Limits of Parochial Cures.

II. I now come to conſider the juſt Meaſure of that Diligence which is required under thoſe Limits. For our Church requires Faithful Diligence in Preaching, and Sacraments, and Prayers, and Reading the Holy Scriptures. If then we can underſtand what this Faithful Diligence implies, we may come to ſatisfie our ſelves whether we do our Duty or not.

1. Faithful Diligence implies ſerious Application of our Minds to the main End and Deſign of our Holy Function; which is to do good to the Souls of Men, eſpecially to thoſe committed to your Charge. And an idle, careleſs, ſantering Life, or one too buſy and diſtracted with the Cares of the World, are not conſiſtent with it. I do not go about to take you off from neceſſary Buſineſs, and reaſonable Allowances, as to Health and Studies, but to perſwade you that the doing good to your Peoples Souls, ought to be the principal and chief Deſign of your Thoughts, Studies and Endeavours. And if the People be ſatisfied that this is really your Deſign among them, you will find that your Doctrine will be eaſier received, your Perſons eſteemed, and your Labours valued. It is poſſible you may meet with a froward, peeviſh, ſelf-willed People; and it is hard when a Man is only ſet to water and mend a Hedge made up of Briars and Thorns; the more Pains he takes, the more Scratches he may meet with; but if it be your Lot, be not diſcouraged from doing your Duty: Remember what ſort of People the Prophets were ſent to, and what Uſage they had from them; what Hardſhips and Reproaches Chriſt and his Apoſtles underwent from a very unkind World; but a very patient Continuance in well-doing gave them inward Satisfaction in the midſt of all, and did by degrees gain the Chriſtian Doctrine Acceſs to the Hearts of thoſe who moſt oppoſed it.

2. It implies an honeſt and conſciencious Care of diſcharging the known and common Duties of your Function, as Preaching, Praying, Catechizing, Adminiſtring Sacraments, Viſiting the Sick, &c. A diligent Perſon is one who neglects no good Opportunities of doing his Buſineſs, but watches for them, and ſtudies to improve them to the beſt Advantage. Can thoſe ſatisfy themſelves that they uſe Faithful Diligence, who ſhamefully neglect their Cures, and care not how ſeldom they come at them, nor how they are ſupplied, if they make a good Bargain for their own Advantage? I cannot deny, but that according to the Laws of the Land, and the Canons of this Church, ſome Perſons are allowed to have two ſeveral Cures, which muſt imply a Non-reſidence for ſome time, at leaſt, upon one of them. But they ſtill ſuppoſe, that there are Perſons reſident upon them, who are allowed by the Biſhop to be ſufficient to diſcharge the neceſſary Duties of the place, and not to be taken up like Poſt-horſes, the next that comes, and to be turned off at the next Stage. I think it a very great Fault in thoſe who have Pluralities, that they look no more after the Curates they employ, and that they do not bring them to the Biſhop to be approved, and to have their Allowance fixed before they imploy them. They think no more is required but to pay the Fees for a Licence; but I have and ſhall endeavour to convince the Clergy of this Dioceſe, that Licences are not to be taken, as St. Peter took the Fiſh that firſt came with Money in the Mouth of it; I hope to be able to ſatisfy them, that it is not the Fees that we aim at, but at Perſons doing their Duties. And our Canons are expreſs, That no Curate is to be allowed in any Cure of Souls, that hath not been examined and admitted by the Biſhop or Ordinary having Epiſcopal Juriſdiction, and atteſted by the Hand and Seal of the Biſhop. How then come Curates to officiate without ever coming to the Biſhop at all, or undergoing any Examination by him? This is a plain Breach of the Canon, and ought to be reformed. I do not ſay, that ſuch Licences as have cuſtomarily paſſed without the Biſhop's Hand and Seal are void; but I do ſay, That they are irregular and voidable, and none ought to be allowed, Can. 48.

ed, which are not according to the Canon; and that no Incumbent ought to take any one for his Curate, till the Biſhop hath allowed and approved him under his Hand and Seal. And this Remedy the Law gives us againſt the Inconveniencies which attend Pluralities by weak and inſufficient Curates. But no Man is excuſed, either by Law or Canons, from attending the Duties of his Place at ſome times in his own Perſon, and Can. 41. that good Part of the Year; in which time he ought to do the Duties of his Place with Diligence and Care; and to acquaint himſelf with his Pariſhioners, in order to the better Diſcharge of his Duty towards them. They have very mean Thoughts of their holy Function, that think the main Part of it lies only in the Pulpit; (I wiſh even that were minded more) but all the ways you can do good among your People is within the Compaſs of your Duty, not merely to inſtruct them in Religion, but to prevent Quarrels, and Contentions, and Meetings for Debauchery, which tend to corrupt Mens Minds, and draw them off from the Principles as well as Practice of true Religion: It is your Duty to endeavour to make them live like good Chriſtians, and good Neighbours, and to ſet Patterns your ſelves of Sobriety, Meekneſs, Charity, and of every thing praiſe-worthy.

3. Faithful Diligence implies filling up your vacant Hours with the moſt uſeful Studies, as to the main End of your Function. For in your Ordination you ſolemnly promiſe to lay aſide the Study of the World and the Fleſh, and to apply your ſelves to the Study of the Scriptures, and ſuch Studies as help to the Knowledge of the ſame.

But it may be ſeaſonably asked by ſome, What Method and Courſe of Study will beſt conduce to that End?

To this I ſhall endeavour to give a ſhort Anſwer ſo far as it concerns the main End of your Function, which it is moſt proper for me to conſider at this time.

1. Look well to the Temper of your Minds, that it be humble, ſober, and religious; for a vain, affected, and ſelf-opinionated Perſon can never have an inward and hearty Reliſh of Divine Truths. The Scriptures will appear to him either too plain and eaſy, or too obſcure and intricate; ſome things will ſeem low and flat, and others too lofty and poetical. Thoſe who read not with a good Mind, will have always ſomething or other to cavil at. It is a mighty Advantage in all Spiritual Knowledge, to come to it with an unbiaſs'd Mind, free from the Power of Prejudice and evil Inclinations. For theſe give a ſtrange Tincture to the Mind, and hinder the clear and diſtinct Perception of Revealed Truths, as above the Natural Faculties which God hath given us. Some are therefore ſo fond of Philoſophical Speculations, that unleſs the Letter of the Scripture ſuits with them, they are ready to deſpiſe it, and only Shame and Fear keep up any Reverence for it in them. Some are altogether for Mathematical Evidence and Demonſtration, as though the Way to Salvation were to be ſhewed by Lines and Figures: Why do they not firſt run down all Laws and Hiſtory, becauſe they are not capable of Mathematical Evidence? And it argues a far greater Meaſure of true Underſtanding to know when to be ſatisfied, than to be always diſputing and cavelling. The Plainneſs of Scripture in ſome places is no more an Offence to one that wiſely conſiders the Deſign of it, than a beaten Road is to a Traveller who deſires to know which is the true Way to his Journey's End; and the plainer it is, the more he is ſatisfied with it. But the Scripture wants not its Depths, which require a very attentive and conſidering Mind, and will afford Matter for Exerciſe of Thoughts, and frequent and ſerious Meditation. The Excellency of the Scripture is, That all things neceſſary are plain; and ſuch as are not ſo, although they are not neceſſary to be known for Salvation, yet require our Diligence to underſtand them, and give great Satisfaction as far as we can know them.

2. Not to perplex your Minds with Difficulties above your reach, as in what relates to the Eternal Decrees, and the particular Manner of that Unity of the Godhead, which is conſiſtent with the Trinity of Perſons. For ſince the Scripture doth aſſert both, we may ſafely be contented with what the Scripture reveals, although the Manner of it be incomprehenſible. And as to the other, the Scripture is clear and poſitive, as to the Moral Parts of our Duties; and if we are to ſeek how to reconcile them with God's Decrees, we have this certain Rule to go by, That without doing our Duty we cannot be happy, but we may without underſtanding how the Freedom of our Wills is conſiſtent with the Divine Preſcience and Decrees.

3. Not to fix plain and neceſſary Duties upon new and unaccountable Theories. As for Inſtance: There are no Duties of greater Conſequence than the Love of God and our Neighbour; but it would be unſpeakable Miſchief to Religion, to fix the Love of God upon ſo abſurd a Principle, as his being the immediate Cauſe of all Senſation in us. And it would have made the Chriſtian Doctrine ridiculous, to found its fundamental Precepts on extravagant Notions and Myſtical Contemplations. And ſo for the Love of our Neighbours, to allow only a Love of Benevolence and Charity, and not of Delight and Complacency, is to make nice Diſtinctions, where God hath made none. But to take away the Love of Complacency in Friends and Relations, and the Bleſſings which God gives for the Comfort of Life, is to overthrow the due Senſe of God's Goodneſs in giving them; and to take away a great Meaſure of that Gratitude we owe to God for them. But when any ſeem very fond of ſuch Notions, and ſhew ſo much Self-Complacency in them, it is impoſſible upon ſuch Principles that they ſhould love their Neighbours as themſelves.

4. If you would underſtand the New Teſtament aright, fix in your Minds a true Scheme of the State of the Controverſies of that time, which will give you more light into the true Knowledge of the Scriptures, than large Volumes of Commentators, or the beſt Syſtems of Modern Controverſies; as, What the Jewiſh Notions of Juſtification by Works, and Expiation of Sin were, and of God's Decrees of Election and Reprobation as to themſelves: And what the Principles of the Judaizing Chriſtians were, as to the joining the Law and the Goſpel, and the Pythagorean Superſtition together. And what the Gnoſticks, who were profeſſed Libertines, held as to Grace, Redemption, Liberty, Government, &c. All which tend very much to the clearing the Senſe of the New Teſtament.

5. Where the Senſe appears doubtful, and Diſputes have been raiſed about it, enquire into the Senſe of the Chriſtian Church in the firſt Ages, as the beſt Interpreter of Scripture; as, Whether the Apoſtles left Biſhops or Presbyters to ſucceed them in the Government of Churches; Whether the Apoſtles appointed the Lord's Day to be obſerved as the Day of Publick Worſhip; Whether Baptiſm were not to be adminiſtred to Infants as well as Circumciſion, both being Seals of God's Covenant; Whether Divine Worſhip doth not belong to Chriſt, and were not given to him in the Hymns and Doxologies of the Primitive Church; and, Whether Divine Worſhip can be given to any Creature; Whether the Form of Baptiſm was not underſtood ſo, as to imply a Trinity of Perſons; and, Whether all true Chriſtians were not Baptized into this Faith; and conſequently, Whether denying the Trinity be not renouncing Chriſtian Baptiſm. Theſe and many other ſuch Queſtions of great Importance, receive great Light from the Writings of the firſt Ages.

But ſome Rules may be very uſeful for right judging the Senſe of thoſe Times.

1. To diſtinguiſh the Genuine and Suppoſititious Writings of that Time. This hath been examined with ſo much Care by Learned Men of this laſt Age, that it is no hard matter to make a true Judgment about them.

2. In thoſe that are Genuine, to diſtinguiſh the Senſe of the Church, delivered by them, from their own particular Opinions; the Senſe of the Church is beſt known by publick Acts, as by Creeds, Sacraments, Hymns, Prayers and Cenſures of ſuch as oppoſe or contradict them.

3. To put a Difference between the Authority of private Perſons, and of the Biſhops and Governours of the Church who may be preſumed to underſtand the Senſe of the Church, and the Doctrine of the Apoſtles better than the other. And ſo Clemens, Ignatius, Polycarp, Theophilus, and Irenæus are more to be truſted as to the Senſe and Practice of the Chriſtian Church than ſuch as Hermes, and Papias and Tatianus, who had neither the Judgment nor the Authority of the other.

4. That may be juſtly looked on as the Senſe of the Church, which is owned both by the Friends and the Enemies of it. The Enemies of Chriſtianity charged them with many Things, which the Apologiſts utterly denied. Now we find Pliny charging the Chriſtians with ſinging Hymns to Chriſt, as to God; ſeveral Chriſtian Writers of that time mention this, but never go about to ſoften; or to excuſe, or deny it. And ſo we find Lucian deriding the Chriſtians for the Doctrine of Three and One, which the Apologiſts of that time are ſo far from denying, that they aſſert and vindicate it, as appears by Athenagoras and others.

But theſe things I only touch at, to ſhew how the Senſe of the Church is to be taken, and how from thence the Senſe of the Scriptures may be cleared.

OF THE Particular DUTIES
OF THE PAROCHIAL CLERGY,

At a Viſitation, October 27th. 1696.

My Brethren,

AS often as it pleaſes God in his wiſe Providence to bring me among you in the ordinary Courſe of my Viſitation, I cannot ſatisfie my ſelf that I do my own Duty, unleſs I put you in mind of doing yours. We live in an Age, wherein the Contempt of the Clergy is too notorious not to be obſerved ; but the true Reaſons are not ſo well conſidered as they ought to be. Some, to increaſe the Contempt of the Clergy, have given ſuch Reaſons of it, as ſeem to make it a light and jeſting matter ; but truly it is very far from being ſo : For the Contempt of Religion is oft-times both the Cauſe and the Effect of it. It is not at all to be wondred at, that thoſe who hate to be reformed, ſhould hate thoſe whoſe Duty and Buſineſs it ought to be to endeavour to reform them. But when Religion is ſtruck at through our Sides, we ought with Patience to bear the Wounds and Reproaches we receive in ſo good a Cauſe. Wo be to us, if thoſe who are Enemies to Religion, ſpeak well of us : For it is a ſtrong Preſumption that they take us to be of their ſide in our Hearts, and that we are diſtinguiſhed only by our Profeſſion, which they look on only as our Trade. And we give too much occaſion for ſuch Suſpicions of us, if we do not heartily concern our ſelves for the Honour and Intereſt of true Religion in the World, whatever we may ſuffer, as to our Reputation, for the ſake of it. It is poſſible, that if we go about to humour ſuch Perſons in their Infidelity and Contempt of Religion, we may eſcape ſome hard Words for the preſent, but they cannot but have the greateſt inward Contempt and Hatred of all thoſe who live upon Religion, and yet have not the Courage to defend it. And what Satiſfaction can ſuch have, when they reflect upon themſelves, and think what Occaſion they have given to confirm ſuch Perſons in their Infidelity, and to make them think the worſe of Religion for their ſakes.

The beſt thing we can do to recover the Honour of Religion, and to ſet our Profeſſion above Contempt, is to apply our ſelves ſeriouſly and conſcientiouſly to do our Duties. For if others find that we are in earneſt, and make it our great Buſineſs to do all the Good we can, both in the Pulpit, and out of it ; if we behave our ſelves with that Gravity, Sobriety, Meekneſs and Charity which becomes ſo holy a Profeſſion, we ſhall raiſe our ſelves above the common Reproaches of a ſpiteful World ; and do what lies in us to ſtop the Mouths at leaſt, if not to gain the Hearts of our Enemies.

For the real Eſteem which Men have of others, is not to be gained by the little Arts of Addreſs and Inſinuation, much leſs by complying with them in their Follies; but by a ſteady and reſolute Practice of our own Duties, joined with a gentle and eaſie, and obliging Behaviour to others, ſo far as is conſiſtent with them. But a proud, ſupercilious, moroſe Behaviour towards our greateſt Enemies, doth but make them much more ſo; if any thing ſoftens them, and makes them more tractable, it will be, joining a Firmneſs of Mind, as to our plain Duties, with Humility and Kindneſs in other Matters.

But what are theſe Duties we are obliged to ſo much Care in the Performance of?

There is a two-fold Obligation lying upon us.

I. That which is more General from the Nature and Deſign of our Imployment; which is the Cure of Souls; and that requires great Diligence and Faithfulneſs, frequent Recollection and Conſideration, ſerious Application of our ſelves to Divine Studies and Imployments; a prudent Uſe of the beſt Methods for the Convincing, Reproving, Directing and Aſſiſting thoſe who are committed to our Care. And all theſe are implied in the Nature of our Office, as it is ſet forth in holy Scripture; wherein we are deſcribed as Labourers, and therefore muſt take Pains, and not ſpend our time in vain and idle Company: As Teachers, and therefore ought to be ſtored with a good Stock of Knowledge our ſelves, and be ready to communicate it to others: as Paſtors, and ſo we ought to look after our Flock, and not leave them to the careleſs Management of others, who are not ſo concerned for their Welfare, as we ought to be: As Ambaſſadors from Chriſt, and therefore we are bound to look after the Buſineſs we are ſent upon, and the great Weight and Importance of it, as to your own Salvation as well as others: As Stewards of the Myſteries of God, and the firſt thing required in them, is to diſcharge their Truſt honeſtly and faithfully, remembring the Account they muſt give to God.

But theſe, you may ſay, are only general Things, and do not determine and limit our Duties within certain Bounds; what is there which doth fix and determine our Duties, as to the Station we have in this Church?

II. I come therefore to the Special Duties, which by the Ancient Conſtitution of this Church, and the Eccleſiaſtical Laws of it, are incumbent upon you. And you are to conſider, that as the Law hath taken Care for your Maintenance and Subſiſtence in doing your Duties; ſo it doth ſuppoſe your careful Performance of them, not only in regard to the general Rule of Conſcience, but to that particular Obligation you are under, as Members of this Church. And therefore I ſhall enquire into two things:

I. The Duties you are under this Obligation to.

II. The Incouragement which the Law gives in Conſideration of it.

I. The Duties are of two ſorts:

1. Publick and Solemn. 2. Private and Occaſional.

1. Publick and Solemn; and thoſe either reſpect the Time, or the Duties themſelves.

1. As to the Times of Solemn and Publick Worſhip, which are the Weekly Lord's-days, and the other Holy-days.

1. I begin with the Obſervation of the Lord's-day; which I ſhall now make appear to have been ſet apart for the ſolemn Worſhip and Service of God, eſpecially by the Clergy, from the firſt Settlement of a Parochial Clergy in this Church.

In a Provincial Council held at Cloveſhoe or Cliff, A. D. 747. the King and Nobility being preſent (where the Archbiſhop and Biſhops Aſſembled for Regulating the Worſhip of God in Parochial Churches then newly erected in many places) the Fourteenth Canon is expreſs, That the Lord's-day ought to be celebrated with due Veneration, and devoted only to Divine Worſhip (Divino tantum cultui dedicatus) and the Presbyters are required to officiate in their ſeveral Churches, both in Preaching and Praying; and the People are required to let alone their common worldly Affairs, and to attend the publick Worſhip of God.

Concil. Angl. 1. 249.

The Canons of Egbert, Archbiſhop of York, are as clear and full for the Northern as the other for the Southern, Can. 104. That nothing is to be done on the Lord's Day, but what tends to the Worſhip and Service of God. And Can. 36. That Chriſt ſanctified the Lord's Day by his Reſurrection. But becauſe theſe Canons of Egbert will be often uſed, ſomething ought to be obſerved to clear their Authority. Sir H. Spelman ſaith there are ſeveral Ancient MSS. of them. Mr. Selden owns the Cotton MS. to be of the time of H. 1. but he ſuſpects that another made the Collection, and put it under his Name. But it was no ſtrange thing for the great Biſhops to make ſuch a Collection of Canons; for ſo it was done by Theodore, Archbiſhop of Canterbury; by Theodulphus of Orleans; Iſaac Lingonenſis, Chrodegangus, Herardus, Hincmarus, &c. And Egbert was not only a great Man, Brother to the King of the Northumbrians, but a great Promoter of Learning and Eccleſiaſtical Diſcipline, as appears by his Dialogue about the latter, and the other by Alcuin's Epiſtles about him, and Bede's Epiſtle to him a little before his death. And the Agreement between the Capitulars and theſe Canons might come from Alcuin's carrying them over into France with him.

Concil. Angl. 1. 258.

Egbert. Dial. de Eccleſ. Inſtit. cum Bedæ Epiſtol. ad Egbert. Dublin, 1664.

In the Saxon Canons, c. 24. it is ſaid, that the Lord's-day on which our Saviour roſe from the Dead, is to be devoted wholly to the Service of God, excepting only Works of Neceſſity and Charity.

Concil. Angl. 1. 600.

Theſe Canons are tranſlated from thoſe of Theodulphus, Biſhop of Orleans, A. D. 786. And it is obſervable, that as the Chriſtian Religion prevailed in theſe Northern Parts, ſo the Religious Obſervation of the Lord's-day was enforced, as appears by the Canons of the Gallican Church, as well as this. As in the famous Canon of the Council of Maſcon, A. D. 585. where the Biſhops Aſſembled, complain of the Neglect of the Lord's-day, and agree to put the People upon a ſtricter Obſervance of it. And ſo before in the Council of Orleans, A.D. 538. But in both theſe Canons they avoid a Jewiſh Superſtition as well as profane Neglect. They allowed both Works of Neceſſity and Conveniency, and did not place the Obſervation in a bare Reſt, but in Attendance on the Worſhip of God; and forbad all manner of Secular Imployments which were inconſiſtent with it. Nay, Theodulphus his Canon goes higher, Tantummodo Deo vacandum, the whole Day ought to be ſpent in Religious and Charitable Imployments.

The greateſt Men in our Saxon Churches aſſerted the ſame. Bede ſaith, That the Apoſtles appointed the Lord's-day to be obſerved with Religious Solemnity, and therein we ought to devote our ſelves to the Worſhip of God; tantum divinis cultibus ſerviamus. And to the ſame purpoſe ſpeaks Alcuin, who was bred up under Egbert, Arch-biſhop of York, and calls Bede the greateſt Maſter of his time; and in another place he ſaith, Bed. T. 7. p. 639.

Alcuin. de O.Fic. c. 27.

One Seventh Day is ſet apart among Chriſtians, as another had been among the Jews for the Service of God; and that therein we ought to attend to the Care of our Souls and to lead a ſpiritual Life.

Epiſt. 5. 49. De Off. c. 40.

Bede diſtinguiſhes between the Patriarchal and Jewiſh Sabbath. The latter he calls a Carnal, and the other a Spiritual Sabbath; the former lay in a ſtrict Abſtinence from Labour, but the other in Prayer, and Devotion, and Spiritual Contemplations. The Jewiſh Reſt, he ſaith, was inutile, languidum, & luxurioſum. For the Jews allowed Recreations and Sports on their Sabbaths; Vacant ab opere bono, ſaith he, non ab opere nugatorio. Vacant ad nugas, ſaith S. Auguſtin; but he ſaith, they had better plow or dig, than dance on that Day, or ſit in the Theater. And he tells us, That the Heathens objected againſt the Jews, That they ſpent one Day in the Week in Idleneſs. For they ſuppoſed the bare Reſt to be the Sanctification of the Day which was commanded, and the ſpending any part of it in the publick Worſhip, to be voluntary Devotion. But the better ſort of the Jews thought the Reſt was appointed for the Knowledge of the Law, and Spiritual Imployments. So Philo, Joſephus, Aben-Ezra, Kimchi, and Menaſſeh ben Iſrael. It ſeems moſt reaſonable in this Caſe to diſtinguiſh between the Legal Reſt ſtrictly required by the Fourth Commandment, and the Original Reſt in Remembrance of God's reſting from the Work of Creation. The former was a Sign between God and the People of Iſrael, as it is often called in Scripture; and the other was a Commemorative Sign, but ſuch as excited them to the Worſhip of the Creator; and therefore the Patriarchal Sabbath, as Bede obſerves, was of a ſpiritual Nature. And ſuch a ſpiritual Sabbath, as S. Auguſtine calls it, ought to be obſerved by Chriſtians in the Duties of God's Worſhip, as well as in ſpiritual and holy Thoughts. But the Jewiſh Sabbath, he often ſaith, doth not oblige Chriſtians. I the rather mention him, becauſe Bede followed his Doctrine herein; and that of Gregory I. who was the great Inſtrument of promoting the Converſion of our Anceſtors to Chriſtianity. And he declares himſelf fully, both as to the Ceſſation of the Jewiſh Sabbath, and the religious Obſervation of the Lord's-day. It ſeems there were ſome then, as there are among us now, who were for the ſtrict Obſervation of the Saturday-Sabbath. But Gregory ſaith, They might as well inſiſt upon Circumciſion and Sacrifices, as the Jewiſh Sabbath. But yet he adds, We ought on the Lord's-day to abſtain from worldly Imployments, and devote our ſelves unto Prayers, that we may make ſome Amends for the Weeks Negligence, by the Devotions on that Day. And this devoting the Lord's-day to the Service of God, is entred into the Body of the Canon Law; and taken out of Ivo, and by him from the Canons of the Gallican Church, as appears by ſeveral Councils.

Our Lynwood mentions that Canon as in force here, Die Dominicâ nihil aliud agendum, niſi Deo vacandum. And he takes ſome Pains to explain it, by diſtinguiſhing,

1. Works ſervile materially and formally, as Plowing, Sowing, Markets, Law-days, &c. theſe are generally forbidden.

2. Acts ſpiritual materially and finally, as all Acts of Piety and Devotion, and theſe we ought to attend upon with Care and Diligence.

3. Acts not ſervile in themſelves, but done for a ſervile End, as Studies and Deſigns for Gain.

4. Acts ſervile in themſelves, but not ſo in their End; as the Man's taking up his Couch on the Sabbath-day, whom Chriſt cured.

He affirms, that there is a Moral Part in the Fourth Commandment, which, he ſaith, is a ſpiritual Reſt, or a time ſet apart for God's Service: Which he takes from Aquinas, who ſaith the Subſtance of the Command is Moral; but he doth not make it to be one day in Seven, but ſome determinate time, which, he ſaith, the Church may appoint; but then it muſt be imployed in the Service of God (vacare rebus divinis) as things were ſaid to be ſanctified under the Law, which were applied to God's Service. But notwithſtanding this Judgment of Aquinas, ſome great Men in the Church of Rome have thought one day in Seven, Moral; and that the Proportion which God himſelf had appointed, cannot be leſſen'd. For although Mankind could not by natural Reaſon find out the Proportion, yet being once reveal'd, it doth not ceaſe to oblige, unleſs ſomething figurative and ſymbolical, or peculiar to the Jewiſh Nation be diſcovered in it.

Bellarmine makes that the Reaſon of the Inſtitution of the Lord's-day, becauſe God's Law required that one day in Seven ſhould be ſet apart for the Worſhip of God; but the Apoſtles thought it not fit to obſerve the Jewiſh Sabbath, and therefore changed it into the Lord's-day.

Bell. de Cultu Sanct. *l.*3. c. 11.

Covarruvius ſaith, That all Divines agree with Aquinas, That there is ſome thing Moral in the Fourth Command, which continues to oblige; and that the Lord's-day is of Divine Inſtitution. And to him the Roman Editors of the Canon Law referr, as to this matter.

Mr. Hooker ſaith, That we are to account the Sanctification of one day in Seven a Duty which God's immutable Law doth exact for ever.

But what is meant by this Sanctification of one day in Seven? If it be underſtood according to the old Canons, it will fill ſcrupulous Minds with more Doubts and Fears about the right Obſervation of it.

Orig. in Numer. Hom. 23. c. 28. Hom. 9. in Levit. 16.

Origen ſaith, The Obſervation of the Chriſtian Sabbath lies in theſe things; 1. A Forbearance of worldly Buſineſs. 2. Attendance on the Publick Worſhip. 3. Divine Meditation on things inviſible and future. Hæc eſt obſervatio Sabbati Chriſtiani. And in another place, he requires beſides Publick Worſhip, private Meditation and Reading the Holy Scriptures.

Chryſoſt. Hom. 5. in Matth. 2. Hom. in Joh. Hom. 5. ad Pop. Antioch. Hom. 10. in Gen.

St. Chryſoſtom inſiſts very much upon the ſame in ſeveral places, and on different Occaſions. And although it be in his popular Sermons, yet he would certainly not put them upon any thing, but what he thought very fit to be done. And they muſt have a mean Opinion of him, who think his Eloquence carried him too far in this matter.

De Officio Archi-presbyt. v. Sanctifices.

I ſhall conclude with the Opinion of Lynwood, a Learned and Judicious Canoniſt; and he obſerves a three-fold Sanctification of the Lord's-day. 1. By Abſtinence from Sin, which is neceſſary at all times. 2. By Abſtinence from ſuch bodily Labours as hinder the Minds Attendance upon God's Service. 3. By the whole Imployment of our Minds in Divine Matters; and this he calls the perfect Obſervation of it.

Theſe things I have the more largely inſiſted upon, to ſhew, that the religious Obſervation of the Lord's-day, is no Novelty ſtarted by ſome late Sects and Parties among us, but that it hath been the general Senſe of the beſt part of the Chriſtian World, and is particularly inforced upon us of the Church of England, not only by the Homilies, but by the moſt ancient Eccleſiaſtical Law among us.

But this is not all, for the Ancient as well as Modern Canons require the Obſervation of Holy-days likewiſe. The Canons of Egbert require not only Prayers, but Preaching then, Can. 1. 3.

Alcuin. de Offic. c 40. Wilthem. in Diptych Leod. c. 8.

The Council of Cloveſhoe, Can. 13. diſtinguiſhes the Holy-days relating to our Saviour, from the reſt; and ſaith, they are to be obſerved in a ſolemn and uniform Manner, and the reſt according to the Roman Martyrology: Which, I ſuppoſe, were thoſe repeated then in the Diptychs of the Church; which cuſtom continued longer at Rome, than in other Churches; but it was generally diſuſed before the time of Charles the Great.

The Cuſtom in Rome, in Gregory's time, was to obſerve the Saints-days with the ſolemn Service at one Church, as appears by his Homilies on the Evangeliſts, which were many of them preached on thoſe Occaſions; as of S. Felicitas, Hom. 3. S. Agnes, Hom. 11, 12. S. Felix, Hom. 13. S. Pancrace, Hom. 27, &c. and of others who were Roman Martyrs; and therefore had a particular Solemnity appointed for them. But as to other Saints-days, it appears by the Antiphonarius and Sacramentary of Gregory I. that they had particular Anthems and Collects proper for them in the Offices of the Day; but I do not find that the generality of the People were ſo ſtrictly tied up, when the Offices were over, as they were on the Lord's-day, and the greater Feſtivals relating to our Saviour. In the Council of Cloveſhoe, Can. 13. I obſerve that the Natalitia Sanctorum, i. e. the Anniverſary Saints-days, were obſerved with particular Pſalmody and Anthems; and Can. 17. the days of Gregory and Auguſtine, the two great inſtruments of converting the Nation, were only to be kept as Holy-days by the Clergy, without any particular Obligation on all the People. So that the Holy-days of ſtrict Obſervation then, ſeem to have been no other than thoſe which relate to our Saviour, called Dominicæ Diſpenſationis in carne Feſtivitatis; the reſt had ſome proper Offices which were performed on their days; but the People were to attend them, as well as they could; but after there was not this ſtrictneſs required, as upon the greater Holy-days; and as it was in the Church of Rome afterwards, when they made the Obligation of Conſcience to extend to all Holy-days appointed by the Church. But it is obſervable, (1.) That this Obligation is taken from thoſe Canons which mention only the Lord's-day, as appears by Bellarmine. (2.) That they kept up the Diſtinction of greater and leſſer Holy-days. (3.) That they allow the Biſhop to diſpenſe, as to ſome Works on Holy-days. Lynwood obſerves, that the Abſtinence from Work is not alike, but as the Church hath required it; and that if a Biſhop's Licence cannot be had, a leſs will ſerve. Our Church, Can. 13. requires Holy-days to be obſerved with Works of Piety, Charity, and Sobriety; but gives no Rule as to Abſtinence from Works, or the ſtrict Obligation of Conſcience.

De Cultu Sanct. l. 3. c. 10.

De Feriis, f. 52.

2. I now come to the particular Duties of the Clergy on the days which are ſolemnly devoted to the Service of God.

1. The conſtant and devout Attendance upon, and ſolemn Reading the Prayers of the Church, as they are appointed. In the old Saxon Canons the Presbyters are required to officiate conſtantly at Prayers in their Churches; ſo in the Council at Cloveſhoe; Can. 8. the Canons of Egbert, Can. 2. Canons of Edgar, Can. 45.

Concil. Angl. 1. 247.

But how if the People will not come to the Prayers? You ought, what lies in you, to remove the Cauſes of ſuch Neglect; which ariſes generally from theſe things; either groſs Stupidity and Regardleſneſs of Religion, which is too common in the World, or from Prejudice and Principles of Education, or the Intereſt of a Party; or from not Reading the Prayers with that Attention and Devotion which is fit to raiſe an Eſteem of them. The other two, you ought to do what you can to remove; but this is your own Fault if you do it not. We are not to pleaſe the Fancies of People by an affected Variety of Expreſſions in Prayers; but we ought to do what we can to excite their Affections, which is done as much by the due manner of Reading, as by Figures in ſpeaking. And the People are uneaſie at ſtaying, when they ſee the Miniſter read them ſo faſt, as though he minded nothing ſo much as to be at the end of them; or when he mangles them ſo, as if he had a mind to make the People out of love with them.

2. The next Duty is Preaching; and truly that need to be looked after, when the Eſteem of our Profeſſion depends ſo much upon it: We have none of thoſe Methods which thoſe on both ſides make ſo much uſe of; we can neither comply with the People in Geſtures, and Phraſes, and Enthuſiaſtick Heats, nor with Superſtitious Devotions and Prieſt-craft of others. Of all Churches ours hath the leaſt Reaſon to be charged with it ſince they let go ſo many Advantages over the People by the Reformation. Thanks be to God, we have Scripture, and Reaſon, and Antiquity of our ſide; but theſe are dry and inſipid things to the common People, unleſs ſome Arts be uſed to recommend them. But ſince our main Support lies in the Honeſty and Juſtice of our Cauſe, without Tricks and Devices, we ought to look very well to that part of our Profeſſion which keeps up any Reputation among the People; and that is Preaching. Thoſe who are ſo weak or lazy, as to be glad to have that laid aſide too, in a great Meaſure, never well conſidered the Deſign of our Profeſſion, or the way to ſupport it. It's true, for ſome time Preaching was an extraordinary thing in the Church; and none but Great and Eloquent Men of Authority in the Church were permitted to preach, and the greateſt Biſhops were then the Preachers, as appears by the Sermons of S. Ambroſe, S. Chryſoſtom, S. Auguſtine, &c. And even ſome of the Biſhops of Rome, whatever Sozomen ſaith, were frequent Preachers, as appears, by Gregory's Homilies on Ezekiel and the Goſpels. And if it were not then practiſed he did very ill to complain of the Burden of it, and the danger of neglecting it. But in other Churches while the Biſhop and the Presbyters lived together, before Parochial Cures were ſettled, the Presbyters had no conſtant Office of preaching, but as the Biſhops appointed them occaſionally. But afterwards when the Presbyters were fixed in their Cures, they were required to be very diligent and careful in preaching, or inſtructing the People committed to their Charge, as may be ſeen in many early Canons of the Gallican Church; and ſo it was here in England: Council of Cloveſhoe, c. 8. 14. Egbert, Can. 3. and that not only in the moving way in the Pulpit, but in the familiar and inſtructing way, which we call Catechizing; Council Cloveſhoe, c. 11. Can. Egbert. 6. Both ought to be done, becauſe they are both very uſeful. The Principles and Foundations of Religion muſt be well laid, to make the People have any Taſte or Reliſh of preaching; otherwiſe it is like reading Mathematicks to thoſe who underſtand not Numbers or Figures. Eraſmus obſerves, that the Senſe of Religion grows very cold without preaching; and that the Counteſs of Richmod, Mother to H. 7. had ſuch a Senſe of the Neceſſity of it in thoſe times, that ſhe maintained many Preachers at her own Charges, and imployed Biſhop Fiſher to find out the beſt qualified for it. And ſince the Reformation the Church of Rome hath been more ſenſible of the Neceſſity of it, as appears by the Council of Trent. Cardinal Borromeo, one of the moſt celebrated Saints ſince that time, frequently inſiſts upon it, gives Directions about it, and ſpeaks of it as a thing, which tends very much to the Glory of God, and the Salvation of Souls. And to the ſame purpoſe other great Men among them, as Cardinal Palæotus, Godeau, Bordenave, and others. Would it not then be a great ſhame for us, who pretend to a Zeal for Reformation and the true Religion, to neglect or leſſen the Reputation of thoſe things which our Adverſaries have learnt from us, and glory in them; and thoſe are Diligence in Preaching and Catechizing? Which none can deſpiſe who value Religion, none can neglect who have any Regard to the Intereſt or Honour of their Profeſſion.

3. The next duty is the ſolemn Adminiſtration of the Sacraments, which ought to be done in the publick Aſſemblies, where is not a great Reaſon to the contrary. The Saxon Canons are expreſs, that Baptiſm, unleſs in Caſe of Neceſſity, ſhould be adminiſtred only in due times and places, Egbert Can. 10, 11. While the ancient Diſcipline was kept up, and Baptiſm only celebrated at the great Feſtivals, there was a neceſſity of its being publick; and the Catechumens underwent ſeveral Scrutinies, which laſted ſeveral days in the Face of the Church, as S. Auguſtine obſerves, after they had been kept under private Examination for ſome time before. But when whole Nations were not only converted, but Infants generally baptized, the former Method of Diſcipline was changed. But yet the Church retained her Right as to Satisfaction about the due Admiſſion of her Members. And that is the true Reaſon why, after private Baptiſm, the Child is required to be brought to the publick Congregation. For Baptiſm is not intended to be done before a ſelect Number of Witneſſes, but in the Face of the Church, which is the regular and ſolemn way; however, the Biſhop may diſpenſe in ſome particular Caſes, which he judges reaſonable. At firſt Baptiſm was adminiſtred publickly, as occaſion ſerved, by Rivers; as Bede ſaith, Paulinus baptized many in the Rivers, before Oratories or Churches were built. Afterwards the Baptiſtery was built at the Entrance of the Church, or very near it; which is mentioned by Athanaſius, S. Chryſoſtom, S. Ambroſe, S. Auguſtine, &c. The Baptiſtery then had a large Baſon in it, which held the Perſons to be baptized, and they went down by Steps into it. Afterwards when Immerſion came to be diſuſed, Fonts were ſet up at the Entrance of Churches: But ſtill the place was publick. But in Caſe of Neceſſity there is a Form preſcribed; and I not ſee how any, without leave, can uſe the form of publick Baptiſm in private Houſes; which is againſt both our Ancient and Modern Canons. In the Greek Church it is Deprivation to do it; and ſo the Synod under Photius confirms it, both as to the Euchariſt and Baptiſm, becauſe publick Order is to be preſerved. But it is there underſtood to be done in oppoſition to the Biſhop's Authority, whoſe Conſent may make the Caſe different, if they judge it reaſonable. But Miniſterial Officers are not Judges in an equitable Caſe againſt a ſtanding Rule.

Bed. l. 2. c. 14.

Concil. in Trullo, Can. 31, 59. Syn. A. & B. Can. 12.

4. Another Duty of the Parochial Clergy is, to be able and ready to reſolve Penitential Caſes, which relate to the internal Court of Conſcience, and not the external and judiciary Court, which reſpects the Honour of the Church, as to ſcandalous Offences committed by the Members of it. And this takes in the private and occaſional Duties of the Parochial Clergy; for they ought to inform themſelves of the Spiritual Condition of their People, that they may be able to give ſuitable Advice and Directions to them both in Health and Sickneſs: But chiefly to be able to give them ſafe and ſeaſonable Advice under troubles of Conſcience by reaſon of wilful Sins. Duarenus, a very conſiderable Lawyer, thinks the main Buſineſs of the Clergy, as to the Cure of Souls, lies in the Power of Binding and Looſing, i. e. in dealing aright with the Conſciences of Men, as to the Guilt of their Sins. And the Rules of the penitential Court, are different from thoſe of the Eccleſiaſtical Court, as well as the end is different. In the Saxon times, there were both here. There were Eccleſiaſtical Law which related to Judicial Caſes, wherein a publick Penance was injoyned in order to the Churches Satisfaction.

Duaren. de Benef. l. 2. c. 7.

Concil. Angl. I. p. 194.

But there were many Cauſes which were not publick, and yet great Care was to be uſed, as to the Direction of Penitents, as appears by the Penitentials of Theodore and Bede in the Saxon times. Whereby we learn that a difference was to be obſerved, as to the nature of Offences, and the Circumſtances of Perſons and Actions, and the Meaſure of Contrition; and the particular Method is ſet down in the penitential Books, which was in very material Circumſtances different from the Methods uſed in the Church of Rome. But it is a thing neceſſary for every Parochial Miniſter to be able to ſettle doubting Conſciences, and to put them into the beſt Methods of avoiding Sin for the Future, without which the Abſolution of the Prieſt ſignifies nothing. For where God doth not abſolve, the Church cannot.

5. Giving a good Example to the People committed to your Charge. This is often mentioned in the Saxon Canons: Council at Cloveſhoe, c. 8. Canons of Egbert, 14, 15, 18, 19, 33. in the Laws of Alfred, c. 3. of Edward c. 3. Conſtit. of Odo. c. 4, 5. of Edgar, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 64. of Canutus, c. 26. And in the Concluſion of one Collection of his Laws are theſe Words, Happy is that Shepherd, who by his good Life and Doctrine leads his Flock to Eternal and Heavenly Joys; and happy is that Flock that follows ſuch a Shepherd, who hath reſcued them out of the Devil's Hands, and put them into God's.

6. Laſtly the Performance of all theſe Duties ſuppoſes a conſtant Reſidence among your People; without which it is impoſſible to diſcharge them in ſuch a manner, as to give them and your ſelves full Satisfaction. This, I am ſenſible, is a very nice and tender Point; and the Difficulties of it do ariſe from theſe things: On one ſide it is ſaid,

1. That there is an Allowance by the Law given to ſeveral Perſons to hold more Benefices than one; and ſince the Diſtribution of Benefices is not by the Law of God, but by the Law of the Land, what Fault is there in making uſe of the Privileges which the Law gives? But there cannot be conſtant Reſidence in more Places than one.

2. That the general Service of the Church is more to be preferred than taking Care of a particular Pariſh; becauſe the neceſſary Duties of a Pariſh may be ſupplied by Perſons approved by the Biſhop, and a ſingle Living ſeldom affords a ſufficient Competency for perſons to be capable of publick Service.

3. That the way of Subſiſtence for the Clergy, is now much altered from what it was when Celibacy was enjoyned. For a Competency was always ſuppoſed where Reſidence was ſtrictly required; and what was a Competency to a ſingle perſon, is not ſo to a Family.

4. That the Church hath a power of Relaxing the ſeverity of Ancient Canons from the different Circumſtances of things: And when the general good of the Church may be more promoted therein; as in the Removal of Clergymen from one Dioceſs to another, and the Tranſlation of Biſhops.

5. That the Caſe is now very different, as to Diſpenſations, from what it was in the Church of Rome, as to the number of Benefices, and the manner of obtaining them that a great Reſtraint is laid by our Laws upon Pluralities, and our own Metropolitan is the Judge when they are fit to be granted.

But on the other ſide it is objected,

1. That in the firſt Conſtitution of Parochial Churches, every Incumbent was bound to a ſtrict Reſidence; ſo in the Canons of Egbert, Can. 25. Presbyters are ſaid to be ſettled in thoſe Churches, which had a Houſe and Glebe belonging to them; and many Canons were then expreſly made, that no Perſon ſhould have more than one Church; and it is ſaid in the Capitulars, that this had been ſeveral times decreed. And ſo it is in Herardus his Collection of Canons, Can. 49. in Iſaac Lingonenſis, Tit. 1. c. 24. in Chrodegangus, c. 67. in Ivo Carnotenſis, part. 3. c. 51. in Regino, l. 1. c. 254. The like we find in the Spaniſh Churches, Concil. Tolet. 16. c. 5. and thence in the Canon-Law, C. 10. Q. 3. c. 4. and in the Greek Churches, Concil. 7. Can. 15. C. 21. Q. 1. c. 1. And

And as ſoon as the Abuſe crept into theſe Weſtern Churches, it was complained of, and endeavoured to be redreſſed, Concil. Pariſ. 6. c. 49. Concil. Aquiſgran. 2. part. 2. c. 5. Concil. Matenſ. c. 3. That afterwards, not meerly the Mendicant Friars complained of them, as ſome have ſuggeſted, but ſome of the greateſt Biſhops have been zealous againſt them, as Gulielmus Pariſienſis, Peraldus, Archbiſhop of Lions, Jacobus de Vitriaco Biſhop of Acon, Robert de Chorton, Cardinal Guiard Biſhop of Cambray; and Gregory IX. declared, That he could only diſpenſe with the Penalty of the Law. After a ſolemn Diſputation at Paris, it was determined againſt Pluralities, if one Benefice be ſufficient; and all the Divines joyned with the Biſhop therein, except two; ſo that it ſeemed to be the current Opinion of the Learned and Pious Men of that time. Aquinas ſaith, It is a doubtful Point, but Cajetan is poſitive againſt them. So that all the Zeal againſt Pluralities, is not to be imputed to the Piques of the Friars againſt the Secular Clergy; although there is no queſtion but they were ſo much the more earneſt in it; but in the Council of Trent the Biſhops of Spain were the moſt zealous, as to the Point of Reſidence, and the Friars againſt it, as appears by Catharinus and others.

Caj. ad 2. 2. q. 185. R. 5.

2. Setting aſide all Authorities, the Argument in Point of Conſcience, ſeems the ſtrongeſt againſt Non-reſidence; becauſe perſons have voluntarily undertaken the Cure of Souls within ſuch Limits; and although the bounds be fixed by human Authority, yet ſince he hath undertaken ſuch a Charge perſonally, knowing thoſe Bounds, it lies upon his Conſcience to diſcharge the Duties incumbent upon him, which cannot be done without conſtant Reſidence, as the Magiſtrates are bound in Conſcience to do their Duty, although the Bounds are ſettled by human Laws: And ſo in the caſe of Property, human Laws bind ſo that it is a Sin to invade what is ſettled by them. And if it be left to a Man's Conſcience, whether a Man anſwers his Obligation more by perſonal Attendance, or by a Curate; whether the Honour of Religion, and the good of Souls be more promoted, and the Peace of his own Mind ſecured by one or the other, it is no hard matter to judge on which ſide it muſt go. It is impoſſible to defend all the Arguments uſed in the old Canons againſt Pluralities, as that Polygamy is unlawful under the Goſpel: So that, as a Biſhop hath but one City, and a Man but one Wife, ſo a Presbyter ought to have but one Church: That no Man can ſerve two Maſters, &c. but all their Reaſons were not of this ſort. For, the Council of Toledo ſpeaks home, That one Man cannot perform his Duty to more than one Charge. To the ſame purpoſe the ſixth Council at Paris; and withal, That it brings a Scandal on the Chriſtian Church, and an Hinderance to the publick Worſhip, and the good of Souls, and ſavours too much of a worldly Mind; which are weighty Arguments.

Concil. Tolet. 16. c. 5. C. 10. Q. 3. c. 3.

The only conſiderable thing on the other ſide, is, That the Biſhops are to take care that the Places be duly ſupplied; but whether it be done by Parſon, Vicar or Curate, is not material. But this will not hold. For, (1.) the Care of Souls is committed perſonally to him that doth undertake it. And a Regard is had to the Qualifications of the Perſon for ſuch a Truſt, by the Patron that Preſents, and the Biſhop who admits and inſtitutes the Perſon ſo qualified. (2.) The old Canons were very ſtrict as to perſonal Reſidence, ſo as to fix them in their Cures from which they could not go away when they pleaſed, which they called Promiſſionem ſtabilitatis. Our Saxon Canons are clear, as to the perſonal nal Cure, Can. Egbert. 1. 4, 6. Populo ſibi commiſſo; and no Presbyter could leave his Cure and go to another only for Honour or Profit, Can. 13. And none could go from one Biſhop to another, without his Dioceſan's Leave, Concil. Herudford. c. 5. Egbert. de Eccleſ. Inſtit. p. 97, 100. And when the Biſhop gives Inſtitution, he commits the Care of Souls to the Incumbent, and not meerly the Care that Divine Offices be there performed.

But yet it is well obſerved by Aquinas, That if the having more Benefices than one were a thing evil in it ſelf, it could in no caſe be diſpenſed with; but there are ſome Actions which in general are irregular, yet in ſome caſes may be juſtified; eſpecially, if they be extraordinary, as to publick Service and Uſefulneſs, &c.

And to the ſame purpoſe Cajetan ſpeaks, but he ſaith, The Caſes that make it lawful, muſt relate to a Publick, and not a Private Good; but he mentions theſe things which excuſe from Reſidence; 1. Lawful Impediments, as to Health, &c. 2. Publick Service. And others ſay, a Geometrical Proportion ought to be obſerved in the Diſtribution of Eccleſiaſtical Benefices, and not an Arithmetical, i. e. A Regard ought to be had to the Merits and Capacities of Perſons; as a Commander hath more Pay than many common Soulders; but this reaches only to the Value, and not to the Number of Benefices.

But the Queſtion ſtill remains, whether a Legal Diſpenſation take not off the Obligation in Point of Conſcience, ſince it is allowed by Law, and the Curate appointed by the Biſhop, who committed the Cure of Souls to him?

In anſwer to this, we muſt conſider,

1. That the Law propoſes in Diſpenſations very allowable ends, as Publick Service, Incouragement of Learning, Reward of Merit; and therefore Doctors by Favour have not the Privilege which others have; and in caſe of Incompetency, as it was then judged, no Legal Diſpenſation was needful.

2. Some Ancient Canons took care of the ſupply of the Place by competent Perſons, and in that caſe abated the Rigour of the Canon. For Sirmondus ſaith in the Canon of the Council of Nantz, againſt Pluralities, this Clauſe was added, unleſs he hath Presbyters under him to ſupply the Duties of his Place: And the ſame Clauſe is in Regino, l. 1. c. 254. and Regino puts it among the Articles of Enquiry, as to the Clergy, If any had more Churches than one without Presbyters to aſſiſt him. And in their old Admonition to them at Viſitations it is to the ſame purpoſe, but in others it is left out. Thomaſſin is of opinion, that the former enquiry related to thoſe who had Chapels, and not to more Churches, becauſe then there were none that had Titles upon anothers Benefice; but theſe Words are expreſs as to more Churches. It's true, there were no ſuch Titles then; for a Title in the old Canon Law, was the Relation which a Clergyman ſtood in to the Biſhop of his Dioceſs, being one of his Clergy; and ſo the Greek Canoniſts underſtand a Man's not being ordained without a Title, and not having two Churches; i. e. not to have Relation to two Dioceſſes, and ſo ſine Titulo is without being owned by ſome Biſhop; and this was that which they thought ought to be ſtrictly obſerved; and to which purpoſe many Canons were made, both ancient and later; and if any deſerted their Biſhop, they were liable to Deprivation. Afterwards the Word, Title, came to be applied to Parochial Churches; but there were ſome who found out, that the Ancient Canons had another Senſe. Thence in the Council of Placentia in the Canon Sanctorum Diſt. 70. c. 2. it was decreed, That one might have two Churches in the ſame Dioceſs, but not two Preferments in ſeveral Cathedrals. And in the Council of Clermont, A. D. 1095. the reaſon is given, becauſe according to the Canons no Man could have two Titles; and every one was bound to hold to the Title to which he was firſt ordained. But after all, the Council of Nantz ſhews plainly, that mere parochial Titles were then allowed, if well provided for, by ſuch perſons as the Biſhop of the Dioceſs approved. Now this very much alters the State of the caſe; for then the Obligation is Real, and not Perſonal.

Concil. Nanet. c. 8.

3. It was agreed by the Ancient Canons, that where there was an Incompetency of Maintenance, they allowed an Union for Support; now that is but the Biſhop's Act in joyning what had been divided, ſuppoſing a ſufficient Subſiſtence. And a reaſonable Diſtance with the Biſhop's Allowance, hath the ſame Equity; i. e. the Biſhop's Act may unite two ſmall Benefices for a Support, not by a perpetual Union, but ſo long as he ſees cauſe, which our Law doth ſtill allow, under ſuch a Value. But it is rather a Diſpenſation than an Union; for the Rights continue diſtinct. In the Court of Rome there were Prerogative Unions ad Vitam, which were very ſcandalous, and are owned by the beſt Canoniſts to be deſtructive of all Order, and invented to defeat the Canons againſt Pluralities. But the Unions which the Law allows, are only thoſe where two diſtinct Benefices are made one for a competent Subſiſtence; and then if the Union be reaſonable, the Diſpenſation within due Diſtance is ſo too. Balſamon ſaith, In the Greek Church Pluralities are not forbidden, if they be near, and under the ſame Biſhop; but they did not allow the ſame Man to be under two Biſhops. In the Capitulars that Clauſe is added, that no Man ſhall have more Livings than one, ſi Facultas ſuppetit, if it affords a reaſonable Subſiſtence.

Addit. 2. n. 10.

And therefore in caſe of Incompetency of Maintenance, of a good Proviſion for Curates, and of publick Service, the ſeverity of the Ancient Canons is with Reaſon abated, and a perſon is ſuppoſed to undertake the Cure, with thoſe Meaſures which the Law and Canons allow. But every Man who regards the doing his Duty out of Conſcience, will conſider how much lies upon himſelf; and that the original Intention of the Church and Laws was, That no Man ſhould undertake more than he was willing and ready to diſcharge, as far as one Man's Abilities could go. For, in great Cities, one great Pariſh requires more than ſeveral Churches in the Country; and in ſuch caſes an equitable Conſtruction muſt be put upon ſuch Canons, which require perſonal performance of theſe Duties.

OF

OF THE MAINTENANCE OF THE PAROCHIAL CLERGY, BY LAW.

THE Subject I intend now to conſider, is the Incouragment which the Parochial Clergy have by Law for the doing their Duties: Which are the Manſe, the Oblations, and the Tithes.

I. The Manſe, or Houſe and Glebe. In the Canons of Egbert it is ſaid, Can. 25. That an entire Manſe ought to belong to every Church, without any other than Eccleſiaſtical Service. By a Manſe, Mr. Selden ſaith in the old Charters the ſame is meant as a Caſat or Hyde of Land. Bignonius and Sirmondus ſay, So much Glebe as was an Imployment for an Husbandman and two Servants. Spelman ſaith, It takes in the Houſe too. Lynwood ſaith, As much Land as would imploy a Yoke of Oxen; and ſo the Gloſs on the Canon Law. But in another place the Gloſs ſaith, The Manſe is the original Endowment of the Church, without which it cannot be ſupplied: And without which it could not be conſecrated. For the Endowment was firſt to be produced before the building. Collatâ primitùs donatione ſolenni, are the Words of the Canon Law. And the ſame appears by Concil. Valent. 3. c. 9. Concil. Bracar. 2. c. 5. Vit. Udalrici c. 7. Regino l. 1. c. 23, 24. which is there explained to be a ſubſtantial Suſtenance for thoſe who were to attend the Service of that Church. And in the Acts of Conſecration of a Parochial Church in Baluzius, the Biſhop in the firſt place declares himſelf ſatisfied with the Endowment, unde dignè domus dei ſuſtentaretur. And upon this the original Right of Patronage, was founded, not upon the Soil, which gave no Title, where there was not a Church built and endowed with a competent Subſiſtence. So that all Advowſons or Rights of Preſentation in private Patrons, were at firſt Appendant to Manors, and not in Groſs; becauſe the Right came from the Endowment out of the Manor: And the Name of Patron in the ſenſe of the Feudal Law, is the ſame with Lord of the Fee, and ſo Beneficium is a Feudal Term; and till the Feudal Law prevailed, the Name of Patron is rarely uſed in this Senſe. And when it came to be uſed, the Patrons in France would have brought thoſe who had their Benefices to a kind of Feudal Service, and to have received Inveſtiture from them. This Mr. Selden drives at, as though the Patrons had the Right of Inveſtiture belonging to them, becauſe ſome ſuch Practice is often complained of in the French Canons, and as often condemned, not meerly by Eccleſiaſtical Canons, but by as good Laws as any were then made. It cannot be denied that bad Practices are the occaſion of making good Laws; but doth it follow that thoſe Practices which were againſt Law, were the Law of that time? Yet this is Mr. Selden's way of arguing; he grants, That there were Laws made but they were little obeyed. Muſt we therefore conclude thoſe illegal Practices to have been the ſtanding Law, and the Laws themſelves to be illegal? There were two things aimed at by thoſe Patrons. 1. To keep the Clergy in a ſole dependance on themſelves, without Regard to the Biſhop's Authority. 2. To make ſuch Bargains with them as they thought fit, both theſe were thought neceſſary to be redreſſed by Laws, ſince the Canons were ſlighted by them. And if the Practice be good againſt Law in one caſe, why not in the other alſo? Why is not Simony juſtified, as well as the Patron's abſolute Power over the Incumbents? But the Laws were ſevere againſt both. For in the time of Lud. Pius, A. D. 816. there was a ſolemn Aſſembly of the Eſtates of the Empire, where ſeveral Eccleſiaſtical Laws were paſſed, and among the reſt, theſe two: 1. That no Presbyters ſhould be put in or put out of Churches, without the Authority and Conſent of the Biſhops; and that the Biſhops ſhould not refuſe thoſe who were preſented, if they were probabilis Vitæ & Doctrinæ, i. e. ſuch as the Biſhops could not object againſt either for Life or Learning. 2. That every Church ſhould have an entire Manſe belonging to it, free from any Feudal Service; but if they had other Eſtates of their own, for them they were to anſwer to the Lords of the Manor, as others did. And from hence this came into the Collections of Ivo, Regino, Burchardus, and Gratian, and paſſed for a Law generally received. As to the former, a new Sanction was added to it in another Aſſembly at Worms, A. D. 829. c. 1. and repeated in the Capitulars, l. 5. c. 98. Addit. 4. c. 95. and the like to the latter, l. 5. c. 100. Capit. A. 829. c. 4.

But it ſeems there were ſome ſtill continued obſtinate in their former Practices, and therefore theſe Laws were re-inforced in another Aſſembly, A. D. 869. in the time of Carolus Calvus, who mentions the Laws of his Father and Grand-father to the ſame purpoſe, c. 9. and there takes notice of the Contrivances made uſe of to defeat the Intention of thoſe Laws; and the bottom of all is there ſaid to be abominable Simony. Which ſhews, what it was which theſe Patrons aimed at, by claiming Inveſtiture without the Biſhop. And it was then judged neceſſary, that the Biſhop's Conſent was required to prevent this Miſchief. But ſtill ſome Patrons required Feudal Service for the Glebe they had given to the Church; but the Law commands them to reſtore it free from ſuch Service, Capit. l. 5. c. 100. Addit. l. 4. c. 98. 163. And after much ſtruggling, Hincmarus, who lived at that time, ſaith, That theſe Laws were obſerved. The Patron's Right by Virtue of the Endowment, was not diſputed; but an Arbitrary Power, as to the Incumbents, was utterly denied them; and they were put under the Biſhop's Care, who was to receive Complaints againſt them, and to proceed according to the Churches Canons. But I am apt to think that all this ſtir in France did not ariſe from the pretence of original Donation and Endowment of Churches, but from the Infeodation of Church-Lands and Tithes, by Charles Martel (as an old MS. in Fileſacus ſaith) and others in France whoſe cuſtom it was to give them in Recompence to their Souldiers, who then looked on them as their own, and were hardly brought to any reaſonable allowance for the Clergy which ſupplied them. Theſe were called Beneficia in the Capitulars, and they were to pay Nonæ & Decimæ, i. e. a Fifth part out of them, which was obtained tained with much Difficulty, as appears by the many Laws made about them. In the Council at Leptins, A. D. 743. Carolomannus, Son to Charles Martel, owns the letting out ſome of the Church-Lands ſub Precario & Cenſu, upon a reſerved Rent, Can. 2. Capit. l. 5. c. 3. but then it was barely for Life. But the conſequence was, That it was very hard to recover either the Lands or the reſerved Rents, and they put in Clergymen, and put them out as they pleaſed, becauſe they held theſe Lands as beneficiary Tenures from the Crown. So that it was the Work of more than an Age to put the Church there in any tolerable Condition. But this ſeems to be very much miſtaken, when it is brought to prove the Right of Patronage from the Endowment, as to the Diſpoſal of Benefices.

But the Right of Patronage by the firſt building and endowing the Church, is owned by the Civil Law in Juſtinian's Novels, 123. c. 18. and two things were there required; 1. A ſufficient Maintenance for the Clergy who were nominated. 2. The Biſhop's Satisfaction as to their Fitneſs, about which he ſpeaks in another Novel, 56. Tit. 12. c. 2. And he elſewhere requires, that before any Churches were built, the Biſhop ſhould ſee that there were ſufficient Maintenance for thoſe who were to officiate, Novel. 66. Tit. 22.

The ſame Right obtained here upon the ſame Grounds, as appears by the Baron's Anſwer to Gregory IX. who affirm, That they had it ever ſince Chriſtianity was founded here. They mean, ever ſince parochial Churches were endowed by their Anceſtors; for there could be no ſuch Right of Patronage before. And ſuch Patrons were here called Advocati Eccleſiæ, as appears by Joh. Sarisbur. Ep. 6. 119. and the Jus Advocationis, as our Lawyers tell us, is a Right which a Perſon hath to preſent to a vacant Benefice in his own Name; which is agreeable to what Bracton and Fleta had ſaid long before.

But it doth not appear by them how the Names of Patron and Advocate came to be ſo applied. Among the Romans, ſaith Aſconius Pedianus, the Patron was he that pleaded the cauſe of another; the Advocate, he that appeared in Court on his behalf. But this doth not reach to the Jus Advocationis which we are now about. In the Ninety ſeventh Canon of the African Code, an Allowance is made for the Churches to have Advocates to ſolicite their Cauſes at Court. From hence the greater Churches and Monaſteries had their proper Advocates appointed them by the King, as Bignonius obſerves; and in the old Charters of Aub. Miræus, ſeveral ſuch Advocates are appointed; and it appears to have been an honorary Title, and great Men were pleaſed with it. Miræus ſaith, it was accounted a conſiderable Honour at that time. And ſo by degrees the Founders of Parochial Churches came to have the Title of Patrons and Advocates of them; and the Right they enjoy'd, the Right of Advowſon as well as Patronage (not as ſome ridiculouſly talk of Advocat ſe, or Advocat alium) becauſe the truſt and care of thoſe Churches, endowed by their Anceſtors, was fallen to them, and they were bound to look after, and to defend the Rights of them; and ſo Lynwood explains it.

II. The next thing to be conſidered is the Oblations of the People, which in thoſe elder times were ſo free and large, that (which may ſeem incredible now) there were Perſons who would build Churches on their own Land to have a Share in the Oblations, as is affirmed in one of the Spaniſh Councils, and there forbidden with great Severity.

rity. It was not, as the Gloſs on the Canon Law underſtands it, to make a Bargain for the Right of Patronage, but it is expreſſed to have an equal Share with the Clergy in the Oblations of the People.

It is obſerved by Agobardus, That the Devotion of Perſons in the firſt Ages was ſo great, that there was no need to make Laws or Canons for the Supplies of Churches, ſince they were ſo amply provided for by the Liberality of the People. Thence we read of the Depoſita pietatis in Tertullian, which were voluntary Oblations; and out of which were made Diviſiones Menſurnæ in S. Cyprian, and the Sportulæ, which were the Allowances made to the Clergy out of the common Stock; and they who received them, and not thoſe who gave them (as Mr. Selden fanſies) were called Sportulantes Fratres; and the Allowances were then ſtiled Stipes & Oblationes, which were ſo conſiderable, that S. Cyprian blamed ſome for their ſetting their Hearts too much upon them; Stipes, Oblationes, Lucra deſiderant, quibus prius inſatiabiles incubabant; which could not be ſaid of any meer neceſſary Subſiſtence; theſe they received tanquam Decimas ex fructibus, as S. Cyprian ſpeaks, in lieu of Tithes at that time, when the moſt of the Chriſtian Church inhabited the Cities, and gave out of their Stock to maintain the Church, and thoſe who attended upon the Service of it. But when Chriſtianity came to ſpread into the Countries, then a more fixed and ſettled Maintenance was required, but ſo as to retain ſomewhat of the Ancient Cuſtom in voluntary Oblations.

No ſooner was Chriſtianity ſettled in France, but we read of Lands given to the Church by Clodovæus after his Converſion; theſe are owned by the firſt Council of Orleans called in his time, A. D. 511. and were put into the Biſhop's Hands, and to be diſtributed by him for Repairs of Churches, Maintenance of the Clergy, and other pious Uſes, Can. 5. 14, 15. but beſides theſe, we read ſtill of Oblations made by the People on the Altar, both in the Mother-Church, and in Parochial Churches. If in the Mother-Church one Moiety went to the Biſhop, the other to the Clergy; if in the other, only the third part to the Biſhop.

In the ſecond Council of Maſcon, Can. 4. we find it required, That all the People make an Oblation of Bread and Wine at the Altar; and this was A. D. 585. but beſides, the next Canon inſiſts on the Payment of Tithes, as founded on the Law of God, and the Ancient Cuſtom of the Church, which is thereby reinforced; unde ſtatuimus & decernimus ut mos antiquus reparetur; which Words are not fairly left out by Mr. Selden, becauſe they ſhew that there was only in this Canon a renewing of an Ancient Cuſtom, which had obtained, but was now growing into Diſuſe. For this Council of Maſcon was called on purpoſe to reſtore what they found too much declining, as to Religion; and they begin with the Obſervation of the Lord's-day, and after, add this, wherein they complain of the Neglect of that which their Predeceſſors obſerved, as founded on the Law of God. So that there can be no doubt of the Cuſtom of paying Tithes in France, from the time of receiving Chriſtianity; and that this Cuſtom declined as their Religion did. In the Council of Nantz, about A. D. 658. Oblations and Tythes are mentioned together, c. 10. as making up the Churches Stock, which was to be divided into four Parts, to the Biſhop, and to the Clergy, and to Repairs, and to the Poor.

Selden of Tythes, c. 5. n. 5. p. 58.

But beſides the Oblations of the Living, it was then common to make Oblations at their Death; and theſe were call'd Oblationes defunctorum, and ſevere Canons were made againſt the Detainers of them, Concil. Vaſ. I. c. 4. Agath. c. 4, 13. Q. 2. 9, 10, 11. And ſo much appears by thoſe Canons which forbid Exactions at Funerals, Concil. Tribur. c. 16. Nannet. c. 6. where an Exception is made as to voluntary Gifts, either by the Parties deceaſed, or by the Executors. But here, in the Saxon times there was a Funeral Duty to be paid called Pecunia ſepulchralis & Symbolum Animæ, and a Saxon Soulſhot; this is required by the Council at Ænham, and inforced by the Laws of Canutus, c. 14. and was due to the Church, the Party deceaſed belonged to, whether he were there buried or not. Some take this for the Foundation of Mortuaries; but then the Money muſt be turned into Goods. For in Glanvil's time, a Freeholder is allowed to make his Will of other things, provided that he give his firſt beſt thing to his Lord, and his ſecond to the Church. And this was not originally pro anima defuncti, as Lynwood thinks, from the Modern Canoniſts De Conſuetud. f. 12. but it was a Right of the Church ſettled on the Deceaſe of a Member of it, as appears by the Law of Canutus. Others have ſaid, That it was in lieu of Tythes ſubſtracted, and Oblations not duly made. So Simon Langham in his Conſtitution about Mortuaries, which was made to explain a former Conſtitution of Robert Winchelſee, becauſe the People were obſerved not to pay their Tithes and Oblations as they ought. But he did not go about to ſettle a Right which had not been before, but to prevent Suits about that which was to be taken for a Mortuary; and he declares, That where there was a choice of three or more, the ſecond was to be for the Mortuary, De Sepult. f. 93. b. So that Richard Winchelſee ſuppoſes it to be an Ancient Right. Indeed in the Cotton MS. of the Council of Merton, where this Conſtitution is extant, the Reaſon is given, That it was required by way of Compenſation for the Neglect of Tithes and Oblations. In the Synod of Wincheſter, in his time, a Conſtitution is made for the uniform Payment of Mortuaries in that Dioceſs, the ſecond beſt of the Goods or Chattels was to be paid in lieu of Tithes unpaid. In the Synod of Exeter of Pet. Quivil, 15 E. 1. the reaſon is given for the Neglect of all Parochial Duties; but there it is ſaid, That ſome pleaded Cuſtom againſt the Payment of them, and others, as to the Manner; and although this Council endeavoured to ſettle an uniform Payment, yet the Statute of circumſpectè agatis, leaves the whole Matter to Cuſtom, ubi Mortuarium dari conſuevit. From whence my Lord Coke infers, That there is no Mortuary due by Law, but only by Cuſtom. The true Inference was, That the contrary Cuſtom had altered the Law from what it was in the times of Canutus and Glanvil. But that the prevailing Cuſtom became the ſtanding Law, as to Mortuaries, appears by the Statute of 21 H. 8. c. 6. which limits the Payment where the Cuſtom continued, but allows Liberty for free Oblations: And this free Oblation was then called Cors preſentè, and was diſtinct from the Mortuary in lieu of Tithes as appears by the Inſtances in Sir W. Dugdale. But I return to other Oblations, which Lynwood diſtinguiſheth into thoſe by way of Gift, and ſuch as became due. For theſe latter, he inſiſts on c. Omnis Chriſtianus in the Canon Law, De Conſecr. D. 1. c. 69. which requires that every one who approaches the Altar, makes ſome Oblation. Where the Gloſs ſaith, it is but Counſel at other times, but a Command on the Feſtivals.

vals. For this 16 Q. 1. c. 55. is produced, quas populus dare debet; but it is there interpreted of the caſe of Neceſſity: Hoſtienſis thinks all are obliged on great Feſtivals, and that the general Cuſtom lays an Obligation; but Lynwood thinks the Cuſtom of particular Churches is to be obſerved.

In the Synod of Exeter before mentioned, Oblations are ſaid to be of Divine Right, and that every Pariſhioner is obliged to make them; but the time is limited to Chriſtmas, Eaſter, the Saints day of the Church and the Dedication, or All-Saints. So that four times in the Year they were required to make Obligations after the Age of Fourteen. And ſo Giles, biſhop of Sarum debent offerre ex debito quater in anno.

Spelm. II. p. 393.

In the Synod of Wincheſter, none were ſo obliged till Eighteen, and having Goods of their own.

p. 303.

But I obſerve, that in the Ancient Canons here, by the Oblations, ſuch things were then underſtood, as were for the Support of the Clergy: Thence ſeveral Canons were made againſt thoſe who turned them another way. So in the Council of London under Archbiſhop Stratford, Oblations are declared to belong only to Eccleſiaſtical Perſons. And ſo Lynword ſaith, The Goods of the Church are called Oblations. And in caſe the Mother-Church were appropriated, the Oblations and Obventions made in the Chapel of Eaſe, did not belong to the Convent, but to the Perſons who officiated there. Theſe were called by the Name of the Altarage, and were generally expreſſed under that Name in the Endowment of Vicarages; but when theſe were too ſmall for the Maintenance of the Vicar, thoſe ſmall Tithes which were joyned with them, were comprehended under that Name; and ſo it hath been reſolved in the Courts of Law upon a ſolemn Hearing.

John de Burgo, in his Pupilla Oculi, ſpeaking of Oblations, ſaith, That perſons may be bound to them four Ways:

1. By Contract upon the Foundation of the Church, which amounts only to a Penſion upon Endowment.
2. By Promiſe either living or dying.
3. By Neceſſity, when the Parochial Miniſter cannot be ſupported without it.
4. By Cuſtom, in the greater Solemnities; but he ſaith, the Proportion and Kind are left to Diſcretion; which made Oblations ſink ſo low, that the Parochial Clergy muſt have ſtarved, if they had had nothing elſe to ſupport them.

Joh. de Burgo Pupill. Oculi, f. 118. b.

But beſides theſe, he mentions Occaſional Oblations upon particular Services, as at Marriages, Chriſtnings, Funerals, &c. concerning which we have ſeveral Conſtitutions againſt thoſe who went about to hinder them, or to reduce them to a ſmall Quantity. The Eaſter-Offerings are none of theſe voluntary Oblations, but a Compoſition for Perſonal Tithes payable at that time; of which I may have occaſion to ſpeak more afterwards. But in the Saxon times here were other ſorts Oblations; As (1.) the Cyrycſceat or Firſt fruits of Corn payable at St. Martin's Day, Ina LL. 4. 62. Edmund. c. 2. and is often mentioned in Doomeſday-book, and in Fleta l. 2. c. 47. Malmesb. l. 2. c. 11. and the Oblation of Poultry at Chriſtmas is mentioned in Doomeſday, under that Title. (2.) There was here another kind of Oblation called Plow-Alms, which was a Peny for every Plow between Eaſter and Whitſontide. This is mentioned in the Laws of King Ethelred, and required to be paid Fifteen days after Eaſter, although it be called Eleemoſyna Aratralis. In the Endowment of the Vicarage of S. Ives, Plow-Alms is mentioned beſides the Altarage and Obventions. Mon. I. 250.

But all theſe Oblations made a very poor Subſiſtence for the Parochial Clergy.

III. And therefore I come to the main Legal Support of the Parochial Clergy, which is in Tithes. Concerning which I ſhall proceed in this Method;

I. To conſider the Foundation in Law which they ſtand upon.

II. The Rules of Law which are to be obſerved about them.

2 Inſt. 642. I. As to the Foundation they ſtand upon in point of Law. My Lord Coke not only ſaith, That the Parochial Right of Tithes is eſtabliſhed by divers Acts of Parliament; but he mentions the Saxon Laws before the Conqueſt for the Payment of Tithes of Edward and Guthrun, Ethelſtan, Hob. R. 296. Edmund, Edgar, Canutus, and King Edward's confirmed by William I. Hobart ſaith, That Tithes are things of common Right, and do of Right belong to the Church, and ſince Pariſhes were erected, they are due to the Parſon (except in ſpiritual regular Caſes) or Vicar of the Pariſh.

Regiſt. f. 46. In the Regiſter of Writs, a Book of great Authority, there is a Writ of Conſultation for Tithes, wherein they are owned to be of common Right, as well as immemorial Cuſtom, due to the Rector within the Limits of his Pariſh.

Moor f. 50. Lord chief Juſtice Dyer ſaith, That Tithes can never be extinguiſhed, becauſe they are of common Right.

Bulſtrod. 3. 243. The ſame is affirmed by Juſtice Dodderige in the Caſe of Foſſe and Parker.

11 R. 13. In Pieddle and Napper's Caſe, Tithes are ſaid to be an Eccleſiaſtical Inheritance collateral to the Eſtate in Land, and of their own Nature due to an Eccleſiaſtical Perſon: And, That all Lands of common Right Hob. 298 44. are to pay Tithes. Therefore it is ſaid by Hobart in Slade's Caſe, That no Land can be diſcharged of Tithes although it may be diſcharged of the actual Payment.

Rolls R. 2. 174. Poph. R. 155. In Popham's Reports we read, That it is a Maxim in Law, that all Perſons ought to pay Tithes, and all Lands ſhall be charged with them of common Right. So that if the Judgment of ſome of the greateſt Men of the Profeſſion may be taken, nothing can be more clear and evident than the Legal Right of Tithes. But it falls out unhappily among us, that nothing hath been the Occaſion of ſo much Difference and Contention between the Incumbents and their Pariſhioners, as the Point of the Payment of Tithes. So that ſome have wiſhed them changed into ſome other way of Maintenance; but I cannot ſee any Reaſon why ſo antient, ſo legal, ſo juſt a Maintenance ſhould be changed into any other, which would leſs anſwer the End, and be liable to as many Difficulties, if not far more; but every Change of this kind, where we cannot be ſecured of the Event, is very dangerous, eſpecially when it proceeds from want of Judgment or Ill-will to the Profeſſion; both which are to be ſuſpected in this caſe. If the ill Humors of ſome People could be changed, it would ſignifie far more to the Quiet of the Clergy, than altering their legal Maintenace.

Therefore the beſt way is to enquire into the Reaſons of this Diſſatisfaction, that we may find out the proper Methods to remove it, and thereby to prevent the troubleſome and vexatious Suits about them, which make the Parochial Clergy ſo uneaſie, and their Labour often unſucceſsful with the People.

And there is a twofold Diſſatisfaction which lies at the bottom of moſt of theſe Contentions about Tithes.

1. In Point of Conſcience.

2. In Point of Law.

1. In Point of Conſcience. There is a ſort of People among us, who are very obſtinate in this Matter, and will rather chuſe to go to Priſon and lie there, than pay their Tithes. I have often thought whence ſuch a Stiffneſs ſhould ariſe in a matter of legal Right. If they had oppoſed all Determinations of Property by Law, they had been more conſiſtent with themſelves; but to allow the Law to determine the Right as to nine Parts, and not as to the tenth, is not to be reconciled. For if the Queſtion be concerning the other Parts, to whom they do belong, may not Men as well diſpute the matter of Dominion and Property in them? May they not ſay, that the Seed is our own, and the Labour and Charges our own; why then ſhall I anſwer to another for the Profit which ariſes from my Pains and Expence? If it be replied, That the Law hath given the Property of the Land to one, and the uſe to another, why may they not pretend this to be an unreaſonable Law to ſeparate one from the other, ſince Land was given for the uſe; and the original Right of Dominion was from what was neceſſary for uſe; therefore the ſeparating Right and Uſe, is an Incroachment on the Natural Rights of Mankind. And there ſeems to be more Colour for this, than for any to allow the Laws to determine the Right of nine Parts to belong to the Lord of the Soil, but the tenth by no means to go that way, which the Law of the Land hath long ſince determined it. So that the Lord of the Soil either by Deſcent or Purchaſe, can claim no Right to it; for neither did his Anceſtors enjoy it, nor thoſe who ſold the Land to a Purchaſer conſider it as his own, for then he would have had the Value of it. The tenth part then is ſet aſide in Valuation of Eſtates, as already diſpoſed of; and the Queſtion is, whether the ſame Law which ſettled the Right to the other, ſhall determine this likewiſe? Is it not a part of natural Injuſtice to detain that which by Law belongs to another? And is not the Law the Meaſure of Right in Caſes of Difference between Man and Man; Why then ſhould not the Law fairly and equally determine this matter, to whom the tenth of the Profits belongs?

But ſtill they ſay, It is againſt their Conſcience, and they cannot do it. Is it againſt their Conſcience to do Acts of Natural Juſtice, not to detain that from another, which of Right belongs to him? But it is in vain to argue with People, who do not judge of things by the common light of Reaſon and Juſtice, but by an unaccountable Light within them, which none can judge of but themſelves; and in matter of Intereſt Men are the worſt Judges in their own Caſe.

2. Therefore I come to thoſe who are capable of being argued with; ſuch, I mean, who are unſatisfied in the Point of Law, not in general, but in particular Caſes, from whence Suits ariſe, and thoſe are often from theſe Cauſes:

1. Not duly conſidering the juſt Meaſure and Extent of the Rules of Law for the Payment of Tithes.

2. Not attending to the Exemptions, or Diſcharges by Law from the Payment of Tithes.

The beſt way I know to prevent troubleſome ſuits about Tithes, is to enquire diligently into theſe two things:

1. The Rules of Law for the Payment of Tithes, One might have juſtly expected, that in a matter of common Right and daily Practice, and wherein the Peace and Quiet of the People is ſo much concerned, as well as of the Clergy, the Rules of Law ſhould have been plain, and clear, and liable to as few Exceptions as poſſible; but inſtead of this, there is not one general Rule in this matter, but hath ſeveral Exceptions, and different Opinions have been about them by the great Men of the Law, which hath given too much occaſion to the Multitudes of ſuits which have been in the matter of Tithes; ſo that the Clergy are not ſo much to blame, if they are unavoidably involved in ſuits by the Perplexity of the Law, and the different Reſolutions which have been made about the Caſes reported by them.

This I ſhall make appear by examining ſome of the moſt general Rules of Law, and comparing them with the Reſolutions which have been made in particular Caſes.

Law of Tithes, c. 12. p. 214.

1. One of the moſt ſtanding Rules of the Law, is, That Tithes are only to be paid of things which do annually increaſe, ex annuatis renovantibus ſimul & ſemel.

But is this Rule allowed in all Caſes?

2 Inſt. 651. Select. Caſes, 16.

1. From hence Coke concludes, That no Tithes are to be paid of Minerals, or of what is of the Subſtance of the Earth; and ſo Stone, Turff, Tinn, Lead, Coals, Chalk, Pots of Earth, are denied to be titheable. But I find, 5 H. 4. n. 65. a Petition of the Commons was denied about being ſued in the Eccleſiaſtical Courts for Tithes of Stone and Slate taken out of their Quarries. The Petition was renewed, 8 H. 4. and then the King's Anſwer was, That the former Cuſtom ſhould continue. And ſo about Tithes for Sea-Coals, 51 E. 3. n. 57. From whence it appears, that theſe things might be tithed by ancient Cuſtom, and that was not thought fit to be altered. But, 34 Eliz. it was reſolved in the King's-

Moor 908. C. El. 277.

Bench, That no Tithes are due of Quarries of Slate or Stone, in the Caſe of Lyſle and Wats. Here was no Regard to Cuſtom, and a Reaſon is given, which deſerves to be conſidered, viz. That he may have Tithes of the Graſs or Corn which groweth upon the Surface of the Land where the Quarries are. But how if there be none? As Lands where Quarries are, ſeldom afford Tithes. But the Note on the Regiſter ſaith, That if Corn doth grow there, Tithe of it would be due however. So that here we have a Rule againſt an ancient Cuſtom and Rule too. But it cannot be denied, that Fitz-Herbert and Brook ſay, That there is no Tithe of Quarries, or Coals, or ſuch things; and it was ſo adjudged, 11. Jac. and 14. Jac. and in other Caſes ſince. And yet after all, Rolls yields, That a Cuſtom in theſe caſes is to be allowed; ſo that the general Rule is to be underſtood ſo, as there be no Cuſtom to the contrary. And as to Minerals, it is determined by a late Writer, That by Cuſtom Tithes may be due of them, although they do not annually increaſe. And my Lord Coke mentions King John's Grant to the Biſhop of Exeter of the Tithe of his Tinn-Farm. And a good Author aſſures us, That in Places of Lead-Mines, the Tithe of Lead is the chief Part of the Miniſters Maintenance. Therefore my Lord Coke concludes his Diſcourſe of Tithes with this general Rule, That by Cuſtom a Parſon may have Tithes of ſuch things as are not titheable of common Right.

2 Inſt. 662. 11 R. 15, 16. Rolls 1. 636.

2. From hence it is concluded, That no Tithe can be due for Houſes, becauſe they have no annual Increaſe. This was ſolemnly debated in Dr. Grant's Caſe, 11 Jac. and that there was no Tithe due, was proved by the Counſel from the Regiſter, Fitz. H. N. B. Brook, &c. But it was reſolved by the Court, That although Houſes of themſelves were not titheable, yet there might be a Modus decimandi on the Ground on which the Houſes ſtood, and the Houſes did not take away the Right before; and in moſt ancient Cities and Burroughs there was ſuch a Modus for the Maintenance of their Miniſter. I grant that there was a certain Modus decimandi upon Houſes, but not upon the Account of the Ground they ſtood upon; but there was a cuſtomary Duty upon Houſes in lieu of Tithes, and were accounted a ſort of Prædial Tithes, although they were called Oblationes de domibus, as Lynwood ſaith, and were diſtinct from perſonal Tithes, for the Jews were bound to pay Tithes of Houſes, but not perſonal. Such was the Rate on Houſes in London: But in Dr. Layfield's Caſe it was denied, that there could be a Preſcription of Tithes upon Houſes, becauſe they are to be paid only for the Increaſe of things. What is now become of the former Modus decimandi, when a Preſcription was here inſiſted upon and denied? So that here were different opinions, a ſpecial Cuſtom was allowed upon good Reaſon; and here a Preſcription diſallowed upon ſuch a Reaſon as would have overthrown the former Cuſtom, and yet the Law was the ſame ſtill.

3. From hence it would follow, That if this Rule hold, things which have not an annual Increaſe would not be titheable: Then no Tithe of Saffron would be due, whoſe Heads are gathered but once in three years, nor of Sylva cædua, under twenty years; and yet this was allowed in Parliament at Sarum, ſaith the Regiſter, notwithſtanding it was not renewed every year. And Rolls ſaith, That Tithes ſhall be paid of Beeches, Hazle, Willows, Holly, Alder, Maple, even after twenty Years, becauſe they are not Timber. But what if Willows be uſed for Timber? Then Hobart ſaith, they ought to be excepted. If young Trees grow in a Nurſery, and be ſold, it is allowed that Tithes ſhall be paid of them, and theſe are not renewed every year. And what becomes now of this general Rule, when ſo many Exceptions are made to it?

4. If this Rule hold, there can be no Tithes of After-paſture, for the Rule is ſimul & ſemel. And my Lord Coke, ſaith, It was adjudged, 8. Jac. That a Parſon ſhall not have two Tithes of Land in one year; and he inſtances in the Hay and After-paſture, &c. And yet Rolls affirms, That it is due by Law, unleſs there be a Preſcription to the contrary; and he ſaith, the Judgment was given upon the Preſcription. And therefore he reſolves it into a Modus decimandi. But he mentions ſeveral Judgments That no Tithe is due for After-paſture, where Tithe-Hay hath been paid before; which muſt be where there was no Cuſtom to the contrary, or elſe he muſt contradict himſelf. And ſo Yelverton ſaith in the Caſe of Green and Auſten, That of common Right, Tithe-Hay diſcharges the Tithe of the After-paſture. But Crook ſaith, That in that caſe the Court went upon the Preſcription, and allowed it to be good. How could it go upon both? And Sir S. Degge is poſitive, that if a Meadow affords two Crops, the Parſon ſhall have Tithe of both. How can theſe things conſiſt? Or what Authority may we rely upon in ſuch Difference of Opinions?

2. Another Rule in Law is, That things which are feræ Naturæ, are not titheable. But here we are to ſeek what things are feræ Naturæ? Whether ſuch things as may be tamed and kept under Cuſtody, and become a Man's Property, are feræ Naturæ? Is it not Felony to ſteal Rabbets or Pigeons? If it be, they muſt be ſome Man's Property; and if they be a Man's proper Goods, how can they be ſaid to be feræ Naturæ? For the meaning was, That no Man was to pay Tithes for that which was not his own. Are not Bees feræ Naturæ, as much as Pigeons and Rabbets? But the Tithe of Bees is allowed to be paid by the tenth of the Honey and Wax. But Rolls ſaith, That it was doubted whether a tenth Swarm were a good Modus for the Tithe of Bees, becauſe they are feræ Naturæ. The Reaſon is, becauſe they are left wild, and under no Cuſtody; but if they went into ſeveral Hives belonging to the Proprietor, they might be titheable by the Hives. And ſo for Pigeons under Cuſtody in a Dove-houſe, they are a Man's Property, and therefore titheable: As it hath been ſeveral times reſolved in Courts of Law, 14. Jac. in Whately and Fanbor's Caſe, in Jones and Gaſtrill's Caſe, a Prohibition was denied; and Juſtice Dodderidge declared, to whom the Court aſſented, that Tithe was due both of young Pigeons and Conies. But the prevailing opinion hath been, That if are conſumed in the Houſe, they are not titheable, but if they ſold, they are. But are they not feræ Naturæ as well when they are ſold at Market, as when they are eaten at home? Why then are they titheable in one Caſe, and not in the other? If they are titheable at all, they are ſo where-ever they are ſpent; for in tithing, the Nature of the thing is to be conſidered, and not the Place of ſpending it. For upon the ſame Reaſon there would be no Tithe of Corn ſpent at home, or Pigs, Calves, &c. and therefore I look on the Reaſon as of worſe Conſequence, than the total denying the Payment. For who can tell how far this Reaſon may be carried in other Caſes?

March 56. Hetley 13. Rolls 1. 635, 636. Palmer 527. Cr. Car. 264, 339. Lynw. 101. Spel. II. 503. Hardr. 188. Kebl. 2. 452. 1 Inſt. 115. 6. 244. Monaſt. I. 577. 646, 1002. II. 4. 658.

But it is reſolved in many Caſes, that though they are feræ Naturæ, yet by Cuſtom they may be tithed; and ſo for Fiſh. Cuſtom it ſeems hath the Power of reducing things feræ Naturæ to the ſame Condition with other things. But as far as I can find, theſe things by our old Conſtitutions, were as titheable as other things; but the notion of their being feræ Naturæ being ſtarted, ſerved as a Plea againſt them, where the Cuſtom was not continued; and where it was beyond all Diſpute then they ſaid they were not titheable in themſelves, but only by Cuſtom; or not by Law, but by Cuſtom; and yet ſuch Cuſtoms make a part of our Law.

In ſeveral ancient Appropriations, Fiſh, and Pigeons, and Rabbets are expreſly mentioned, as given together with other Tithes; ſo that in thoſe times both Law and Cuſtom went together. For the Lords of Manours were not wont to give Tithes which were not otherwiſe due.

3. But what is to be done with thoſe Lands which might afford Tithe, if the Increaſe of Graſs were ſuffered, but the Owners feed Cattel upon it, and ſo there can be no Tithes, what remedy doth the Law afford in this Caſe?

Lynw. f. 99. F. N. B. 53. 2 Inſt. 651.

1. It is agreed that no Tithe is due, if no other Cattel be fed, but ſuch as the Owner pays Tithe for, or are imployed in plowing, or any other way which is for the Benefit of the Incumbent of that Pariſh where they are fed. For otherwiſe they are but as barren Cattel to him.

Hadres, 184.

2. That there is a certain Rate due for the Agiſtment of barren Cattel, Jure communi, and ſo delivered by Hales then chief Baron, according to the Value of the Land, unleſs Cuſtom hath determined otherwiſe. And ſo for Gueſt-Horſes, &c. unleſs the Inn-keeper had paid

Tithe-Hay, ſay ſome, or the Cuſtom be otherwiſe: But none for Saddle-Horſes for the uſe of the Owner. One of the Judges diſſenting, becauſe not intended for Husbandry. But for unprofitable Cattel the tenth part of the Bargain is due, or according to the Value of the Land, and the Owner of the Cattel is compellable to pay.

3. If profitable and unprofitable be mixed, ſo as the latter be the greater Number, then Herbage muſt be paid for them, and Tithe in kind for the profitable; but if the profitable be the greater Number, it is queſtioned whether the other are not excuſed; but no Law or precedent is produced for it: And there ſeems to be no Reaſon, if Paſturage be due for unprofitable Cattel, why they ſhould be excuſed becauſe there are more profitable, unleſs their Nuber be inconſiderable.

Poph. 142. Rolls 1. 641, 650. Bulſt. 1. 171. Rolls, 1. 641. Poph. 176, 197. Hardres 184. Law of Tithes 200.

Theſe things I have only briefly touched at, that you may the better govern your ſelves in Diſputes of this Nature; and as you are not to loſe the juſt Rights of the Church, ſo neither is it for your Intereſt or Honour to be ingaged in them, where the Law will not bear you out.

II. The next thing neceſſary to be conſidered, is, the legal diſcharges from the Payment of Tithes. For, although the Reaſon of the Payment of them be founded on the Law of God, and the Settlement of Tithes among us hath been by ancient and unqueſtionable Laws of the Land, yet the Recovery of Tithes when unjuſtly detained, can be no otherwiſe than by the Law of the Land, as it is now in force. And if theſe do allow ſeveral Diſcharges and Exemptions not to be found in the ancient Laws of Practice, we ſhall but involve our ſelves in fruitleſs Contentions, if we diſpute thoſe Limitations which the Law hath put upon the Payment of Tithes. And therefore our Buſineſs is to enquire and ſatisfie our ſelves, as well as we can, about the Nature and Extent of theſe Limitations.

Now there are four ſorts of Diſcharges of the Payment of Tithes allowed.

1. By Appropriations to Monaſteries.
2. By Privileges of particular Orders.
3. By Preſcription and real Compoſitions.
4. By Unity and Poſſeſſion.

Of theſe I ſhall diſcourſe in order, ſo as to clear the greateſt Difficulties, with reſpect to them.

1. As to Appropriations. By the Statute of Diſſolution, 31 H. 8. 13. the new Poſſeſſors are to enjoy their Parſonages appropriated, Tithes, Penſions, and Portions, and all other Lands belonging to them, diſcharged and acquitted of the Payment of Tithes, as freely, and in as ample a manner as they were enjoyned before.

32 H. 8. 7. It is Enacted, That no Perſons ſhall be compelled, or otherwiſe ſued to yield, give or pay any manner of Tithes for any Manors, Lands, Tenements, or other Hereditaments, which by Laws or Statutes of this Realm or diſcharged, or not chargeable with the payment of any ſuch Tithes. So that we muſt enquire into the State of Parſonages appropriated before the Diſſolution, and how the Payment of Tithes ſtood then.

I will not deny that there were Churches appropriated to Monaſteries in the Saxon times; but if Mr. Selden's Doctrine hold good, as to the Arbitrary Conſecration of Tithes till the twelfth Century, thoſe Churches cannot carry the Tithes along with them, but only ſuch Glebe and Oblalations as belonged to them. For how could the Tithes paſs with the Churches, if they were not then annexed to them? But he confeſſes, That the mention of Tithes with Churches in Appropriations, was rare, or not at all till after the Normans. The Reaſon might be, that the Separation of Tithes from the Churches, was not known till the Norman times. For the Norman Nobility took little notice of the Saxon Laws about Tithes; but finding Tithes paid out of the Lands within their Manors, they thought they did well, if they gave the whole Tithes, or a Portion and ſhare of them, as they thought fit, to ſome Monaſtery either abroad at home. And this I take to be the true account of the beginning of Appropriations among us. It were endleſs to give an account of the Appropriations made by the Normans, for the Monaſticon is full of them. William I. gave ſeveral Churches with their Tithes to Battle-Abby. William Rufus added more. H. 1. to the Monaſtery of Reading, ſeveral Churches in like manner; and H. 2. more. Hugh Earl of Cheſter, gave the Tithes of ſeveral Manors to the Monaſtery of St. Werburgh, in the time of William I. Of which kind the Inſtances are too many to be mentioned; inſtead thereof, I ſhall ſet down the State of the Parochial Clergy under theſe Appropriations, which was very mean, and intended ſo to be, being ſupplied by the Engliſh Clergy.

1. Where the Churches and Tithes were appropriated to a Monaſtery, the Vicar had only ſuch a Competency as the Biſhop thought fit to allow, till Vicarages came to be endowed: For right underſtanding this matter of Appropriations, as it ſtood here in England, theſe things are to be conſidered.

1. That there was a Parochial Right of Tithes ſettled in the Saxon times: Which I infer from the Laws of Edgar and Canutus, where the Tithes are required to be paid to the Mother-Church; and if the Lord of a Manor have a Church on his own Free-land, he may retain a third part of the Tithes for the uſe of it. Theſe Laws are ſo plain and clear, that Mr. Selden does not deny them; and he confeſſes, the firſt Limitation of Profits to be contained in them. But what is to be underſtood by the Mother-Church to which the Tithes were given? Mr. Selden would have it the Monaſtery or Mother-Church; but afterwards he grants, That a Parochial Right to Incumbents was hereby ſettled; Which is the firſt legal Settlement of Tithes in a Parochial Manner: But theſe Laws of Edgar and Canutus were ſo ſolemnly enacted, that, as Mr. Selden obſerves they were particularly called, Leges Anglicæ, the old Engliſh Laws in the old Latin MSS. It is a commonly received Opinion among the Lawyers of the beſt Rank, That before the Lateran Council there was no Parochial Settlement of Tithes here. My Lord Coke found no ſuch decree of the Lateran Council under Alexander 3. 5 H. 2. A.D. 1179. and therefore he refers it to a Decretal of Innocent 3. As to the Lateran Council which Lynwood mentions, it plainly ſpeaks of Feudal Tithes, which a Perſon enjoyed by the Churches Grant, and ſuch might before that Council, be given to what Church the Perſon pleaſed. But is there no difference between Feudal and Parochial Tithes? And what Proof is there of any ancient Infeodations of Tithes here? Mr. Selden himſelf thinks Lynwood applies the Cuſtom of other Countries to his own. But as to the Parochial Right of Tithes among us, it ſtands thus: By the Saxon Laws the Parochial was ſettled. After the Norman Invaſion theſe Laws were neglected and ſlighted by the Normans; H. I. by by his Charter reſtored them, H. 1. c. 11. and the very words of the Laws of Edgar and Canutus are repeated. The Normans went on notwithſtanding, and ſo theſe Laws were diſcontinued in Practice. But Hadrian 4. who was an Engliſhman by Birth, obſerving the diſorderly Payments of Tithes here, publiſhed a Conſtitution to require the Parochial Payment of them, as is obſerved by P. Pithæus, a very learned and impartial Man. After him Alexander 3. in a Decretal directed to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury and his Suffragans, complains, That whereas the Pariſhioners had formerly paid their Tithes entirely where they ought to pay them, the contrary Cuſtom had obtained; and ſome withdrew the Tithe of Wool, Fiſh, and Mills; therefore he requires the ſtrict Payment of them to the Churches to which they were due. The latter part only is in the Canon Law, but the former is added from the ancient Copies by Pithæus.

Not. in Decret. l. 3. c. 30. n. 4.

As to the Decretal of Innocent III. to which my Lord Coke refers, and Mr. Selden thinks was miſtaken for the Lateran Council, being brought into England with it; there is ſuch an Epiſtle extant in the Collection of his Epiſtles, but not put into the Canon Law, and was nothing but an Inforcement of the former Laws, and a declaring the contrary Cuſtom void, which had too much obtained ſince the Norman times. But in a Decretal extant in the Canon Law, De Decim. c. 29. he acknowledges the Parochial payment of Tithes to be due by common Right, Cum perceptio Decimarum ad Paræciales Eccleſias de Jure communi pertineat. Can any thing be plainer than that the Parochial Right could not depend upon his Decretal Epiſtle, when himſelf confeſſes that they were due by common Right?

Innocent. 3. Epiſt. 3. c. 114.

We do not deny that he inforced the Payment which had been ſo groſly neglected in the Norman times, and the moſt they would be brought to in many places, was to pay only a third part to the Pariſh-Prieſt who officiated, and gave the reſt to Monaſteries, and often appropriated the whole Tithes to them, either at home or abroad, as will abundantly appear by the Monaſticon; from whence it is plain, that they looked on Tithes in general, as due to the Church, as appears by very many of their ancient Charters; but they thought they did very well when they appropriated them to Monaſteries of their own Erection, or others, as they thought fit. But this Humour took ſo much among the Norman Nobility, and ſerved ſo many purpoſes of Honour and Devotion, as they thought (beſides Reaſon of State) that the Parochial Clergy were reduced to ſo poor a Condition, that Alexander IV. complained of it as the Bane of Religion, and Deſtruction of the Church, and as a Poiſon which had ſpread over the whole Nation. And it muſt be very ſcandalous indeed, when the Pope complained of it: For the Monks that were able, generally got their Appropriations confirmed in the Court of Rome.

2. There was a Competency to be ſettled on the Parochial Clergy by the Biſhop's Conſent, which was required in order to the confirming an Appropriation; as may be ſeen in Multitudes of them in the Monaſticon, beſides thoſe which are preſerved in the Churches Regiſter. Clergy too little; and therefore requires the Biſhops to take care that the Vicar had a competent Subſiſtence, ſo as to be able to bear the Burden of his Place, and to keep Hoſpitality. This was directed to the Biſhop of Worceſter; for it ſeems ſo long ſince the poor Vicars here were hardly provided for. And yet I have ſeen ſeveral Forms of Appropriations made by the Biſhops here, after the Conqueſt, wherein there is a twofold Salvo; one for the Biſhop's Right, and another for a ſufficient Maintenance for the Curate, although the Church were appropriated ad communem uſum Monachorum, as of Wolſtan, Roger, and of William in the time of Hen. II. when Alexander III. lived, and of Walter de Grey, Sylveſter, &c. But it ſeems where a competent Subſiſtence had been decreed, the Monks took the firſt Opportunity to leſſen it; which occaſioned another Decretal in the Canon Law, wherein any ſuch thing is forbidden, without the Biſhop's Conſent. In other Places they pleaded Cuſtom for it; thence came another Decree of the Lateran Council, to void all ſuch Cuſtoms by whomſoever introduced, where there was not a competent Subſiſtence for him that ſerved the Cure.

The Monks were ſtill refractary in this matter; and becauſe the Biſhops had Power to refuſe any Perſon preſented by the Monks, unleſs they did conſent to ſuch a reaſonable Allowance as the Biſhop thought fit; therefore they grew ſullen, and would not preſent; in which Caſe another Decretal was made to give the Biſhop Power to preſent.

Extr. de Monachis, ubi ſupra.

Ext. de Supplend. Neglig. Præl. Sicut nobis.

And after all, Clement V. De Jure Patron. c. 1. reinforced the former Decretals, and injoyned the Dioceſans in the ſtricteſt manner, not to admit any perſon preſented to a Cure, where the Church was appropriated, unleſs ſufficient Allowance were made by the Biſhop's Conſent and Approbation, and all Cuſtom and Privileges to the contrary are declared to be void.

But how far doth this hold among us now, ſince the Appropriations are become Lay-Fees, and the Biſhop's Power is not mentioned in the Statute of Diſſolution? To this I ſhall give a clear Anſwer, but I doubt not ſatisfactory, to all Parties concerned. For as Neceſſity and Power, ſo ſome Mens Intereſt and Reaſon live very near one another.

1. The Statute of Diſſolution leaves all matters of Right as to perſons intereſted juſt as they were before. For by the Surrender the King was to have the Monaſteries and Tithes in as large and ample a manner as the Abbots then had them in Right of their Houſes, and in the ſame State and Condition as they then were, or of Right ought to have been: And ſo res tranſit cum ſuo onere. But this is not all: For there is an Expreſs Salvo for all Rights, Claims, Intereſts, &c. of all Perſons and Bodies Politick. So that if by the Law of England there was ſuch an Antecedent Right in the Vicar to his Allowance, and in the Biſhop to aſſign it, it is not taken away by this Statute, nor any other.

2. By the Law of England the Biſhop had a Right to provide a competent Maintenance for ſupplying the Cure upon an Appropriation. We are told by an unqueſtionable Authority in point of Law, that 9 Car. 1. this Point was brought before the Kings-Bench, in the Caſe of Thornburgh and Hitchcot. The Vicar complained, that the Church was appropriated, and that he wanted a competent Maintenance; a Prohibition was prayed, but denied upon this Reaſon, That the Vicar had Reaſon for his Suit, and that the ordinary might compel the Im-propriator to make it greater; becauſe in all Appropriations that Power was reſerved to the ordinary. And ſo in the Year-Books it is allowed, That the ordinary may increaſe or diminiſh the Vicar's Portion, 40 E. 3. Caſ. 15. f. 28. By our Provincial Conſtitutions, the Biſhop is to take care that the Vicar have a competent Allowance; which at that time was ſet at Five Marks; but Lynwood obſerves, that as the Price of things roſe, ſo the Allowance was increaſed, and in Stipendiaries it was then advanced to Eight or Ten Marks; which, according to Sir H. Spelman's Computation, comes to above Sixty Pounds per Annum. But ſome have told us, That by ſome old Statutes, even beneficed Perſons were not by Law to have above Six marks per Annum; for this was the Sum allowed to Pariſh-Prieſts; which is ſo groſs a Miſtake in any that pretend to Law or Antiquity, that it is to be wondred how they could fall into it.

Pro Conſt. de Offic. Vic. c. quoniam.

Of Tithes, p. 153. Miſcel. Parl. 183.

The Truth of the Caſe was this; the Parochial Chaplains or Prieſts were complained of, 36 E. 3. n. 23. that they could not be gotten to attend after the Plague, but at exceſſive Rates; upon this a Provincial Conſtitution was made, extant in the Parliament Rolls, wherein they are obliged to demand no more than Six Marks. But who were theſe Pariſh-Prieſts? Not ſuch as had the legal Endowments, but thoſe who depended on the Good-will of the Parſon or People, and were hired to officiate in Chapels of Eaſe, or to perform Offices for the Dead, which were ſo frequent at that time. And theſe were called Annual Chaplains, or Maſſe Chaplains, and were diſtinguiſhed from Domeſtick Chaplains who officiated in great Mens Houſes in their private Oratories, and from Beneficed Perſons, as appears by many Conſtitutions. But whatever was underſtood by the Act of Parliament then, it was repealed 21 Jac. 1. 28.

3. The Law of England, as to a competent Subſiſtence for the Vicars or Curates in appropriated Churches, is founded on very good Reaſon. For the Tithes were originally given for the Service of the Church, and not for the uſe of Monaſteries. And this was a hard Point for the Monks to get over, ſince the Tithes were given for the Maintenance of the Clergy, and they were none of the Clergy, how they came to have a Right to the Tithes. It is certain, that the State of the Clergy and the Monaſtick State were different; and the Offices of the Clergy and of the Monks were inconſiſtent, if they held to their Rules; how then came the Monks to take the Maintenance which belonged to the Clergy for other Offices, as though they were originally intended for them? For which there is no Colour or Pretence. This Point was debated between two great Men of their times, S. Bernard and Petrus Cluniacenſis: The former a Ciſtertian Monk, declared himſelf unſatisfied with the Monks taking the Maintenance of the Parochial Clergy from them, which was given on purpoſe to attend the Cure of Souls. But, ſaid Petrus Cluniacenſis, do we not pray for their Souls? But the Cure of Souls is another thing; and by the Canons of the Church the Monks were forbidden to meddle in Parochial Offices of Preaching, Baptizing, Viſiting the Sick. So that it might bear a Queſtion in Law, whether a Monaſtery were capable of an Appropriation, ſince by the Eccleſiaſtical Law, they are not an Eccleſiaſtical Body? And for that Reaſon Hobart ſaith, a Nunnery is not; and the ſame Reaſon will hold for the other.

D. 55. c. C. 16. Q. 1. c. 4, 5, 6, 8, 10, 11.

The Ciſtertian order was at firſt very ſcrupulous in this matter, when Mon. I. 699. they came hither and pretended to live only on their own Lands, and Rolls, R. 2. 480. diſliked Appropriations, as great Injuries to the Clergy, and called it Sacrilege to take their Tithes away from them. This was wiſely done of them at firſt to ingratiate themſelves with the Clergy, and to get as good Mon. I. 736. Lands as they could. But after a while they abated their Zeal, and then they pretended to do nothing without the Biſhops Conſent; till at laſt they were as ready as any, and got as large Privileges to exempt their Lands from Payment of Tithes, under which the Clergy ſuffer to this day.

But to return to the beginning of Appropriations among us.

After the Normans coming, they ſtood upon no Niceties of Law, or original Grants, but they took Poſſeſſions of the Tithes of their Manours, and diſpoſed them as they pleaſed. The poor Parochial Clergy were Engliſh, whom they hated, and cared not how poor they were; the Biſhops were Normans, as faſt as they could make them; and the buſineſs of the great Men, was to incourage the Norman Monks that came over, and to build and endow Monaſteries for them to pray for their Souls, which they minded ſo little themſelves; and this I take to be the true Account of the beginning and increaſe of Appropriations in England, which at firſt were only permitted, but are confirmed by the Law ſince the Statute of Diſſolution.

II. In ſome Appropriations there were Vicarages endowed, and here the Difficulty lies in diſtinguiſhing the Tithes which belong to one from the other: Before the Statutes for Endowment of Vicarages, in caſe of Appropriations, 15 R. 2. 6. 4 H. 4. 12. there were Endowments made, where the Biſhops took care of it; but they were generally ſo remiſs in it, that thoſe Statutes were thought very neceſſary; and one, it ſeems, was not ſufficient. For they eluded the former by appointing Vicars out of their own Body; but the latter Statute requires, That the Vicar ſhall be a Secular Perſon, and made Spiritual Vicar, and have ſuch an Endowment as the ordinary ſhould think fit, otherwiſe the Appropriation to be void.

The Scandal of the Appropriations was made ſo great by the greedineſs of the Monks, and Eaſineſs of the Biſhops, that I find in the Parliament Rolls 2 H. 4. 51. a Petition of the Commons, that no Appropriations ſhould be made for the future; but afterwards they came to that Temper which is expreſſed in the Statute 4 H. 4.

And that before thoſe Statutes, there was no neceſſity of the Endowment of a Vicarage, is plain from the occaſion of making them; and ſo Rolls, R. 2. 99. Cr. 2. 518. it hath been agreed in the Courts of Law in the Caſe of Britton and Ward. But the main Difficulty is, to ſtate the Tithes which belonged to the Vicarage and to the Appropriation; becauſe there was no certain Limitation either as to quantity or kind, although generally the great Tithes of Corn and Hay went with the Parſonage, and the ſmall Tithes and Obventions, and Altarage with the Vicarage.

Yelv. 86. The beſt Rules I can find to be ſatisfied in this matter, are the Endowment, or Preſcription. And where the Endowment is found, yet there may be a Preſcription of Tithes not mentioned; becauſe the Biſhop had a Power reſerved to increaſe the Allowance: As in the Caſe of the Vicar of Gillingham, who ſued for cuſtomary Tithes not mentioned in the Endowment; and he recovered them on this Preſumption, Hardr. 328. That the Vicarage might be augmented with thoſe Tithes; and in caſe of long Poſſeſſion, it is there ſaid to have been often ſo held and ruled. Sometimes there is a Difficulty in the Senſe of the Words of the Endowment, as in the Caſe of Barkſdale and Smith, whether Decima Garbarum in W. implied Tithe-Hay; but it was reſolved, that although Garba ſeems to relate to Corn, de omni Annonâ decima Garba Deo reddenda eſt. L. Edw. Confeſſ. c. 8. at leaſt, to ſomething bound up; and ſo Lynwood applies it to Faggots; yet the Cuſtom was thought ſufficient to extend it to Tithe-Hay; and for Tithe-Wood in Renoulds and Green's Caſe. But the greateſt Difficulty hath been about ſmall Tithes, which is the common Endowment of Vicarages. In the Caſe of Ward and Britton, one Point was, whether Lambs were ſmall Tithes or not. Noy pleaded Cuſtom for it. The Councel on the other ſide ſaid, That ſmall Tithes were ſuch as grew in Gardens; but Lambs were a ſort of Prædial Tithes; however, it was yielded, that Cuſtom might bring it under ſmall Tithes.

Bulſtr. 2. 27.
Palmer, 219. Cr. Jac. 516.

Another Point about ſmall Tithes, was about Saffron growing in a Corn-Field, in the Caſe of Bedingfield and Freak, and it was reſolved to be ſmall Tithes. But the Ground of that Reſolution was queſtioned in the Caſe of Udal and Tyndal; ſome ſaid it was, becauſe Saffron was ſmall Tithes where-ever it grew: Others, that by the Endowment, the Parſon had only reſerved the Tithe of Corn and Hay.

Cr. Eliz. 467. Moor, 909. Hutton, 78. Owen, 74. Cr. Car. 28.

But ſuppoſe whole Fields be planted with Woad, which grows in the Nature of an Herb, is this to be reckoned among ſmall Tithes? Crook ſeems to deliver the ſenſe of the Court ſo, in the former Caſe: But Hutton reports it, that it might come to be majores Decimæ and Prædial, if it came to be the main Profits of the Place. And the like may hold as to Hemp, Hops, Wool and Lambs. It's there ſaid, that all theſe new things, as Saffron, Hemp, Woad, Tobacco, &c. are to be reckoned among ſmall Tithes, unleſs there be ſome material Circumſtance to the contrary. But who is to be Judge of that? And what Proportion changes ſmall Tithes into greater? But what if the Endowment be ſo expreſſed, that only Tithes of Corn and Hay be reſerved to the Parſon? Then Rolls thinks all the reſt fall to the Vicar by Conſtruction of Law.

II. The next Diſcharge of Tithes, is by the Privileges of particular Orders allowed by our Law. For it is to be obſerved, that no Bulls of Popes make a legal Diſcharge; but in ſuch Caſes where the Law allows them, and my Lord Coke thinks it cannot be inſiſted upon without danger of a Præmunire. For when the Ciſtertians had procured new Bulls to inlarge their Privileges as to their Lands in the Hands of Farmers, a Law was paſſed againſt it, 2 H. 4. c. 4. which was grounded on a Petition in Parliament ſhewing the Novelty and Miſchief of it.

And

The Ciſtertian order was at firſt very ſcrupulous in this matter, when Mon. I. 699. Rolls, R. 2. 480. they came hither, and pretended to live only on their own Lands, and diſliked Appropriations, as great Injuries to the Clergy, and called it Sacrilege to take their Tithes away from them. This was wiſely done of them at firſt to ingratiate themſelves with the Clergy, and to get as good Mon. I. 736. Lands as they could. But after a while they abated their Zeal, and then they pretended to do nothing without the Biſhops Conſent; till at laſt they were as ready as any, and got as large Privileges to exempt their Lands from Payment of Tithes, under which the Clergy ſuffer to this day.

But to return to the beginning of Appropriations among us.

After the Normans coming, they ſtood upon no Niceties of Law, or original Grants, but they took Poſſeſſions of the Tithes of their Manours, and diſpoſed them as they pleaſed. The poor Parochial Clergy were Engliſh, whom they hated, and cared not how poor they were; the Biſhops were Normans, as faſt as they could make them; and the buſineſs of the great Men, was to incourage the Norman Monks that came over, and to build and endow Monaſteries for them to pray for their Souls, which they minded ſo little themſelves; and this I take to be the true Account of the beginning and increaſe of Appropriations in England, which at firſt were only permitted, but are confirmed by the Law ſince the Statute of Diſſolution.

II. In ſome Appropriations there were Vicarages endowed, and here the Difficulty lies in diſtinguiſhing the Tithes which belong to one from the other: Before the Statutes for Endowment of Vicarages, in caſe of Appropriations, 15 R. 2. 6. 4 H. 4. 12. there were Endowments made, where the Biſhops took care of it; but they were generally ſo remiſs in it, that thoſe Statutes were thought very neceſſary; and one, it ſeems, was not ſufficient. For they eluded the former by appointing Vicars out of their own Body; but the latter Statute requires, That the Vicar ſhall be a Secular Perſon, and made Spiritual Vicar, and have ſuch an Endowment as the ordinary ſhould think fit, otherwiſe the Appropriation to be void.

The Scandal of the Appropriations was made ſo great by the greedineſs of the Monks, and Eaſineſs of the Biſhops, that I find in the Parliament Rolls 2 H. 4. 51. a Petition of the Commons, that no Appropriations ſhould be made for the future; but afterwards they came to that Temper which is expreſſed in the Statute 4 H. 4.

And that before thoſe Statutes, there was no neceſſity of the Endow- Rolls, R. 2. 99. Cr. 2. 518. ment of a Vicarage, is plain from the occaſion of making them; and ſo it hath been agreed in the Courts of Law in the Caſe of Britton and Ward. But the main Difficulty is, to ſtate the Tithes which belonged to the Vicarage and to the Appropriation; becauſe there was no certain Limitation either as to quantity or kind, although generally the great Tithes of Corn and Hay went with the Parſonage, and the ſmall Tithes and Obventions, and Altarage with the Vicarage.

Yelv. 86. The beſt Rules I can find to be ſatisfied in this matter, are the Endowment, or Preſcription. And where the Endowment is found, yet there may be a Preſcription of Tithes not mentioned; becauſe the Biſhop had a Power reſerved to increaſe the Allowance: As in the Caſe of the Vicar of Gillingham, who ſued for cuſtomary Tithes not menti- Hardr. 328. oned in the Endowment; and he recovered them on this Preſumption, That the Vicarage might be augmented with thoſe Tithes; and in caſe of long Poſſeſſion, it is there ſaid to have been often ſo held and ruled. Sometimes there is a Difficulty in the Senſe of the Words of the Endowment, as in the Caſe of Barkſdale and Smith, whether Decima Garbarum in W. implied Tithe-Hay; but it was reſolved, that although Garba ſeems to relate to Corn, de omni Annonâ decima Garba Deo reddenda eſt. L. Edw. Confeſſ. c. 8. at leaſt, to ſomething bound up; and ſo Lynwood applies it to Faggots; yet the Cuſtom was thought ſufficient to extend it to Tithe-Hay; and for Tithe-Wood in Renoulds and Green's Caſe. But the greateſt Difficulty hath been about ſmall Tithes, which is the common Endowment of Vicarages. In the Caſe of Ward and Britton, one Point was, whether Lambs were ſmall Tithes or not. Noy pleaded Cuſtom for it. The Councel on the other ſide ſaid, That ſmall Tithes were ſuch as grew in Gardens; but Lambs were a ſort of Prædial Tithes; however, it was yielded, that Cuſtom might bring it under ſmall Tithes.

Bulſtr. 2. 27.
Palmer, 219. Cr. Jac. 516.

Another Point about ſmall Tithes, was about Saffron growing in a Corn-Field, in the Caſe of Bedingfield and Freak, and it was reſolved to be ſmall Tithes. But the Ground of that Reſolution was queſtioned in the Caſe of Udal and Tyndal; ſome ſaid it was, becauſe Saffron was ſmall Tithes where-ever it grew: Others, that by the Endowment, the Parſon had only reſerved the Tithe of Corn and Hay.

Cr. Eliz. 467. Moor, 909. Hutton, 78.
Cr. Car. 28.

But ſuppoſe whole Fields be planted with Woad, which grows in the Nature of an Herb, is this to be reckoned among ſmall Tithes? Crook ſeems to deliver the ſenſe of the Court ſo, in the former Caſe: But Hutton reports it, that it might come to be majores Decimæ and Prædial, if it came to be the main Profits of the Place. And the like may hold as to Hemp, Hops, Wool and Lambs. It's there ſaid, that all theſe new things, as Saffron, Hemp, Woad, Tobacco, &c. are to be reckoned among ſmall Tithes, unleſs there be ſome material Circumſtance to the contrary. But who is to be Judge of that? And what Proportion changes ſmall Tithes into greater? But what if the Endowment be ſo expreſſed, that only Tithes of Corn and Hay be reſerved to the Parſon? And that the Pope could not by his Bull diſſolve a Vicarage after Cr. 2. 517. Pal. 222. they were made perpetual by the Statute; ſo that our own Law is to govern in this matter.

But what Orders had Exemption from Tithes by our Law? At firſt moſt of the Orders of Monks had it for Lands in their own Hands. Extr. de Decimis, c. 10. This by Hadrian IV. was reſtrained to the Ciſtertians, Templars and Hoſpitallers, which is owned in the Canon-Law, by a Decretal of Alexander III. who declares it not to be intended for Lands let out to farm.

Innocent III. reſtrains it to ſuch Lands as they were then in Poſſeſſion 2 Inſt. 652. of; but my Lord Coke makes the Grant to be from Innocent III. in the Council of Lateran, 17 John; but he adds, That it extends only to the Lands which they had before; which was all that was done then. But he ſaith, That this Privilege was allowed by the general Conſent of the Realm; however that were, it is certain that the Lateran Council made no Reſtriction to the three orders.

But what ſhall we ſay to the Præmonſtratenſes, of whom he ſaith, That they were diſcharged by a Bull of Innocent III. This point was diſ- Popham. 156. puted in the Caſe of Dickenſon and Greenhow. It was not denied, that they had obtained ſuch a Bull, but it was denied that it was ever received here. On the other ſide, it was ſaid, that their Bulls were confirmed; which doth not appear, nor that any Judgment was given in the Caſe. There is a Bull extant in the Collection of Innocent's Epiſtles, to exempt the Præmonſtratenſes from the Tithes of Lands in their Innocent. 3. Epiſt. l. 1. Ep. 331. own Hands; but this was granted in the firſt Year of Innocent III. ſometime before the Lateran Council, and they might enjoy the ſame Privileges with the Ciſtertians, if it could be proved, that they were as generally received, which hath not yet been done. As to the Ciſtertians themſelves, there are conſiderable Limitations of their Privileges.

1. They muſt relate to Lands in their Poſſeſſion before the Lateran Council, A. D. 1215. 17 of King John. And in matters againſt common Right, the Proof in Reaſon ought to be on thoſe who pretend to particular Privilege. But it's certain the Ciſtertian Order hath had many Lands in England ſince that time (and it were no hard matter to find them out.) But, ſuppoſe they were actually diſcharged at the Diſſolution, and the Proprietaries were to enjoy them in the State they found them, is not this a ſufficient Diſcharge? Yes, if it be a legal Diſcharge; for the Statute only puts them into the ſame legal Capacity they were in before; but if they were Lands given ſince the Lateran Council, they were not in a Capacity to be diſcharged by Law; for it was not otherwiſe received.

2. This Privilege doth not exclude ancient Compoſitions, as to their Demeſn Lands. For theſe Privileges did not go down ſo eaſily, but where there were Rectors able to conteſt it, they brought even the Ciſtertians, to Compoſitions. And the Pope himſelf appointed Commiſſioners here to compound the matter: And between the Monaſtery of Pipewel and Hugh Pateshul Rector of Eltyndon, which ended in Compoſition of ſix Marks per Annum for the Tithes of their Demeſns. And another between the Vicar of Dunchurch and the ſame Monaſtery; and between the Rector of Wynſwick for the Tithes of Ten Yard-Lands in Colds Abby. All which I have peruſed in the Regiſter of that Monaſtery MS.

3. The Privilege doth not hold where the Monaſteries were under Value, and came to the King by the Statute 27 H. 8. unleſs they were continued, and came within the Statute of Diſſolution, 31 H. 8. And it ought to be proved that they continued ſeparate; for if their Lands were given to the greater Monaſteries, they did not retain the Privilege upon Diſſolution.

Coke R. 2. 47. Moor, 420. Cr. Car. 424.

But there is a much harder Point concerning the Hoſpitallers (who had the Lands of the Templars after 17 E. 2.) Their Lands were not given to the King by the Statute of Diſſolution, 31 H. 8. but 32 H. 8. c. 24. and the Clauſe of Exemption was left out of the Grant. Upon which a great queſtion hath riſen, whether their Lands are exempt or not? And Judgment was given againſt them in the Caſe of Cornwallis, or Quarles and Spurling. But in the Caſe of Whiſton and Weſton, it was argued, that the King had the ſame Privileges which the Hoſpitallers had. But it was replied, That other Lands given to the King after that Act, had not thoſe Privileges, as Chanteries, &c. It was ſaid, that it was, becauſe they were not regular Eccleſiaſtical Bodies: Which was a ſtrange Anſwer, conſidering what ſort of Eccleſiaſtical Bodies the Hoſpitallers made, when only the Grand Maſter and two Chaplains are bound to be Eccleſiaſticks; and in foreign Judicatures they were denied to be any part of the Clergy, being only an order of Knights under ſome particular Regulations.

Cr. 2. 58. Moor, 913. Jones, 186. Bridgm. 33. Latch. 89. Rolls R. 2. 40. Selden of Tithes, 122.

But ſuppoſe them capable of Appropriations of Tithes, yet when the Body is diſſolved, the Appropriation falls of it ſelf, unleſs continued by Act of Parliament, as thoſe of the Templars were to them; and thoſe of the Monaſteries by 31 H. 8. but where there is no Clauſe to continue the Appropriation, it muſt be underſtood to be left to the natural courſe of things; and ſo the Appropriation ſinks.

III. The third legal Exemption is from Preſcription, and ancient Compoſitions. This ſeems a difficult Caſe, becauſe ſomething leſs than the real value is to be taken, and the Rule in Lynwood is, non valet conſuetudo, ut minus quam Decima ſolvatur; but in all ſuch Preſcriptions and Compoſitions there is leſs than the true Value.

Lynw. f. 101.

To clear this matter, I ſhall ſhew,

1. That by our Eccleſiaſtical Law, all Compoſitions are not condemned.

2. That by the common Law all Preſcriptions are not allowed. And if theſe things be made out, it will follow, that where the Compoſitions and Preſcriptions are legal, the Clergy may with good Conſcience ſubmit to them, as they do in other matters of Law.

1. As to the Eccleſiaſtical Law, Lynwood himſelf makes theſe Limitations;

1. In caſe of perſonal Tithes. He grants that as to them, a Man may with a good Conſcience obſerve the Cuſtom although it be under the real Value. Now theſe are founded on the ſame Laws that Prædial and mixt Tithes are; and by the Stat. 2 E. 6. c. 13. they are reduced to a cuſtomary Payment before Eaſter, as it had been uſed Forty Years before: But beſides theſe there were Offerings to be compounded for, and the Eaſter Duties are a kind of Compoſition for perſonal Tithes.

Lynw. f. 97. b. c. Conſuet. f. 99.

2. In ſmall Tithes, the cuſtomary Payment is allowed. The Payment in Lynwood's time, was 6 ob. for ſix Lambs, becauſe it was the Tenth of the Value at that time of a Lamb of a year old; the ſeventh Lamb was to be paid in kind, for which 3 ob. were to be paid back, becauſe three Lambs were wanting of the number Ten. But can any one believe that 5 d. was the true Value then of a Lamb of a year old? And Lynwood doth not ſuppoſe it to be the exact Value; but it was ſuch as the provincial Conſtitution determined, and he allows Compoſitions Lynw. f. 97. b. ſuper minutis decimis.

3. Compoſitions were allowed with the Biſhop's Conſent with Lay-perſons for their Tithes. As to what is paſt, there was no doubt; but for the future he ſaith, it doth not hold ſine Judicis auctoritate; which implies, that by his Conſent it may. And if ſo, then a Modus decimandi ſo qualified, is allowed by the Eccleſiaſtical Law. Such Compoſitions as theſe were entred into the Biſhop's Regiſtries, and if they were then made upon a valuable Conſideration at that time, I doubt the Force of Cuſtom will get the better of the Reaſon that may be taken from the great Difference of Valuation of things.

2. Let us now conſider what Preſcriptions and Compoſitions are not allowable at Common Law.

1. No Preſcription de non decimando, is allowed among Lay-perſons, becauſe none but ſpiritual Perſons are by the Law capable of Selden of Tithes, p. 409. Coke R. 2. 44. Cr. 2. 47. Rolls, 653. Moor, 531, 425. Hob. 297. Cr. El. 599. Tithes in their own Right. A Lay-man, ſaith Mr. Selden, cannot be diſcharged of all Payment by meer Preſcription, unleſs he begins by Preſcription in a ſpiritual Perſon. And to the ſame purpoſe our great Lawyers ſpeak. But in the famous Caſe of Pigot and Hern, a Diſtinction was found out, which may prove of dangerous Conſequence, viz. That although the Lord of a Manour cannot preſcribe for Tithes, becauſe he is not capable of them by our Law, yet he may preſcribe for a tenth Shock, as a profit apprendre, as a thing appurtenant to his Manour; and ſo he may have decimam garbam, but not decimas garbarum. Upon which Reſolution it is ſaid in the Biſhop of Wincheſter's Caſe, 2 R. 45. that the Lord of a Manour may have Tithes as appurtenant to his Manour: For which there is no Foundation in our ancient Laws or Cuſtoms that I can find that is inconſiſtent with what is before acknowledged, that none but ſpiritual Perſons are capable of Tithes. But in plain Truth, this Caſe is not truly repreſented; and my Lord chief Hob. 300. Juſtice Hobart, a perſon of great Judgment and Learning in the Law, hath told the World, That this famous reporter hath ſometimes given his own opinion, and that ſudden, inſtead of the Reſolution of the Court, which muſt take much off from the Authority of his Reports; eſpecially when the Caſe is differently reported by others; as it falls out in this Caſe. For Serjeant Moor, who was of Counſel in that Caſe, ſaith, Moor, 483. That the Defendant pleaded a Modus decimandi in Satisfaction for Tithes, which was 6 s. per Annum: But as to the other point, whether ſuch an ancient Modus being made with the Lord of a Manour, binds the Copy-holders, it is out of our way; but ſurely there ought to be good Proof, that the Modus was made before the Copy-holds were granted, which is not offered, but only that it might be ſo; which deſerves no other Anſwer, but that it might not be ſo. And it is hard indeed, when Judgments are given upon Poſſibilities. And for the diſtinction of Decima Garba and Decimæ Garbarum, in a Compoſition for Moor, 278. Seld. p. 398. Tithes, is the ſame thing. Mr. Selden, as to this Caſe of Pigot and Hern, ſaith, It was an inheritance of Tithes from immemorial time, by virtue of an ancient Compoſition: And he would not underſtand the Judges in any other Senſe: For no kind of Infeodation of Tithes is allowable here, he ſaith, ſo as to create in Lay-men a perpetual Right to them (except only by the Statute of Diſſolution of Monaſteries) unleſs it be derived from ſome ancient Grant of Diſcharge from the Parſon, Patron and Ordinary, with a Conſideration of Recompence to the Parſon; and that either from time immemorial, or ancient Compoſition.

And to the ſame purpoſe he ſpeaks in another place, where he P. 285.
owns, that by our Law every Parſon had a common Right to the Tithes of all annual Increaſe (Prædial or Mixt) within the limits of his Pariſh; and any Title or Diſcharge muſt be ſpecially pleaded.

2. Where a Preſcription is pleaded de modo decimandi, the actual Recompence by Compoſition muſt be ſhewed. For, as my Lord Coke ſaith, a Modus decimandi is intended as a yearly Sum in way of Satisfaction for the Tithes to the Parſon; which Rolls calls the actual Recompence. Select Caſes. 43.

In the Regiſter the Account of the Modus decimandi is thus ſet down:
1. There was a real Compoſition, as four Acres of Land for ſome ſmall Regiſter.
Tithes. 2. There was an Agreement in Writing, by the Conſent of Ordinary 38. b. and Patron.

But my Lord Coke ſaith, the Modus may as well be for a Sum of Money 2 Inſt.
as for Land. 490.

Suppoſe no ancient Compoſition in Writing can be produced, how far doth a Preſcription hold?

1. It muſt be immemorial, or time out of mind. Here a great Point Bulſt. 2.
ariſes fit to be conſidered: Suppoſe the thing it ſelf hath been within 238.
Memory, as Improvements by Hops, Fruit-trees, &c. doth not a Compoſition bind in this Caſe?

I anſwer, that we are to diſtinguiſh perſonal Contracts from real Compoſitions.
In the Caſe of Hitchcock and Hitchcock, there was a Contract March, 87. between the Vicar and Pariſhioners, but it was denied to be a real Compoſition, although confirmed by the Ordinary, and affirmed not to be binding to the Succeſſors.

A Compoſition by a meer verbal Agreement in the Caſe of Hawles Hob. 176. and Bayfield was declared to be neither binding to the Party nor his Succeſſours. But in the Caſe of Tanner and Small it was declared to Yelv. 94, hold for Years, but not for Life. 95.

My Lord Coke ſeems to be of Opinion, that if it be a Preſcription, 2 Inſt.
it muſt be time out of Memory of Man; but that a real Compoſition 653. Select Ca-matters, that although real Compoſitions are ſuppoſed in Law to be 151.

the Foundation of Preſcriptions de Modo decimandi, where the Patron, Parſon's Coun.

ſelves; which, I am afraid, is too true.

And he is of opinion, that no real Compoſition can be made now to bind the Succeſſour, ſince the Statute, 13 Eliz. c. 10. which reſtrains all binding Grants to one and twenty Years, or three Lives; and if ſo, then the Conſent of Patron and Ordinary cannot make it good.

2. It muſt be reaſonable, and therefore it hath been rejected in theſe Caſes:

1. If

Hob. 107. Rolls, 647.

1. If it be a Preſcription to pay a certain Tithe without the Parſon's View of the nine parts, becauſe, ſaith Hobart, it is againſt the Law of Partition, in the Caſe of Wilſon and the Biſhop of Carliſle.

Rolls, 649. Cr. El. 276. March, 65.

2. If there be no Recompence to the Parſon, as in the Caſe of Scory and Barber, the Preſcription was founded on the Pariſhioners finding Straw for the Body of the Church.

Cr. Eliz. 786. C. Select Caſes, 45. Bulſt. 2. 238.

3. If it be for paying what was due in lieu of other Tithes; as in the caſe of Ingoldsby and Johnſon, that they paid their other Tithes in lieu of Tithes of dry Cattel; or in caſe a Load of Hay be preſcribed for in lieu of Tithe-Hay, or ten Sheafs of Corn for the Tithe of all the reſt.

4. If it be not for ſomething certain and durable. For this, ſaith Hobart, ſhews original Weakneſs in Compoſition; being of a thing certain and durable for that which is not ſo.

IV. The laſt Exemption or Diſcharge that is pleaded, as to the payment of Tithes, is unity of Poſſeſſion: This is, where a Monaſtery had the Right of Tithes by Appropriation, and had other Lands which did not pay Tithes, becauſe the owners, were to receive them, theſe were actually free at the time of Diſſolution; and the queſtion is, whether they are legally ſo by virtue of the Statute? It cannot be denied, that unity of Poſſeſſion is in it ſelf no legal Diſcharge; but whether by the Words of the Statute the Judges were divided in Opinion. But afterwards in the Caſe of Green and Boſekin the Judges allowed it, ſo it were not a meer unity of Eſtate, but of Occupation. Hobart ſaith, that after it had been long controverted, it was received as the common Opinion. Coke, that where unity of Poſſeſſion gives a diſcharge, the Title muſt be clear, the Non-payment general, and the Preſcription time out of Memory; but if the Appropriation were made in the time of Ed. 4. H. 6. it could not be diſcharged by unity; nor if it were a late Abby-preſcription.

Thus I have endeavoured to lay this matter before you as briefly and clearly as I could, from the beſt Light I could get, that I might give you ſuch Directions, that you may neither run into needleſs and vexatious Suits, nor be run down by frivolous Pretences. It is your great Advantage that you have the Law of your ſide, if you underſtand it aright; but have a care of being ſet on by ſuch, whoſe Intereſt it is to promote Suits; and I am ſure it is yours to prevent them, if it be poſſible, and as much as lies in you. The Churches Right is not to ſuffer by your Negligence; and you are not to make the Church to ſuffer by your Contentions. He that loves going to Law, ſeldom fails of having enough of it; he ſuffers in his Purſe, in his Reputation, in his Intereſt, and the Church ſuffers by his Means. Endeavour to gain, as much as may be, the Love of your People by a kind, modeſt, courteous and peaceable Behaviour, which is the beſt way to prevent, or to compoſe Differences. If you are forced to ſue for your Maintenance let them ſee that you are forced to it, and that you are always willing to put an end to all ſuch Diſputes, if the Churches Right be ſecured, which you are bound to preſerve.

Of the OBLIGATION to obſerve the Eccleſiaſtical CANONS and Conſtitutions, at a Viſitation October 29th. 1696.

IN ſpeaking clearly and diſtinctly to this caſe, there are theſe two things to be conſidered;

I. By what Authority they do oblige.

II. In what way and Manner they oblige.

I. The firſt thing to be conſidered is the Authority by which Eccleſiaſtical Canons and Conſtitutions do oblige. For, if there be not ſufficient Authority, there cannot be that Obligation on Conſcience, which ſuppoſes a legal Exerciſe of Power, or a juſt Right to command. Our obedience to the orders of our Superiours, is due by virtue of that divine Law which requires us to be ſubject for Conſcience-ſake: But our obedience is to be regulated by the order of Juſtice, i. e. it ought to be according to Law. Therefore it is neceſſary, in the firſt place, to enquire whether there be among us any ſuch things as Eccleſiaſtical Laws, i.e. ſuch Rules, which according to the Conſtitution of our Government, we are bound to obſerve.

For we are Members of a Church eſtabliſhed by Law; and there are legal Duties incumbent on us, with reſpect, not only to the Laws of God, but of the Realm. For, although our Office and Authority, as Church-men, hath a higher Original; yet the Limitation of the Exerciſe of it, is within ſuch Bounds as are allowed and fixed by the Law of the Land.

It is therefore a matter of great Conſequence to us to underſtand how far our Eccleſiaſtical Conſtitutions are grounded upon the Law of the Land, which cannot be done without ſearching into the Foundations of our Laws.

Which lie in three things: 1. Immemorial Cuſtom. 2. General Practice and Allowance. 3. Authority of Parliament.

And I ſhall endeavour to ſhew how far our Eccleſiaſtical Conſtitutions are founded on theſe.

1. Immemorial Cuſtom. Our greateſt Lawyers allow ancient Cuſtom to be one of the Foundations of our Laws; and my Lord Coke calls it one of the main Triangles of the Laws of England. I ſuppoſe he means Foundations. And another ſaith, That the common Law of England is nothing elſe but the common Cuſtom of the Realm. My Lord chief Juſtice Hales ſaith, That the common Uſage, Cuſtom and Practice of the Kingdom, is one of the main Conſtituents of our Law. Coke quotes Bracton's Authority to prove, That Cuſtom obtains among us the force of a Law, where it is received and approved by long uſe. And of every Cuſtom, he ſaith, there be two eſſential Parts, time and uſage; time out of mind, and continual and peaceable uſage without Interruption. But in caſe of Preſcription or Cuſtom, he ſaith, That an Interruption of ten or twenty years hinders not the Title, but an Interruption in the Right; the other is only an actual Suſpenſion for a time.

It may be asked, how time and uſage come to make Laws, ſince time hath no operation in Law, ſaith Grotius?

Not of it ſelf, as Grotius there ſaith, but with the Concurrence of other Circumſtances it may.

Bracton ſaith, longa poſſeſſio parit jus poſſidendi; and by a long and peaceable Poſſeſſion Dominion is transferred, without either Title or Delivery; which he founds on this good Reaſon, that all Claims of Right ought to have a certain limitation of time, and length of time takes away any Proof to the contrary. Littleton ſaith, that time out of Memory of Man, is ſaid to give Right, becauſe no Proof can be brought beyond it. And this he calls Preſcription at common Law, as it is diſtinguiſhed from Preſcription by the ſeveral Statutes of Limitations.

But whence is it then, that an immemorial Poſſeſſion gives Right?

Is it from the meer Silence of the Parties concerned to claim it? No, Silence gives no Conſent, where Ignorance or Fear may be the Cauſe of it. And is it a Puniſhment upon the Neglect of the Party concerned? So Bracton ſaith, time doth it, per patientiam & negligentiam veri Domini. But meer Neglect doth not overthrow Right, unleſs there be an antecedent Law to make that Neglect a Forfeiture.

Is it from a preſumptive Dereliction? But that ſuppoſes not bare continuance of time, but ſome kind of voluntary Act, which implies a ſort of Conſent which doth not appear in this Caſe. And it is a great Miſtake in thoſe, who think there is no preſumtive Dereliction, where there is not a full Conſent; for it may be, where there is the Conſent of a mixt Will, i. e. partly voluntary, and partly involuntary; when the Circumſtances are ſuch, as the Perſon rather chuſes to leave his Right, than ſubmit to the lawful Conditions of enjoying it: As if a Man would rather quit his Fee than perform the Service which belongs to it.

Is it from the common Intereſt of Mankind, that ſome Bounds be fixed to all Claims of Right? Becauſe otherwiſe that Man will be liable to perpetual diſturbance, if the Right be permitted to be claimed beyond any poſſibility of Proof.

Or is it, laſtly, that in ſuch Nations where immemorial Cuſtom obtains the force of a Law, it ſeems agreeable to the Foundations of Law, that a long continued Poſſeſſion ſhould carry Right along with it?

Glanv. Prol. Dr. and St. c. 7.

And this was the caſe here in England, as not only appears by what Bracton hath ſaid, but Glanvil makes a great part of our Law to conſiſt of reaſonable Cuſtoms of long Continuance. And St. Germain affirms ancient general Cuſtoms to be one of the principal Foundations of our Law; and that they have the force of Laws, and that the King is bound by his Oath to perform them. And it is worth our while to obſerve what general Cuſtoms he doth inſtance in; as the Courts of Equity and Law, the hundred Court, the Sheriffs Turn, the Court-Baron, &c. which depend not upon Acts of Parliament, but the ancient Cuſtom of England, which he calls the common Law. And among theſe ancient Cuſtoms, he reckons up Rights of deſcent, Eſcheats, the different ſorts of Tenures, Freeholds, and the Laws of Property, as they are received among us.

We are now to enquire, how far any of our Eccleſiaſtical Conſtitutions can be ſaid to be built upon this Foundation; and upon immemorial Cuſtom generally received.

1. I place (1.) the Diſtribution of this national Church into two Provinces, in each whereof there is an Archbiſhop with Metropolitical Power, which lies chiefly in theſe things, (1.) the right of Conſecration tion of his Suffragans. (2.) The Right of Viſitation of every Diocеſs in ſuch way and manner as Cuſtom hath ſettled it. (3.) The right of receiving Appeals from inferiour Courts of Judicature in Eccleſiaſtical Matters. (4.) The right of preſiding in provincial Councils of the Suffragans of his Province; which by the moſt ancient Conſtitutions of this Church, were to be held once a Year; ſo it was decreed in the Council under Theodore, A.D. 673. but by the Difficulties of the times, they were diſcontinued; and ſo the Authority of examining things through the Province, came by a kind of Devolution to the Archbiſhop and his Courts. (5.) The Cuſtody of vacant Sees, by the Cuſtom of England, falls to the Metropolitan, if there hath been no Cuſtom or Compoſition to the contrary. And ſo it hath been upon ſolemn Debates reſolved in our Courts of common Law. Coke thinks that of common Right it belongs to the Dean and Chapter, but by Cuſtom to the Archbiſhop. But Panormitan ſaith, There was no Pretence of common Right for them, till the time of Boniface VIII.

2. The ordinary Juriſdiction of every Biſhop over the Clergy of his own Dioceſs. This is as ancient as Chriſtianity among us. For no ſooner were Churches planted, but there were Biſhops ſet over them; who had from the beginning ſo much Authority, that none of the Clergy could either receive or quit his Benefice without their Conſent and Approbation; and they were all bound to give an account of their behaviour at their Viſitations; and in caſe of Contempt, or other Miſdemeanours, they were to proceed againſt them according to the Canons of the Church. I do not ſay the Dioceſſes were at firſt all modelled alike, or with the ſame bounds which they now have; which was unreaſonable to ſuppoſe, conſidering the gradual Converſion of the Nation. For at firſt there was but one Biſhop in every one of the Saxon Kingdoms, except Kent, where was but one Suffragan to the Metropolitan for ſome time, till the Kingdoms came to be united; or the Kings conſented to an Increaſe of ſeveral Dioceſſes, and uniting them under one Metropolitan, which was a work of time. But in all the Saxon Councils we find no mention of any Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction, but what was in the Biſhops themſelves, Concil. Cloveſhoe Can. 1, 4, 5. Concil. Cealchyth. Can. 1. Egbert Canon. c. 45, 62. The firſt who began to ſeek for Exemptions, were the Abbots, who were under the Biſhop's Juriſdiction, who was too near them; and therefore they endeavoured to get under the Pope's immediate Juriſdiction by Charters of Exemption, which the great Abbies either procured or made; and the more ancient the more ſuſpicious. But the Lord Chancellor and three chief Judges declared, that by the common Law of England, every Biſhop in his Dioceſs, and the Archbiſhops in Convocation may make Canons to bind within the Limits of their Juriſdiction.

Moor, n. 783.

3. The ſubordinate Juriſdiction which was lodged in the Bodies of the Clergy reſident in Cathedral Churches, and of Archdeacons in the ſeveral Dioceſſes: I cannot find either of theſe to have had any Juriſdiction here before the Conqueſt. neither were there any Courts of Juſtice out of the ſeveral Counties before; for all Cauſes were tranſacted in the County Courts and Sheriffs Turns, and Appeals lay from them to the Supreme Judicature of the King and the Lords. But this doth not hinder but theſe Courts may be founded on the Law of England. And ſo the original Juriſdiction, which of Right belonged to the Biſhop, might by decrees, and a gradual Conſent, come to be committed, as to ſome ſome parts, to the Bodies of Cathedral Churches, and to the Archdeacons, who are, ſaith my Lord Coke, ſixty in England. We are told in a late Caſe of Woodward and Fox, That there are Archdeaconries in England by Preſcription, which have no dependency on the Biſhop, but are totally exempt. And for this Godolphin is cited, who refers to the Gloſs on the Legatine Conſtitutions, f. 27. where we read of ſome Archdeacons having a cuſtomary and limited Juriſdiction ſeparate from the Biſhop, for which a Preſcription lies. But this is only for ſome ſpecial Juriſdiction; as the Archdeacon of Richmond for Inſtitutions, which came firſt by Grant from the Biſhops; but that not being to be produced, they inſiſt upon Cuſtom and Preſcription, as the Deans and Chapters do, where the ancient Compoſitions are loſt, but none who underſtand the ancient Conſtitutions of this Church, can ſuppoſe either of them to have been original, ſince the Right to the Juriſdiction of the Dioceſs was in the Biſhop, before there were here either Archdeacons or Chapters with Juriſdiction.

Rolls R. 2. 150.

In the caſe of Chiverton and Trudgeon, it was declared, that an Archdeacon might have a peculiar Juriſdiction, as to Adminiſtration, &c. as the Dean of S. Paul's had at S. Pancras; and ſo the Archdeacon of Cornwall, as to Wills. In the caſe of Gaſtril and Jones the chief Juſtice declared, that the Archdeacon is the Biſhop's Officer, and his Authority ſubordinate to the Biſhops, and granted by them; but if ſpecial Cuſtom be pleaded, that muſt be well proved; to which Dodderige agreed.

De Offic. Archdiac.

Gloſſ. in Conſt. Oth. p. 27.

But we muſt diſtinguiſh between Archdeaconries by Preſcription, for which I can find no Foundation (being all derived by Grant from the Biſhop) and Archdeacons having ſome kind of Juriſdiction by Preſcription, which others have not; which cannot be denied. All the Power which the Archdeacons have by virtue of their Office, is per modum ſcrutationis ſimplicis, as Lynwood ſpeaks, tanquam Vicarius Epiſcopi: Whatever Power they have beyond this, is not Jure communi, but Jure ſpeciali, and depends either upon Grant or Cuſtom; which the Gloſs on the Legatine Conſtitutions calls a limited Jiriſdiction.

Ventris, II. 269. 4 Inſt. 339.

The Archdeacon's Court is declared by the Judges in Woodward's Caſe to have been, time out of Mind, ſettled as a diſtinct Court, from which there lies an Appeal to the Biſhop's Court, by the Statute, 24 H. 8. c. 12.

And ſo the Archdeacon's Juriſdiction is founded on an immemorial Cuſtom, in ſubordination to the Biſhops.

As to the Deans and Chapters, I obſerve theſe things:

3 R. 75.

1. That although Eccleſiaſtical Bodies in Cathedrals were very ancient, yet we read not of any Juriſdiction peculiar to themſelves, during the Saxon times. My Lord Coke ſaith, there were Chapters, as the Biſhop's Council, before they had diſtinct poſſeſſions. And by their Books, he ſaith, it appears, that the Biſhops parted with ſome of their Poſſeſſions to them, and ſo they became Patrons of the Prebends of the Church: Such were London, York and Litchfield.

2. That ſeveral of our Chapters were founded and endowed by the Biſhops ſince the Conqueſt: Such was that of Salisbury and Oſmund out of his own Eſtate, as appears by his Chapter, and the Confirmation of H. 2. So was that of Lincoln by Remigius, who removed the See from Dorcheſter thither, and placed there a Dean, Treaſurer, Præcentor, and ſeven Archdeacons, as Henry of Huntingdon ſaith, who lived near the time. And in following times thoſe of Exeter and Wells were ſet-tled as Dean and Chapter; for they were Eccleſiaſtical Bodies before, but not under that Denomination.

3. That ſome had the legal Rights of Dean and Chapters, as to Election of Biſhops, and Confirmation of Leaſes, &c. but were a Monaſtick Body conſiſting of Prior and Convent: Such were Canterbury, Wincheſter, Worceſter, after the Expulſion of the ſecular Canons; for the Monks not only enjoyed their Lands, but were willing enough to continue the Name of Dean among them: As at Canterbury, after Dunſtan's time, Agelmothas is called Dean; in Worceſter Wolſton is called Dean when he was Prior; and Winſius, upon the firſt change, is ſaid to be placed loco Decani, by Florence of Worceſter. At Norwich, Herbert the Biſhop founded the Prior and Convent out of his own Poſſeſſions in the time of William II. and they became the Chapter of the Biſhop by their Foundation. Now as to theſe, it is reſolved in the Dean and Chapter of Norwich's Caſe, that when the King transferred them from a Prior and Convent, the legal Rights remained the ſame. And in Hayward and Fulcher's Caſe, the Judges declared, that an Eccleſiaſtical Body may ſurrender their Lands, but they cannot diſſolve their Corporation, but they ſtill remain a Chapter to the Biſhop. And it was not only then delivered, but ſince inſiſted upon in a famous caſe, that it was the Reſolution of the Judges, that a ſurrender cannot be made by a Dean and Chapter, without conſent of the Biſhop, becauſe he hath an intereſt in them.

4. That H. 8. endowed ſome as Chapters to new erected Biſhopricks, as Cheſter, Briſtol, Oxford, &c. 31 H. 8. 9. 34 H. 8. 17. and united others, as Bath and Wells, and Coventry and Litchfield, 33 H. 8. 30. 34 H. 8. 15.

5. That where the Cuſtom hath ſo obtained, there may be a legal Chapter without a Dean; as in the Dioceſſes of S. David's and Landaff, where there is no other Head of the Chapter but the Biſhop; but they muſt act as a diſtinct Body in Elections and Confirmations of Grants by the Biſhops.

6. That by the ancient Cuſtom of England, there are ſole Eccleſiaſtical Corporations as well as aggregate. A ſole Eccleſiaſtical Corporation, is, where a ſingle Perſon repreſents a whole Succeſſion, and under that Capacity is impowered to receive and to convey an Eſtate to his Succeſſors: As Biſhops, Deans, Archdeacons, Parſons, &c. But Parſons and Vicars are ſeized only in Right of the Church, but as to a Biſhop, he may have a Writ of Right, becauſe the Fee-ſimple abideth in him and his Chapter; and ſo may a Dean and Maſter of an Hoſpital: And theſe are called Bodies Politick by Littleton.

1 Inſt. 341. b. 300.

That the Exerciſe of the Biſhop's Power may be reſtrained by ancient Compoſitions, as is ſeen in the two ancient Eccleſiaſtical Bodies of S. Pauls and Litchfield. Concerning which, it is to be obſerved, that where the Compoſitions are extant, both Parties are equally bound to obſerve their parts. Thus by the Remiſneſs and Abſence of the Biſhops of Litchfield from their See, by going to Cheſter, and then to Coventry, the Deans had great Power lodged in them, as to Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction there. After long Conteſts, the matter came to a Compoſition, A. D. 1428. by which the Biſhops were to viſit them but once in ſeven Years, and the Chapter had Juriſdiction over their own Peculiars. So in the Church of Sarum the Dean hath very large Juriſdiction, even out of the Biſhop's Dioceſs; which makes it probable to have been very ancient; but upon conteſt it was ſettled, by Compoſition between the Biſhop, Dean, and Chapter, A. D. 1391. But where there are no Compoſitions, it depends upon Cuſtom, which limits the Exerciſe, altho' it cannot deprive the Biſhop of his Dioceſan Right.

4. The delegate Juriſdiction which was committed to the ſeveral Officers of the Biſhops Courts, and the manner of their Proceedings, is founded upon immemorial Cuſtom. In the Saxon times I find no Delegation of Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction; for the Biſhops ſate in Perſon in in the County-Courts, and there heard Eccleſiaſtical Cauſes, as appears by the Charter of H. 1. when he pretended to reſtore the Saxon Laws, c. 7. But William I. had ſettled the Conſiſtory Court by as good a Law as any that was made at that time, diſtinct from the County-Court, and required all Eccleſiaſtical Cauſes to be there heard; and his Son H. 1. did but make a ſhew of reſtoring the Saxon Laws, and the former Law came to be generally receceived, and ſo Mr. Selden yields, that it grew to be a general Law; which ſhews that it obtained the force of a Law by Conſent, as well as by Authority. The Conſiſtory Courts being thus ſettled, and Numbers of Cauſes there depending, and the Biſhops being then by H. 2. in the Conſtitutions of Clarendon ſtrictly tied to Attendance upon the Supreme Courts of Judicature, with other Barons, there came a Neceſſity of taking in other Perſons with a delegated Power to hear Cauſes, and to do ſuch other Acts of Juriſdiction as the Biſhops ſhould appoint. For it was allowed that Jure communi, the Juriſdiction was in the Biſhop; but Jure ſpeciali, & in auxilium Epiſcopi, it might be delegated to others. And ſo it hath been here received, and not only here, but it hath been the general Practice of Chriſtendom. As to the manner of proceeding in the Eccleſiaſtical Courts, it is the ſame in all Parts, and built on the ſame Grounds with thoſe of our Courts of Equity and Admiralty, which are as different from thoſe of the Common Law.

Selden of Tithes, p. 413.

Borde-nave, f. 69.

5. The ſettling parochial Rights, or the Bounds of Pariſhes depends upon an ancient and immemorial Cuſtom. For they were not limited by any Act of Parliament, nor ſet forth by ſpecial Commiſſioners; but as the Circumſtances of Times and Places, and Perſons did happen to make them greater or leſſer.

In ſome places Pariſhes ſeem to interfere, when ſome place in the middle of another Pariſh belongs to one that is diſtant; but that hath generally happened by an unity of Poſſeſſion, when the Lord of a Manour was at the charge to erect a new Church, and make a diſtinct Pariſh of his own Demeſns, ſome of which lay in the compaſs of another Pariſh. But now care is taken by annual Perambulations to preſerve thoſe Bounds of Pariſhes, which have been long ſettled by Cuſtom. But the Bounds of Pariſhes is not allowed to belong to the Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction.

II. The next Foundation of Law, is a general Practice, and Allowance, i. e. when things of themſelves do not oblige by the Authority of thoſe that made them; yet being generally received and allowed, they thereby become Law to us. This we have in an Act of Parliament, 25 H. 8. c. 21. wherein it is ſaid, that the People of England are only bound to ſuch Laws as are properly their own, being in Subjection to no Foreign Legiſlative Power. But were not many things here received for Laws, which were enacted by foreign Authority, as the Papal and Legantine Conſtitutions? True, ſay they, but it is not by virtue of their Authority, but by the free Conſent of the People in the Uſe and Allowance of them: And ſo they are not obſerved as the Laws of any foreign Prince, Potentate, or Prelate, but as the cuſtomed and ancient Laws of this Realm, originally eſtabliſhed as Laws of the ſame, by the ſaid ſufferance, Conſent and Cuſtom, and no otherwiſe.

So that here we have a full and expreſs Declaration by Parliament, that ſuch Canons as have been received and allowed by ancient Cuſtom, make a part of our Laws, and continue to oblige, provided that they be not repugnant to the King's Prerogative, nor to the Laws, Statutes, and Cuſtoms of the Realm, as it is expreſſed in another Act of the ſame Parliament, 25 H. 8. c. 19.

The Eccleſiaſtical Laws, ſaith my Lord Coke, are ſuch as are not againſt the Laws of the Realm, viz. the common Law, and the Statutes and Cuſtoms of the Realm: And according to ſuch Laws the ordinary and other Eccleſiaſtical Judges do proceed in cauſes within their Conuſance. 1 Inſt. 344.

So that by the Acknowledment of this great Oracle of the common Law, there are Laws Eccleſiaſtical in force among us, and Cauſes to be judged by thoſe Laws, and Officers appointed by the Law to proceed according to them.

The Eccleſiaſtical Laws and Ordinances are owned by the Statute, 27 H. 8. c. 20. 32 H. 8. c. 7. 35 H. 8. c. 19. after the Commiſſion appointed for the Review of them, 1 E. 6. c. 2. The Eccleſiaſtical Courts are appointed to be kept by the King's Authority, and proceſs to be iſſued out in his Name in all Suits and Cauſes of inſtance between Party and Party, where the Cauſes are particularly mentioned, which belong to thoſe Courts, and no Alteration is made in them, as to their Powers, but only that the proceſs ſhould be in the King's Name.

But ſome Perſons in our Age, who love to be always ſtarting Difficulties to humour ſuch as bear Ill-will to our Conſtitution, have ſuggeſted, that although this Act was repealed, 1 Q. M. 2. yet that Repeal was taken off, 1 Jac. 25. n. 48. therefore, ſay they, this Stat. 1 E. 6. is revived.

But the plain and ſhort Anſwer is this, that there was no need of any Debate about the Repeal of the Statute of E. 6. after the firſt of Q. Eliz. becauſe then the Statute, 25 H. 8. c. 20. was expreſly revived, wherein the Biſhops were impowered to act as before they might have done, according to the Laws and Cuſtoms of the Realm. By which no leſs Men of the Law than Coke, Popham, and other Judges did think the Stile of the Court, and manner of their Proceedings was comprehended. C. 12. 8. And the ancient Epiſcopal Juriſdiction is declared to be according to Law, by the Stat. 1 El. c. 1. and all foreign Juriſdiction is aboliſhed, and the Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction annexed to the Crown of this Realm; which is owned by every Biſhop when he takes the Oath of Supremacy. How then can it be imagined, that he ſhould do any more to the Prejudice of the Crown, by the proceſs being in the Biſhop's Name, than the Lord of a Manour doth, when he keeps his Courts in his own Name? To ſuppoſe that it is owning a foreign Juriſdiction, is ridiculous; for the Biſhops of England never pretended to act as Ordinaries, by virtue of a Juriſdiction from the Pope, but by virtue of their Original Authority which they had by the Laws of the Realm, as to their exterior Juriſdictions. And the Authority they then acted by from the Pope, was in Caſes extraordinary, when they were delegated by particular Commiſſion. And if there had been a real Derogation from the King's Prerogative, in the proceſs being in the Biſhop's Name, can any Man of Senſe imagine, that it would have been permitted in ſuch jealous times as to Supremacy, as the latter end of H. 8. and the whole Reign of Q. Elizabeth were, wherein the Biſhops wanted not Enemies, but their Malice would have been too apparent, if they had inſiſted on ſuch Objections? But to proceed in ſhewing that the Eccleſiaſtical Laws have been owned by Acts of Parliament ſince the Reformation, 2 E. 6. c. 13. n. 13. The Eccleſiaſtical Judges are required to proceed according to the King's Eccleſiaſtical Laws.

And to the ſame purpoſe, 1 E. c. 2. n. 23.

1 Inſt. 11. 4 Inſt. 321. Proœm. to 4 Inſt.

Accordingly my Lord Coke frequently owns the Eccleſiaſtical Laws and Juriſdiction, ſo they be bounded by the Laws of the Realm; of which there can be no queſtion. For deciding of Controverſies, and for diſtribution of Juſtice, ſaith he, there be within this Realm two diſtinct Juriſdictions; the one Eccleſiaſtical, limited to certain ſpiritual and particular Caſes; the other ſecular and general, for that it is guided by the common and general Law of the Realm.

1 Inſt. 96.

And to the ſame purpoſe my Lord chief Juſtice Hales in ſeveral places in a MS. diſcourſes of the Hiſtory and Analyſis of the common Law, ch. 1. and 2. But here the great Difficulty lies in finding out what theſe Canons and Conſtitutions are which have been ſo received and allowed by our Laws.

Stat. de Merton. c. 9.

For it is certain, that ſeveral Canons made by Popes, were not received here, as in the Statute of Merton, about Legitimation of Children born before Marriage, Stat. Mer. c. 9. where the Lords declared they would not alter the old Laws for a new Canon. For Alexander III. in the time of Hen. II. had made a Canon to that purpoſe; but as Glanvil ſaith, it was contra jus & conſuetudinem Regni.

Glanvil, l. 7. c. 15.

Stat. de Bigamis, c. 5.

The Canon to take away the benefit of the Clergy from Bigami, was debated in Parliament how far it ſhould be received, and the ſenſe there declared, which was complained of, 51 E. 3. and taken away, 1 E. 6. c. 12.

The Canon againſt Inveſtiture of Biſhops by a Lay-hand, was never here received; for although H. 1. after a long Conteſt gave it up, yet it was reſumed by his Succeſſors.

Popham. 157.

Spelm. Concil. 2. 342.

The Canons for Exemption of the Clergy, were never fully received here. Some Lawyers ſay, it was never obſerved; I ſuppoſe they mean according to the Canons, but that they had legal Privileges here, although not a total Exemption, cannot be denied by any one verſed in our Laws from the Saxon times.

The Pope's Canon for the Clergy, not being taxed without his conſent, was never received, as appears by the Conteſts about it in the time of E. 1. and their Submiſſion afterwards.

The Pope's Canons about Appeals, Proviſoes, Diſpenſations, &c. were never received by ſuch a general Conſent as to make them Laws; they were ſometimes practiſed by Connivance, and the Kings, when it ſerved their purpoſes, let them alone; but as often as there was occaſion, they were conteſted and denied, and Statutes made againſt the Execution of them.

Some Canons I find diſputed, whether they were received by the Law of England or not.

De Filiis Presbyt. cum à jure ſit inhibit. Lynw. l. 32.

As the Canon againſt Clergy-mens Sons ſucceeding their Fathers in their benefices immediately, without a papal Diſpenſation, is not only a part of the Canon Law, but enter'd in our provincial Conſtitutions. But in the Caſe of Stoke againſt Sykes, it was held by Dodderidge and Jones, two learned Judges, that this Canon was not received here. And Dodderidge inſtanced in two other Canons not received; as againſt a Man's marrying a Woman he had commited Adultery with; and a Lay-man's not revoking his firſt Preſentation. Latch. 191. And Sir John Davis mentioned reckoning the Months for Preſentation by Weeks, and not by the Calendar. Popham. 157. But both theſe are diſputable Points.

For ſome ſay, as to the former, that none but the King can revoke a Preſentation. Leon. 1. 156. But the Canoniſts think a private Patron may vary with the Biſhop's Conſent. Hugh's Parſ. Law, c. 12.

And as to the way of computing the Months, it hath been differently reſolved; Lynw. f. 119. Leon. 1. 39. 6 R. 61. but in Catesbie's Caſe, it was determined to be Calendar Months for many Reaſons. But in the ancient Reſolution in the time of E. II. the Tempus ſemeſtre was reckoned from notice to the Patron, and not from the death of the Incumbent. Rolls ſaith, By our Law it is from the time the Patron might have notice, with regard to the diſtance of the Place where the Incumbent died: Rolls A. 2. 363. Which leaves the matter uncertain. But the Regiſter reckons from the Vacancy. Reg. 42. b.

In many other caſes the foreign Canons were not received, for they allow but four Months to a Lay-Patron, but our Law ſix Months; 2 Inſt. 361. they deny any Sale of a Right of Advowſon, but our Law allows it, and a Separation of it from the Inheritance, which the Canon Law allows not; and ſo in other particulars, but theſe are ſufficient to my purpoſe.

It is obſervable, that after the Council of Lions, where the Pope was preſent, Peckham, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, called a provincial Council, wherein he mentions the difference of our Cuſtoms from all others, and a Temperament to be made ſuitable to them. Spelm. Concil. II. 329. And our Judges in the great Caſe of Evans and Ayſcough, declared, that no Canons bind here, but ſuch as are received by the Realm. Jones, 160. And Dodderidge ſaid, that our Eccleſiaſtical Law doth not conſiſt of the Pope's Decretals, but is an Extract out of the ancient Canons, General and National. Latch. 234. Palmer, 458. But the Judges agreed, that when they are received, they become part of our Law. 469.

Lord Chief Juſtice Vaughan ſaith, that if Canon Law be made a part of the Law of the Land, then it is as much the Law of the Land, and as well, and by the ſame Authority, as any other part of the Law of the Land. Vaugh. 21.

In another place, that the ancient Canon Law received in this Kingdom, is the Law of the Kingdom in ſuch Caſes. 132.

In a third, that a lawful Canon, is the Law of the Kingdom, as well as an Act of Parliament. 327.

III. I now come to the third thing, viz. The Power of making Canons by Act of Parliament.

This is founded on the Statute 25 H. 8. c. 19. The Words are, that no Canons, Conſtitutions and Ordinances, Provincial or Synodal, ſhall be made, promulged and executed without the King's Royal Aſſent or Licence.

Canons ſo made, and authorized by the King's Letters Patents, according to the form of the Statute, are ſaid by Lord Chief Juſtice Vaughan, to be Canons warranted by Act of Parliament. Vaugh. 327. And ſuch he affirms the Canons of A. D. 1603. to be.

But ſome have objected,

That theſe are only Negative Words, and are not an Introduction of a new Law, but a Declaration of what the Law was before. Bagſhaw's Arg. about the Canons, p. 1.

But my Lord Coke with far greater Judgment, limits that Expreſſion, that what was then paſſed, was declaratory of the common Law, to that Clauſe, that no Canons ſhould be in Force, which were repugnant to the Laws of the Realm. c. 4 Inſt. 323.

But as to the making of new Canons, he only ſaith, that their Juriſdiction and Power is much limited, becauſe they muſt have licence to make them, and the King's Royal Aſſent to allow them, before they be put in Execution. But he never imagined the Senſe of the Statute to be, that no Canons could be made but in Parliament, or that the King had not a Power to confirm new Canons made by the Convocation.

As to the Law, as it ſtood before, we muſt diſtinguiſh theſe two things;

1. Convocations called by the King's Writ to the Biſhops, and the body of the Clergy, could never aſſemble without it. But the Writ for the Convocation to ſit with the Parliament, (not together in Place, but at the ſame time) is contained in the Writ to the Biſhop, and begins with the clauſe Præmunientes. And it is moſt probable, that it began on the ſame Ground that the Attendance of Burgeſſes did, viz. That when they were brought into the Payment of Subſidies, they ought to give their Conſent. For I find, that in the time of H. 3. A. R. 39. the inferiour Clergy complained, That they were taxed without their Conſent. Annal Burton. 356.

2. Convocations called by the King's Writ to the Archbiſhops; and in this Province the Archbiſhop ſends his Mandate to the Biſhop of London, who is to ſummon all the Biſhops, &c. to appear at a certain Time and Place, and to act as they receive Authority from the King.

The not diſtinguiſhing theſe two Writs, hath cauſed ſo much Confuſion in ſome Mens Minds, about the Rights of the Convocation: For they imagine that the Convocation, as it treats of Eccleſiaſtical Matters, ſits by virtue of the firſt Writ, which is in the Biſhops Summons to Parliament; but that related to them as one of the three Eſtates of the Realm, whoſe Conſent was then required to their own Subſidies, which were diſtinctly granted, but confirmed by the other Eſtates.

But the other Writ was directed to the Archbiſhop, by which the Biſhops and Inferior Clergy were ſtrictly required to appear, and then to underſtand the King's further Pleaſure, as appears by the moſt ancient Writs for a Convocation. Which ſhews, that the Convocation, properly ſo called, is an occaſioned Aſſembly for ſuch purpoſes as the King ſhall direct them when they meet. And this was the true Foundation upon which the Statute, 25 H. 8. was built. For it cannot be denied, that in Fact there had been Convocations for Eccleſiaſtical Purpoſes called without the King's Writ, by virtue of the Archbiſhop's Legatine Power, which was permitted to be exerciſed here, although it were an Uſurpation upon the King's Right. So even in the time of H. 8. although there were a Convocation ſummoned by the King's Writ to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, yet Cardinal Wolſley, by virtue of his Legatine Power, ſuperiour to that of the Archbiſhop, removed the Convocation to another place, and preſided in it: Which was as great an Affront to the King's as well as the Archbiſhop's Authority, as could well be imagined. But this was then patiently born: Wherefore the Statute is to be underſtood of Legal, and not of Legatine Convocations.

But when H. 8. was ſufficiently provoked by the Court of Rome, he reſolved to reſume the ancient and legal Rights of the Crown, howſoever diſuſed by modern Uſurpations. And among theſe he claimed this of ſummoning the Convocation, and directing the Proceedings therein.

The difference of theſe Writs will beſt appear by the Inſtance of the Convocation, A. D. 1640.

In the Year 1639. about the firſt of February the Parliament Writ was iſſued out to the Biſhops for calling their Clergy to Parliament; and this is only ad conſentiendum iis quæ tunc ibidem de communi Concilio Regni noſtri contigerint ordinari.

The other Writ for the Convocation to the Archbiſhops was iſſued out the twentieth of February, and had his Clauſe, ad tractandum, conſentiendum, & concludendum ſuper præmiſſis & aliis quæ ſibi clarius exponentur ex parte meâ.

The Parliament at that time being diſſolved, it's certain the Convocation ſitting by virtue of the Writ to the Biſhops muſt fall with it: But a great Queſtion aroſe, whether the Convocation ſitting by the Writ to the Archbiſhops, was diſſolved, or not? And the greateſt Judges and Lawyers of that time were of Opinion it was not. But thoſe were not times to venture upon ſuch Points, when People were diſpoſed to find fault, as they did to purpoſe, when the next Parliament met; who made uſe of the ſitting of this Convocation, and the Canons then paſs'd, as one of the popular Themes to declaim upon againſt the Biſhops, and to inflame the Nation againſt the whole Order.

The greateſt objection in Point of Law, was, that the Commiſſion had a Reſpect to the Convocation ſitting in Parliament time, which began 13 April 1640. and the Commiſſion bore Date April 15. the Parliament was diſſolved May 5. and the 12th of May a new Commiſſion was granted, which made void that of the fifteenth of April; and ſo what was done by virtue of that, muſt be done out of Parliament, ſo and not in Convocation, according to 25 H. 8. 19. although theſe Canons were confirmed by the King's Authority the thirtieth of June the ſame Year.

After the King's Reſtoration, an Act of Parliament paſſed for Reſtoring the Biſhop's ordinary Juriſdiction; wherein a Clauſe is added, That this Act did not confirm thoſe Canons of 1640. but left the Eccleſiaſtical Laws as they ſtood 1639. which Act being paſſed by the King's Aſſent, it voids the former Confirmation of them, and ſo leaves them without Force. But the Alteration of our Law by the Act, 25 H. 8. c. 19. lay not in this, that the Convocation by the King's Writ to the Archbiſhop, could not ſit but in Parliament time (although that in all reſpects be the moſt proper time) for there is not a Word tending that way in the Statute; but provincial Councils having been frequently held here, without any Writ from the King, and therein treating of Matters prejudicial to the Crown, by virtue of a Legatine Power, there was great Reaſon for the King to reſume the ancient Right of the Crown. For ſo William I. declared it in Eadmerus, that nothing ſhould be done in provincial Councils without his Authority. But afterwards we find Hubert, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, holding a provincial Council againſt the King's Prohibition; and ſeveral Writs were ſent to them to prohibit their medling in Matters of State in prejudice to the Crown, 18 H. 3. under penalty of the Biſhop's forfeiting their Baronies; and to the like purpoſe, 35 E. 1. 15 E. 2. 6 E. 3. which ſeems to be a tacit Permiſſion of theſe provincial Councils, provided they did nothing prejudicial to the Crown. And from ſuch Councils came our provincial Conſtitutions, which Lynwood hath digeſted according to the Method of the Canon Law, and hath therein ſhewed what part of the Canon Law hath any Spelm. II. 123.

Force here; not by virtue of any Papal or Legatine Power, but by the general Conſent of the Nation, by which they have been received among us.

But my buſineſs is not now with Canons ſo received, but with Canons made according to the Statute, 25 H. 8. 19. for it is ridiculous to imagine thoſe are only negative Words, for then they exclude the King's Power of calling a Convocation, as well as confirming the Acts of it. For to what purpoſe is the King's Writ to call them together, if being aſſembled they can do nothing?

Ventris Rep. II. 42. But I have already mentioned my Lord Chief Juſtice Vaughan's Opinion, that the Canons made A. D. 1603. are warranted by 25 H. 8. c. 19. It was urged by the Council in the caſe of Grove and Eliot, 22 Carol. 2. That no Canons can alter the Law, which are not confirmed by Act of Parliament. But it was ſaid on the other ſide. that theſe Canons had been always allowed, having been confirmed by the King. One of the Judges ſaid, that the King and Convocation cannot make Canons to bind the Laity, but only the Clergy. But Vaughan ſaid, that thoſe Canons are of Force, although never confirmed by Act of Parliament, as no Canons are; and yet, ſaith he, they are the Laws which bind and govern in Eccleſiaſtick Affairs. The Convocation, with the Licence and Aſſent of the King, under the Great Seal, may make Canons for Regulation of the Church, and that as well concerning Laicks as Eccleſiaſticks; and ſo is Lynwood. There can be no queſtion in Lynwood's time, but Eccleſiaſtical Conſtitutions were thought to bind all that were concerned in them; and the Eccleſiaſtical Laws which continue in Force by Cuſtom and Conſent, bind all; the only Queſtion then is about making new Canons, and the Power to make them, is by virtue of an Act of Parliament, to which the Nation conſented; and ſo there need no Repreſentatives of the People in Convocation. And no ſuch thing can be inferred from Moor, 755. for the Judges declared the Deprivation of the Clergy for not conforming to the Canons, to be legal; but they ſay nothing of others. But in the Caſe of Bird and Smith f. 783. the Chancellor and three Chief Judges declared, that the Canons made in Convocation by the King's Authority, without Parliament, do bind in Eccleſiaſtical Matters, as an Act of Parliament. And therefore I proceed to ſhew, II. In what manner we are obliged to the obſervation of theſe Canons; concerning which I ſhall premiſe two things.

1. That I meddle not with ſuch Canons as are altered by Laws; for all grant, that unleſs it be in Moral Duties, their force may be taken away by the Laws of the Land.

2. There are ſome Canons, where the general diſuſe in matters of no great Conſequence to the Good of the Church, or the Rights of other Perſons, may abate the Force of the Obligation; eſpecially when the diſuſe hath been connived at, and not brought into Articles of Viſitation, as Can. 74. about Gowns with ſtanding Collars, and Cloaks with Sleeves. But the general Reaſon continues in Force, viz. That there ſhould be a decent and comely Habit for the Clergy, whereby they ſhould be known and diſtinguiſhed by the People; and for this, the ancient Cuſtom of the Church is alledged.

But here a very material Queſtion ariſes, how far Cuſtom is allowed to interpret and alter the Force of Canons made by a lawful Authority: For where Cuſtom prevails againſt a ſtanding Rule, it amounts to this, whether Practice againſt Law, is to have more Force than the Law.

And how can there be a reaſonable Cuſtom againſt a Law built upon reaſonable Grounds? But on the other ſide, if Cuſtom hath no power in this caſe, then all the ancient Canons of the Church do ſtill bind in Conſcience, and ſo we muſt not kneel at our Prayers on Sundays, nor between Eaſter and Whitſontide, which were thought to be made upon good Reaſon at firſt; and ſo many other Canons which have long grown into a diſuſe. So that if we do ſtrictly oblige perſons to obſerve all Eccleſiaſtical Canons made by lawful Authority, we run Men into endleſs Scruples and Perplexities; and Gerſon himſelf grants, That many Canons of General Councils have loſt their Force by diſuſe, and that the obſervation of them now would be uſeleſs and impoſſible. But on the other ſide, if meer diſuſe were ſufficient, what would become of any Canons and Conſtitutions, where Perſons are refractary and diſobedient?

Gerſon de Vit. Spirit. Lect. 4. Cor. 13.

This is a Caſe which deſerves to be ſtated and cleared. And we are to diſtinguiſh three ſorts of Cuſtoms.

1. Cuſtoms generally obtaining upon altering the reaſon of ancient Canons.

2. Cuſtoms allowed upon the general Inconveniency of modern Canons.

3. Cuſtoms taken up without any Rules or Canons for them.

1. As to general Cuſtoms againſt ancient Canons where the Reaſon is altered; I ſee no Ground for any to ſet up thoſe Canons, as ſtill in Force, among us: For this muſt create Confuſion and diſorder, which thoſe Canons were deſigned to prevent; and the Laws of the Land do certainly ſuperſede ancient Canons, wherein the neceſſary Duties of Religion are not immediately concerned. For we muſt have a care of ſetting up ancient Canons againſt the Authority of our Laws, which cannot be conſiſtent with our national Obligation, nor with the Oath of Supremacy.

2. As to Cuſtoms relating to modern Canons, if it hath any Force, as to altering the Obligation.

1. It muſt be general; not taken up by particular diſaffected Perſons to our Conſtitution; for the Cuſtom of ſuch Men only ſhews their wilful Diſobedience and Contempt of Authority; and all Caſuiſts are agreed, that Contempt of lawful Authority, is a wilful Sin: Which ſuppoſes a wilful Neglect upon knowledge and Admonition of their Duty. For Contempt is, Nolle ſubjici cui oportet ſubjici; and a leſſer fault committed with it, is a greater Sin than a greater Fault in it ſelf committed without it, i. e. by meer careleſneſs and inadvertency. But where there is an open and cuſtomary Neglect, there is a Preſumption of Contempt, unleſs ſome great and evident Reaſon be produced for it. I do not ſay the bare Neglect doth imply Contempt in it ſelf, but where there is admonition and a continuance after it, there is a down-right and poſitive Contempt. But where the diſuſe is general, not out of Contempt, but upon other Reaſons; and there is no Admonition by Superiours, but a tacit Connivence; there is a Preſumption of a Conſent towards the laying aſide the ſtrict Obligation of the Canons relating to it.

Cajet. Sum in Verb.

2. It muſt be reaſonable; i. e. on ſuch Grounds as may abate the Force of the Obligation. For there is a difference between a Cuſtom obtaining the Force of a Law, and a Cuſtom abating the Force of a Canon: In the former caſe the Cuſtom muſt be grounded on more evident reaſon than is neceſſary for the latter. Wherein the Caſuiſts allow a Permiſſion of Superiours joyned with reaſonable Circumſtances, to be ſufficient.

But how can acts of diſobedience make a reaſonable Cuſtom?

Cajetan ſaith, they are to blame who began it, but not thoſe who follow it, when the Cuſtom is general.

And Suarez ſaith, it is the common Opinion.

The Canoniſts ſay, if a Cuſtom be againſt a Rule, the reaſon muſt be plain; if only beſides the Rule, and be not repugnant to the end and deſign, the reaſonableneſs when it becomes general, is preſumed. But if the Superiours take notice of it, and condemn it, it loſes the force of Cuſtom, unleſs a new reaſon or higher Authority appear for it.

3. But what is to be ſaid for Cuſtoms taken up without Rules or Canons; of what force are they in point of Conſcience?

1. It is certain, that no late Cuſtoms brought in by ſuch as have no Authority to oblige, can bind others to follow them. For this were to lay open a Gap to the introducing fooliſh and ſuperſtitious Cuſtoms into the Church, which would make diſtinctions without cauſe, and make way for Differences and Animoſities, which all wiſe and good Men will avoid as much as may be.

Soto, l. 1. Q. 7. Art. 2.

It is a Rule among the Caſuiſts, that voluntary Cuſtoms, although introduced with a good Mind, can never oblige others to obſerve them. And Suarez yields, that a bare frequent Repetition of Acts cannot bind others, although it hath been of long continuance.

Suarez. de LL. l. 7. c. 15. 10, 11.

2. If the Cuſtoms be ſuch as are derived from the primitive times, and continue in practice, there is no reaſon to oppoſe, but rather to comply with them; or if they tend to promote a delight in God's Service. As for inſtance:

Origen in Numer. Hom. 5.

Clem. Alex. Str. l. 7. Tertul. Apol. c. 16. Baſil. de Sp. Sancto c. 27.

1. Worſhipping towards the Eaſt, was a very ancient Cuſtom in the Chriſtian Church. I grant that very inſufficient reaſons are given for it; which Origen would not have Men to be too buſie in inquiring into, but to be content that it was a generally received Practice even in his time; and ſo doth Clemens Alexandrinus before him, who thinks it relates to Chriſt, as the Son of Righteouſneſs. Tertullian and S. Baſil own the Cuſtom, and give no Reaſon.

But of all Cuſtoms that of Contention and Singularity, where there is no plain reaſon againſt them, doth the leaſt become the Church of God.

2 Chron. 29. 25.

2. The uſe of organical Muſick in the publick Service. If it tends to compoſe, and ſettle, and raiſe the Spirits of Men in the Acts of Worſhip, I ſee no reaſon can be brought againſt it. If it be ſaid to be only a natural Delight, that reaſon will hold againſt David, who appointed it by God's own Commandment. They who call it Levitical Service, can never prove it to be any of the Typical Ceremonies, unleſs they can ſhew what was repreſented by it.

I come now to the Meaſure of the Obligation of the Canons in Force.

And therein a great Regard is to be had to the Intention of that Authority which enjoyns them; and that is to be gathered from three things;

1. The matter. 2. The Words and Senſe of the Church. 3. The Penalty.

1. As to the matter. If it be in it ſelf weighty, and tends to promote that which is good and pious, and for the Honour of God, and Service of Religion, it cannot be denied but theſe Canons do oblige in Conſcience.

Bellarmin diſtinguiſhes between Laws of the Church, which, he ſaith, are very few and pious Admonitions and good Orders, which are not intended to oblige Men to ſin, but only in caſe of Contempt and Scandal. And as to the Feaſts and Faſts of the Church, which belong to the Laws, he ſaith, they have mitiſſimam obligationem; ſo any one would think, who conſiders how many are exempted, and for what Reaſons.

Bell. de R. D. l. 14. c. 18.

Gerſon ſaith, that no human Conſtitutions bind as to Moral Sin, unleſs it be founded on the Law of God; as he confeſſes the Church's Authority is, as to Circumſtances; and then he thinks it obliges in Conſcience. The Subſtance of his Opinion, which hath been much diſputed and controverted by modern Caſuiſts, lies in theſe things:

De Vit. Spir. Lect. 4. Cor. 1. Coroll. 6.

1. That where Eccleſiaſtical Conſtitutions do inforce any part of the Law of God, although it be not expreſly contained therein, they do immediately bind the Conſciences of Men.
2. That where they tend to the good of the Church, and the Preſervation of Decency and Order, they do ſo far oblige, that the contempt of Authority therein, is a Sin againſt the Law of God.
3. That where the Injunctions of Authority are for no other end, but to be obeyed, he doth not think that there is any ſtrict Obligation in point of Conſcience.

And ſo far Cajetan agrees with him.

Cajet. Sum. 6. Contemp. &c. Clericorum.

And although the other Caſuiſts ſeem to be very angry with him, yet when they require a publick Good, and the Order of the Church to be the reaſon of Eccleſiaſtical Laws, they do, in effect, agree with him.

Now as to the matter of our Canons which reſpect the Clergy, there are two eſpecially which bind them ſtrictly.

1. The Canon about Sobriety of Converſation, Can. 75. Yes, ſome may ſay, as far as the Law of God obliges, i. e. to Temperance and Sobriety; but the Canon forbids reſorting to Taverns, or Alehouſes, or playing at Dice, Cards, or Tables; doth this Canon oblige in Conſcience in this manner? If it were a new thing that were forbidden, there were ſome Plea againſt the ſeverity of it; but frequenting publick Houſes is forbidden by the Apoſtolical Canons, which are of great Antiquity, by the Council of Laodicea, and in Trullo, and many others ſince.

Can. Apoſt. 54. Laodicea, 24. In Trullo, 9. Carthag. 43. Diſt. 44. 2, 3, 4. Aquiſgr. c. 14. Francſ. c. 19. Aquiſgr. 2. c. 60. Extr. de Vit. & Honeſt. Cleric. c. 15. Conc. Weſtmon. c. 2. Spelm. II. 192. Lynw. l. 3. c. 1.

And by the Apoſtolical Canon any Presbyter playing at Dice, and continuing ſo to do after Admonition, is to be deprived. The Illiberitan Council makes it Excommunication to play at Dice. Not meerly for the Images of the Gentile Gods upon them, as Albaſpinæus thinks, but becauſe the thing it ſelf was not of good Report, even among the Gentiles themſelves; as appears by Cicero, Ovid, Suetonius, &c. as giving too great occaſion for indecent Paſſions, and of the loſs of time. Hoſtienſis reckons up ſixteen Vices that accompany it, which a Clergyman eſpecially ought to avoid. And playing at Dice was infamous by the Civil Law.

Juſtinian forbids Clergymen not only playing, but being preſent at it. It was forbidden in the old Articles of Viſitation here, and in ſeveral Dioceſan Synods, Spelm. II. 192, 252, 298, 367, 450. So that there can be no reaſon to complain of the ſeverity of this Canon, which ſo generally obtained in the Chriſtian Church.

II. The

II. The Canons which relate to Miniſters diſcharging the ſeveral Duties, of their Function, in Preaching, Praying, Adminiſtring Sacraments, Catechizing, viſiting the Sick, &c. which are intended to inforce an Antecedent Duty; which we can never preſs you too much or too earneſtly to; conſidering that the Honour of Religion, and the Salvation of your own and the Peoples Souls depend upon it.

Caj. & Præcept. Navar. Man. c.23. n. 50, &c. Suarez. de L. L. l. 4. c. 18. Tolet. Summ. l. 8. c. 19. n. 3.

(2.) The next way of judging the Churches Intention, is by the Words and Senſe of the Church. Cajetan thinks the general Senſe is the beſt Rule. Navarr ſaith to the ſame purpoſe, although ſome words are ſtricter than others. Suarez, that the main obligation depends on the matter, but the Churches Intention may be more expreſſed by ſpecial Words of Command. Tolet relies moſt upon the Senſe of the Church: But the Senſe of the Church muſt be underſtood, whether it be approving, or recommending, or ſtrictly commanding, according to the Obligation of affirmative Precepts, which makes a reaſonable allowance for Circumſtances. And ſo our Church in ſome Caſes expreſly allows reaſonable Impediments. And in Precepts of Abſtinence, we muſt diſtinguiſh the Senſe of the Church, as to Moral Abſtinence, i. e. ſubduing the Fleſh to the Spirit; and a Ritual Abſtinence in a meer difference of Meats which our Church lays no Weight upon; and a Religious Abſtinence for a greater Exerciſe of Prayer and Devotion, which our Church doth particularly recommend at particular Seaſons, which I need not mention.

(3.) By the Penalties annexed, which you may find by reading over the Canons, which you ought to do frequently and ſeriouſly, in order to your own Satisfaction about your Duties, and the Obligation to perform them.

But ſome may think, that ſuch Penal Canons oblige only to undergo the Puniſhment.

To which I anſwer, that the caſe is very different in an Hypothetical Law, as Suarez calls it; when Laws are only conditional and disjunctive, either you muſt do ſo, or you muſt undergo ſuch Penalty, which is then looked on as a legal Recompence; and Eccleſiaſtical Conſtitutions, where Obedience is chiefly intended, and the Penalty is annexed only to inforce it, and to deterr others from diſobedience. For no Man can imagine that the Church aims at any Man's Suſpenſion or Deprivation for it ſelf, or by way of Compenſation for the Breach of its Conſtitutions.

And now give me leave not only to put you in mind, but to preſs earneſtly upon you the diligent Performance of thoſe Duties, which by the Laws of God and Man, and by your own voluntary Promiſes when you undertook the Cure of Souls, are incumbent upon you. It is too eaſie to obſerve, that thoſe who have the Law on their ſide, and the Advantage of a national Settlement, are more apt to be remiſs and careleſs when they have the Stream with them, than thoſe who row againſt it, and therefore muſt take more pains to carry on their Deſigns. As thoſe who force a Trade muſt uſe much more Diligence, than thoſe who go on in the common Road of Buſineſs. But what Diligence others uſe in gaining Parties, do you imploy in the ſaving their Souls: Which the People will never believe you are in earneſt unleſs they obſerve you are very careful in ſaving your own by a conſcientious Diſcharge of your Duties. They do not pretend to fineneſs of thoughts, and ſubtilty of reaſoning, but they are ſhrewd Judges whether Men mean what they ſay, or not; and they do not love to be impoſed upon by ſuch a ſort of Sophiſtry, as if they could think that they can have ſuch a Regard to their Souls, who ſhew ſo little to their own. Therefore let your unblameable and holy Converſations, your Charity and good Works, your Diligence and Conſtancy in your Duties, convince them that you are in earneſt; and they will hearken more to you, than if you uſed the fineſt Speeches, and the moſt eloquent Haranges in the Pulpit to them. Theſe, the People underſtand little, and value leſs; but a ſerious, convincing, and affectionate way of Preaching, is the moſt likely way to work upon them. If there be ſuch a thing as another World, as no doubt there is, what can you imploy your time, and thoughts, and Pains better about, than preparing the Souls of your People for a happy Eternity? How mean are all other laborious Trifles, and learned Impertinencies, and buſie Inquiries, and reſtleſs thoughtts in compariſon with this moſt valuable and happy imployment, if we diſcharge it well? And happy is that Man, who enjoys the Satisfaction of doing his Duty now, and much more happy will he be whom our Lord, when he cometh, ſhall find ſo doing.

§. IV.

A Discourse concerning Bonds of Reſignation of Benefices, in Point of Law and Conſcience.

155:2:C

The PREFACE.

THE Intention of Writing and Publiſhing the following Diſcourſe, was to give a ſtop, if poſſible, to a dangerous and prevailing Practice; and ſo much the more dangerous, becauſe it is managed with ſo much Secrecy, and Perſons are often drawn into it, before they are aware of the Miſchief of it. They are told, That there is no Law againſt it; and that there are adjudged Caſes and Precedents in Law for it; and that there is nothing amiſs in the Bond of Reſignation it ſelf: But if there be any corrupt or evil Practice after it, that makes it fit to be condemned in Equity, but not in Law. But a general Bond of Reſignation of a Benefice upon Notice, in order to the obtaining a Preſentation to that Benefice, hath ſuch a Simoniacal Appearance, that any Perſon who pretends to Conſcience, cannot but think it neceſſary to examine, how far ſuch a Practice can be conſiſtent, not only with the Law, but with the Oath which he is to take againſt all Simoniacal Contracts and Promiſes, directly or indirectly, &c. for or concerning the procuring or obtaining the Rectory or Vicarage of, &c. How can any Man that enters into theſe Bonds, ſay that he doth it not in order to the obtaining a Preſentation? And doth not ſuch a Bond amount to a Contract? How then can they ſatisfie themſelves in taking this Oath after ſuch a Bond? All they can pretend, is, that although it be a Contract for ſuch an End, yet it is no Simoniacal Contract. But which way are we able to be ſatisfied in Point of Conſcience, what is a Simoniacal Contract, and what not? Is it only from the Statute, 31 Eliz. c. 6.

ſo that what is there forbidden is Simoniacal, and nothing elſe? But where hath that Law determined what Simony is, when it is never mentioned in it? It ſeverely prohibits ſome corrupt Practices as to Benefices, but it never goes about to reſtrain the Notion of Simony to them (as will appear in the following Diſcourſe) and the Eccleſiaſtical Laws, as to this matter, are left as they were before. If therefore there be ſuch a true Notion of a Simoniacal Contract, as is allowed by our Laws, which is not confined to that Statute, then it muſt follow, that there may be a Simoniacal Contract, which is not condemned by that Law; and therefore all Perſons who underſtand the Nature and Extent of our Laws, will have a care of reſtraining the Nature of a Simoniacal Contract to the Letter of that Statute.

It may be ſaid, That a Simoniacal Contract is an ill Name put on we know not what, if we go beyond the Law of the Land; and that there muſt be ſome certain Bounds ſet to ſuch hard Words, or elſe the Snare may be greater another way; and that there is no ſuch thing as real Simony in the caſe; but the Word is applied to ſome indirect Practices in obtaining Benefices, but what thoſe are, the Law muſt determine. To which I anſwer, That I am very far from going beyond the Law of the Land for determining this matter. For I do acknowledge, that ſince the Notion of Simony is extended beyond the firſt Occaſion of the Name, there muſt be a certain Rule to determine it; and that I do freely grant is the Law of the Land. But by it I do not mean a particular Statute made with reſpect to ſome more notorious Acts, which are puniſhable in the Courts of Common Law; but I underſtand by the Law of England that comprehenſive Body of Laws, which have been here received as the Meaſure of our Judgment and Actions in thoſe things which are to be determined by them.

If a Queſtion be made, Whether a Contract made at Sea, be a good Contract? It will be no good Anſwer to ſay, It muſt be a good Contract, becauſe there is nothing in it contrary to the Rules of the Common Law. For if our Common Law ſhould happen to allow ſuch Contracts, which the Civil Law doth not, will it be Ground enough to affirm, That it is a good Contract, becauſe our Common Law doth not condemn it? No certainly: But it muſt be determined by that Law which is proper for it, and being here receiv'd for ſuch, is in ſuch Caſes the Law of the Land.

So I ſay here; the Eccleſiaſtical Law, ſo far as it is receiv'd and allow'd by the Common Law, is the Rule and Meaſure whereby the Nature of Simony is to be determin'd; and that is allowed by our moſt learned and judicious Interpreters of our Common Law, to be of Eccleſiaſtical Cogniſance; only ſuch Acts as come under Statutes belong to the Courts of Common Law. And there was a general Preſumption in Law before, That no Patron was to make any Advantage to himſelf of a Right of Preſentation. And therefore my Lord Coke ſaith, That a Guardian in Socage of a Manor whereunto an Advowſon is appendant, ſhall not preſent to the Church, becauſe he can take nothing for the Preſentation for the which he may account to the Heir; from whence he infers, That Simony is odious in the Eye of the Common Law. And it is very well if it ſo continues; which I can hardly imagine, if theſe Bonds of Reſignation prevail. But if by the Eccleſiaſtical Law, as received here, ſuch Bonds are Simoniacal, being a Contract in order to the obtaining a Preſentation, then it can give little Satisfaction to any Man's Conſcience to be told, That they are not againſt Law, i. e. againſt the Statute, 31 Eliz. c. 6.

Inſt. 156.

My Buſineſs is not here to give a full Account of the matters contained in the following Diſcourſe, but only to remove ſome general Prejudices againſt the Deſign of it. Which is truly no other than to bring this ſecret Practice into open View, and to have it fairly examin'd and diſcuſs'd. For while it is managed in this manner, there is not only Miſchief done to the Church, but to the Conſciences of Men; who are very apt to ſuſpect a Snare in all ſuch Bonds, and are very uneaſy at the Thoughts of them afterwards. If there be any better Reaſons to be given for them than I have yet ſeen, I ſhould be glad to be convinced of the Lawfulneſs of ſuch indirect Practices and private Contracts: But at preſent I think (if they be not timely prevented) they will end in unſpeakable Miſchief to the Parochial Clergy, who are the main Eccleſiaſtical Body of the Church of England, and in whoſe Welfare we ought to be all concerned.

And truly I cannot but be very tender in what relates to their Rights; for their Work and Duty is great and laborious, if it be performed as it ought to be; and they ought not to have any new Burdens impoſed upon them, under a Pretence of Law, which neither they nor their Succeſſors will be able to bear.

I am very ſenſible how much in this Age depends upon the Faithfulneſs, and Diligence, and good Reputation of the Parochial Clergy of England. For I am not much afraid of any Deſigns of our open Enemies (or which may be worſe, of our pretended Friends) if we be true to our ſelves, i. e. if we ſeriouſly and conſcientiouſly do our Duties with reſpect to God, the People, and our own Souls. If we do not give way to unreaſonable Suſpicions, and cauſeleſs Jealouſies of one another; if we mind the Intereſt of Religion more than our own, and ſerve God, and not our own Luſts; if we ſincerely promote the beſt Ends in the World, the ſaving Souls, and doing good to Mankind, God will not be wanting to us; but he that hath ſav'd us from the Lion and the Bear, will likewiſe ſave us from the Fox and the Viper; I mean ſuch who under fair and plauſible Pretences eat through the Bowels of their Mother, and by ſecret and indirect Practices go about to ruin the Church they profeſs themſelves to be of, altho' by their Works they deny it.

If I had not ſome more than ordinary Reaſon to believe ſuch things to be not only practiſed, but encourag'd by ſuch who pretend not only to underſtand our Law, but to direct the Nation in it, I ſhould hardly have undertaken a Task of this Nature. But having ſo juſt an occaſion to ſearch into this matter, as well as I could, and finding ſo much Cauſe of Diſſatisfaction as to theſe Bonds, I thought it my Duty to do what lay in me to prevent that Miſchief which is haſtning upon our Church by them. If I am miſtaken in any part of the following Diſcourſe, I ſhall be glad to be better informed; and if I am not, I hope that our Church may receive no diſadvantage by it. And as I honour the Profeſſion of the Law, and the many worthy Perſons who are and have been of it; ſo I cannot but be concerned to find ſome Pretences of Law made uſe of to ſuch ill Purpoſes and Deſigns; that if the number of Patrons that are againſt our eſtabliſhed Religion ſhould happen to exceed thoſe that are for it, by the help of theſe Bonds of Reſignation, the Title to moſt of our Parochial Cures would in a little time fall into the hands of Popiſh Prieſts; which would much facilitate the introducing their Religion, when ſo many Proteſtant Incumbents would ſo eaſily be turned out, by no other means, but by theſe Bonds of Reſignation. And therefore it is not merely the Intereſt of our Parochial Clergy, but of our Religion which lies at ſtake; and this, I ſuppoſe, will be ſufficient to juſtify this Undertaking.

Weſtminſter, July 10. 1695. E. W.

A Diſcourſe concerning Bonds of Reſignation, &c.

THE Deſign of this Diſcourſe, is to enquire into a Caſe, too commonly practiſed among us, and too little examin'd; which is concerning Bonds of Reſignation given by Clergymen to Patrons in order to the obtaining a Preſentation to a Benefice with Cure of Souls. This is a Caſe which reſpects both Law and Conſcience: And it is not ſo eaſie a matter, as ſome ſeem to take it for granted, to reſolve it as to either of them. For if ſuch a Practice be within the Reaſon and Intention of the Law, which forbids all corrupt Preſentations and Reſignations, 31 Eliz. c. 6. then it cannot be juſtified by Law; and if it be againſt the Scope and Deſign of the Oath againſt Simoniacal Contracts, then it can much leſs be juſtified in Point of Conſcience. And whether it be or not, is the Subject of this preſent Diſcourſe; which I am ſorry there is ſo much occaſion for: But ſince there are too many that practiſe it; and others too ready to defend it; and ſince it is of ſo miſchievous Conſequence to the Intereſt of the Church of England, if it prevails, I think it highly neceſſary to enquire more ſtrictly into this matter, than hath been hitherto done. Which I ſhall do in ſuch a manner, as to make it appear that no Conſiderations whatſoever have ſwayed me, but thoſe of Law and Conſcience; and I hope thoſe who have been drawn into ſuch Snares, will ſee cauſe to repent, (if they do it not already) and others take care how they run themſelves into ſuch Perplexities, which no Precedents in Point of Law, and no Authority in Point of Conſcience can give them Satisfaction in.

But I intend no Reflections on particular Perſons; and I cannot believe that any who have impartially weighed theſe things, can maintain the lawfulneſs of them ſo, as to wiſh them generally practiſed. For however there may be ſome Caſes wherein ſuch Bonds may be thought far more reaſonable than in others; yet it cannot be denied that there are far more Caſes, wherein ſuch a Practice muſt be deſtructive to the legal Rights of the Church. Suppoſe ſome Patrons to be Perſons of great Piety and Integrity, who do require theſe Bonds only to bind the Clergy the more ſtrictly to do their Duty: Suppoſe others have no Regard to their own Intereſt, but only take care of Minors, bred up with a Proſpect of ſuch Benefices which they are not yet capable of: (which are the moſt reaſonable Conſiderations inſiſted upon in the adjudged Caſes:) but what are theſe to the multitude of moſt unjuſt and unreaſonable Conſiderations, which may be made the Conditions of theſe Bonds? For the Bonds are ſuppoſed to be general, and ſo the Patrons left at liberty to impoſe their own Conditions. And, are there no ſuch kind of Patrons among us, who may be too juſtly ſuſpected to mind their own Intereſts above the Churches Good? And therefore will take all ways to leſſen the Profits of Benefices in their Diſpoſal, as far as they are told that the Law permits them? Such I mean, who have no Reſtraint but what the Law lays upon them, having no Senſe of Honour or Conſcience in theſe matters. And if it once paſs for an allowed Doctrine in Law, that Bonds of Reſignation are lawful, what ſhall ſtop ſuch Men from putting very unreaſonable Conditions upon their Incumbents, or elſe they may preſently call them to an Account for the Forfeiture of the Bonds? If then there be no effectual courſe ſo much as offer'd againſt very hard and unreaſonable Terms; how can ſuch Bonds be thought Juſt and Reaſonable?

It may be ſaid, That if the Conditions be ſuch as are allowed by Law, then the Bonds are lawful, otherwiſe not. But this by no means clears the Difficulty. For the main Queſtion is, whether ſuch Bonds be lawful, where the Conditions are not expreſſed, but meer notice of three or ſix Months? And theſe are the general Bonds of Reſignation: And ſuch, I think, I may with Reaſon affirm to be againſt both Law and Conſcience. But ſuppoſe there may be Conditions of both kinds required, but it is not expreſſed in the Bonds what they are: What a miſerable Slavery muſt the Clergy be under, who give general Bonds, and know not what Conditions will be required? And then they muſt go to Law, and be at greater Charge and Trouble than they can well bear, to know whether the Conditions required of them be ſuch as the Law allows or not? So that the general allowance of Bonds of Reſignation upon Notice, although the Law be left to determine the particular Conditions, is that which we have Reaſon to look upon as very hard and unjuſt, and inconſiſtent with the Nature and Deſign of that Relation which the Law ſuppoſes between Patrons and Incumbents, as will appear more afterwards.

There are two things chiefly inſiſted on by thoſe who plead for theſe Bonds of Reſignation.

I. That there is no Law againſt them.

II. That there have been Caſes adjudged for them: And both theſe I ſhall carefully examine.

I. That there is no Law againſt them. There are two Laws to be conſider'd in this matter.

1. The Law againſt Simoniacal Contracts, 31 Eliz.

2. The Law which requires every Incumbent to make an Oath againſt Simony.

1. As to the Law againſt Simoniacal Contracts: The Statute is expreſly againſt preſenting to a Benefice for a Summ of Money, Reward, Gift, Profit, or Benefit, directly or indirectly, or entring into Bond or Covenant for that Purpoſe, 31 Eliz. c. 6. n. 5. Wherein theſe things are obſervable:

(1.) That it is not a meer Summ of Money which is here forbidden, but any Benefit whatſoever directly or indirectly.

(2.) That not meer doing the thing but entring into Bond or Covenant to do it is within the Reach of this Law.

(3.) That the Penalty is againſt ſuch who do preſent for, or by Reaſon of any Promiſe or Agreement for any Benefit whatſoever: Or thoſe who do accept ſuch Preſentations on thoſe terms: i. e. ſo as it becomes the Motive of ſuch Preſentation or Acceptance.

(4.) That the ſame Law declares, n. 8. againſt corrupt Reſigning or Exchanging the Benefice he enjoys, for any Summ of Money or Benefit whatſoever.

(5.) That the Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures ſtill remain in Force againſt theſe Offences: Which ſuppoſes that this Law doth not ſuperſede the Eccleſiaſtical Laws here in being, n. 9.

So that here are two material Queſtions to be reſolved upon this Statute.

[1.] Whether ſince the making this Statute, there be any Simoniacal Contract, but what is againſt the Purport of it?

[2.] Whether a Bond of Reſignation, upon which a Benefice is given and accepted, be within the Deſign of it?

[1.] As to the former; it is obſervable, that the words Simony or Simoniacal Contract, are never mentioned in this Statute. For, if they had, the Judges would have had ſufficient Reaſon to have declared what was Simony, and what not. We are told indeed by the Reverend and Cr. Car. 361. Learned Judges in the Caſe of Mackaller and Todderick, That the Conſideration to have Money to procure one to be Rector of a Church, is a Simoniacal Contract, and an unllawful Act condemned by all Laws: And that the Common Law before the Statute, 31 Eliz. took notice of it. But they do not declare how far the Common Law could take notice of it, before that Statute, any farther than that it was not a thing allowed by it. For certainly it was then of Spiritual Cogniſance; and the Perſons guilty of it were to be proceeded againſt by the Eccleſiaſtical Laws. And conſequently, the Notion of Simony is to be taken from thence, and not meerly from this Statute: So that if accepting a Benefice upon giving a Bond of Reſignation were Simoniacal before, it doth not ceaſe to be ſo by this Statute. Indeed corrupt Reſignation of a Benefice hath not the ſame Penalty by this Statute with corrupt Acceptance of it at firſt: For that is a Diſability, and the other double the Value. But hereby we ſee that the one is againſt the Law, as much as the other. So far then it is clear by this Statute, that any corrupt Reſignation is againſt Law: And if the enquiry be after the Penalty, the Statute muſt determine that. But if the Queſtion be, whether Reſignation upon a Bond given before hand in order to a Preſentation, be a Simoniacal Act or not, as done in Purſuance of a Simoniacal Contract? In that the Statute gives no Rule, but only declares the Penalties of ſome particular Acts, which are there expreſſed.

Thoſe who would have nothing now to be Simony, but what is there forbidden, muſt firſt prove that the Intention of the Law was to limit and determine the Nature of Simony; which (as is already obſerved) is not ſo much as mentioned in it. The Reaſon of the Law as to Penalties is one thing, and the Nature of a Simoniacal Contract another. If a Queſtion be put, whether a Simoniacal Contract be void in Law or not? 3 Inſt. 153. Marg. My Lord Coke ſaith, that the Statute doth not make the Bond, Covenant, Promiſe, or other Aſſurance, void, but the Preſentment, &c. and ſo it was adjudged, 40 Eliz. This is ſomewhat ſtrange Doctrine, that a Preſentment ſhould be void by reaſon of a Simoniacal Bond, and yet that Bond not be void in Law. For that which makes another thing void, one would think ſhould be void in it ſelf; eſpecially ſince he F. 156. ſaith in the ſame Chapter, that Simony is odious in the Eye of the Common Law. But not ſo very odious, if a Simoniacal Contract be a good Contract according to the Common Law. But he diſtinguiſheth between Malum in ſe againſt the Common Law, and Malum prohibitum by Statute Law. How doth this clear the Point? The Preſentation is void, being prohibited by the Statute: But is not a Simoniacal Contract Malum in ſe, againſt the Common Law? How then comes this not to be void? Eſpecially ſince it is contractus ex turpi cauſâ: And for that reaſon my Lord Hob. f. 167. Cr. Car. 361. Hobart held it void in Law; and ſo the Court held in Mackaller's Caſe. But ſuppoſe my Lord Coke in the right, as to a Simoniacal Contract, that it is not void at Common Law: it follows from thence, that the conſideration of Law and Conſcience is different in this matter. For I ſuppoſe none will deny that a Simoniacal Contract is unlawful in point of Conſcience; and yet he aſſerts it not to be void in Law. Why then may not Bonds of Reſignation, although not within the compaſs of this Statute, yet be unlawful in point of Conſcience, as well as a Simoniacal Contract be unlawful in point of Conſcience, and yet be good by the Common Law? Either therefore Simony, as odious as it is in the Eye of the Law, muſt not be Malum in ſe againſt Common Law, as my Lord Coke ſpeaks; or if it be, there muſt be another Rule of Conſcience in this matter from this Statute. I would fain know what was Simony at Common Law before this Statute; and whether that which was ſo before doth not continue ſo ſtill, if it be not taken away by it? For if there be no Simony now, but what is expreſſed in that Statute, then it muſt declare what is Simony, and what not. Simony, ſaith my Lord Coke, is deſcribed by this Act, 31 Eliz. and he ſaith in his Margin, Injuſtum eſt illa vendere, quæ gratis diſtribui debent; which is a very good Illuſtration of it. But the Queſtion is, What is meant by Selling? Whether it be merely for a Sum of Money paid down, or ſecured by Bond or Covenant? Or whether it doth not take in any kind of Benefit or Emolument accruing to the Perſon who beſtows it, which hinders it from being a free Gift? The Caſuiſts ſay, Nomine emptionis & venditionis intelligitur omnis contractus non gratuitus. But can that be called a free Gift, where there is a Bond of Reſignation of ſuch a thing, whereof the Poſſeſſion and Reverſion bear a Price, and have a real Value? We need not run to Simon Magus to underſtand what turpe Commercium is. There were many Laws among the old Romans, againſt purchaſing any publick Offices; and they thought it a great Reproach to them for any Price to be ſet upon them; as the great Roman Maſter ſaid, Pretium quod habet, hoc ipſo vileſcit. By the Laws Acilia and Calpurnia, all that were convict of giving Money for Offices, were under a Diſability or Incapacity of any for the future; and the Mercatores Poteſtatum were infamous by their Laws. Ariſtotle thought it a matter of very ill Conſequence to any Government to have any thing of Money given for Offices, becauſe it taught Men to ſet a greater Value on Money than Vertue. Theſe Conſiderations, ſetting aſide the Story of Simon Magus, were great enough to induce the Chriſtian Church to be extremely nice and tender in this matter of Benefices; and not only to forbid the direct Sale of them for Money, but any indirect Trafficking, which might take off the entire Freedom of the Preſentation of Perſons to them. I know to how little purpoſe it would be, to reckon up all the Canons which have been made in the Chriſtian Church from the Apoſtles Times downwards againſt Simony, becauſe ſome will ſay, That the Eccleſiaſticks were always true to their own Intereſt. But let us ſet aſide all Prejudice in this matter, and conſider it impartially. If any Offices in the World ought to be free from the Suſpicion of ſordid Trafficking, certainly thoſe of the Church ought, from the Nature and Deſign of their Imployments. The Queſtion then will come to this, Whether giving a Bond of Reſignation, in order to the procuring a Benefice, be ſuch a Trafficking or not? And we have three Rules to judge by.

Sylveſt. v. Simon.

V. Ciceron pro Planco

Dion. l. 36.

Ariſt. Pol. l. 2. c. 12.

1. The Nature and Reaſon of the thing: Whether ſuch Actings be not inconſiſtent with that Freedom which ought to be uſed, both in Giving and Taking Eccleſiaſtical Benefices? So that if there were no Laws either Eccleſiaſtical or Civil in the caſe, whether there be not ſomething in theſe Tranſactions unbecoming the Deſign and Dignity of the Employment?

2. The Eccleſiaſtical Law of England, which hath been from time to time received here, and allow'd by a general Conſent, and ſtill continues in force, where it is not repugnant to any Laws of the Realm; which cannot be pretended in this caſe.

3. The Statute-Law, which doth not abrogate the Eccleſiaſtical Law as to Simony; it only enacts ſome particular Penalties on ſome more remarkable Simoniacal Acts as to Benefices and Orders, but never once goes about to repeal any Eccleſiaſtical Laws about Simony, or to determine the Nature and Bounds of it.

[2.] But let us come more cloſely to the Statute it ſelf, to ſee whether theſe Bonds of Reſignation be not againſt the Deſign of it. The Words are, If any Perſon for any Sum of Money, Reward, Gift, Profit or Benefit, directly or indirectly, or for or by reaſon of any Promiſe, Agreement, Grant, Bond, Covenant, or other Aſſurance of or for any Sum of Money, Gift, or Profit whatſoever, directly or indirectly, ſhall preſent, &c. Now we ſuppoſe a Patron to preſent one to a Benefice without any Money, or Bond for Money; but he declares before his preſenting him, That he muſt enter into a Bond to Reſign his Benefice upon Six Months Notice, under a ſevere Penalty; to which he ſubmits on the Condition of obtaining his Benefice. After this, the Patron demands ſuch a Portion of Tythes; or a Conſent for him to incloſe, to the apparent Benefit of the Patron, and Diminution of the Profits of the Living. The Queſtion is, Whether ſuch a Bond be within the Deſign of this Statute? All that can be ſaid is, That no ſuch Conſideration is expreſſed in the Bond, which is in general Terms; which implies, That if the Conſideration had been expreſſed in the Bond, it had been plainly againſt the Law. But ſuppoſe it be left out of the Bond, is not the penal Sum of the Forfeiture of the Bond ſufficient to make the poor Incumbent comply with the Terms propoſed afterwards? If none but juſt and reaſonable things had been intended, why were they not clearly expreſſed in the Bond it ſelf, ſo as to prevent any Fear or Jealouſy of worſe Deſigns? Have no ſuch things ever been practiſed, or heard of among us? If there had not, doth it not look like a Contrivance to deceive the Law, and to hamper the Conſciences of thoſe who take Benefices? And whatever is done in fraudem Legis, is againſt Law; for it fruſtrates the main Intention and Deſign of a Law without breaking the Letter of it; which is the worſt way of defeating a Law.

But we are told, That our Courts of Law are to judge according to the Law, and not according to an equitable Conſtruction of the Intention and Deſign of it. If it be really ſo, it doth only ſhew that ſuch Courts are under a ſtrange Limitation, which are tied up to the Letter of a Law, againſt the main Scope and principal End of it. But by the Judges Oath, 18 E. 3. n. 2. 20 E. 3. n. 1. they are bound to do equal Law and Execution of Right to all the King's Subjects, &c. What is here meant by equal Law? Is it to purſue the Letter of the Law againſt the Reaſon and Deſign of it?

There are two ſorts of Equity to be conſider'd among us.

1. An Equity founded upon a reaſonable Conſtruction of Law, according to the Intention of it.

2. An Equity for which the Common Law hath made no Proviſion; as in Caſes of Fraud, Accident and Truſt; which is the true Foundation of the Court of Equity in Chancery, viz. to ſupply the Defects of our Law in thoſe Caſes.

The Queſtion now is, Whether the Judges at Common Law are ſo tied up to the bare Letter of it, that they cannot take in ſuch Caſes, which are according to the Reaſon of a Law, but not within the Words of it? And my Lord Coke allows this ſort of Equity. For, ſaith he, Equity is a Conſtruction made by the Judges, that Caſes out of the Letter of a Statute, yet being within the ſame Miſchief or Cauſe of making the ſame, ſhall be within the ſame Remedy that That Statute provideth. 1 Inſt. 24. b. Theſe are remarkable Words of this great Oracle of the Law, and ought to be well weighed and conſidered in all ſuch Caſes as this. And he afterwards ſaith, That Equity is the Reaſon of the Law, which weighs Caſes according to their due Meaſures; and ſo gives in paribus rationibus paria Jura & Judicia. If then theſe Bonds of Reſignation are within the Reaſon of this Law, and tend to the ſame Miſchief, they ought to have the ſame Remedy; and it cannot be made any juſt Plea for them, that they are not within the Letter of the Law.

II. I now come to conſider the Oath againſt Simony, which every Incumbent is bound to take, which runs in theſe Words; "I, A. B. do "ſwear that I have made no Simoniacal Payment, Contract or Promiſe, "directly or indirectly, by my ſelf or by any other, to my Knowledge "or with my Conſent, to any Perſon or Perſons whatſoever, for or "concerning the procuring or obtaining of the Rectory or Vicarage; "nor will at any time hereafter perform or ſatisfy any ſuch kind of "Payment, Contract or Promiſe made by any other without my Know"ledge or Conſent.

Simony, ſaith my Lord Coke, is the more odious, becauſe it is ever accompanied with Perjury; for the Preſentee is ſworn to commit no Simony. 3 Inſt. 156.

Here are too things fit to be conſidered.

1. That the Oath is not meerly againſt direct Simony, but againſt any Simoniacal Contract for obtaining a Benefice.

2. That this Oath is not limited to the Statute, 31 Eliz. nor made in purſuance of it, but was in being long before; and therefore muſt have its Interpretation from the Eccleſiaſtical Law, as it was here received, and not from the Words of the Statute, which do not mention a Simoniacal Contract. Noy, 25. We muſt then enquire what was a Simoniacal Contract by our Eccleſiaſtical Law.

In our Provincial Conſtitutions, which were received as part of our Law relating to Eccleſiaſtical Matters, there is one about an Oath to be taken by every one preſented before the Biſhop, C. de. Jurejur. Preſent. Stat. That for the obtaining the Preſentation, he had neither promiſed nor given any thing to him that preſented him; nec aliquam propter hoc inierit pactionem, nor enter'd into any Bond or Covenant for that end; not a Covenant to pay a Sum of Money, but to obtain the Preſentation. Propter hoc, ſaith Lynwood, Lynw. f. 56 ſc. ut præſentetur; and he declares it before, that whatever is done with an Intention to induce the Patron to preſent, is Simoniacal; and whatever Compact any enter into for that purpoſe, is a Simoniacal Contract. Nay he goes ſo far as to ſay, the doing any thing with that Deſign to obtain a Benefice, makes it a Mental Simony; (which reaches not to the Oath, and requires no more but Repentance) but if there be a Bargain between the Patron and the Party to be preſented, he declares it to be a Simoniacal Contract. He puts the Queſtion, If a Perſon offers to ſerve a Patron for a Year or two, with that Intention to obtain the Preſentation to ſuch a Benefice by it, Whether ſuch a one can with a ſafe Conſcience take the Oath? He anſwers, Negatively. If this were his principal Deſign, and there were a Bond or Covenant between them to that purpoſe; for this were Simony. From whence it follows, that any Bond or Covenant enter'd into for that End, to obtain a Preſentation, was Simoniacal according to the Senſe of our Law Eccleſiaſtical.

In the time of Archbiſhop Courtney, the Form of the Oath was more full and expreſs, as it is extant in the Archbiſhop's Regiſter called Morton, and in Spelman's Councils: For there is this Clauſe added, That neither themſelves, nor any Friends of theirs are under any Bonds about the Reſignation or Exchange of their Benefices. Here the Oath is expreſſed againſt any Bonds of Reſignation. But why is this Clauſe left out ſince? Becauſe it was ſuppoſed to be ſufficiently implied in the other Words; ſince this was at leaſt an indirect Simoniacal Contract.

It may be ſaid, " That Men are not now tied up to the Canoniſts
" Opinions about Mental and Conventional Simony: For our Law owns " nothing but Real Simony, i. e. either actual Payment, or a Bond to " pay ſuch a Summ of Money to obtain a Preſentation: And if there " be no Contract for that end, it is no Simoniacal Contract according to " our Law.

This is all that can be ſaid in this Caſe; but I think it can give no conſidering Man Satisfaction. For the Intention of the Law, in being ſo ſtrict and ſevere againſt all Simoniacal Contracts, was twofold:

1. To preſerve the Dignity of the ſacred Function; which could never be upheld, if mean and ſordid Trafficking were allowed as to Benefices. For the People can never have any due Reſpect or Veneration for a Perſon, whom they ſuſpect to have come into his Place among them by indirect Practices; although it be not the Payment of ſo much Money. For they have ſo much Senſe as to know, that what is valuable by Money, is as good as Money, according to its Proportion: And if a Man gives a Bond to Reſign his Living upon Notice; they know how much this abates of the Value of it to him, when he holds it on ſuch a precarious Title; and that he gives ſo much to obtain the Living as it is of leſs Value to him, than if he had it without any ſuch Bond. He that is forced by a Bond to reſign his Benefice, muſt part with what is really valuable to him, as much as the Poſſeſſion of it for ſo many years, as he might otherwiſe enjoy it, would come to: And he that gives a Bond to that purpoſe to obtain a Preſentation, doth oblige himſelf to give to the Patron ſo much as that Intereſt can be valued at. Is not a free unconditional Intereſt in a Benefice really more valuable, than that which depends on the Pleaſure of another? If it be, then he that gives a Bond of Reſignation, doth give ſomething really valuable in Money, to obtain the Preſentation. And how can this be excuſed from Simony? Yes, ſome may ſay; Simony is only a frightful word uſed by Eccleſiaſticks to deterr People from making the beſt of their own: whereas the true Notion of Simony is only buying the Gifts of the Holy Ghoſt: But what Relation is there between the Gifts of the Holy Ghoſt and a Benefice?

I do not think there are any ſo weak, as to imagine the Gifts of the Holy Ghoſt can be purchaſed with Money given to Patrons; and if they could, the dealers in ſuch Bargains would not think them worth their Money; which they could lay out upon things of greater value to them. But here lies the true State of the Caſe. It hath been the Wiſdom and Charity of Princes and other Perſons of Eſtates, to make Endowments of Parochial Churches for the Support and Incouragment of thoſe in Holy Orders to attend upon the Service of God in them: And the Law of the Land hath ſo annexed the Spiritual Duty with the Temporal Advantage, that no one can be capable of the latter, that is not obliged to the other. So that the Right of diſcharging a Spiritual Truſt, and the Right of enjoying the Profits go together. But to prevent the unſpeakable Miſchief of purchaſing the Profits which are devoted to ſuch a Spiritual Uſe, this hath been called by the deteſtable Name of Simony; and very ſevere Laws have been made, not only againſt the giving of Money, but the uſing of any indirect Means to obtain a Preſentation. Becauſe ſuch things do leſſen the Eſteem of thoſe who uſe them; and not only thereby make them more uncapable of doing Service, but expoſe the Sacred Function it ſelf to Contempt.

2. Another great end of theſe Laws, is to keep the Clergy from Oppreſſion and Slavery. I am far from going about to leſſen the Juſt and legal Rights of Patrons, who by our Laws enjoy ſome Privileges, which are not allowed them in other Countries, where the Eccleſiaſtical Law is ſtricter than here in England: As in the Liberty of ſelling the Rights of Advowſons; their Trial at Common Law; the ſix Months for Patrons, &c. But for our right underſtanding the preſent matter, it muſt be conſider'd, as to the Rights of Patrons, that it was not an Original and Abſolute Right to diſpoſe of Benefices as they pleaſed; but a limited Truſt repoſed in them, to put in fit Perſons to diſcharge the Duties of their Places. It is very well known to all Perſons who have looked into theſe Matters, that in the firſt Settlement of this Church of England, the Biſhops of the ſeveral Dioceſſes had them under their own immediate Care; and that they had the Clergy living in a Community with them, whom they ſent abroad to ſeveral Parts of their Dioceſſes, as they ſaw occaſion to imploy them; but that by Degrees, they ſaw a neceſſity of fixing Presbyters within ſuch a Compaſs, to attend upon the Service of God among the People that were the Inhabitants: That theſe Precincts, which are ſince called Pariſhes, were at firſt much larger, and caſt into ſuch Diviſions in each Dioceſs, as probably make up the ſeveral Deanaries ſince: That when Lords of Manours were inclined to build Churches for their own Conveniencies, they found it neceſſary to make ſome Endowments, to oblige thoſe who officiated in their Churches to a diligent Attendance: That upon this, the ſeveral Biſhops were very well content to let thoſe Patrons have the Nomination of Perſons to thoſe Churches, provided they were ſatisfied of the fitneſs of thoſe Perſons, and that it were not deferred beyond ſuch a limited time. So that the Right of Patronage is really but a limited Truſt; and the Biſhops are ſtill in Law the Judges of the fitneſs of the Perſons to be imployed in the ſeveral parts of their Dioceſſes. But the Patrons never had the abſolute diſpoſal of their Benefices upon their own Terms; but if they did not preſent fit Perſons within the limited time, the Care of the places did return to the Biſhop, who was then bound to provide for them. Some pretend, that before 2 Inſt.
the Lateran Council, there was no time of Lapſe to the Biſhop, if the Patron 361.
did not preſent; but that the Biſhop was to provide one to ſerve the Cure in the mean time, and the Patron might preſent when he would. But this is certainly a miſtake, however it be aſſerted by perſons of great Authority. My Lord Coke cites Bracton and Fleta for it: But I can find nothing like it in either of them. Bracton indeed ſpeaks of the time of Bract. l. 4.

Before this Lateran Council Alex. had ſent a Conſtitution hither, which allow'd the Biſhops, in caſe any difference hapned about the Patronage, to ſequeſter the Profits, without fixing the Time: Which is all the Foundation I can meet with for this famous Maxim. But before this we may obſerve ſeveral Canons of Councils, which limited the Patrons to three Months. Theſe Canons were never receiv'd in England; which, if I miſtake not, had always the Privilege of ſix Months for Patrons. This I ground upon the Regiſter, a Book of great Authority, and conſiderable Antiquity, where it is ſaid expreſly, That the Biſhops have not the Right of Lapſe till ſix Months are paſſed; which is ſaid to be ſecundum legem & conſuetudinem Regni Angliæ, according to the ancient Cuſtom and Law of England. And the like was obſerved in the old Cuſtoms of Normandy.

But by the ancient Law of England, notwithſtanding the Right of Patronage, the Biſhop of the Dioceſs had theſe Rights reſerved to him:

1. The Right of Admiſſion of the Perſon preſented.
2. The Right of Lapſe, or beſtowing the Benefice, if the Patron fail'd his ſix Months.
3. The Right of making an Avoidance, by Deprivation or Reſignation.

Spelm. Concil.

Matth. Paris. A. D. 1239. p. 513.

1. The Biſhop hath by Law the Right of Admiſſion of the Perſon preſented by the Patron. For here from the time of Chriſtianity being received among the Saxons, at leaſt as far as we can trace any Footſteps of the Settlement of a Parochial Clergy, it was expreſly provided for That no Presbyter ſhould be fixed in any Place, without the Conſent of the Biſhop. For this we have a Canon of Theodore Archbiſhop of Canterbury, preſerved by Egbert Archbiſhop of York (each the Seventh in their Sees, but at ſome diſtance of time) in his Collection of Canons: the words are, Statutum eſt ut ſine Authoritate & Conſenſu Epiſcoporum, Presbyteri in quibuſlibet Eccleſiis non conſtituantur, nec inde expellantur & ſi quis hoc facere tentaverit, Synodali Sententiâ feriatur. So that by the Original Conſtitution of this Church the Biſhops had the Power of fixing Presbyters in Churches, and of removing them if there were occaſion, and no other perſons could do it without them. This doth by no means infringe the Right of Nomination or Preſentation of fit Perſons to the Biſhop: but it implies that no ſuch Preſentation was ſufficient, unleſs the Biſhop did firſt approve and conſent to the Perſon. Wherein the ancient Right of Patronage here in England did conſiſt, we cannot have a better account, than from the Words of all the Nobility of England in their Remonſtrance to Gregory IX. when he attempted to incroach upon them by Papal Proviſions: Cum igitur à primâ Chriſtianitatis Fundatione in Angliâ, tali fuerint hactenus progenitores noſtri gaviſi libertate, quod decedentibus Eccleſiarum Rectoribus, Eccleſiarum Patroni Perſonas idoneas eligentes ad eaſdem, Dioceſanis præſentaverunt ab eiſdem Eccleſiarum Regimini præficiendas. Theſe are Words of great Weight, and do plainly ſhew, that the Right of Patronage conſiſted in the Nomination of fit Perſons to the Biſhop of the Dioceſs for any vacant places: But that the Biſhops were, if they approved them, to put them into the poſſeſſion of them. In the time of Innocent III. the King wrote to the Pope, That the Nobility and Biſhops of England did inſiſt upon it, as their Right by the ancient Cuſtom, to build Churches on their own Lands: And the Pope yielded it to the Laity, provided that they had the Conſent of the Biſhop of the Dioceſe, and that the Rights of former Churches were not prejudiced thereby. But ſaith Mr. Selden, they challenged it without Licence. What to do? To build Churches on their own Lands; but not a Word of putting in any Incumbents by their own Power, without the Biſhop's Conſent and Approbation. Nay it appears that they could not build Churches on their own Lands without the Biſhop's allowance. Mr. Selden would fain have it believed, That the Right of Preſentation to the Biſhop of the Dioceſe came in by the Canon Law about A.D. 1200. But the Inſinuations of that kind, as they are frequent in his Book of Tythes, ſo they do ſhew his want of Skill or Ingenuity at that time, as much as any one part of it. But I need go no farther than this Letter of the Nobility to the Pope, who were extreamly jealous of their Rights of Patronage, and yet they challenged nothing thereby, but a Right of Nomination of a fit Perſon to the Biſhop of the Dioceſe, not a word of Inveſtiture or Collation by the Patron, which Mr. Selden talks of. He doth not deny, That after A.D. 1200. it was the undoubted Law of England for the Patrons to preſent to the Biſhops. But I ſay, it was the Law of England before ever the Decretals were made; it was the Original and Fundamental Law of the Engliſh Church, and as ancient as the Right of Patronage. In the ſame Epiſtle they deſire the Pope to leave them to their ancient Liberty, which was Perſonas Idoneas præſentare. But who is to be Judge of the Fitneſs of the Perſons? For that we have a full Declaration of the ancient Law and Cuſtom of England, in Artic. Cleri, c. 13. De Idoneitate Perſonæ præſentatæ ad Beneficium Eccleſiaſticum, pertinet Examinatio ad Judicem Eccleſiaſticum, & ita eſt hactenus uſitatum, & fiat in poſterum. Upon which my Lord Coke ſaith, That the Examination of the Ability and Sufficiency of the Perſon belongs to the Biſhop, who is the Eccleſiaſtical Judge; and in this Examination he is a Judge, and not a Miniſter, and may and ought to refuſe the Perſon preſented, if he be not Perſona idonea. And that this was no new Law, appears by the Words, That it had been hitherto ſo uſed, and ſhould be ſo for the time to come. And ſo Coke truly ſaith, That this Act was but a Declaration of the Common Law and Cuſtom of the Realm. So that the Biſhops Power of Examining and Judging the Fitneſs of the Perſon preſented, is a part of the Common Law of England.

Articuli Cleri mention a reaſonable Cauſe; which, ſay they, muſt be Special; for cauſa vaga & incerta non eſt rationabilis. But the main point is, Who is to judge what is a reaſonable Cauſe? And I cannot but think that Anderſon's Opinion is the trueſt and moſt reaſonable. If it be for a matter triable at Common Law, that Court is to judge; but if not, I do not ſee how it can be avoided, but the Biſhop muſt judge; and his Judgment of Inſufficiency muſt be taken, as well as in any Certificate whatſoever. For if the Law truſt him with the Judgment of a matter proper for him to judge of, other Courts which have no Cognizance of it, muſt give Credit to ſuch a Certificate; or elſe they muſt take upon them to judge in matters that are not of their Cognizance, which is to confound the Juriſdiction of Courts. I grant the Judgment of the Biſhop is not concluſive; but the Appeal then lies to the Supreme Eccleſiaſtical Court, and the Metropolitan is to be Judge of the Sufficiency of the Perſon.

“ But is not this a great Prejudice to the Right of Patrons, if the Biſhops are to judge of the Fitneſs of Perſons preſented; and ſo the Patrons Preſentation may ſignify nothing, if the Biſhop pleaſes?

This is a Truſt which the Law repoſes in the Biſhop, and it lies upon his Conſcience to act ſincerely in this matter; and in caſe of Examination of fit Perſons, a Truſt muſt be placed ſomewhere; and in whom more properly than in the Biſhop of the Dioceſe, to whom the Care of it doth eſpecially belong, and that by as plain Law as any we have. Are not all Judges truſted in matters that come before them? But this is no deciſive Judgment; for an Appeal lies according to the Nature of the matter. And this is no other Truſt than hath been allowed in all other Chriſtian Nations, where the Rights of Patronage are

As to the Ca-

Lapſe is in the Right of the Patron, and for his Turn. This ſeems to me to be a miſtaken Notion of a Lapſe; for the true Queſtion is, Whether upon a Lapſe the Ordinary doth collate Jure pleno, or Jure devoluto? Some French Lawyers held the latter; but Car. Molinæus and others utterly reject that Opinion, for this Reaſon; becauſe Churches and Dioceſſes were Jure communi under the Care of the Biſhops; but it was by particular Indulgence, that the Patrons had the Right of Preſentation: which being neglected, things do return to common Right; and therefore the Biſhop hath a true Intereſt, and acts not in the Right of the Patron, but his own.

De Roye de Jure Patr. p. 95. 145.

It's true, there is a Devolution afterwards by our Law: for as the Author of the Doctor and Student ſaith, The Law of the Realm is, that if a Benefice falls void, then the Patron ſhall preſent within ſix Months; and if he do not, that then the Ordinary ſhall preſent; but yet the Law is farther in this caſe, That if the Patron preſent before the Ordinary put in his Clerk, that then the Patron ſhall enjoy his Preſentment; and ſo it is, though the time ſhould fall to the Metropolitan. For, as he ſaith, by our Law, if the Biſhop doth not collate within ſix Months, then the Metropolitan preſents. But this is by a Right of Devolution, and then why not the other?

Dr & Stud. c. 36. 125.

The Anſwer is, That the Biſhop is Ordinary of the Dioceſs, and therefore it comes to him of common Right; but it falls to the Archbiſhop, not as Ordinary, but as Superior; to whom the Right of Devolution falls upon the Inferior's Neglect. For, although in ſome reſpects, and in the excepted Caſes, the Archbiſhop may be ſaid to be Ordinary of the whole Province; yet that is not ſo much in reſpect of Immediate Juriſdiction, which Hobart and others ſay, was by Virtue of the Legatine Power which was annexed to his See. But the Archbiſhop hath a Power as Metropolitan, to ſupply the Defects of the Suffragans of his Province; and ſo this Right of Collating upon defect of the Ordinary, comes to him by Right of Devolution.

Hob. 17. Brownl. 21. 27.

But how then comes the King to his Right after the Metropolitan's Neglect? That is, ſay our Lawyers, Becauſe the King is Patron Paramount of all the Benefices within the Realm. The meaning is, That the King by Right of his Crown is to ſee that all Places be duly ſupplied with Perſons fit for them; and if all others whom the Law hath entruſted, do neglect their Duties, then by the natural Order and Courſe of Government it falls to the Supreme Power, which is to ſupply Defects, and to reform Abuſes.

3. The Biſhop hath the Right of making an Avoidance by Deprivation or Reſignation. For, as he hath the Power of putting-in, ſo the Law hath lodged in him the Judicial Power of proceeding againſt Offenders, and hath not left that to the Judgment of the Patron. If we enquire, Who by our Law is made the proper Judge of a beneficed Perſon, whether he behaves himſelf ſo as to deſerve to loſe his Benefice? Will any one ſay, that the Law hath put this into the Patron's hands? Yet all thoſe who juſtifie theſe Bonds of Reſignation, muſt in effect ſay, that the Patrons are the proper Judges; for they have the real Power of Deprivation in their hands, and may execute it when they pleaſe. Which is ſuch an Arbitrary Juriſdiction, as would be thought intolerable in other Hands.

In all Cauſes of Deprivation of a Perſon actually poſſeſſed of a Benefice, theſe things muſt concur.

1. A Monition or Citation of the Party to appear.
2. A Charge given him, to which he is to anſwer, called the Libel.

Articuli Cleri mention a reaſonable Cauſe; which, ſay they, muſt be Special; for cauſa vaga & incerta non eſt rationabilis. But the main point is, Who is to judge what is a reaſonable Cauſe? And I cannot but think that Anderſon's Opinion is the trueſt and moſt reaſonable. If it be for a matter triable at Common Law, that Court is to judge; but if not, I do not ſee how it can be avoided, but the Biſhop muſt judge; and his Judgment of Inſufficiency muſt be taken, as well as in any Certificate whatſoever. For if the Law truſt him with the Judgment of a matter proper for him to judge of, other Courts which have no Cognizance of it, muſt give Credit to ſuch a Certificate; or elſe they muſt take upon them to judge in matters that are not of their Cognizance, which is to confound the Juriſdiction of Courts. I grant the Judgment of the Biſhop is not concluſive; but the Appeal then lies to the Supreme Eccleſiaſtical Court, and the Metropolitan is to be Judge of the Sufficiency of the Perſon.

" But is not this a great Prejudice to the Right of Patrons, if the Bi-" ſhops are to judge of the Fitneſs of Perſons preſented; and ſo the " Patrons Preſentation may ſignify nothing, if the Biſhop pleaſes?

This is a Truſt which the Law repoſes in the Biſhop, and it lies upon his Conſcience to act ſincerely in this matter; and in caſe of Examination of fit Perſons, a Truſt muſt be placed ſomewhere; and in whom more properly than in the Biſhop of the Dioceſe, to whom the Care of it doth eſpecially belong, and that by as plain Law as any we have. Are not all Judges truſted in matters that come before them? But this is no deciſive Judgment; for an Appeal lies according to the Nature of the matter. And this is no other Truſt than hath been allowed in all other Chriſtian Nations, where the Rights of Patronage are owned. Juſtinian owns it ſeveral times in his Novels, not only that the Biſhops are to examine and approve thoſe who are nominated by Founders of Churches; but if they find them unworthy, they may put others in their room. By the Capitulars, or old Eccleſiaſtical Laws of France, the Lay-Patrons are not only to preſent to the Biſhop ſuch as were Probabilis Vitæ & Doctrinæ, but if upon Examination they found them otherwiſe, it was in their power to reject them. As to the Canon-Law there can be no Diſpute in this Point: But if the Biſhop refuſed, an Appeal did lie to the Pope; and if he were unjuſtly refuſed the Biſhop was bound to provide for him: but during the Appeal, the Patron might preſent another; whom if the Biſhop approved, the Appeal did fall. Rebuffus, a noted Lawyer, ſaith, That it is a damning Sin in a Biſhop, not to examine the Fitneſs of thoſe who are preſented by Patrons. And a late learned French Canoniſt ſaith, Thoſe are to blame who lay the Fault of ſo many unworthy Men being in Places on the Lay-Patrons; For, ſaith he, the Biſhops are to blame, who are bound to examine, and if they ſee Cauſe, to reject them. So that we have not only our own Law, but the General Conſent of the Chriſtian World, where the Right of Patronage is allow'd, as to the Biſhop's Right of Examining and Judging the Fitneſs of Perſons preſented to Benefices.

The Right of Collation upon Lapſe belongs to the Biſhop, notwithſtanding the Right of Patronage. It is ſaid by Lord Hobart, That a Lapſe is not an Intereſt naturally, but a meer Truſt in Law: And afterwards, That the Ordinary, or he that is to preſent by Lapſe, is as a kind of Attorney made by Law, to do that for the Patron, which it is ſuppoſed he would do himſelf, if there were not ſome Lett; and therefore the Collation by Lapſe Hob. 154.

Lapſe is in the Right of the Patron, and for his Turn. This ſeems to me to be a miſtaken Notion of a Lapſe; for the true Queſtion is, Whether upon a Lapſe the Ordinary doth collate Jure pleno, or Jure devoluto? Some French Lawyers held the latter; but Car. Molinæus and others utterly reject that Opinion, for this Reaſon; becauſe Churches and Dioceſſes were Jure communi under the Care of the Biſhops; but it was by particular Indulgence, that the Patrons had the Right of Preſentation: which being neglected, things do return to common Right; and therefore the Biſhop hath a true Intereſt, and acts not in the Right of the Patron, but his own.

Which is ſuch an Arbitrary Juriſdiction, as would be thought intolerable in other Hands.

In all Cauſes of Deprivation of a Perſon actually poſſeſſed of a Benefice, theſe things muſt concur.

1. A Monition or Citation of the Party to appear.
2. A Charge given him, to which he is to anſwer, called the Libel.

3. A Competent Time aſſigned for the Proofs and Anſwers.

4. A Liberty for Counſel to defend his Cauſe, and to except againſt the Proofs and Witneſſes.

5. A Solemn Sentence after hearing all the Proofs and Anſwers.

Theſe are the Fundamentals of all Judicial Proceedings in the Eccleſiaſtical Courts, in order to a Deprivation; and if theſe things be not obſerved, the Party hath juſt Cauſe of Appeal, and may have a Remedy by a Superior Court. And theſe Proceedings are agreeable to the common Juſtice and Reaſon of Mankind; becauſe the Party accuſed hath the liberty of Defence, and the Right of Appeal. But there is nothing of all this, in Bonds of Reſignation; for the Patron takes the Advantage of the Forfeiture of the Bond, and ſo without any Trial, or Proof, or Sentence, deprives him of his Benefice.

Some who are no Friends to the Eccleſiaſtical Courts, would have no Deprivation of a Benefice, but by Proceedings at Common Law; becauſe it is a Freehold. Suppoſe that it were ſo (which ſeems contrary to the Courſe of the Law; for the Biſhop in a Plea to a Quare Impedit, ſaith, Nihil clamat præter Inſtitutionem & Deſtitutionem Clericorum; and Eccleſiaſtical Deprivations have been ſtill allow'd at Common Law, if they have been according to the Eccleſiaſtical Laws) but taking it for granted, that a Deprivation of a Freehold ought to be at Common Law: what then? What, without an Indictment, and without a Trial by a Jury? No hearing of the Cauſe, no Witneſſes examined, no Counſel to be heard, no Judgment by his Peers? And can this be agreeable to the Fundamental Laws of England, to have Men forced out of their Freeholds in ſuch an Arbitrary manner? What would they think, if other Free-hold-Eſtates, which hold of a Superior Lord, were made ſo Arbitrary, as to depend upon the Will of the Lord ſo, as to be turned out upon ſix Months notice? Let us ſee Bonds of Reſignation practiſed upon ſuch Eſtates; and then we ſhall ſoon find what Clamours will be made againſt them, as overthrowing the Fundamental Rights and Liberties of the People. Is there not the ſame Reaſon in this Caſe? Is there not greater? Becauſe theſe Benefices are not Freeholds which are held of the Patrons, but they have only a Right to preſent fit Perſons to them. But it may be, that the Defenders of theſe Bonds will deny Benefices to be Freeholds by the Law of England. It is eaſie to gueſs what ſome Men would have them to be, by theſe Bonds; I am ſure far enough from Freeholds. But ſuch private Tranſactions cannot alter the Nature of Things; and we are now enquiring, What Benefices are, by the Law of England? It is diſputed at Common-Law, in whom the Freehold of the Glebe-land of a Benefice is, during the Voidance? And it is agreed, That it is neither in the Patron nor Ordinary; becauſe it was given to the Incumbents and their Succeſſors. And therefore they tell us, it is then in Abeyance; which is a pretty way of expreſſing, That the Law takes care that it ſhall come to the next Incumbent, notwithſtanding the Diſcontinuance by Death of his Predeceſſor; and I think it had been as well ſaid, That it was in the Law, although not in any Perſon. But it is not diſputed, but that as ſoon as another Incumbent is in poſſeſſion, the Freehold is in Him; for thoſe are Littleton's Words, Sect. 647. And my Lord Coke ſaith, That the Incumbent cannot be look'd on, as a meer Tenant for Life: becauſe he may have ſuch Writs, which none can have but a Tenant in Fee-ſimple or Fee-tail; and he may receive Homage, which a Tenant for Life cannot do. And for this he goes as far back as the time of E. 1. But long before that in Glanvil's time, time, which was of H. 2. it is ſaid. That he that is poſſeſſed of a Benefice by Inſtitution from the Biſhop, and judged fit by him, ſhall enjoy it for his Life, although the Right of Advowſon be diſputed. Which is ſeveral times affirmed by my Lord Coke upon good Reaſon. In one place he ſaith, 1 Inſt. 343. b. That at the Common Law, if a Church be once full, the Incumbent could not be removed (excepting juſt Cauſe of Deprivation) and Plenarty generally was a good Plea in a Quare Impedit, or Aſſiſe of Dare in Preſentment: And the Reaſon of this was, to the intent the Incumbent might apply himſelf to his Spiritual Charge. 2. The Law intended, That the Biſhop that had Cure of Souls within his Dioceſs would admit and inſtitute an able Man for the Diſcharge of his Duty and his own; and that the Biſhop would do right to every Patron in his Dioceſs. In another place he ſaith, 2 Inſt. 357. That by the Order of Common Law, if one had preſented unto a Church whereto he had no Right, and the Biſhop had admitted and inſtituted his Clerk, this Incumbent could not be removed for divers Reaſons: 1. For that he came into the Church by a Judicial Act of the Biſhop. 2. That by the Common Law, in every Town and Pariſh there ought to be Perſona Idonea: and when the Biſhop had admitted him able, which implied that he was idonea perſona, then the Law had his final Intention, viz. That the Church ſhould be ſufficiently provided for. 3. That the Incumbent having Curam animarum, might the more effectually and peaceably intend ſo great Charge; the Common Law provided, That after Inſtitution he ſhould not be ſubject to any Action, to be removed at the Suit of any common Perſon, without all reſpect of Age, Coverture, Impriſonment, or Non-ſane-memory; and without regard of Title, either by Deſcent or Purchaſe, or of any Eſtate. Are theſe things conſiſtent with Bonds of Reſignation?

But it may be ſaid, That here is no Deprivation ſuppoſed, but a voluntary Reſignation; and what hurt is there, if it be a Man's own Act?

I anſwer, That we are not only to conſider the Act of the Perſon, but the Intereſt and general Concernment of the Church in it. For in all matters of ſuch a publick Nature, we are not to regard ſo much the Conſent of the Party, as the Nature and Conſequence of the Act it ſelf. If it be an illegal thing, and tend to ſubvert the Rights of the Church, it cannot make it legal to ſay, that it was his own Act. Now as to this kind of Reſignation, we are to conſider theſe two things:

1. That if the Reſignation be not into the hands of the Biſhop, it is an illegal Act, and void of it ſelf.

2. That if it be into the Biſhop's hands, he hath the Power in Law to accept it or not.

1. That the Reſignation muſt be into the hands of the Biſhop. For a Reſignation into the hands of the Patron, is by the Canon Law declared to be null and void of it ſelf. So Innocent IV. ad c. 6. de rerum per. And this is grounded on the Text of the Canon Law, C. 17. Q. 2. c. Gonſaldus; and on the Appendix to the Lateran Council under Alex. III. De Renunt. tit. 15. c. pen. where it is declared, to be an unworthy thing, and contrary to the Canons, to reſign into the Hands of Patrons. And Alex. III. forbids it abſolutely under an Anathema. De Renunt. c. 4. which is confirmed by Innocent III. c. 8. in the Decretals. v. Flamin. Pariſ. de Reſignat. li 7. c. 1. n. 9. But we are to conſider eſpecially, how far this part of the Canon Law was receiv'd; and we can have no better a Judge in this Caſe than Lynwood, who ſaith poſitively, that Renuntiatio facta in manus Laici etiam ſponte non tenet; i. e. a Reſignation made into the hands of a Lay-Patron, if it be never ſo free, doth not hold: and therefore he ſaith, it muſt be made into the hands of him who hath the Ordinary Juriſdiction, and therefore hath power to admit. Lynw. f. 55. c. Ne lepra.

He obſerves two things very material as to the point of Reſignation:

1. That a voluntary Reſignation, though not to the Ordinary, deprives the party of the Poſſeſſion; ſo as he cannot recover, although he be not wholly deveſted of the Property, or Right to the thing: Quia ſine conſenſu Superioris non tenet Reſignatio: And this is founded on that Fundamental Reaſon, that the Care of the Dioceſs belongs to him, who hath the ordinary Juriſdiction, who was the Biſhop: But as Lynwood obſerves, by Cuſtom and Compoſition, this is put into other hands; as in places of exempt Juriſdiction. And ſo where the power of granting Inſtitution is lodged by the Biſhop's Conſent, and a Preſcription upon it; there is a Power likewiſe of receiving a Reſignation: But not in any, who have only a delegated Power from the Biſhop. For there is a difference in Law and Reaſon between an ordinary Power depending on an ancient Preſcription and Compoſition (as it is in ſeveral places in the Deans and Chapters within certain Precincts) and an ordinary Power in a Subſtitute, as a Chancellor or Vicar-General. For although ſuch an Officer hath the ſame Court with the Biſhop, ſo that the legal Acts of the Court are the Biſhop's Acts, by whoſe Authority he ſits there; ſo that no Appeal lies from the Biſhop's Officer to himſelf, but to the Superiour: And although a Commiſſary be allowed to have the power of the Ordinary in Teſtamentary Cauſes, which were not originally of Spiritual Juriſdiction, as it is ſaid in Henſlow's Caſe, with which Lynwood agrees: Yet in Acts of Spiritual and voluntary Juriſdiction the Caſe is otherwiſe. For the Biſhop by appointing a Chancellor, doth not diveſt himſelf of his own ordinary Power; but he may delegate ſome parts of it by Commiſſion to others, which goes no farther than is expreſſed in it. For it is a very great Miſtake in any to think, that ſuch who Act by a delegated Power, can have any more Power than is given to them, where a ſpecial Commiſſion is required for the Exerciſe of it. For by the general Commiſſion no other Authority paſſes, but that of hearing Cauſes: But all Acts of voluntary Juriſdiction require a ſpecial Commiſſion, which the Biſhop may reſtrain as he ſees Cauſe. For as Lynwood ſaith, nothing paſſes, virtute officii, but the hearing of Cauſes: So that other Acts depend upon the Biſhop's particular Grant for that purpoſe. And the Law no where determines the bounds of a Chancellor's Power as to ſuch Acts; nor can it be ſuppoſed ſo to do, ſince it is but a delegative Power: And it is in the Right of him that Deputes, to Circumſcribe and Limit it. Neither can Uſe or Cuſtom inlarge ſuch a Power, which depends upon another's Will. And however, by modern Practice, the Patents for ſuch places have paſſed for the Life of the Perſon to whom they were firſt granted; yet it was not ſo by the ancient Eccleſiaſtical Law of England. For Lynwood affirms, that a grant of Juriſdiction ceaſes by the Death of him who gave it: per mortem deputantis ceſſat Poteſtas Officialium: (or elſe it could never paſs into the Dean and Chapter ſedevacante; or to the Guardian of the Spiritualities.) And he gives a good Reaſon of it; Nè invitus habeat Officialem ſibi fortaſſis odioſum. It's true, that by the Statute 37 H. 8. c. 17. meer Doctors of Law are made capable of Exerciſing all manner of Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction. But it doth not aſſign the Extent of their Juriſdiction, but leaves it to the Biſhops themſelves, from whom their Authority is derived. And the Law ſtill diſtinguiſhes between Poteſtas Ordinaria and Delegata: For the former ſuppoſes a Perſon to act in his own Right, and not by Deputation; which, I ſuppoſe, no Chancellors or Officials will pretend to. But how far now, a Commiſſion to exer-

exerciſe Juriſdiction doth hold, when the Perſon who gave it is dead, is not my preſent buſineſs to enquire: But in Sutton's Caſe it ſeems to be taken for granted by the Counſel, that a Chancellor's Patent, con- Cr. Car. 65. firmed by Dean and Chapter, doth give a Man a Freehold for Life, if he be capable of doing his Duty; otherwiſe he may be deprived for Inſufficiency, as Doctor Sutton was. But Noy ſaith, That the Court was Noy, 91. in doubt, how far the Act of the Predeceſſor could bind the Succeſſor as to the Profits. And in the Prebend of Hatcherly's Caſe, Dodderidge declared, 152. That Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction in judicial Acts may be executed by Subſtitute: But a Grant of it is not good, but during the Biſhop's Life; and ſhall not bind the Succeſſor. And Coke thought it a very hard thing, That the Succeſſor ſhould not remove him, but be bound to anſwer for the Acts and Offences of a Commiſſary, which he never put in. But theſe things belong not to our preſent buſineſs, any farther than to ſhew, that however in ſome Caſes the Biſhops may ſubſtitute others, yet as to Reſignations of Benefices, for all that I can find, the Law only takes notice of the Biſhop himſelf.

Lynwood obſerves, that there is a difference to be made between the Reſignation of a ſimple Benefice, i. e. where there is no cure of Souls, and of ſuch a one that hath ſuch a Cure going along with it. In the former Caſe he ſaith, That a Reſignation may be to the prejudice of the Party, without the Biſhop's Conſent: But in the latter, where it may be to the prejudice of others as well as of himſelf, it hath no force without the Biſhop's Ratification: In hoc caſu neceſſaria eſt Ratihabitio Epiſcopi. So that no Reſignation of a Cure of Souls can be of any Validity without the Biſhop's Acceptance. In the ſame Caſe of Smith againſt Foanes, it was reſolved and agreed by all upon Evidenceat Bar, That a Reſignation to a Proctor, does not make the Church void, until it be accepted by the Bi- Noy, 157. ſhop, and acknowledged before him.

2. But ſuppoſe the Reſignation be made into the hands of the Biſhop, is he bound to Accept it? By what Law? For what Reaſon? Muſt he not enquire into the Reaſon and Inducements of the Reſignation, whether it be corrupt or not? No Biſhop can be bound to accept a corrupt Reſignation; and whether it be ſo or not, he is bound to enquire: And if he be not ſatisfied, by what Law can he be required to do that, which he cannot do with a good Conſcience? If the Law hath truſted him with accepting a Reſignation, it hath likewiſe truſted him with judging, whether it be fit to be accepted or not. In Gayton's Caſe it is plain, That the Biſhop may refuſe a Reſignation before a Publick Notary, when there Owen, 12. was a Condition annexed to it, which the Law doth not annex. For in this Caſe, the Condition was, That if ſuch or ſuch a Perſon were not preſented within ſix Months, the Reſignation ſhould be null: Which Coke then ſaid, made it void, becauſe Reſignations ought to be free: And this is a Judicial Act, to which a Condition cannot be annexed, no more than an ordinary may admit upon Condition.

But it may be objected, that in caſe of Donatives the Reſignation muſt be into the Patron's Hands, as in Gayr's and Fairchild's Caſe: Why Yelver. 60. then may not a Reſignation be good to a Patron in other Benefices, ſince Moor, 765. thoſe are as really Benefices as the other?

The difference is, that there is no Preſentation to the Biſhop in Donatives. For, it is agreed by the Judges in that Caſe, That if there were Cr. 2. 63. 1 Inſt. 344. a Preſentation once made to the Biſhop, it ceaſes to be a Donative, and becomes always Preſentable. So that the Caſe of Donatives, is very different; for we ſay, that where-ever the Biſhop hath a Right to admit, it is his Right

He obſerves two things very material as to the point of Reſignation:

1. That a voluntary Reſignation, though not to the Ordinary, deprives the party of the Poſſeſſion; ſo as he cannot recover, although he be not wholly deveſted of the Property, or Right to the thing: Quia ſine conſenſu Superioris non tenet Reſignatio: And this is founded on that Fundamental Reaſon, that the Care of the Dioceſs belongs to him, who hath the ordinary Juriſdiction, who was the Biſhop: But as Lynwood obſerves, by Cuſtom and Compoſition, this is put into other hands; as in places of exempt Juriſdiction. For the Biſhop by appointing a Chancellor, doth not diveſt himſelf of his own ordinary Power; but he may delegate ſome parts of it by Commiſſion to others, which goes no farther than is expreſſed in it. For it is a very great Miſtake in any to think, that ſuch who Act by a delegated Power, can have any more Power than is given to them, where a ſpecial Commiſſion is required for the Exerciſe of it. For by the general Commiſſion no other Authority paſſes, but that of hearing Cauſes: But all Acts of voluntary Juriſdiction require a ſpecial Commiſſion, which the Biſhop may reſtrain as he ſees Cauſe. For as Lynwood ſaith, nothing paſſes, virtute officii, but the hearing of Cauſes: So that other Acts depend upon the Biſhop's particular Grant for that purpoſe. And the Law no where determines the bounds of a Chancellor's Power as to ſuch Acts; nor can it be ſuppoſed ſo to do, ſince it is but a delegative Power: And it is in the Right of him that Deputes, to Circumſcribe and Limit it. Neither can Uſe or Cuſtom inlarge ſuch a Power, which depends upon another's Will. And however, by modern Practice, the Patents for ſuch places have paſſed for the Life of the Perſon to whom they were firſt granted; yet it was not ſo by the ancient Eccleſiaſtical Law of England. For Lynwood affirms, that a grant of Juriſdiction ceaſes by the Death of him who gave it: per mortem deputantis ceſſat Poteſtas Officialium: (or elſe it could never paſs into the Dean and Chapter ſedevacante; or to the Guardian of the Spiritualities.) And he gives a good Reaſon of it; Nè invitus habeat Officialem ſibi fortaſſis odioſum. It's true, that by the Statute 37 H. 8. c. 17. meer Doctors of Law are made capable of Exerciſing all manner of Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction. But it doth not aſſign the Extent of their Juriſdiction, but leaves it to the Biſhops themſelves, from whom their Authority is derived. And the Law ſtill diſtinguiſhes between Poteſtas Ordinaria and Delegata: For the former ſuppoſes a Perſon to act in his own Right, and not by Deputation; which, I ſuppoſe, no Chancellors or Officials will pretend to. But how far now, a Commiſſion to exer-

exerciſe Juriſdiction doth hold, when the Perſon who gave it is dead, is not my preſent buſineſs to enquire: But in Sutton's Caſe it ſeems to be taken for granted by the Counſel, that a Chancellor's Patent, confirmed by Dean and Chapter, doth give a Man a Freehold for Life, if Cr. Car. 65. he be capable of doing his Duty; otherwiſe he may be deprived for Inſufficiency, as Doctor Sutton was. But Noy ſaith, That the Court was Noy, 91. in doubt, how far the Act of the Predeceſſor could bind the Succeſſor as to the Profits. And in the Prebend of Hatcherly's Caſe, Dodderidge declared, 152. That Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction in judicial Acts may be executed by Subſtitute: But a Grant of it is not good, but during the Biſhop's Life; and ſhall not bind the Succeſſor. And Coke thought it a very hard thing, That the Succeſſor ſhould not remove him, but be bound to anſwer for the Acts and Offences of a Commiſſary, which he never put in. But theſe things belong not to our preſent buſineſs, any farther than to ſhew, that however in ſome Caſes the Biſhops may ſubſtitute others, yet as to Reſignations of Benefices, for all that I can find, the Law only takes notice of the Biſhop himſelf.

Lynwood obſerves, that there is a difference to be made between the Reſignation of a ſimple Benefice, i. e. where there is no cure of Souls, and of ſuch a one that hath ſuch a Cure going along with it. In the former Caſe he ſaith, That a Reſignation may be to the prejudice of the Party, without the Biſhop's Conſent: But in the latter, where it may be to the prejudice of others as well as of himſelf, it hath no force without the Biſhop's Ratification: In hoc caſu neceſſaria eſt Ratihabitio Epiſcopi. So that no Reſignation of a Cure of Souls can be of any Validity without the Biſhop's Acceptance. In the ſame Caſe of Smith againſt Foanes, it was reſolved and agreed by all upon Evidence at Bar, That a Reſignation to a Proctor, does not make the Church void, until it be accepted by the Bi- Noy, 157. ſhop, and acknowledged before him.

2. But ſuppoſe the Reſignation be made into the hands of the Biſhop, is he bound to Accept it? By what Law? For what Reaſon? Muſt he not enquire into the Reaſon and Inducements of the Reſignation, whether it be corrupt or not? No Biſhop can be bound to accept a corrupt Reſignation; and whether it be ſo or not, he is bound to enquire: And if he be not ſatisfied, by what Law can he be required to do that, which he cannot do with a good Conſcience? If the Law hath truſted him with accepting a Reſignation, it hath likewiſe truſted him with judging, whether it be fit to be accepted or not. In Gayton's Caſe it is plain, That the Biſhop may refuſe a Reſignation before a Publick Notary, when there Owen, 12. was a Condition annexed to it, which the Law doth not annex. For in this Caſe, the Condition was, That if ſuch or ſuch a Perſon were not preſented within ſix Months, the Reſignation ſhould be null: Which Coke then ſaid, made it void, becauſe Reſignations ought to be free: And this is a Judicial Act, to which a Condition cannot be annexed, no more than an ordinary may admit upon Condition.

But it may be objected, that in caſe of Donatives the Reſignation muſt be into the Patron's Hands, as in Gayr's and Fairchild's Caſe: Why Yelver. 60. then may not a Reſignation be good to a Patron in other Benefices, ſince Moor, 765. thoſe are as really Benefices as the other?

The difference is, that there is no Preſentation to the Biſhop in Donatives. For, it is agreed by the Judges in that Caſe, That if there were Cr 2. 63. 1 Inſt. 344. a Preſentation once made to the Biſhop, it ceaſes to be a Donative, and becomes always Preſentable. So that the Caſe of Donatives, is very different; for we ſay, that where-ever the Biſhop hath a Right to admit, it is his Right to accept of a Reſignation. But in this Caſe, the Biſhop is ſuppoſed to have nothing to do in the Admiſſion or Inſtitution of the Perſon. If it be asked, How the Biſhops came to loſe their Right of receiving the Preſentation to theſe Benefices? I anſwer, That they ſeem to me to have come 1 Inſt. 344. one of theſe two ways: 1. By Royal Licence; So my Lord Coke ſaith, That the King may not only found a Church, or Free Chapel Donative himſelf, Regiſt. 40. 3. but may Licence any Subject to do the ſame. But the Regiſter ſuppoſes a Royal Foundation, and not a meer Royal Licence, and that it muſt be proved to be ancient too; and therefore a new Licence will not come up to the Regiſter. 2. By peculiar Privilege; as when a Lord of a Manor in a great Pariſh, having his Tenants about him at a remote diſtance from the Pariſh-Church, offers to build and endow a Church there, provided that it ſhould belong entirely to him and his Family, to put in ſuch Perſons as they ſhould think fit, if they were in Holy Orders. It's very poſſible that the Biſhops at that time, to encourage ſuch a Work, might permit them to enjoy this Liberty; which being continued time out of mind, is turned into a Preſcription. If theſe Donatives had been common, the Miſchief would have been more viſible; but being ſo few in compariſon, they have been leſs taken notice of. And they are to be diſtinguiſhed from thoſe called Sine-Cures and Exempt-Juriſdictions.

For Sine-Cures in Truth are Benefices preſentable, but by means of Vicarages endowed in the ſame places, the Perſons who enjoy them have by long Cuſtom been excuſed from Reſidence, which is the moſt can be ſaid for them. And ſuch Sine-Cures, if they be reſigned, it muſt be into the Biſhop's hands.

Exempt-Juriſdictions are not ſo called, becauſe under no Ordinary; but becauſe they are not under the Ordinary of the Dioceſe, but have one of their own. Theſe are therefore called Peculiars, and they are of ſeveral ſorts.

1. Royal Peculiars, which are the King's Free Chapels, and are exempt from any Juriſdiction but the King's; and therefore ſuch may be Re- Lynw. f. 64, 80. Roll's Abrid. 2. 356. Coke, 12, 41, 42. ſigned into the King's hands as their proper Ordinary, either by ancient Privilege or inherent Right. But how far Reſignations may be made to the King as Supreme Ordinary, as in Goodman's Caſe, it is not here a place to examine.

2. Archbiſhops Peculiars; which are not only in the Neighbour Dioceſſes, but diſperſed up and down in remoter places: For it appears by Ead. Hiſt. in Anſelm. p. 22. Eadmerus, That where-ever the Archbiſhop had an Eſtate belonging to him, he had the ſole Juriſdiction as Ordinary.

3. Deans and Chapters Peculiars; which are places wherein by ancient Compoſitions the Biſhops have parted with their Juriſdiction as Ordinaries to thoſe Societies, whoſe Right was not Original, but derived from the Biſhop; and where the Compoſitions are loſt, it depends upon Roll's Abr. 2. 357. Preſcription, as in the Deans and Chapters of St. Paul's and Litchfield, which are mentioned in the Books, 11 H. 4. 9.

4. Peculiars belonging to Monaſteries; for the richer Monaſteries were very uneaſy, until they had obtained either from the Biſhops or from the Popes (which proved the moſt effectual, but more chargeable way) an Exemption from Ordinary Juriſdiction. Thoſe Churches, which the Monaſteries had gotten to be annexed to themſelves, were called Appropriations; but how far theſe were exempt from the Ordinaries Juriſdiction is not fully underſtood, and therefore I ſhall endeavour to explain it.

C. 16. Q. 2. c. Sanc. 1. Appropriations did not at firſt imply any Exemption from the Ordinary. For it was expreſly provided in the Canon Law, That no Perſons ſhould be put into ſuch Churches without Inſtitution from the Biſhop; to whom the Incumbents were to be anſwerable in all Spiritual Matters, as in all Temporal to the Abbots. And in the oldeſt Appropriations which I have ſeen, there is a Salvo per omnia Jure Epiſcopali; which Words are inconſiſtent with an Exemption.

2. The Forms of Appropriation were different afterwards. For altho' none could be made without the Biſhop's Conſent, yet that Conſent was expreſſed in different ways, and had different Effects.

If the Biſhop only confirmed the Lay-Patron's Gift, then nothing but the Right of Patronage paſſed, and his Juriſdiction remained. If the Biſhop joined in the Donation in theſe Words, Concedimus vobis talem Eccleſiam, then he paſſed away his Temporal Rights as to that Church. If the Biſhop granted the Church Pleno Jure, then the Canoniſts ſay, he paſſed his Dioceſan Right; which conſiſted in Rights which the Biſhop had diſtinct from his Epiſcopal Juriſdiction; which it was thought he could not part with by any Act of his, for that were to diveſt himſelf of his Order.

Ext. de Donat. c. paſtor. Lynw. f. 80

3. Appropriations, confirmed by the Papal Authority, were allowed to carry with them Exemptions from the Ordinary. And therefore the Monaſteries which could bear the Charge, did not think themſelves free from their Ordinaries, till they had obtained Bulls for that purpoſe; and then they took themſelves to be free in their Conventual Churches, as well as their Chapels, or Oratories on their own Lands.

4. All Papal Exemptions are taken away by Act of Parliament, 31 H.8. c. 13. and the Churches ſo exempted are put under the Juriſdiction of the Ordinary of the Dioceſe, or ſuch Commiſſioners as the King ſhall appoint. So that no Papal Exemption can now be pleaded as to appropriated Churches, how clear and full ſoever the Charters of Exemption were. This is a thing ſo little taken notice of, that I ſhall ſet down the Words, §. 23. Be it further enacted, That ſuch of the ſaid Monaſteries, &c. and all Churches and Chapels, to them, or any of them belonging, which before the Diſſolution, &c. were exempted from the Viſitation or Viſitations, and all other Juriſdiction of the Ordinary or Ordinaries within whoſe Dioceſe they were ſituate or ſet, ſhall from thenceforth be within the Juriſdiction and Viſitation of the Ordinary or Ordinaries, within whoſe Dioceſe they or any of them be ſituate and ſet; or within the Viſitation and Juriſdiction of ſuch Perſon or Perſons, as by the King's Highneſs ſhall be limited or appointed, this Act or any other Exemption, Liberty or Juriſdiction to the contrary notwithſtanding.

Therefore no Perſons who enjoy the Eſtates belonging to Monaſteries, can now plead an Exemption by virtue thereof from the Ordinary's Juriſdiction; nor that they have a Power to put in and put out as they pleaſe, without any regard to the Biſhop's Authority.

But ſuppoſe there were no Endowment, and that the Churches were built on the Site of the Monaſteries, and ſo were ſupplied by their own Body; then ſuch Perſons are wholly at their Will, and they may turn them out as they pleaſe. I anſwer;

I confeſs the Condition of ſuch Stipendiaries is as bad as of thoſe who hold their Benefices under Bonds of Reſignation; for Tenures at the Will of the Lord, are the worſt of any. But it is to be hoped, that ſuch Perſons who enjoy ſuch Eſtates as were originally deſigned for the Support of the Parochial Clergy, (however at firſt fraudulently perverted by the Combination of the Monks and Popes) will at the leaſt take Care that the Cure of Souls be duly provided for in ſuch places. For that Burthen goes along with the Churches Revenue, in whoſe Hands ſoever it be; and ſo they are both in Law and Conſcience to ſee the Places well ſupplied. And by the Statutes of Diſſolution, as they do injoy the Rights, ſo they are bound to provide for the Churches; and where they were Parochial, to ſee that there were a fixed Incumbent with a competent Maintenance; which the Law always took a particular care of.

II. It is time now to conſider the Precedents, which have been produced to ſhew that theſe Bonds of Reſignation are not againſt Law.

Cr. 2.248. The firſt is of Jones and Laurence, 8 Jac. A Bond was given to reſign the Benefice he was preſented to, within three Months upon Requeſt: and it was alledged in Court, That it was a Simoniacal Contract, and againſt Law. On the other ſide it was ſaid, That there doth not appear any Simony upon the Condition; and therefore Judgment was given for the Bond. But a Writ of Error was brought in the Exchequer-Chamber; and the principal Error inſiſted on, was, That this Condition was againſt Law. But the Judges of the Common Bench, and Barons of the Exchequer held, That the Obligation and Condition are good enough. For a Man may bind himſelf to reſign upon good and valuable Reaſons, without any Colour of Simony; as to be obliged to reſign, in caſe of Plurality or Non-reſidence; or if his Son be at Age. But if it had been for a Leaſe of the Glebe or Tythes, or a Sum of Money, that had been Simony, &c. and ſo the Judgment was affirmed.

To this Precedent I anſwer, That the Reaſon of the Judges is inſufficient. For it comes to this: The Bond is good becauſe there may be good Reaſon for it. May it not be ſaid on the other ſide, The Bond is naught, becauſe there may be a very bad Reaſon for it? And a Bond that may be turned to ſo very ill Uſes, it cannot but ſeem ſtrange to me, that the Judges ſhould affirm it to be a good Bond. If the particular Reaſons had been made the Conditions of the Bond, they might have judged upon them; but the Bond was general, and no Condition in it but Notice. Therefore the Judgment muſt be, That a Bond is reaſonable, if no bad Conditions appear in it; which makes the Incumbent a Slave to the Patron, and overthrow the juſt Rights and Liberties of the Clergy; and lays them open to Perjury, when they give ſuch a Bond meerly to obtain a Preſentation. And they very well knew that none could be poſſeſſed of a Benefice without an Oath againſt all Simoniacal Contracts, either directly or indirectly. Why did not the Judges declare, that it was Simony within their Oath? But they were only to judge of the Law. And how could they judge this not to be a Simoniacal Bargain? Becauſe there was no Simoniacal Condition in it. But what is a Simoniacal Condition? Where hath the Common Law determin'd it? And by what Rule? Yes, ſay they, A Leaſe for Tythes, or a Bargain for Money, had been Simony. But how come they to determine that no other Contracts are Simoniacal; when they own, That Simony is not under their Cogniſance? Did they ever offer to adviſe with the Civilians? What was a Simoniacal Contract, according to the Eccleſiaſtical Law? Not the leaſt mention of this; and therefore I cannot but think this a Judgment without ſufficient Reaſon to ſupport it.

Cr. 2.274. The ſame Cauſe came on again the next Year; and there it is declared, That it was not Simony, but good Policy to tie him to reſign; and if it were, it is not material. Here are two good Points declared: 1. That Bonds of Reſignation are good Policy. To what End? To inſnare Men's Conſciences; to make the Church a Prey to corrupt Patrons; to keep Men from doing their Duties, leaſt they ſhould diſpleaſe their Patrons, If this be good Policy, let it rather paſs for that, than for good Law.

2. That it is not material as to the goodneſs of the Bond, whether it be Simony or not. Then it ſeems a Simoniacal Contract holds good in Law; which, I think, was no good Policy for Judges to declare.

But we are told, That 15 Jac. in the Caſe of Paſchal and Clerk, it was ſaid by the Court upon Evidence, That if the Patron takes a Bond of Reſignation at three Months warning, it was Simony within the Statute. And for this we are referr'd to the Roll. 2051. I wonder this Judgment is not hitherto diſproved, if the Roll be falſified; and if not, here is Judgment againſt Judgment.

Noy, 22.

But again, in the Caſe of Babington and Wood, it was reſolved on the ſame Grounds with that of Jones and Laurence, and ſo deſerves no new Conſideration: and ſeveral other Judgments are ſaid to have been given ſince on the ſame Grounds.

But let us compare this Caſe with ſuch as have been adjudged to be Simony in the Courts of Common Law.

Cr. Car. 180. Hutton, 110. Jones, 220. Keble, 2. 446.

In the Caſe of Byrte and Manning, The Court held, That if a Man enter'd into a Contract to procure a Preſentation, in Conſideration of the Marriage of his Son, that had been a Simoniacal Contract. Why is not a Bond of Reſignation, as much Simony, as a Conſideration of Marriage; when both are made equally the Conditions of obtaining a Preſentation?

Cr. Car. 426.

If a Simoniacal Contract be made, and the Perſon preſented not at all privy to it, he is to incur the Penalty of it; but if a Man be privy to a Bond of Reſignation in order to a Preſentation, he ſhall not be guilty. And yet in the one Caſe, a Man ſwears with a good Conſcience, which I think he cannot in the other.

Cr. Eliz. 789. C. 12.100. Cr. 2.385. Noy, 25. Bulſtrod. 3. 90.

In the Caſe of Winchcomb and Pulleſton, it was declared to be Simony, to purchaſe the next Preſentation, when the Incumbent was ſtill alive, but in a Fit of the Strangury. And yet this was not within the Letter of the Law; for the Living was not actually void. Therefore ſuch Acts, as are againſt the Deſign and Reaſon of the Law, are forbidden by it. And the like was affirmed by Juſtice Hutton in the Caſe of Sheldon and Bret. In a late Judgment in Chancery, Bonds of Reſignation at pleaſure to Patrons by their Clerks, are damned in Equity, when any ill Uſe is made of them. But why ſhould any ſuch Bonds be allowed in Law, which are liable to ſuch ill Uſes?

Hob. 165. Winch, 63. Rep. Chancery, 2. 399.

I conclude with the Words of my Lord Coke, That the Common Law doth deteſt Simony, and all corrupt Bargains for Preſentation to any Benefice; and its deſign is, that a fit Perſon for the Diſcharge of the Cure ſhould be preſented freely without Expectation of any thing. How then can Bonds of Reſignation be agreeable to Law?

1 Inſt. 17. b.

Having thus diſpatch'd the main Point againſt all General Bonds, which are made the Conditions of obtaining a Preſentation; there remain only ſome Quæry's to be reſolved.

(1.) Suppoſe a Bond be required only to tie Men up to do their Duties, and to keep them from Non-Reſidence. I anſwer, (1.) That the Patron is to blame to pitch upon a Perſon to diſcharge ſuch a Cure, of whom at the ſame time he diſcovers ſuch a Miſtruſt as to need a Bond to make him do his Duty. And if a Man makes no Conſcience of his Duty without a Bond, I doubt he will make very little with it. If he could make him a good Man by his Bond, it were of great Uſe; but if he be not, he may do the more Miſchief by continuing in his Place by the force of a Bond. So that I look on ſuch Bonds, as apt to raiſe Scruples in good Men's Minds, and to do no good upon bad ones.

2. That all wiſe and good Patrons will conſider the general Miſchief, more than a particular Inconvenience. And what greater Miſchief can come to our Church, than to have Bonds of Reſignation brought into requeſt? For, beſides corrupt Patrons as to Bargains; what Advantage will corrupt Patrons as to Religion make of it? who by that means will be able to turn out the Incumbents upon notice given, when opportunity ſerves them; as is before obſerved in the Preface.

(2.) Suppoſe it be a very equitable Caſe, as for a Minor, is a Bond of Reſignation unlawful?

I anſwer, That there may be a lawful Truſt, in ſuch a Caſe I do not queſtion; but whether the Perſon who takes this Truſt, can enter into a Bond, and take the Oath, I very much queſtion, upon the Reaſons already mentioned. For there may be a confidential Simony, as the Caſuiſts call it; and the way to prevent it, is, ſay they, That the Truſt be ſine pretii, pacti, modi, vel conditionis interventu. For the taking of a Bond argues a Miſtruſt; and is therefore contrary to the Nature of a Truſt.

Navarr. Man. c.23. n. 109.

(3.) Suppoſe the Biſhop himſelf requires a Bond of Reſignation, as to a Prebend of his Church, If the Prebendary quit the Dioceſs; is ſuch a Bond juſtifiable, or not?

The Biſhop is, no doubt, bound to take all poſſible care of the Good of his Dioceſs, and to make his Preferments ſerviceable to that End. But if a Man knows beforehand, that without this Condition he cannot obtain it, and with it he may, he runs into a Snare by giving a Bond for that End; and after, taking the Oath againſt any Simoniacal Contract, directly or indirectly. I do think theſe Bonds of ſo bad a Nature and Tendency, that I do wiſh that no Countenance or Incouragement be given to them; eſpecially by ſuch, whoſe Example may encourage others to do that for bad Deſigns which they do for good. And Wiſe and Good Men will always ſhew the greateſt Regard to that, which ſerves the moſt Publick Intereſt, and prevents the moſt growing Miſchief.

(4.) Suppoſe the Incumbent of a Living makes an Agreement with another Clergyman, that he ſhall have a Leaſe of his Benefice from three Years to three Years; upon which he takes a Sum of Money, and gives a Bond of Reſignation before Harveſt, and is to procure a Preſentation from the Patron; is this Simony, or not, by our Law?

Here the Patron is only ſuppoſed barely to know and to conſent, (which is hardly to be ſuppoſed in ſuch kind of Caſes) and that the Terms are only between the two Parties, (for I will not ſuppoſe the Biſhop acceſſary to ſuch Bargains) the Queſtion is, Whether the Incumbent can with a ſafe Conſcience part with his Benefice on ſuch Terms? and whether the other can give a valuable Conſideration for his Intereſt in it, if the Patron conſents?

I anſwer, That the Law is as expreſs againſt corrupt Reſignation, as againſt corrupt Bargains for a Preſentation; only the Penalty is not ſo great. The Words of the Act are, That if any Incumbent of any Benefice with Cure of Souls, ſhall corruptly reſign or exchange the ſame, or corruptly take for, or in reſpect of the Reſigning or Exchanging of the ſame directly or indirectly any Penſion or Sum of Money or Benefit whatſoever; that then as well the Giver as the Taker, &c. ſhall loſe double the Value of the Money ſo given, and double the Value of one Years Profit. 31 Eliz. c. 6.

It may poſſibly be ſaid, That this is a diſtinct Clauſe from the other, and hath another kind of Penalty; and ſo cannot reach Perſons in point of Conſcience as the other doth. But this is a ſtrange way of dealing with Laws. For there is the ſame Penalty in the former Clauſe; only there is added a preſent Avoidance, and a Diſability in Law; ſuppoſing theſe two left out, the one ſtands upon the ſame Foot with the other. And I would know, Whether if theſe were gone, they could not as well make a Bargain for a Preſentation, as for ſuch a Reſignation? And is there nothing of Conſcience, or Honour, or a Regard to the Dignity of the Sacred Function in the Caſe? No Reverence to Laws made on purpoſe to deter Men from ſuch ſordid Practices? Is a Benefice to be look'd on as a meer Livelihood, to be bought and ſold as other Eſtates are? Is there no Senſe of any Spiritual Employment going along with it? No Regard to the Charge and Truſt that attends it? If nothing of a Spiritual Nature is to be conſidered in a Benefice, then there can be no ſuch thing as Simony; and then their Hearts are at eaſe, and they may publiſh Papers for Preſentations as well as for Reſignation of Incumbents. But I will not ſuppoſe ſuch hard things of Perſons who pretend to be in Holy Orders; but this I muſt put them in mind of, that there is an Oath to be taken, and a very ſtrict one, againſt all Simoniacal Contracts, either directly or indirectly. And is wilful Perjury a thing to be ſlighted by any, eſpecially by Church-men, and in order to a Cure of Souls? I have already mentioned my Lord Coke's Saying, That Simony is the more odious, becauſe it is ever accompanied with Perjury, for the Preſentee is ſworn to commit no Simony; and for this he refers to Lynwood. And I have already ſhewed how Simony is to be underſtood according to him. If a ſolemn Oath comes to be ſlighted, and made little or nothing of, how can ſuch Men pretend to Religion or Conſcience? But it may be ſaid, That Simony is to be determined by the Law; and the Law makes a Bargain with the Patron to be Simony, and not with the Incumbent. I have ſaid enough already to ſhew, that the Statute doth not determine what Simony is, but only inflicts a ſevere Penalty on ſome ſorts of it; and therefore it may be Simony, although not expreſly againſt the Words of the Law. But the Words of the Law are expreſs againſt corrupt Reſignations; and I would fain know, whether a Reſignation for Money be not a corrupt Reſignation? And ſuppoſing the Patron innocent, can any Man of common Senſe or Honeſty take the Oath, who comes in upon ſuch Terms, That he hath made no Simoniacal Contract or Promiſe to any Perſon or Perſons whatſoever, concerning the procuring or obtaining the Rectory or Vicarage, &c. Is not this Bargain in order to the procuring or obtaining the Preſentation? Let it be with whom it will, if it be for this end, it is Simoniacal; or elſe it will be hard to determine what Simony is. And as to ſuch kind of Bonds of Reſignation between Parties, without the Patron's Privity, how can they ſignify any thing, if the Biſhop do not accept the Reſignation? Which I have ſhewed before muſt be into his Hands. But theſe Men ſeem to ſet the Biſhop quite aſide, or to ſuppoſe him very weak and inconſiderate. All they look at is the point of Law; and they may ſay, They have adviſed with Council, and they have told them, that there is nothing againſt Law in this Practice. How? Not againſt Law? Did they ask them, whether this were not a corrupt Reſignation within the Statute? No; but whether it were Simony or not? I hardly ſuppoſe any Man that underſtands what Simony is by our Law, would go ſo far; but they might ſay, It doth not void the Living, nor bring a Diſability on the Perſon; and ſo far they ſaid as the Statute doth. But is this all which Men of Conſcience, and who take the Care of Souls, are to enquire after? What! nothing but whether the Benefice will be void or not? Or, whether the King may preſent or not? Are theſe all the Conſiderations, even of Clergymen, in ſuch Caſes? Such kind of Practices, which which ſavour only of this World, are thoſe which give ſuch Advantages againſt our Profeſſion, in ſuch an Age of Infidelity as ours. Do not you ſee, ſay they, that they mind nothing but their bare Intereſt as to this World, and have no regard to Law or Conſcience, where they contradict it? I am ſenſible how unreaſonable it is, to charge a Profeſſion with the Faults of a few; and thoſe in Compariſon, I hope, not conſiderable in it. But we ought, if poſſible, to avoid any Scandal of this kind; for it ſtrikes at the whole Body of the Clergy of our Church, and at Religion it ſelf; which if we have any our ſelves, we ſhall be very tender of the Honour of. Some Men have a mighty Prejudice againſt any Church-men meddling in Secular Affairs, although they be Matters of Juſtice and Mercy, which the Law of the Land calls them to; but my great Prejudice is againſt ſuch Church-men, who bring Secular Ways of Trafficking into Church-matters, as though nothing were really minded, but buying, and ſelling, and getting Gain. Advancing of Trade is a noble Deſign in a Nation, and that which makes it conſiderable at Home and Abroad; but God forbid that ſuch a way of Trading ſhould ever be brought into the Church, or be ſuffered to go unpuniſhed in it: for it will certainly ruin the beſt Church in the World, by leſſening the Reputation of Church-men, by taking off the good Affections of the People, and making them to run into Faction and Infidelity.

There is certainly ſomething more to be regarded in theſe things beſides our own Intereſt; there is that of Religion, of our Church, and of the Laws of the Land, which ought to over-rule it. Suppoſe there were nothing but the bare Law in the caſe, which expreſly forbids all corrupt Reſignations; is it not fit for thoſe who are to preach Obedience to Laws, to obſerve them, in what relates to themſelves? Ought they not to be Examples to others in every thing of good Report, and to abſtain from whatever tends to take off from the Influence of their Doctrine upon the People? And nothing doth it more, than when they are ſuſpected to come among them by unlawful and indirect means.

I have taken the Liberty in this Diſcourſe, to ſpeak my Mind freely about Matters which touch upon Law and Conſcience, the Duties of Patrons and Incumbents; but I have done it, without any other Deſign, than of doing ſome Good, or at leaſt preventing ſome Miſchief to the Church I live in, and which I have a true and a juſt Value for. If I had not thought that this kind of Simoniacal Contracts were a great and growing Miſchief, and had not had too much Reaſon to think ſo, I ſhould have ſpared my pains as others have done; for I do not love to be uneaſy to my ſelf or others. I know very well, how ill ſuch Diſcourſes are apt to be taken by all that are concerned in them, viz. Patrons, Incumbents, and all ſuch Lawyers that go about to defend them. But before I conclude this Diſcourſe, I muſt requeſt ſome things of all theſe; and then let them judge as they pleaſe, ſo it be without Prejudice and Partiality.

1. That Patrons would conſider, That the Right of Patronage is a Truſt committed to them, of which they muſt give an account to God; for there is an Obligation in point of Conſcience, going along with it. It is hard to believe what is commonly reported, how ſlight many great Patrons make of their beſtowing of Benefices, by letting Servants make their beſt Advantage of them; who ſcandalouſly expoſe the Livings, and themſelves, and the Honour of thoſe they depend upon. If Servants deſerve to be gratified, for God's ſake, let it not be at the Price of Souls. If there were no ſuch thing as Religion, but that the pretended Care of Souls is nothing but an Artificial way of Maintaining a Sett of Men, to keep the People in a little better Order, by telling them of Moral Duties, and another World; then there were ſome Colour for ſuch an affected Negligence in theſe Matters: But I do not believe that any of theſe Perſons can ſatisfie themſelves in ſuch abſurd and unreaſonable Imaginations, againſt the Senſe of all the Wiſer and more conſiderate part of Mankind. But it cannot be denied, that the things which they are to teach the People in point of Morality, are very good things, and neceſſary to be told them. This is all I deſire at preſent. And is it of no Conſequence what ſort of Men thoſe are, who are entruſted with the teaching People their Duties to God and Man? If Religion were only to be regarded in point of Policy; thoſe muſt be far from Politicians, who have no regard to the Qualifications of the Perſons they put into ſuch places. For Ignorant and Illiterate Men can never give them good Inſtructions; Scandalous and debauched Perſons will certainly do abundance of Miſchief, making the People more looſe and debauched than otherwiſe they would be. Men of ill Principles will inſtill them into the Heads of the buſie part of thoſe they converſe among, and take upon them to guide; and make them far more ungovernable than otherwiſe they would be. I have no very great Opinion of the World as it is; but I cannot but think, that it would be yet much worſe, if an Ignorant, Vicious, Turbulent, Seditious Clergy were put into all ſuch places as Patrons diſpoſe of: And they know not, but they may be all ſuch whom they preſent, if they take no more care about them; but ſuffer their Servants to make what Bargains they think fit; who mind not they Men, but the Advantage they are to get by them. And there is a juſt Preſumption, that thoſe are not very deſerving, who are ready to drive ſuch Bargains for themſelves: And ſuch Men are not to be valued, as Cattel in a Market, by the Money they will yield.

2. That Lawyers would not encourage their Clients in indirect methods of obtaining Preſentations. For here lies a great part of our preſent Miſchief: The Clergymen who want Benefices, they ſay; we are ignorant of the Law; but we go to thoſe whoſe buſineſs it is to underſtand it: And they tell us, they have Caſes and Precedents in their Books, for ſuch Bonds; and they have been many times adjudged in the Courts of Law to be good; and therefore why are we to blame if we ſubmit to them? But here lies the great Miſtake: The point is really a point of Conſcience as to the Oath; but the Queſtion to put them, can be only a point of Law; who are to give Judgment upon the Statute, and according to the Rules of Judgment allowed in their Courts. But I cannot but obſerve, that there is no Precedent offer'd before 8 Jac. 1. and in the 15th. was a contrary Judgment. In the beginning of Charles I. the former Judgment was affirmed; and from hence it hath come to be ſuch a prevailing Opinion. I confeſs, that I am not ſatisfied, how far ſuch Precedents, or one or two judicial Sentences make a thing to paſs for Law; nor whether the Authority of ſuch a Sentence, or the Reaſon, is to give the force of Law to it. I obſerve that my Lord Coke, when he ſpeaks of the Laws of England; he reckons up Common Law, Statute Laws, Cuſtoms reaſonable, &c. but he never mentions the Judgment of the Courts, as any part of our Law; they being no more but a Declaratory Sentence of the Majority of the Judges, when it may be the other differ upon better Reaſons; and when ſuch Rea-

Reaſons come to be thought better by one more at another time, then the contrary muſt paſs for Law on the ſame Grounds. How often do we hear that the Judges were divided in their Opinions in point of Law? How often, that the greater number went one way, but Law and Reaſon on the other? Suppoſe a Lord Chief Juſtice of great Skill and Knowledge in the Law, to be unequally yoked with others of far leſs Judgment; how is it poſſible to prevent that Judgment ſhall not be given on the wrong ſide, if the three happen to be of an Opinion againſt him; or one be abſent, and two be againſt one? In a late great Cauſe, viz. of Commendams; although three Judges concurred in Opinion, and the general Practice was allowed to be of that ſide; yet becauſe one Judge differ'd from the reſt, his Authority was produced againſt the Sentence of the Court: And for what Cauſe can this be, but the Suppoſition, that it is not the Sentence, but the Reaſon which makes the Law. My Lord Chief Juſtice Hales in a MS. Diſcourſe of the Hiſtory and Analyſis of the Laws of England, Chap. 4. makes three Conſtituents of the Common Law of England: 1. The Common Uſage and Cuſtom: 2. The Authority of Parliament: 3. The judicial Deciſions of Courts of Juſtice: But how? Conſonant to one another in the Series and Succeſſion of Time. This is ſpoken with great Judgment: For, no doubt, a mighty Regard ought to be ſhewed to a Concurrent Senſe of ſo many Perſons of Ability in the Law, in the different times wherein ſuch Matters have been before them; and this is the higheſt Authority for expounding the Law; but it cannot amount to the making of a Law. For, as the ſame excellent Perſon adds; It's true, the Deciſions of Courts of Juſtice, although by the ſtrength of the Law of this Kingdom, they do bind as a Law between the Parties to it in that particular Caſe in Queſtion, till Reverſed by Error or Attaint; yet they do not make a Law: For that only the King, by the Aſſent of Parliament, can do. All that I aim at, is not in the leaſt to take off from the Authority and Reverence due to judicial Deciſions, built upon a General Agreement from time to time; or upon Evident Reaſon in point of Law: But only that things ſhould not be ſo poſitively aſſerted to be Law, which are built only on a few Modern Precedents, without any convincing Evidence: Which I take to be the preſent Cace.

3. That the Clergy would mind their own Honour and Intereſt, and that of the Church and Religion ſo much as not to accept of Benefices upon ſuch Enſnaring Terms, as thoſe of Bonds of Reſignation.

If what I have ſaid on this Argument be true; I am ſure they have all the Reaſon in the World to refuſe them, when they know not what the Conſequence of them may be; and they do know what kind of Oath they are to take. And no Man can honeſtly take an Oath, that is not ſatisfied, that ſuch Bonds are no Simoniacal Contract in the Senſe of that Law, by which he is required to take the Oath. Now the Oath is not impoſed by the Courts of Common Law in purſuance of the Statute; for then it were to be underſtood according to the Senſe and Meaning of it; but that very Statute leaves the Eccleſiaſtical Laws as they were; by which Simony is of a larger Extent than it is underſtood at Common Law; and by thoſe Laws this Oath is required. Therefore my Requeſt is to all ſuch Clergymen, as are in danger of having ſuch put upon them; that they would ſtudy the Caſe, and ſatisfie their Minds before they venture upon taking an Oath, which may afterwards rob them of that Peace and Tranquility of Mind, which every Good Man will Eſteem above any Benefice in the World.

THE BOOKSELLER TO THE READER.

THE Firſt of theſe Diſcourſes was ſent to me by the Right Reverend Author, at the ſame time that the Firſt Part of the Eccleſiaſtical Caſes relating to the Duties and Rights of the Parochial Clergy were ſent up; and he intended to have added this and the two following Diſcourſes formerly printed to that Volume; but that firſt Part ſwelling to too great a Bulk, theſe were laid aſide, and might poſſibly have been attended with other Diſcourſes of the ſame Nature, if it had pleaſed God to have continu'd his Life. The two Speeches in the Houſe of Lords, and the Diſcourſe concerning the Antiquity of London, I received from his Son, the Reverend Mr. Stillingfleet.

DISCOURSE I.

109:2.G.

Of the Nature of our Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction, and the Laws on which it ſtands.

BY the Statute for Reſtraint of Appeals, 24 H. 8. c. 12. we underſtand what that Juriſdiction was, which our Laws did not allow, and what it was, which was founded upon them. It begins with a Recital, that it appears from Ancient Hiſtories and Authentick Records, that the Realm of England, is an Empire governed by one Supreme Head and King, to whom the whole Nation owes a natural and humble Obedience; but the People are divided in Terms, and by the Names of the Spiritualty and Temporalty. However that there is ſufficient Power, Authority and Juriſdiction within the Realm to end all Cauſes that ariſe, without any Appeal to a foreign Court; the Body Spiritual, uſually called the Engliſh Church, judge all ſuch Matters as belong to them; and the Laws Temporal are for trial of Property of Lands and Goods, and for the preſervation of Peace and Unity, according to which, there are Judges of the Temporalty appointed to adminiſter and execute Juſtice, and both theſe do conjoin together the one to help the other.

From whence theſe things do naturally follow:

1. That an External and Foreign Authority and Juriſdiction is inconſiſtent with the original Conſtitution of our Government, and the Deſign of our Laws.

2. That there are two ſeveral ſorts of Juriſdiction owned by our Laws, the one Spiritual, and the other Temporal; and that both theſe concur to the due Adminiſtration of Juſtice, as the Words of the Statute are.

But the Statute proceeds to ſhew, Ar. 2. that notwithſtanding the Statutes of Proviſors and Præmunire in the times of E. 1. & 3. and R. 2. & H. 4. there had been many Encroachments made, eſpecially in Caſes of Appeal as to ſuch Matters, which by the Goodneſs of the Princes of this Realm, and by the Laws and Cuſtoms of the ſame, did appertain to the Spiritual Juriſdiction of this Realm. And theſe Matters are expreſſed to be Cauſes Teſtamentary, Cauſes of Matrimony and Divorces, Rights of Tithes, Oblations and Obventions: Therefore it is enacted, That all ſuch Cauſes ſhall be finally determin'd within the King's Juriſdiction and Authority, and not elſewhere, in ſuch Courts Spiritual and Temporal, as the Natures, Conditions, and Qualities of the Caſes ſhall require. From whence it follows,

1. That the Intention of our Laws before was to reſtrain the Exerciſe of the Pope's exorbitant Juriſdiction here in matters which belong'd to our own Spiritual Juriſdiction, according to the Laws and Cuſtoms of the Realm.

2. That the particular Deſign of this Law is to reduce things to their ancient and legal Methods which had been ſo much ſubverted by the Pope's gradual Encroachments and Uſurpations.

3. That our own Laws and Cuſtoms are the beſt Means to ſet the Bounds and Meaſures, as to Spiritual and Temporal Juriſdiction.

4. That the ſame Statute which takes away the Pope's Juriſdiction in matter of Appeals, doth eſtabliſh the Authority of our Spiritual Courts in ſuch things as by the Cuſtoms and Laws of England belong to their Juriſdiction.

5. That ſince no other Law hath taken away this Power and Juriſdiction from the Spiritual Courts, they remain ſtill in the ſame Force and Authority from this particular Statute, as well as from the ancient Laws and Cuſtoms of the Realm.

It's true that by the Act 17. Car. 1. c. 12. the Exerciſe of the ordinary Spiritual Juriſdiction ſeem'd to be taken away; but by the Act 13. Car. 2. c. 12. that Clauſe is wholly repealed, and the Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction reſtored to the ſame Condition it was in before, in all Cauſes and Matters belonging to the Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction, according to the Eccleſiaſtical Laws uſed and practiſed in this Realm in as ample manner and form, as they did and might lawfully have done before the making of the ſaid Act.

And it is obſervable, that although there was a deſign to have reformed the Eccleſiaſtical Laws by virtue of the Statutes 25 H. 8. c. 19. 27 H. 8. *c.*15. 35 H. 8. *c.*16. 3 E. 6. *c.*11. and Commiſſions were iſſued out to that purpoſe, and a Draught agreed upon; yet theſe never paſſing into a Law, the old Eccleſiaſtical Laws of England continued ſtill in force, which were not contrariant or repugnant to the Laws, Statutes and Cuſtoms of the Realm, nor to the damage and hurt of the King's Prerogative. And from hence the Eccleſiaſtical Laws are mentioned in ſeveral Acts of Parliament, as ſtill in being after the Statute 25 H. 8. c. 19. So 27 H. 8. c. 20. Tithes are required to be paid according to the Eccleſiaſtical Laws and Ordinances of the Church of England, 32 H. 8. c. 7. Detainers of Tithes are to be proceeded againſt according to the Courſe and Proceſs of the Eccleſiaſtical Laws, 35 H. 8. c. 19. Perſons are ſuppoſed to be convict according to the Eccleſiaſtical Laws, 1 E. 6. *c.*2. An Alteration was made as to the Name and Authority by which the Summons, and Citations, and other Proceſs was ſent out; for inſtead of the Biſhops Names, they were to be in the King's Name as in Writs at Common-Law, but with the Teſts of the Biſhops. Which was occaſion'd by the Jealouſy ſtill remaining, that ſome Biſhops acted by Authority from Rome; (which Jealouſy is removed by the Act of Supremacy, 10 Eliz.) yet we find all the ſame Proceedings allowed in the Eccleſiaſtical Courts as are mention'd in the Statute, 24 H. 8. c. 12. and ſome more mention'd, as Cauſes of Correction and Inquiries de Jure Patronatûs, &c. There hath been a great Difficulty made by ſome concerning this Act; becauſe it was repealed 1 Q. M. 2. and that Repeal taken off 1 Jac. 25. n. 48. Therefore, ſay they, this Act is revived, and conſequently the Eccleſiaſtical Proceſs muſt be in the King's Name, and not in the Biſhops.

But we are to conſider, that the Act 25 H. 8. c. 20. gives the Biſhops conſecrated after the Manner there preſcribed, Power to execute in all things touching the ſame, as any Arch-Biſhop or Biſhop of this Realm, without offending of the Prerogative Royal of the Crown, and the Laws and Cuſtoms of this Realm, might at any time heretofore do: Now the Acting in their own Names, was according to the ancient Cuſtoms of the Realm, and not then look'd on as any diminution of the Prerogative; for then it would never have been ſuffered in ſo jealous a time as the Remainder of the Reign of H. 8. For as long as they diſowned the Pope's

Power,

Power, and owned the King's Supremacy, by 25 H. 8. c. 19. they did not regard in whoſe Name the Proceſs went out, the Diſpute not being between the King and the Biſhop, but between the King and the Pope, and when the Biſhop owned the King as Supreme Head, the Proceſs muſt run in the Name of one who owned no other Supreme Head but the King; and what greater Injury was this to the Prerogative, than every Lord of a Manor calling a Court in his own Name? And this ſeems to me a very unreaſonable Objection, unleſs it be ſuppoſed that the Biſhop had no other Power of Juriſdiction but what he derived from the Pope, which is a ridiculous Suppoſition; for the Biſhops did exerciſe a Spiritual Juriſdiction here, by virtue of their Office, and the Laws of the Land, before the Pope's Uſurpation here. If then the old Kings of England did, by Conſent of the Eſtates of the Realm, allow the Biſhops to exerciſe a Spiritual Juriſdiction without Regard to the Pope's Authority, how can this be ſuppoſed to be any Diminution to the King's Prerogative? It is poſſible that the Popiſh Biſhops in the time of E. 6. might in the Height of their Bigotry aſſert, that the Biſhops had no Juriſdiction but what they derived from the Pope; but this was not the ancient Doctrine of the Biſhops of England, who exerciſed a Spiritual Juriſdiction by Virtue of their Office, without any Authority derived from a foreign Biſhop. Therefore we are to take the Practice of the Biſhops Juriſdiction from the ancient Cuſtoms here receiv'd, and not from any late and novel Opinions; and theſe two Acts of the ſubmiſſion of the Clergy, c. 19. and this of the Biſhop's Authority, c. 20. as going together. But now 1 Eliz. 1. both theſe Acts are revived, n. 6, 7. And ſo if there had been no Repeal of Q. Mary of the Statute 1 E. 6. when theſe Acts were revived, the Biſhops had Power to act as formerly; for this Revival was a virtual Repeal of that Act. And the Repeal of Q. Mary's Act, 1 Jac. 25. doth but leave that Act as it ſtood in Competition with 25 H. 8. c. 20. But the Act of E. 6. not being revived, but the other, it puts the State of Epiſcopal Juriſdiction then juſt as it was, when the Act of 25 H. 8. paſſed. Why was not this Repeal taken away 1 Eliz. as well as 1 Jac. 1? It ſeems they then thought the Revival of 25 H. 8. would ſet the matter right without any Reflection upon 1 E. 6. And the Biſhops all Queen Elizabeth's Reign acted by virtue of the Statute 25 H. 8. and no Prejudice to the Prerogative then: How can we then imagine it to ſuffer by 1 Jac. 1. when the ſame Laws as to the Prerogative were in force? And Q. Eliz. took care to ſecure it by the Act of 1 Eliz. which effectually aboliſhed all foreign Juriſdiction, n. 16. and annexed Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction to the Crown of this Realm, n. 17. If they had then thought the Biſhops uſing their own Names had been contrary thereto, it is not to be imagined, that it would have been permitted at that time. For they were then as jealous of the Prerogative, as any have been ſince, and did take as much Care to preſerve it; but this they thought not worth any Notice being taken of it. And it ſerves only for a Pretence to quarrel at the Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction, when they have nothing material to alledge againſt it.

But there are others who go much farther than this Objection reaches; for they pretend that the very Notion of Eccleſiaſtical Laws is wrong; for it ſuppoſes a diſtinct Law from the Common Law of England, which, ſay they, is inconſiſtent with the Rights and Liberties of the People of England.

This ſtrikes at the root of all Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction and therefore muſt be fully anſwer'd, before I proceed; and that ſhall be done by theſe ſteps;

1. By ſhewing that it proceeds upon a very falſe ſuppoſition, viz. that it is one of the Fundamental Rights of the Nation, to have ſuch a Common Law as excludes the Eccleſiaſtical.

2. That the Eccleſiaſtical Laws of England are built on the ſame Foundations with other parts of the Common Law. And that theſe Laws are allow'd, and owned, by the greateſt Aſſerters of our Common Law.

1. This mighty Objection argues great Ignorance of our Fundamental Conſtitution, as though it depended upon having one Common Law; by which they bring all things under the Cogniſance of what they call Common Law, ſo that all Cauſes ſhould be heard and determined by the Rules and Methods uſed in thoſe Courts, which proceed according to it. This Term of Common Law ſeems to favour the Pretenſions of thoſe who would bring all Matters to be tried by it; but if they would look into the Original or Grounds of it, they would find themſelves deceived. For the Common Law had not its Denomination from the Univerſality of its Extent; as though all things were under its Juriſdiction; and all other Methods were but Encroachments upon it. But the true Notion of the Common Law extends to all thoſe Cuſtoms, which have obtained the Force of Laws, although the Method of Proceeding be very different in them. And although the Modern Acception of it ſeems to Reſtrain it to the Municipal Laws of the Kingdom, as diſtinguiſhed from the more General Laws and Cuſtoms here receiv'd, which are grounded on the Civil, Canon or Maritime Laws; yet I ſee no Reaſon why thoſe Laws which ſtand upon one Common Bottom, as being receiv'd by Immemorial Cuſtom, ſhould not paſs under the ſame Denomination. For the Original Common Law of England was that which is commonly called, the Laws of Edward the Confeſſor, which was a Collection made in his time of the beſt of thoſe Laws which had been diſuſed by the Daniſh Irruptions, and were then thought fit to be brought together for the common Uſe of the Nation. For it appears from our beſt Hiſtorians, that there were different Laws in the ſeveral Parts of the Nation; the Mercian Laws were in many things different from the reſt; the Laws of the Eaſt Angles were Daniſh, and ſo were the Northumbrian; and the Laws of the Weſt Saxons differ'd from both the other; and were collected by Alfred, who made uſe of the Mercian and Kentiſh Laws. But although he deſigned great Matters as to the Laws, as well as to Religion and Learning; yet his time was ſo very troubleſome, that no laſting Effect follow'd his Endeavours, (notwithſtanding all that is ſaid of him in the Book called the Mirror of Juſtices, ſaid to be written in the time of E. 1.) in King Edgar's time there was a freſh Attempt to ſettle the Laws; but he was taken off in the Flower of his Years, and a very tempeſtuous time followed. After King Edward was ſettled in the Throne, there happen'd a conſiderable time of Peace; and then a Collection of our Laws was again thought of; and many of them were put together, which were of moſt general Uſe, under his Name. And theſe ſaith Brompton and Ranulph Higden were called the Common Law of England; not, that theſe Laws were then made, but that they were then made common to the Nation; as the Paraphraſt on the Confeſſors Laws confeſſes, c, 35.

Script. p. 957.
Ran. l. 1. c. 50.

Theſe Laws being thus publiſhed and commonly receiv'd, the People of England grew extremely fond of them; in ſo much, that when William I. found there was no Governing this People without Laws, he would fain have put the Law of the Eaſt Angles upon them; but they would not hear of any but King Edward's Laws; which he promiſed with his own Amendments; but kept them as he ſaw Cauſe. After him William II. regarded no Laws at all. Henry I. took an Advantage by this, and promiſed to reſtore King Edward's Laws, upon which he was Receiv'd; but he kept not his Word. When his Daughter treated with the Londoners, they inſiſted upon King Edward's Laws; which ſhe refuſing they deſerted her, as Florentius Wigornienſis relates. A.D.1141. Her Son Henry II. ſaw no ſatisfaction would be given to the Nation without theſe Laws, and therefore he Reſtored them as they are in Hoveden. His Son Richard I. was moſt abroad, and left things at home in the Hands of Others. His Brother John had very little Contentment here, becauſe he preferr'd his own Will and Pleaſure above the Law, which the Nation would not bear; and ſo at laſt he conſented to the Reſtoring the Ancient Laws, but new digeſted under the Name of Magna Charta; which was confirmed by following Kings, and juſtly look'd on as the Standard of our Laws and Liberties.

Now it ought to be obſerved, that in all theſe ſeveral Collections of our Ancient Common Law, the Eccleſiaſtical Laws are ſo far from being Excluded, that the firſt Care is taken of them. In the Laws of King Edward, the Churches Rights and Liberties are ſecured in the firſt Place; and the Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction in the following Sections.

It's true, that the Eccleſiaſtical Cauſes were then heard in the Kings Courts; but how? Not according to the Municipal but the Eccleſiaſtical Laws; as appears by the Saxon Laws and the Charter of King William, when he ſeparated the Courts; of which hereafter. But in the Laws of King Edward it is provided for, that the Eccleſiaſtical Cauſes were to be firſt Diſpatched. In the Laws of Henry 1. c. 5. the Diſtinction of Cauſes is ſet down, and ſome are ſaid to be Eccleſiaſtical and ſome Secular; and the Method of Proceedings in the former, as to Accuſation and Witneſſes, is at large ſet down.

In the great Charter, the firſt Article is, that the Church ſhould enjoy all its Rights and Privileges entire, i. e. ſaith my Lord Cooke; all their lawful Juriſdictions, and other their Rights without any diminution or ſubſtraction whatſoever. 2 Inſt. 3.

But ſay theſe Men, the moſt Fundamental Rights of an Engliſh Man by Magna Charta is to be tried by his Peers, c. 29. which is not done in the Eccleſiaſtical Courts, and therefore the Proceedings there are inconſiſtent with our Rights and Liberties.

This is the main Strength of the Argument againſt the Eccleſiaſtical Laws and Courts, to which I ſhall give a clear and diſtinct Anſwer.

1. How is this poſſible to be the meaning of Magna Charta, when the Churches Liberties and Juriſdiction, were ſecured before? And no Man ever pretended that the Eccleſiaſtical Proceedings were at any time in the way of Juries. The Common Law of England, was Originally a Mixt Law, and conſiſted partly of old Saxon Cuſtoms, partly of the Rules of the Civil and Canon Law; and partly of the Feudal Law relating to Tenures, &c. No one of theſe can pretend to be the old Common Law of England; and altogether do make up the Body of it. Now as to Trials which related to Mens Legal Eſtates, the Saxon Cuſtoms and the Feudal Law did agree, viz. That no free Man ſhould be diſſeiſed of his Liberty and Rights but by the Trial of his Peers. The Occaſion of the Renewing this Law, was this, King John being a Man who took great Liberties himſelf, was not willing that his People ſhould enjoy any under him; For he ſeized upon Mens Perſons and took away their Eſtates, without any Proceſs at Law, but meerly at his own Will and Pleaſure. This may be ſeen at large in Matt. Paris and others; and therefore the People of England had great Reaſon to inſiſt upon this as a Fundamental Right. But there was no ſuch Complaint againſt another Method of Proceeding in Eccleſiaſtical Cauſes, which went upon different Rules as to Judicial Proceedings. viz. by Accuſation and Depoſition of Witneſſes; For if this had been the thing meant, there would have been ſomething in Magna Charta againſt them, but here the whole relates to the King's Proceedings by himſelf againſt Men, nec ſuper eum ibimus, nec ſuper eum mittemus; my Lord Cooke ſaith, this is to be underſtood of the King's Suit; I rather think it relates to the King's uſing no Suit at all, but meer Arbitrary Power in his own Cauſe. For the Intention of Magna Charta was to ſettle the Juſt Meaſures of Proceedings between the King and People.

2 Inſt. 49.

2. The Expreſſions there uſed do not exclude any other cuſtomary way of Trial allow'd by the Law of the Land; for the words are, niſi per legale judicium Parium ſuorum vel per Legem terræ. Can any who underſtands the Nature of our Conſtitution think the latter to be only an Explication of the former? But the Lex terræ was a diſtinct way of Trial at Law; therefore Mr. Selden renders it thus; Neither will we enter into his Poſſeſſion, nor convict him, but by legal Judgment of his Peers, or by Jury; or by Trial of him by Oath, or Wager, or doing his Law. For vadiare Legem is to offer the Oath or Trial; facere Legem to make Oath. Bracton ſaith of Perjured Jurymen, Legem terræ amittunt; i. e. non erunt Otheſworth nec ad Teſtimonium admittentur. This was an uſual way of Trial in the Saxon times, and was called Atha; in the Privileges of Glaſenbury the King grants Athas & Ordelas, i. e. the Trial by Oath and by Ordeal; this ſaith Sir H. Spelman is often mention'd in the Ancient Laws; and it is likewiſe in Domeſday Book. This way of Trial was not by the ſingle Oath of the Party, but by ſuch a Number of Compurgators as the Judge thought fit; generally two beſides the Perſon: And this was anciently allow'd in other Caſes beſides Actions of Debt; for Mr. Selden ſaith, in the old Rolls, nothing is more uſual than in Criminal Actions (not Capital) and Civil of any kind to admit Leygager, as in Attachments upon Prohibitions, Quare impedits, and the like. But this Paſſage of Magna Charta doth certainly relate to the King's Proſecution and not to Matters of Appeal at the Suits of the Party; ſo my Lord Cooke confeſſes, and he affirms, that there are ſeveral Trials allow'd by the Common Law, without Juries. And among others he mentions two ſorts of Trials by Certificates; ſome in Temporal Cauſes, as the Certificate of the Lord Marſhal, of the Judges upon Records; and of the Sheriffs upon Privilege; and for Spiritual Cauſes, he inſtances in Marriage, Baſtardy, Excommunication, &c. which he ſaith are regularly to be tried by the Certificate of the Ordinary. are not all theſe equally againſt Magna Charta? And elſewhere he ſaith, that the Trial of Things done out of the Realm before the Conſtable and Marſhal of England, is by Witneſſes or by Combat, and their proceeding is according to the Civil Law, and not by the Oath of Twelve Men. So that the plain meaning of Magna Charta is not to overthrow any other Legal Ways of Trial, which had been ſettled by Cuſtom and Conſent; but that in all Indictments and Proſecutions at the Suit of the King, the Perſon indicted ſhall be tried by his Peers, or by a Jury of twelve Men. And ſo the Author of the Diverſity of Courts in the time of H. 8. ſtates the Matter: Upon an Indictment ſaith he, the Common Trial by our Law is by the Verdict of twelve Men upon their Oaths; but ſometime ſaith he, the matter ſhall be tried by the Biſhop, and not by Verdict of twelve Men, as generally Baſtardy, &c.

p. 324.

3. If this Argument be good againſt Eccleſiaſtical Proceedings, it muſt likewiſe hold againſt all Proceedings in other Courts, which make no more uſe of a Trial by Juries, than the Eccleſiaſtical Courts do. So in Courts of Equity and Conſcience. For they are as fully againſt this Paſſage of Magna Charta, as the other can be ſuppoſed to be; and ſo much more, becauſe the Churches Juriſdiction is preſerved therein, but there is no Salvo for the Courts of Chancery or Admiralty, which proceeds upon Depoſition of Witneſſes after the manner of the Civil Law, and not according to the ordinary Courſe of the Common Law; which allows of no ſuch Proceedings. What ſhall be ſaid now? Are all Courts of Equity to be run down, becauſe they take Depoſitions, and require Anſwers upon Oath to Interrogatories? The very ſame Arguments have indeed in our time been urged againſt this Court, and that by knowing Perſons in the Common Law; and the Anſwer given, was, that Magna Charta, by the Law of the Land doth allow all ancient Cuſtoms and Practices, although different from the Proceedings of the Common Law. But it was ſaid on the other ſide, that there could be no Proof of ſuch ancient Cuſtoms and Practices as to the Court of Equity. The Court of Record in Chancery as it was Officina Brevium was allow'd to be very Ancient; but the Court of Equity was ſaid to be no older than H. 4. when Feoffments came in, or it may be later. And the Greatneſs of the Juriſdiction of that Court my Lord Cooke attributes to three Cardinals, Beaufort, Kemp and Woolſey; others more probably to the Defects of the Common Law, as to the Caſe of Fraud, Accident, and Truſt. However, if this Argument from Magna Charta hold, theſe can never juſtifie the Proceedings of a Court of Equity againſt a Fundamental Right, if it be ſo ſtrictly underſtood. But if allowance be made for Ancient Cuſtoms of the Nation as to other Trials; then there will appear greater Evidence of the Proceedings in the Eccleſiaſtical Courts than in any ſuch Courts of Equity, which yet are now the moſt prevailing Courts of the Nation. And the ſame Reaſon will hold againſt the Proceedings in the Court of Admiralty; which are known and allowed to be according to the Methods of the Civil Law, which hath been the Occaſion of ſeveral Controverſies between the Courts of Common Law and the Court of Admiralty as concerning Contracts made beyond Seas: For, on the one ſide, Littleton's Authority is produced, Sect. 440. that a thing done out of the Realm may not be tried within the Realm by a Jury of twelve Men; On the other ſide it is ſaid, that the Trial of Contracts belongs to the Common Law, where-ever they are made and that the Admiralty cannot take Cogniſance of any thing but what is done upon the Sea.

4 Inſt.143.

Let us take that for granted; but how comes a thing done beyond Sea to be capable of being tried by a Jury in England, who are to be of the Neighbourhood? For that my Lord Cooke hath told us of an admirable Expedient at Common Law; which is, That an Obligation 1 Inſt. 251. made beyond Sea's may be ſued here in England in what Place the Plaintiff 6. will. What then? If it bear date at Bourdeaux in France, where ſhall it be ſued? And Anſwer is made, that it may be alledged to be made in quodam loco vocato Bourdeaux in France. Very well: Then a thing done beyond Sea may be tried by a Jury here. No; for it follows, In Iſlington in the County of Middleſex. How can theſe two be honeſtly put together? No matter for that; for he adds very peremptorily, that there it ſhall be tried. By what Colour? By a certain Fiction at Law. And what Reaſon can be given for ſuch an extravagant Fiction? The only thing pretended is, to prevent a Failure of Juſtice. But the bottom of all ſeems to be, to bring all things to a Trial at Common Law, as though there were no Juſtice to be expected in any other Court. But why then may not ſuch kind of Fictions remove Cauſes out of all other Courts proceeding by other Methods to prevent a Failure of Juſtice: For my Lord Cooke's Reaſon will hold as well from W. 2. Nè Curia Regis 1 Inſt 405. deficeret in Juſtitiâ exhibendâ. And truly it ſeems very hard to challenge a Right of Juriſdiction from a Fiction at Law, and ſuch as was never known, till a Bill for that purpoſe, as we are told, was rejected in the Houſe of Lords in the latter end of H. 8. But what Foundation in Law is there for ſuch a kind of Fiction in matters of Fact? And if there be none, what Bounds can be ſet to them? All that is ſaid to any purpoſe is, That Contracts in general belong to Common Law; and the Place is not material to the Contract. Very true, if the Queſtion be not about Juriſdiction; for then the Place is material. As if the Admiral exerciſe Juriſdiction upon Land for things which are under his Cognizance at Sea, will they ſay the Place is not material? And upon this Point the Controverſy began. For the Admiral in the time of R. 2. without any Fiction of Law, aſſumed a Juriſdiction within the Bodies of Counties; upon which a Complaint was made in Parliament, which was the occaſion of the reſtraining Statutes, 13 R. 25. 15 R. 2, 3. Notwithſtanding this, freſh Complaints were made, 4 H. 4 n. 47. 11 H. 4. n. 61. and Care taken to reſtrain the Admiral's Power to things done upon the Seas, and other matters upon the Land here were left to be tried at common Law. But ſtill the Queſtion remained about Contracts beyond the Seas, which thoſe Laws took no notice of, the Admirals challenged the Juriſdiction to themſelves, becauſe the Lord Marſhal judged of all things relating to War beyond the Seas, and therefore the Admiral look'd on all other Cauſes that aroſe there to belong to him, becauſe in his Patent all manner of Juriſdiction is comprehended; which Cuſtom had interpreted not barely of things done upon the Seas, but of ſuch matters which no other Court could pretend to. Now, ſay they, the Courts of Common Law have a limitted Juriſdiction to matters done within ſome County of England, where the King's Writ Selden, doth come. And ſo much ſeems to be confeſſed on the other ſide, Mare cl. when they yield that the Action muſt be laid here at home, although l. 2. c 24. it was done abroad. And it is impoſſible to ſuppoſe a Jury of the Neighbourhood to try it, which is certainly a part of our Conſtitution, as well as a Trial by Juries. But it is more diſhonourable to our Laws to make uſe of ſuch Fictions to maintain its Juriſdiction, than to leave things to ſuch Methods of Trial which our Anceſtors allow'd.

I do not go about to aſſert the Authority or Juriſdiction of one Court againſt another; nor in the leaſt to diſparage the Juſtice of Proceedings in Trials at Common Law, which have in ſome reſpects the Advantages of any other; but all that I argue for is, that all Meaſures of Juſtice be not confined to the Courts of Common Law; for that were really to charge ſome of the wiſeſt Nations of the World with the not underſtanding the right Methods of Juſtice. It is very hard to ſuppoſe, either that the Romans wanted the juſt Methods of Proceeding in Trials, or that other Nations ſhould be ſo deceived, as to take up their Methods when their Power was gone, unleſs there had been ſomething in their way which gave them Satisfaction in Point of Juſtice, which all civilized Nations are very careful about. Now the Method of Proceedings uſed in other Courts beſides thoſe of the Common Law, are taken from the old Roman Laws; and when our Way of Trial by Juries is magnified as ſo peculiar to our ſelves, it looks like a tacit Reproach of the far greateſt part of the Pretenders to Juſtice in the World. And yet thoſe who have look'd more narrowly into theſe Matters have found, that the Trial by Juries even among us is not of that wonderful Antiquity which ſome imagine. It's true that Ethelred before the Conqueſt, did appoint twelve in every Hundred to hear Cauſes, but theſe were Judges of Law and Fact too. The way of Trial by Aſſize of twelve ſufficient Perſons, was look'd on as a great Novelty, and a Favour too in Glanvil's time, to avoid Trial by Combat, but was very different from our modern Juries. Bracton ſaith, that in his time, if the twelve differ'd, then others were to be added till the Judge could find out twelve agreeing, and then their Verdict ſtood. In Fleta's time the Judge might keep them together till they agreed. And Brook ſaith, the Judges might carry them about in Carts with them till then; but I know not what Authority he had for it.

But my buſineſs is not to find fault with this Way of Trial by Juries; for I do freely confeſs, that if the Law be obſerved, as to the Return and Qualifications of the Perſons, and the Evidence be fully delivered in Preſence of the Judges and Parties, by ſufficient Witneſſes, it is one of the faireſt Methods of Trial in the World. But it cannot be denied that the Romans allow'd more Time for the Party accuſed to prepare himſelf for Anſwer, after he knew the Matter of his Accuſation; and that he had greater liberty as to Counſel and Advice for his Defence, than our Law ſeems to do in the higheſt criminal Cauſes; and if we would judge impartially of our Methods of Trial, we muſt take all together, and not ſingle out ſome Particulars, and leave all the reſt. And we ought not for the ſake of ſome Advantages in the Way of Common Law, to condemn all others as inconſiſtent with our Rights and Liberties.

Aſcon. Ped. 79.
Sigon. de Judic. Rom.

I am apt to think that other Northern People were as fond of their own cuſtomary Laws as we can be; but after long Trial they found it convenient to take in the Rules of the Civil Law in many Caſes. And were it not for the Benefit they expected by the uſe of that Law, it is hard to imagine how the ſeveral Northern Nations, after they had caſt off the Roman Yoke, ſhould yet at laſt ſubmit in great meaſure to their Laws. It is very well known what Numbers and Varieties of Laws the Lombards, and ſeveral ſorts of Goths, and other Northern Nations brought into the ſeveral Parts of Europe, upon the Decay of the Roman Empire; but it is as well known that after long Uſage of their own Cuſtoms, they were glad to take in the Aſſiſtance of the Roman Laws.

No People ſeem'd more averſe to any Uſe of the Civil Law than the Goths, which ſettled in Spain; for in the time of Chindaſwindus they made an entire Body of Laws for themſelves chiefly out of their old Cuſtoms, and forbad any other. But it is obſervable, (1.) That they took many things out of the Civil Law, and put them into it. (2.) That their Biſhops were allow'd by General Conſent of King and the Eſtates, to make Eccleſiaſtical Laws or Canons at that time; which appears by the Spaniſh Councils. (3.) That after all, Alphonſus 10. tranſlated the Civil Laws into Spaniſh; which, with the Additions of later Times, make up the Common Law of Spain, although there be particular Cuſtoms obſerved for Laws in the ſeveral Kingdoms of Catalonia, Navarre and Arragon; becauſe they were not united as Members of the ſame Kingdom, but as ſeveral Kingdoms making up one Body.

Neither the Goths nor Lombards in Italy could wholly extinguiſh the Uſe of the Roman Law there. And altho' the Feudal Law were firſt collected there, and put into ſome kind of Order; yet the Author of that Collection confeſſes, that Cauſes were determin'd by the Roman Law, as well as by the Feudal Laws and Cuſtoms. And the Reaſon given by learned Men, why the Civil Law came to be in ſo much Requeſt about the 13th Century, was not any Command of Lotharius, but the People were willing to have the Rigour of the Feudal Law abated by the Equity and Temper of the Roman. For the Feudal Law was found to be very ſtrict and ſevere, being intended for keeping the People under a Military Service, (which was the true Reaſon of the ancient Tenures) this by Degrees began to be found very uneaſy to them; and they found no way of Relief in many Caſes from the Rigor of it, but by the Courts of Equity, proceeding by more general Rules, and ſupplying the Defects of thoſe Laws.

Lindenbrog. Præfat. ad Cod. Leg. Antiq. Conring. de Orig. Juris German. c. 23.

There are ſeveral things which are look'd on as fundamental Maxims of our Common Law, which are nothing but the Effects of the Rigour of the Feudal Law: As,

1. That all Land muſt be held of a Superiour Lord, and ſo there can be no Allodium, i. e. Land held free from Dependance on another, which the Romans called Jure Optimo; as the Roman Citizens held theirs. 1 Inſt. 1. 65

2. That there is no Tenure, but there is ſome Service belonging to it: Otherwiſe, ſaith my Lord Coke, it would be againſt Reaſon, and the Common Law is nothing but Reaſon; which it ſeems the Romans did not underſtand. 1 Inſt. 97.

3. That Lands of Inheritance do lineally deſcend, and not aſcend. And the Common Law being nothing but Reaſon, a very ſubſtantial one is given for this; becauſe Land is ponderoſum quid; which, I think, is no peculiar Reaſon to Land in England. But the true Reaſon was, it was to go that way, where there was moſt probability of doing the Service. 1 Inſt. 10. Ratcliff's Caſe, 40.

4. That none can be Heir in Fee Simple by the Common Law, but he that is of the whole Blood. Which was the Rule of the Feudal Law, wherever it prevailed. 1 Inſt. 14. Feud. l. 2. c. 29.

Ripuar.34. Alem. 56. Burguid. l. 1. tit. 1. n. 2. Theſe things I only mention, to ſhew how the Feudal Law was here receiv'd in its Rigor, which is what ſome Men call the Common Law, and when they often ſay, ſuch a thing is ſo at the Common Law, no more is really meant by it, but that it was ſo according to the Feudal Cuſtoms, as they were here receiv'd; for they were not in all Places alike. So that here we have two Notions of the Common Law; 1. For the Saxon Cuſtoms which were generally eaſy and well-liked. 2. For the Norman Tenures, which were much harder, and required a ſtricter Obſervance. And this Strictneſs is ſuitable to what they call Proceeding at Common Law. And although there were ſome kinds of Services in the Saxon times, yet they were much eaſier than thoſe brought in by the Normans, who put the whole Kingdom into military Service, and added very hard Conditions to it. But by Degrees they obtained a Releaſe from many of them by their Great Charters; which reduced things to a Certainty, eſpecially as to Impoſitions and Trials, as to their Perſons and Eſtates. But yet there was ſomething of Rigour in the common Courſe of the Law, which called for Equity, and was to be expected only in ſuch Courts as proceeded by the Meaſures of the Roman Laws, as in the Courts of Chancery in matters of Contracts, and a Regard to the Circumſtances and Reaſon of Actions; for the Common Law proceeding upon the Terms of the Feudal Tenures had a Rigidneſs in the Nature of it, which was found neceſſary to be abated by Courts of Equity. It hath been warmly debated in our time, how far a Court of Equity is any part of our Conſtitution? Which in other Terms is to enquire, Whether our Nation were governed by the ſtrict Feudal Law, or by equitable Conſtructions, according to the more general Laws and common Reaſon of Mankind. There is a remarkable Difference between our profound Sages of the Law about this. Hobart Hob. 63. ſaith poſitively, That Courts of Equity are as ancient as the Kingdom it ſelf, and that the Chancery is a Fundamental Court, as well as that of the King's Bench and Common Pleas; for, ſaith he, all Kingdoms in their Conſtitution are endued with the Power of Juſtice, both according to the Rule of Law and Equity, both which being in the King as Sovereign, were after ſettled in ſeveral Courts. But Equity being oppoſite to Regular Law, is a ſpecial Truſt committed to the King; which he exerciſes by one whom 2Inſt.552. he appoints for that Office. But on the other ſide, Coke is as poſitive, That there was anciently no other Court in Chancery but of Common Law, and that the Chancellor was to adminiſter Juſtice according to the Common Law; and that Equity then was no more than doing Juſtice, and that whatever Notion of Equity hath been taken up ſince, is a Novel Invention, and no older than the Differences between the Houſes of York and Lancaſter.

Here we find a fundamental Difference between two great Perſons of the Law, concerning one of the greateſt Courts of the Kingdom. But I muſt obſerve that my Lord Cooke is not ſo conſiſtent with himſelf in 4Inſt 79. this Matter as the other is. For in another Place he ſaith, That Equity is a juſt Correction of the Law in ſome Caſes; and that Robert Paring, 15 E. 1. was made Lord Chancellor. What, to adminiſter Juſtice according to Law in that Court? No; but ſuch Equity, as was a Correction of the Law in ſome Caſes. How could this be, if this Notion of Equity were no older than H. 4.? But if it was neceſſary to have a juſt Correction of the Law in ſome Caſes in Point of Equity, then ſuch a Court was founded upon neceſſary Reaſon; and then the Common Law cannot not be the Supreme and Abſolute Rule; for then it were not capable of a juſt Correction in Point of Equity. But to ſpeak freely in this matter, I do not think it ſufficiently cleared by either of them. For Hobart is in the Right as to the Fundamental Conſtitution, that it implies a Power of doing Juſtice according to the Rules of Law and Equity: But then he doth not ſufficiently clear the Practice as to this Nation; which I think is very capable of being done; for,

(1.) In the Saxon times there was certainly a Court of Appeal from the Rigour of the Law, and from falſe Judgments; which were ſuch as were paſſed in the Hundred Courts, before the Eſtabliſhment of the Courts in Weſtminſter Hall; which all know, was not before the Time of E. 1. This Court of Appeal in Caſes of Equity, was then to the King in his Court of the Lords; as appears by the Laws of Edgar, Canutus, and Edward the Confeſſor.

(2.) After the Norman Conqueſt there were two Supreme Courts; one relating chiefly to the King's Revenue, which William I. brought out of Normandy, and had its Name of Exchequer from thence; in this the great Officers of State and other Barons ſat; the other was the Supreme Court of Juſtice, commonly called Curia Regis, where all greater Cauſes and Matters of Appeal were heard; and the King was not only often preſent, but there judged with his Miniſters and Lords ſitting in Court. This was then the Supreme Court both of Law and Equity.

(3.) After the Courts of Juſtice came to be for ſome time ſettled in Weſtminſter Hall, the King would ſtill have the Chancellor to attend his Perſon, with the Judges of the King's Bench. Artic. ſup. Chart. c. 5. 28. E. 1. This ſeems ſtrange; but my Lord Coke ſaith, That they all were required to attend the King about Matters of Law. Was there no occaſion for a juſt Correction of the Law in ſome Caſes then? And if there were, who ſo proper as the Chancellor, who was to moderate the Rigour of Law before that time, as appears by the Verſes of Thomas a Becket's being Chancellor by John Sariſburienſis. While the Curia Regis continued, the Chancellor had the great Direction in Appeals, as Chief Miniſter in that Court, as the Chief Juſticiary was in the other Court, and ſo Matters of Equity came to him, as Matters of Law to the Chief Juſticiary; whoſe Place was leſſen'd in its Power in the beginning of Edw. I. and after confined to a certain Place, called the King's Bench. (The Exchequer ſtill remaining as to the King's Revenue.) And the dividing of theſe Places was the Foundation of the two Courts of King's Bench and Chancery, as to Law and Equity, and the Supreme Court of Appeal remained in the Houſe of Lords, who ſucceeded the Curia Regis in that Point. For a Court of Appeal ſomewhere, is certainly a Part of our Conſtitution; and the King's giving Judgment by the Judgment of his Peers is in King Edward's Laws, and was therefore one of our moſt ancient Cuſtoms.

(4.) There being diſtinct Courts fixed for Law and Equity, it is no wonder, if they fell into different Methods of Proceedings, according to the Nature of Things. For Matters of Law require a ſtricter Proceeding; and the Oath of the Judges was to proceed ſtrictly, Secundum Legem & Conſuetudinem Regni, in the time of H. 3. and ſo in Fleta, and by this the general Oath, 18. & 20. E. 3. hath been interpreted and is ſtill ſo underſtood, as to bind the Judges at Common Law, to proceed according to the ſtrict Rules of it. Conſtitution of thoſe Courts, and the Cuſtom and long continued Courſe of it. But becauſe the Circumſtances of Actions, and the Nature of Contracts and Defect in Forms of Law do often require Relief, where the Common Law doth not give it; therefore, leſt there ſhould be a failure of Juſtice in ſuch Caſes, a Court of Equity, proceeding by other Methods, was neceſſary to be Eſtabliſhed and Continued.

Thus much I thought neceſſary to ſhew, how fatal the Conſequence will be, from ſuch a ſence of Magna Charta, as to Trial by Peers neceſſary in all Caſes, for it not only overthrows the Eccleſiaſtical Courts, but all others, which proceed not by the Methods of the Common Law.

Thus much in Anſwer to this great Objection; I now proceed,

II. To ſhew that the Eccleſiaſtical Laws ſtand on the ſame Bottom with other Parts of the Common Law of England, and that is Immemorial Cuſtom.

Preface to Rep. The Common Law of England, ſaith Sir John Davis, is nothing elſe but the Common Cuſtom of the Realm; and Cuſtom which hath obtained the Force of a Law is always ſaid to be Jus non Scriptum. The Law of England, ſaith my Lord Coke, conſiſts of three Parts. 1. Judicial Records. 2. Acts of Parliament. 3. Cuſtoms grounded upon Reaſon, and time out of 1 Inſt. 344. mind. 1 Inſt. 110. 6. Elſewhere he divides the Law into three Triangles, (he means Angles) and ſaith, that Cuſtom is one of the main Triangles of the Laws of England. And in another place, that the Laws of England conſiſt of three Parts; the Common Law, Cuſtoms, and Acts of Parliament. By Common Law here he means Judgments at Common Law; for otherwiſe Cuſtoms are owned by him to be part of the Common Law; and in another 1 Inſt. 11. 6. place he makes them to be a Law of England, but of a different ſort: For, among the Laws which obtain in England, he reckons, Common Law, Statute Law, and Cuſtoms Reaſonable, &c. And yet 1 Inſt. 115. 6. in another place he ſaith, General Cuſtom is part of the Common Law.

My Lord Chief Juſtice Hales in a MS. Diſcourſe of the Laws of England, ch. 4. ſpeaks more diſtinctly; for he ſaith, that there are three Principal Conſtituents of the Laws of England. And thoſe are, (1.) The common Uſage, and Cuſtom, and Practice of the Kingdom. (2.) The Authority of Parliament. (3.) Judicial Deciſions of Courts of Juſtice conſonant to one another in the Series and Succeſſion of Time. Now it cannot be denied, that the Method of Proceeding in the Eccleſiaſtical Courts hath been an Immemorial Cuſtom, and practiſed time out of mind here; and much longer and more conſtantly than of thoſe Feudal Cuſtoms which make ſo great a part of the Common Law. For it is certain that many of thoſe things which paſs for undoubted Parts of the Common Law of England, have not had ſuch a conſtant and uninterrupted Cuſtom, which the Eccleſiaſtical Proceedings have had. As (1.) The Tenures were not the ſame, after William I. that they were in the Saxon times: For although there was a ſort of Service due upon Thane-Lands; yet it was of a very different Nature from the Norman Knight-Service. The Bocland then was Land of Inheritance, but not under ſuch Reſtrictions, as the Feudal Tenures afterwards were. And there was Bocland in Free-Socage among the Saxons; which were Partible Eſtates, or Gavel kind, where there was a Diviſion as among Equals; but according to the Feudal Cuſtoms the Land deſcended to the Eldeſt, who was to do the Service. I cannot find ſufficient Evidence in Alfred's Laws, Laws, that the Service then carried with it Ward, Marriage and Relief; 1 Inſt. 76.

but I rather think they came in with the Norman Tenures; for they 6. 14. a.

or Writing, but by ſome Overt-Act tending to the Execution of his Intent.
But doth this Rule of Common Law hold in Caſe of Treaſon? No, he ſaith, before the Statute 25 E. 3. a Declaration of the Intent by Words or Writing was ſufficient, which he offers to prove from the ancient Books. Which are plain, that if the Deſign or Intention be well proved, Glan. l. 1.

of the Judges, was the true Reaſon of that famous Act of Parliament, as appears by the Parliament Rolls of that Year. Now if the Common Law of England be ſo certain and unchangeable a thing, as my Lord Cooke often affirms; how came the Judges to be ſo much to ſeek what was Treaſon at Common Law; for one would think they ſhould have known this the eaſieſt of any one Point, being a matter of ſo great conſequence; and which they had ſo often Occaſion to give Judgment in.
But the firſt Words of the Act are, Where is divers Opinions have been be- fore this time, in what Caſe Treaſon ſhall be ſaid and in what not. How came theſe divers Opinions in ſuch a Point of Common Law? But my Lord Cooke takes no notice of this, but only ſaith, that the Law is for the moſt part Declaratory of the ancient Law. How came the ancient Law to beget ſuch different Opinions, as to need ſuch a Declaration? And yet even his Declaratory Act hath not cleared the Doubts as to the Proof at Common Law. For he ſaith, that before Declaring by Words 4 Inſt. 5. 6. or Writing the inward Intention, was ſufficient Overture by Common Law.
And again, by all which is manifeſt, that Compaſſing, Machinating, Coun- ſelling, &c. to kill the King, though it hath no other Declaration but by Words, was High Treaſon at Common Law. But is the Common Law alter'd as to this or not by this Statute? It ſaith, the Perſon muſt be prove- ably attainted of the Overt-Act. But it doth not clear the meaning of an Overt-Act. He ſaith, it is an open Act which muſt be manifeſtly proved. This f. 12.
is

is not clearing the Point at all: For what is an open Act in this Caſe? Not every Act which can be proved, but ſuch an Act as manifeſtly proves the Intention. And after all, he confeſſes, that bare Words cannot do it without an Overt-Act; by which he ſeems to diſtinſtuiſh Words from an Overt-Act; but he adds, that if the Words be ſet down in writing by the Delinquent himſelf, this is a ſufficient Overt Act within this Statute. But how come Words not to be ſufficient without an Overt Act; and yet, when thoſe Words come to be written they become an Overt Act? The Words written are not the Overt Act, but the bare writing muſt make them ſo, or elſe they are no more an Overt Act than they were before, ſo that the Alteration of the Law, as to this matter, comes at laſt to this, that before the Act, the manifeſting the Intention by Words or Writing was ſufficient; but ſince Words when they are ſpoken are no Overt Acts, but if thoſe Words be written by the Party, then they become an Overt Act: But how far this is Law or not, I take not upon me to determine.

I only mention theſe things to ſhew, that there are ſeveral Material Points relating to the Common Law and Cuſtom, which are not ſo clear and ſatisfactory to all that enquire into them. And therefore, if there be any Difficulties ſtarted, as to the Eccleſiaſtical Laws, there is no Reaſon from thence to Reject them from being any Part of our Laws.

But it may be others will Object, that a meer Immemorial Cuſtom is no ſufficient Ground for Laws without Acts of Parliament to confirm them. I cannot imagine that any who pretend to underſtand the Common Law of England in any meaſure can make ſuch an Objection; but if they do, I need but to refer them to the Acts of Parliament already mention'd, which own and allow the Eccleſiaſtical Laws. But how comes an Immemorial Cuſtom to make a Law, ſince Time hath no Operation of it ſelf on Moral Things; therefore a Legiſlative Power muſt be ſuppoſed, or elſe a Cuſtom cannot paſs into a Law.

To this I anſwer, that there are two ways of making Things to paſs into Laws. 1. By the Expreſs Act of thoſe who have the Power to make Laws. 2. By the Tacit Conſent of thoſe who are to make Laws and to keep them. And thus, thoſe Things which are not paſſed at firſt, by ſuch who have the Legiſlative Power in them, may by a general Conſent become part of our Laws. As the Feudal Cuſtoms which had their Riſe abroad are become part of the Common Law of England; not by Acts of Parliament, but by a general Reception of them. And thus ſeveral Canons made out of our Land may become part of the Law of it; not by Virtue of that Foreign Power, but by their being ſo long Receiv'd and allow'd to paſs for Law among us. And ſo it is expreſſed in the Act of Parliament in theſe Words, 25 H. 8. 21. "For, where this your Realm recognizing no
" Superiour under God, hath been, and is free from Subjection to any " Man's Laws, but only to ſuch as have been deviſed, made and ob" tained within this Realm for the Wealth of the ſame; or to ſuch
" other, as by Sufferance of your Grace, and Progenitors the People of " this your Realm, have taken at their free Liberty by their own Con-
" ſent, to be uſed among them; and have bound themſelves by long
" Uſe and Cuſtom to the Obſervance of the ſame, not as to the Obſer-
" vance of the Laws of any Foreign Prince, Potentate or Prelate, but " as to the Cuſtomed and Ancient Laws of this Realm; originally E-

" ſtabliſhed as Laws of the ſame by the ſaid Sufferance, Conſents and ' Cuſtom, and none otherwiſe. Here we have three ſorts of Laws; (1.) Laws of the Realm made by our Kings, with Conſent and at the Deſire of the People. (2.) Foreign Laws made by ſuch Power as we have no Reaſon to ſubmit to. (3.) Foreign Rules, which are not Laws by the Authority which paſſed them, but by a general Conſent both of King and People in receiving them; and ſo they become Laws, not by the meer Acceptance of the People, nor by the bare Will of the Prince, but by a general Conſent of all thoſe who are concerned in the paſſing of Laws. So that whatever Canons were anciently made by Provincial Councils at home, and received by a general Conſent; or ſuch which have paſſed abroad, but have been here received, not by Virtue of Foreign Power, but by free Conſent, they do make up the more ancient part of the Eccleſiaſtical Laws of this Realm. And ſo, as my Lord Chief Juſtice Hales hath well obſerved, Uſe and Cuſtom among us generally receiv d doth obtinere vim Legis; and this is that which gives Power, ſometimes to the Canon Law, as in Eccleſiaſtical Courts; ſometimes to the Civil, as in the Admiral's Courts; and again controlls both, when they croſs other Cuſtoms which are receiv'd in this Kingdom.

MS. Hiſtory and Analyſis of the Common Law.

And in another Place he expreſſes his Mind more fully as to this matter, ch. 2. He divides the Law of the Land into Written Law, or Acts of Parliament, and Unwritten Law; under which he comprehends,

1. The Common Law, according to its uſual Acceptation, viz. that by which Proceedings and Determinations in the King's ordinary Courts of Juſtice are directed and guided.

2. Thoſe particular Laws which are applicable to particular Matters and Courts; by which he means the Laws Eccleſiaſtical and Civil, which although they be written Laws, yet he reckons them as unwritten, becauſe they lay no Obligation on us here, but as they are received and admitted in this Kingdom, either by Conſent of Parliament, or by immemorial Uſage and Acceptation in ſome particular Courts, Caſes and Matters, and no otherwiſe.

And after, treating of the Eccleſiaſtical Courts, he ſaith, They are either ſuch as were derived immediately from the King's Authority by Commiſſion, as the Court of High Commiſſion, &c. (2.) Such as were not ſo derived, but the Law of England had annexed to certain Offices Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction as incident to them: Thus every Biſhop, by his Election and Confirmation, even before Conſecration, had Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction annexed to his Office, as Judex Ordinarius within his Dioceſe; and divers Abbots anciently, and moſt Arch-deacons at this Day, by Uſage, had the like Juriſdiction within certain Limits and Precincts.

But he adds, that although the ordinary Juriſdiction of the Biſhop is annexed to his Office, yet in foro exteriori it is derived from the Crown of England.

And although, ſaith he, the Proceſs runs in the Name, and under the Seal of the Biſhops, yet that is no Impediment but that their Juriſdiction is derived from the Crown; for till the Statute 27 H. 8. the Proceſs in Counties Palatine run in the Names of the Counts Palatine, yet no Man ever doubted but the Palatine Juriſdiction was derived from the Crown.

1 Inſt. 344. The Eccleſiaſtical Laws, ſaith my Lord Chief Juſtice Coke, are thoſe which are allow'd by the Laws of the Realm, viz. which are not againſt the Common Law (whereof the King's Prerogative is a principal part) nor againſt the Statutes and Cuſtoms of the Realm, and regularly according to ſuch Eccleſiaſtical Laws, the Ordinary and other Eccleſiaſtical Judges do proceed in Cauſes within their Conuſance; and this Juriſdiction was ſo bounded by the ancient Common Laws of the Realm, and ſo declared by 1 Inſt. 11. 4 Inſt. 321. Act of Parliament. And in other Places he owns the Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction and Laws; but ſtill ſaith, that they are bounded by the Laws of the Realm. Of which there is no Queſtion. Of Juriſdictions, ſaith Proœm. to 4 Inſt. he in his Preface to 4 Inſt. ſome be Eccleſiaſtical, and ſome Civil and Temporal. Of both theſe, ſome be Primitive or Ordinary; ſome derivate or de- 1 Inſt. 96. legate by Commiſſion. For deciding Controverſies, and for diſtribution of Juſtice within this Realm, there be, ſaith he in another place, two diſtinct Juriſdictions; the one Eccleſiaſtical, limited to certain Spiritual and Particular Caſes; the other Secular and General, for that it is guided by the Common and General Law of the Kingdom.

4 Inſt. 321. But doth he not ſay, That thoſe who have Spiritual Juriſdiction, as Arch-biſhops, Biſhops, Deans, &c. are the King's Judges within his Realm, and that this may be proved from our Books?

Who goes about to deny this? For as Judge Hales ſaid, in Foro Exteriori the Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction is derived from the Crown; and therefore they may be properly enough called the King's Judges. But he doth not ſay, the Kings, as ſuch, have Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction, which he never thought. For ſaith he, of what things the Clergy have Juriſdiction, is evident in our Books, whereof there is no Queſtion. And certain it is that this Kingdom hath been beſt governed, and Peace and Quiet beſt preſerved when both Parties, i. e. when the Juſtice of the Temporal Courts and the Eccleſiaſtical Judges have kept themſelves within their proper Juriſdiction, without incroaching or uſurping one upon another.

Did not the Biſhops before the Reformation derive their Spiritual Juriſdiction from the Pope? How then could my Lord Coke prove by good Authority from the old Books, that they were the King's Judges?

I anſwer that the Juriſdiction then was two-fold.

1. Delegate and Extraordinary, which they had by particular Commiſſion, and this they had from the Pope, whom they look'd on as Supreme Ordinary; and therefore he might in particular Caſes be the Fountain of Juriſdiction to them.

2. Ordinary and Common; and this had by virtue of their Office, and was not derived from the Pope, but annexed to their Office by the Law of the Land as to Exteriour Juriſdiction; and therefore, on that Account, they might even then be look'd on as the King's Judges. But in matters of Ordinary Juriſdiction, if they exceed their Bounds, they are ſaid to offend againſt the Crown and Royal Dignity, when they draw things ad aliud examen, therefore only the Temporal Juriſdiction is by our Law, derived from the Crown. In the Biſhop's Ordinary Juriſdiction, theſe things are to be diſtinguiſhed. 1. The Original Right belonging to his Office; which we do not pretend to be derived from the Crown, but from the Fountain of Spiritual Juriſdiction, the Founder and Head of the Church. 2. The Authority to execute ſuch a Juriſdiction within the Realm, and the Rules and Meaſures of doing it; and this is derived from the Laws of the Land; which have given ſuch Authority, and fixed thoſe Bounds; and therefore to tranſgreſs them is an Offence againſt the Crown and Royal Dignity.

Did not the Kings of this Realm, in the very Forms of Prohibitions, challenge only Temporal Cauſes as belonging to their Crown and Dignity? How then could the Judges in Eccleſiaſtical Cauſes derive their Juriſdiction from the Crown?

The King's Crown and Royal Dignity may be conſider'd two ways. 1. As to what was of Right belonging to it; and ſo all external Juriſdiction doth. 2. As in Fact our Kings had limited their own juſt Authority, and given too much leave to the Pope to uſurp upon them. And this being inconſiſtent with the inherent Rights of the Crown, the Pope's uſurped Power was juſtly caſt off, and then the ancient Right returned. And it is to be obſerved, that the main Encroachments and Uſurpations of the Popes were in Points of extraordinary Juriſdiction; as in Caſes of Diſpenſations, Commendams, Proviſions, Appeals, &c. But even theſe were not carried without many Rubs and Difficulties by the Laws of the Land, as appears by the Statutes of Proviſors and Præmunire, which were no more than neceſſary. For after the Popes came to Avignon, they were more greedy than when they enjoy'd the Profits of the whole See of Rome, and were farther from England. They then bethought themſelves of a new Invention, which was very profitable to them. Being Spiritual Head of the Church, was a thing of great Sound, but of little Advantage; but the new Device was, to make themſelves a kind of Feudal Lords over the Benefices of the Church. For they found that the old Fees were called Beneficia; and ſo they made a pretty artificial Turn of the Churches Benefices into Eccleſiaſtical Fees held of the Pope as Chief Lord. Boniface 8. in the time of E. 1. firſt ſtarted the Doctrine of the Pope's Univerſal and Abſolute Dominion in Beneficiary Matters, but he was vehemently oppoſed. But his Succeſſors meeting with fairer Opportunities, and being upon better Terms with Princes, by Degrees ſet up and exerciſed this kind of Feudal Authority in Benefices. And as the conſequence of this Doctrine, the Pope challenged the Firſt Fruits, as a Year's Profits on the Beneficiary Fee to the chief Lord. This was demanded here in England then; but the Parliament at Carliſle put it into their Complaints as a thing before unheard of, and therefore forbad the Pope's Officers to gather them, 35 E. 1. And ſo this Buſineſs fell for the preſent; but after the Popes came to Avignon, they inſiſted more ſtrictly upon the Payment of Annates, or Firſt Fruits. John 22. owned the Demand, and goes about to defend it from their preſent Neceſſities; but to ſhew their Moderation, he ſaith, That they took but one Year's Profits at a reaſonable Valuation, as appears by the Bull it ſelf, which only mentions a Moiety of the firſt Year's Profits, where the Taxation was not deliver'd into the Pope's Exchequer before.

Fagnanus, a late Canoniſt, ſaith, that the full value was never exacted by the Pope; but the Taxation of Boniface is follow'd at Rome. But Platina ſaith, his Demand of Firſt Fruits was rejected in England, except only for Biſhopricks and Abbies; and Fagnanus confeſſes, That the inferiour Clergy did not here pay that Moiety. But the Pope ſtill inſiſted on the Firſt Fruits as their due, according to ſuch a Taxation as was then receiv'd; but even that would not go down with the Councils of that time. In the Council of Vienne, it was propoſed, That the Pope ſhould have a twentieth part in lieu of them; but they were then afraid both would have been put upon them, for then the Firſt Fruits were a diſcharge from any Payments afterwards, the Rule being Impo-

In the Council of Conſtance, Tenths were abſolutely forbidden; but the Annats were kept up as far as the Pope's Power prevailed, notwithſtanding that the Council of Baſil and the Pragmatick Sanction had condemned them. Pius II. publiſhed a Bull to deprive Perſons of their Benefices who did not pay their Annats; and it appears by his Epiſtle to Meyerus, they made them pay them at Rome before Poſſeſſion. Here in England they went down very hardly, as appears by the Complaints in Parliament about them, 25 E. 3. c. 1. 47 E. 3. 51 E. 3. 4 R. 2. 6 R. 2. 10 R. 2. 6 H. 4. 1. But after all, the Pope's Intereſt prevailed, and Firſt Fruits and Tenths were both paid, until, for better Reaſon, they were ſettled on the Crown, in the ſame Manner as they had been paid before, as appears by the Statute 1 Eliz. c. 4. n. 22. where the ſame Eſtate, Title and Quantity is mention'd, which was ſettled on H. 8. When the Popes would have raiſed them above the accuſtomed Payment, the Parliament would not hear of it, 6 H. 4. c. 1. For they look'd on the Payment but as an Acknowledgment, and not as any valuable Conſideration; and therefore ought not to be ſtretched to the full Value. By the Statute Weſt. Quia Emptores terrarum, Payment was to be made Secundum Quantitatem: In Marſh and Jones his Caſe, the Queſtion was, whether it was the value at that time, or the improved value ſince, and it was reſolved that it was to be taken as at that time. And ſo 17 E. 2. the King was to have a Year's value of the Leonard C. 163. 114. Tenants in Capite at firſt Admiſſion; but it turned to a cuſtomary Payment, and not at the full value. But this was not all the Advantage the Popes challenged by this new Device; for Benedict 12. who ſucceeded John 22. at Avignon by his Bull, A. D. 1335. makes a Reſervation to himſelf, among many other Preferments, of all ſuch as ſhould be void by Promotion; which, as the Canoniſts tell us, was then look'd on as only the Change of a Life in a Feudal Eſtate, of which the Lord of the Mannor may expect an Advantage, becauſe he promotes the Perſon whom the Patron had preſented. But becauſe the Pope had a Power of diſpenſing with the Canons, which made one Benefice void by accepting another, therefore when he pleaſed he prevented the Avoidance, upon a Promotion by a Diſpenſation before-hand; and ſo it paſſed into a Commendam, as it was then called. And by his abſolute Power he gave away the beſt Preferments before they were void, which was called by Proviſion. Theſe things were often complained of, and many Acts of Parliament were made againſt them, which were very little regarded, for the Pope went on, and exerciſed this extravagant Power as he thought fit. But ſometimes they met with Rubs in Point of Law, as in the Caſe of the Biſhop of St. David's, 11 H. 4. where the main Point urged againſt the Pope's Power was, that it overthrew the Law of the Land, which voids a Benefice upon Conſecration. No, ſaid the other ſide, here is no Avoidance, for the Pope prevented it by a Diſpenſation before-hand. But in the Biſhop of Wincheſter's Caſe, 4 H. 6. the Diſpenſation coming too late, his Biſhoprick was declared void by accepting the Cardinalſhip before it. But the Practice of theſe things continued till H. 8. reſtored the ancient Rights of the Crown, by caſting off the Pope's Uſurped Power; by the Statutes made 25 H. 8. wherein the King is declared Supreme Head of the Church. But a Doubt ſtill remained about ſuch Privileges which the Pope had challenged as Head of the Church, and been in quiet Poſſeſſion of, as particularly Firſt Fruits and Tenths; and theſe being no an-ancient Right of the Crown were ſettled upon the King by Act of Parliament 26 H. 8. 3. And the Power of Diſpenſation in ſeveral Caſes; 25 H. 8. 21. 28 H. 8.

But ſtill there remained ſome Perquiſites of the Head of the Church, which were not provided for by theſe Statutes as beſtowing Benefices by Right of Promotion, granting Commendams, giving Commiſſions of Review, &c. As to theſe, there is nothing expreſly mention'd; but by the Statute 26. H. 8. 1. it is enacted, that the King ſhall have and enjoy, annexed and united to the Imperial Crown of this Realm, as well the Stile and Title of Supreme Head of the Church of England, as all Honours, Dignities, Preeminences, Juriſdictions, Privileges, Authorities, Immunities, Profits and Commodities to the ſaid Dignity of Supreme Head of the ſame Church belonging and appertaining. Now the Queſtion is, what is underſtood by all theſe Words; Whether only ſuch things which of Right belong to the Crown; and theſe were already Reſtored by his being Recognized as Head of the Church; or whether ſuch other Privileges and Commodities, as the Pope had peaceably and actually Enjoy'd as Head of the Church? which ſeems the more probable Opinion, becauſe the Crown hath ſince Enjoy'd the ſame Privileges as to Right of Promotion, Commendams and Commiſſions of Review; which ſhews that they were then ſo underſtood, and have continued ever ſince; although there have been ſome, who have been unſatiſfied about them; but their Authority is of no Weight, compared with the General Opinion and Practice ſince the time of making theſe Statutes.

It is another Point, whether the Kings of England had not theſe Privileges of Right before; and ſome Authorities are produced to prove it, but it cannot be denied that the General Practice and the Prevailing Opinion had been otherwiſe; and there was not ſo great Evidence, as to overthrow the Pope's Uſurpations from the Contrary Cuſtom; therefore the cleareſt Reſolution as to theſe Matters is, that they are Eſtabliſhed in the Crown by the Statute, 26 H. 8. 1. and the conſequent Practice, even in the time of H. 8. and ſo continued to this Day.

There are two things ſaid by Coke upon theſe Matters which ought not to be paſſed over.

(1.) That it is apparent by many Authorities, that the King (before the Reformation) had no ſuch Prerogative, as to Preſent in Right of Promotion; but that he did it on the Account of the Temporalties being in his Hands; or on the Account of Wardſhip, &c. 4 Inſt. 357.

(2.) That in the Caſe of the Commiſſion of Review, he ſaith, that ſuch Authority as the Pope had claiming as Supreme Head, doth of Right belong to the Crown, and is annexed thereunto by the Statutes, 26 H. 8. 1. & 1 Eliz. 1. and ſo it was Reſolved in the King's Bench 39 Eliz. after a ſolemn Debate in Holingworth's Caſe. 4 Inſt. 341.

Thus I have endeavour'd to clear, as well as I could, the Nature of the Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction among us, and the Laws on which it is founded.

THis Diſcourſe concerning the Illegality of the late Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſion, was written when the Author of it was ſummoned to appear before it; and was in continual Expectation of undergoing its Cenſure, for not complying with the Orders of it. This put him upon an Enquiry into the Grounds on which it ſtood.

From whence he proceeded to ſearch into the True Notion of the Legal Supremacy; and finding it very imperfectly ſet down in the famous Fifth Report, De Jure Regis Eccleſiaſtico, he took the Pains to Examine it through every Reign, there mentioned; and upon the whole Matter he finds him and his Adverſary F. And it is hardly poſſible to ſettle the* Notion of it aright without conſidering the Practice of other Countries, as well as our own: Of both which the Reader will find a ſhort but impartial Account; which I believe the Author could more eaſily have inlarged, than have brought it into ſo narrow a Compaſs.

By this, I hope the World will ſee, That it was not Humour or Faction, but a real and well grounded Diſſatisfaction, which made thoſe of the Church of England oppoſe the Proceedings of that Time; and that ſuch have as great and real a Zeal for the Ancient and Legal Conſtitution of our Government, as thoſe who make a greater Noiſe and Clamour about it; and that, not upon any new Notions or Phraſes, but upon the very ſame Grounds which our Anceſtors made uſe of; and carry in them the true Baſis of our Engliſh Government. It is poſſible ſome worthy Men may have carried ſome Notions beyond our Legal Conſtitution; but the more they ſearch into it, the better Opinion they will have of it. Which, I think, is ſo well ſettled, that every Deviation from it tends to our Ruin.

As to the Diſpenſing Power, the Author hath inlarged that Part, ſince ſome late Diſcourſes have been publiſhed, both for and againſt it. He hath neglected nothing which hath been moſt plauſibly pleaded for it; but hath given a full Anſwer to the moſt material Inſtances which have been inſiſted on, in behalf of it. And after all, I cannot but conclude, That the Diſpenſing Power is a kind of Mental Reſervation, which quite alters the Meaning and Deſign of a Law.

When the late Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſion was ſuperſeded (if not diſſolved) the Author laid by theſe Papers as Uſeleſs, but having communicated them to one particular Friend, (whoſe Judgment and Authority he had a great Regard to) he hath been prevailed with by him, to make them Publick at this Time: It being ſtill neceſſary to ſhew, with what Juſtice and Reaſon, we refuſed to own the Juriſdiction of it. And it ſeems to me as hard to reconcile it to our Laws as Liberty of Conſcience to the Principles of Popery, or the Worſhip of Images to the Second Commandment.

DISCOURSE II.

CHAP. I.

The State of the Queſtion concerning the Court of the late Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſion.

The Caſe ſtands thus,

BY the Act of 1 Eliz. 1. it was eſtabliſhed and enacted, That ſuch Juriſdictions, Privileges, Superiorities and Preheminencies, Spiritual and Eccleſiaſtical, as by any Spiritual or Eccleſiaſtical Power or Authority, have heretofore been or may lawfully be exerciſed or uſed for the Viſitation of the Eccleſiaſtical State and Perſons, and for Reformation, Order and Correction of the ſame, and of all manner of Errors, Hereſies, Schiſms, Abuſes, Offences, Contempts and Enormities, ſhall for ever by this preſent Parliament, be United and Annexed to the Imperial Crown of this Realm.

And that the Kings and Queens of this Realm ſhall have full Power and Authority by virtue of this Act by Letters Patents under the great Seal of England, to Aſſign, Name and Authorize, when, and as often as they ſhall think meet and convenient, and for ſuch and ſo long time as they ſhall think meet to exerciſe, uſe, occupy and execute all manner of Juriſdictions, Privileges and Preheminences in any wiſe, touching or concerning any Spiritual or Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction within theſe Realms; and to viſit, reform, redreſs, order, correct and amend all ſuch Errors, Hereſies, Schiſms, Abuſes, Offences, Contempts and Enormities whatſoever, which by any manner of Spiritual or Eccleſiaſtical Power, Authority or Juriſdiction, can or may lawfully be reformed, ordered, redreſſed, corrected, reſtrained or amended to the Pleaſure of Almighty God, the increaſe of Virtue, and the conſervation of the Peace and Unity of this Realm: And that ſuch Perſon and Perſons ſo to be Named, Authorized and appointed after the ſaid Letters Patents to him or them made and delivered, ſhall have full Power and Authority, by Virtue of this Act, and of the ſaid Letters Patents to exerciſe, uſe and execute all the Premiſes, according to the Tenour and Effect of the ſaid Letters Patents, any Matter or Cauſe to the contrary, in any wiſe, notwithſtanding.

But in the Act 17 Car. 1. c. 11. after the recital of this latter Clauſe, theſe Words follow, And whereas by colour of ſome Words in the aforeſaid Branch of the ſaid Act, whereby Commiſſioners are Authorized to execute their Commiſſion, according to the Tenour and Effect of the King's Letters Patents, and by Letters Patents grounded thereupon the ſaid Commiſſioners have, to the great and unſufferable Wrong and Oppreſſion of the King's Subjects, uſed to fine and impriſon them, and to exerciſe Authority not belonging to Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction reſtored by that Act; and divers other great Miſchiefs and Inconveniencies have alſo enſued to the King's Subjects by occaſion of the ſaid Branch and Commiſſions iſſued thereupon, and the Executions thereof; therefore for the Repreſſing and Preventing of the aforeſaid Abuſes, Miſchiefs and Inconveniencies in time to come, Be it enacted by the King's Moſt Excellent Majeſty, and the Lords and Commons in this preſent Parliament aſſembled, and by the Authority of the ſame, That the aforeſaid Branch, Clauſe, Article or Sentence ſhall from henceforth be repealed, annulled, revoked, annihilated and made void for ever, any thing in the ſaid Act to the contrary, in any wiſe, notwithſtanding.

Then after a Clauſe relating to ordinary Juriſdiction, repealed 13 Car. 2. c. 12. the Act concludes thus, And be it further Enacted, That from and after the ſaid firſt Day of Auguſt, no new Court ſhall be erected, ordained or appointed within this Realm of England, or Dominion of Wales, which ſhall or may have the like Power, Juriſdiction or Authority, as the ſaid High Commiſſion Court now hath or pretendeth to have, but that all and every ſuch Letters Patents, Commiſſions and Grants made or to be made by his Majeſty, his Heirs and Succeſſors; and all Powers and Authorities granted or pretended, or mentioned to be granted thereby, and all Acts, Sentences and Decrees to be made by virtue or colour thereof, ſhall be utterly void and of none effect.

By the Act, 13 Car. 2. c. 12. This Repeal ſtands good in the firſt Proviſo; and in the ſecond Clauſe, where that which concerns ordinary Juriſdiction, is repealed, an Exception is put in, in theſe Words, Excepting what concerns the High-Commiſſion-Court or the new erecting ſome ſuch like Court by Commiſſion.

The Caſe which ariſes from hence, is, Whether theſe Acts of Parliament only take away the Power of Fining and Impriſoning, from any Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſion granted by the King; ſo that notwithſtanding theſe Repeals, the King may ſtill conſtitute a Commiſſion proceeding by Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures: And for the ſame Ends which are expreſly mentioned in the Statute repealed, viz. To exerciſe, uſe, occupy and execute all manner of Juriſdictions, Privileges and Preheminences, in any wiſe touching or concerning any Spiritual or Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction within this Realm of England, and Dominion of Wales, and to viſit, reform, order, correct and amend all Abuſes, Offences, Contempts and Enormities whatſoever, which by the Spiritual and Eccleſiaſtical Law of this Realm, can or may lawfully be reformed, ordered, redreſſed, corrected, reſtrained, or amended, to the Pleaſure of Almighty God, the Increaſe of Vertue, and the Conſervation of the Peace and Unity of this Realm. Theſe are the Powers of the preſent Commiſſion, and are the ſame which are mentioned in the Act of Repeal, 17 Car. 1. c. 11. only Errors, Hereſies and Schiſms, being left out.

It cannot be denied, That the Power of Fining and Impriſoning, is moſt expreſly taken away, and that is aſſigned as one Reaſon and Occaſion of repealing the Clauſe of 1 Eliz. 1. which eſtabliſhes the Court; but I cannot be ſatisfied, that this was all that was intended by the Act 17 Car. 1. c. 11. And that for theſe Reaſons:

1. If no more had been intended, then it had been ſufficient to have deſtroyed the Letters Patents, by which the Power of Fining and Impriſoning was granted, without mentioning the Act of Parliament, which gives no ſuch Power. But the Act of Repeal, 17 Car. 1. c. 12. begins with the Act of Parliament: Whereas in the Parliament holden in the firſt Year of Queen Eliz. there was an Act made and eſtabliſhed, &c. In which Act, among other things, there is contained one Clauſe, Branch, Article or Sentence, whereby it was enacted to this Effect, &c. Then follows all the enacting Clauſe; and after it, the Abuſes of the Power by the Letters Patents are reckoned up, viz. Fining and Impriſoning, and other great Miſchiefs and Inconveniences: Therefore, for the repreſſing and preventing of them, not merely the Power to fine and impriſon, but the whole Clauſe, and all things contained in it, are from thenceforth repealed, annulled, revoked, annihilated, and utterly made void for ever. What need all this, if no more were deſigned than to take away the Power of Fining and Impriſoning.

It is plauſibly argued by the Lord Coke, That the Power to Fine and Impriſon was not agreeable to the Deſign of the Act. 1. Becauſe the Title of it is, An Act reſtoring to the Crown the ancient Juriſdiction; but the ancient Juriſdiction Eccleſiaſtical had not a Power to Fine and Impriſon, but proceeded only by Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures. 2. Becauſe the Power to reform, order and correct all Errors, Hereſies, &c. was to be ſuch as may be lawfully reformed, corrected, reſtrained or amended by any Manner of Spiritual, Eccleſiaſtical Power, Authority or Juriſdiction, which did not extend to Fine and Impriſonment. 3. The Tenor of the Letters Patents was to exerciſe, uſe and execute all the Premiſes. Since therefore the Premiſes go no farther than Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction, the Letters Patents could give no ſuch Power, being in purſuance of the Act. But it is agreed, ſaith he, That before this Act no Man could be puniſhed by Fine and Impriſonment by any Eccleſiaſtical Power, unleſs it were by force of ſome Act of Parliament. But becauſe the Act ſaith, They are to uſe aad execute all the Premiſes according to the Tenor and Effect of the Letters Patents. Others have thought, That the Power to Fine and Impriſon being within the Letters Patents, the Act of Parliament did bear them out in purſuing what was in the Tenor of them.

4 Inſt. f. 325.

But in my Opinion, this Matter ought to be a little further cleared; and therefore we muſt diſtinguiſh between the Original Commiſſion, and the Supplemental Power, added to enforce it. The Original Commiſſion extended no farther than Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction, as is plain from the reading of the Statute; and that of it ſelf could go no further than Eccleſiaſtical Cenſure. But becauſe of the Circumſtance of that Time, when (as the Lord Hobart, in a MS. Diſcourſe of the High Commiſſion, obſerves) The Perſons moſt concerned did ſlight the Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures; therefore it was thought neceſſary, in the Letters Patents, to grant them a new Commiſſion to enforce the former, and that extended to Fine and Impriſonment; for in the High Commiſſion for the Province of York, (which is preſerved) diſtinct Powers are granted, which are not in the Act. For whereas the Act goes no further than the Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction, the Commiſſion gives them Power to proceed after another manner than by Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures; for the Words are, Contumaces tumaces autem & Rebelles, ſi quos invenerint, tam per Cenſuras Eccleſiaſticas, quam Perſonarum apprehenſionem, & Incarcerationem, &c. ac quacunque alia Juris Regni noſtri Remedia compeſcendum, &c. Here we ſee plainly a Conjunction of the Power of Common Law added to that of the High Commiſſion, by virtue of the Act of Parliament, and ſo in all probability it was in the Letters Patents for the High Commiſſion in this Province, which bore equal Date with the former.

And although the Date of the High Commiſſion was before the Depriving of the Biſhops, 1 Eliz. Yet I ſee no ground for my Lord Coke's Aſſertion, which the Defendant takes for granted, p. 13. That this Commiſſion was firſt granted for depriving the Popiſh Biſhops, and that about Twenty were deprived by it; whereas in Fact, there were but Fourteen deprived, and that for not doing what they had done before in Henry the 8th's Time, viz. for refuſing to take the Oath of Supremacy, which they had all taken in the time of H. 8. And as far as I can learn, they were not deprived by the High Commiſſion, but by a particular Commiſſion for that purpoſe, as appears by the beſt Account we have of it in the Hiſtorians who lived neareſt the time. In the Month of July, ſays Stow, the old Biſhops of England then living were called and examined by certain of the Queen's Majeſty's Council, where the Biſhops of York, Ely, and London, with others, to the Number of Thirteen or Fourteen, for refuſing to take the Oath touching the Queen's Supremacy, and other Articles, were deprived from their Biſhopricks. What he means by the other Articles, I know not; for there ſeem to be no other at that time for which they could be deprived by Law, but refuſing the Oath of Supremacy, (and ſo much Saunders himſelf owns) for the other faults were not puniſhable with deprivation. The Biſhops being deprived by a ſpecial Commiſſion of the Council, then, ſaith Stow, Commiſſioners were appointed for all England: For London, Sir Richard Sackvile, Dr. Horn, Dr. Huick and Mr. Savage, who called before them divers Perſons of every Pariſh, and ſwore them to enquire and preſent upon certain Injunctions. With him Hollingſhead agrees, only adding, That theſe Commiſſioners were ſent according to an Act paſſed, and confirmed laſt Parliament.

Sand. de Schiſ. 4. 157.

This was the Act for the High Commiſſion, which then extended to particular Pariſhes, with ſuch Powers of the Common Law as are already mentioned, but are not of the Eſſence of the Commiſſion according to the Act of Parliament, and therefore the taking away thoſe additional Powers doth not deſtroy the High Commiſſion, but the repealing the Act of Parliament, on which it was built, takes away any ſuch Court-Proceeding by Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures.

To make this more plain by a Parallel Inſtance: The Court of Star-Chamber was taken away at the ſame time the High Commiſſion was, and both determined the ſame day, 17 Car. 1. Aug. 1.

This Court was erected for extraordinary Civil Juriſdiction, as the High Commiſſion was for Spiritual; but by the Act 17 Car. 1. c. 10. it was taken away much in the ſame manner with the Court of High Commiſſion: For there is a Recital of the Statutes on which it was grounded, 3 H. 7. c. 1. 21 H. 8. c. 20. And then it is alledged, That they had exceeded the Bounds which the Law had given them, in theſe Words; But the ſaid Judges have not kept themſelves to the Points limited by the ſaid Statute, but have undertaken to puniſh where no Law doth warrant, and to make Decrees for things having no ſuch Authority, and to inflict heavier vier Puniſhments than by any Law is warranted. And ſo, by this very ſame way of Reaſoning which the Vindicator uſes, another Court of Star-Chamber may be ſet up, if it keeps it ſelf within the Bounds of the Statutes. But we are not to judge of the force of a Law by the particular Reaſon aſſigned, but by the Enacting Clauſe: Be it Ordained and Enacted by the Authority of this preſent Parliament, That the ſaid Court, commonly called the Star-Chamber, and all Juriſdictions, Power and Authority belonging unto, or exerciſed in the ſame Court, &c. be from the firſt of Auguſt, 1641. clearly and abſolutely diſſolved, taken away and determined. If another Star-Chamber cannot be ſet up with ſome Limitation for extraordinary Civil Juriſdictions, how can another Eccleſiaſtical Court for extraordinary Juriſdiction, which is taken away after the ſame manner? Only the Act againſt the High Commiſſion is more expreſs in the Concluſion againſt Setting up any other Court with like Power, Juriſdiction or Authority; for it was then foreſeen, that ſome other Court might be ſet up with ſome Alterations; and to prevent any thing of that Nature, the laſt Clauſe was annexed.

2. The prohibiting Clauſe, 17 Car. 1. c. 11. is very conſiderable to the purpoſe. For the Force of the former Act was taken away by the Repealing Clauſe; but that was not thought ſufficient to prevent another Court riſing up, which might be like to it. A Court may be like, although not altogether the ſame: It may be like in Juriſdiction, although not in a Power to fine and impriſon. But the Act ſaith, That no new Court ſhall be erected which ſhall or may have the like Power, Juriſdiction or Authority, as the ſaid High Commiſſion now hath, or pretendeth to have; but that all and every ſuch Letters Patents made or to be made by his Majeſty or Succeſſors, and all Powers and Authorities granted, or pretended, or mentioned to be granted thereby; and all Acts, Sentences and Decrees to be made by virtue or colour thereof, ſhall be utterly void, and of none effect. Was all this meant only of ſuch a Court as ſhould proceed to Fine and Impriſon? Why was not this ſet down in as plain a manner as ſuch a Law required? But we are to obſerve,

1. It not only voids the Letters Patents, but declares the Conſtitution of the Court it ſelf to be illegal; but that doth not depend upon the Power to Fine and Impriſon. If it had been ſaid, No new Court ſhall be erected with a Power to Fine and Impriſon, the Matter had been clear; for a new Court might have been erected proceeding by Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures, without a Power to Fine and Impriſon. But the Act takes no notice here of any ſuch Power, but abſolutely forbids any Court with the like Power, Juriſdiction, or Authority. Had the High Commiſſion no Power, Juriſdiction or Authority, but only to Fine and Impriſon? Their Power and Authority by Act of Parliament was general, to reform Abuſes, &c. In caſe there had been no ſuch Clauſe as Fining and Impriſoning in the Letters Patents, had there been no Court, no Power, Juriſdiction or Authority belonging to it? If then there be a Power, Juriſdiction or Authority of a High Commiſſion Court, without a Power to Fine and Impriſon, then all ſuch Power and Authority is taken away by the prohibiting Clauſe.

2. It forbids the Juriſdiction of ſuch a Court: But Juriſdiction is quite another thing from a Power to Fine and Impriſon. Juriſdiction, ſaith Bracton, is Authoritas judicandi, ſive juris dicendi inter partes; and to the ſame purpoſe Fleta: They both diſtinguiſh two kinds of Juriſdiction, Eccleſiaſtical and Civil. Eccleſiaſtical, ſaith Bracton, is that

which belongs to Eccleſiaſtical Cauſes; which ſhews, That they looked
l. 36. §. 5. on Eccleſiaſtical Proceedings by Cenſures as part of the Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction. The firſt General Exception, ſaith Fleta, is againſt the Juriſdiction of a Court, which is allowed to be made to thoſe quibus deficit authoritas judicandi. From hence it appears, That the Power and Authority of meddling in Eccleſiaſtical Cauſes, is that which is implied in the Juriſdiction of the Court; if it hath no Juriſdiction it is no Court; if it have Juriſdiction, it is void in Law; for the Act of Parliament takes away all Power, Juriſdiction and Authority, from any ſuch Court.

3. The Explanatory Act, 13 Car. 2. c. 12. makes this more evident; for there being a Clauſe inſerted, 17 Car. 1. c. 11. which ſeemed to take away the ordinary Juriſdiction of the Eccleſiaſtical Courts, it was thought fit to make that Act on purpoſe to clear that Matter, by repealing that Clauſe. But that Clauſe being part of the Act which took away the High Commiſſion Court, leſt by ſuch Repeal the Act it ſelf ſhould be thought repealed, therefore there is only an Exception put in, not barely as to the old High Commiſſion, but as to the new erecting ſome ſuch like Court by Commiſſion. And a particular Proviſo is added, That neither this Act, nor any thing herein contained, ſhall extend or be conſtrued to revive or give force to the ſaid Branch of the ſaid Statute, made in the ſaid firſt Year of the Reign of the ſaid late Queen Elizabeth, mentioned in the ſaid Act of Parliament, made in the ſeventeenth Year of the Reign of the ſaid King Charles; but that the ſaid Branch of the ſaid Statute made in the ſaid firſt Year of the Reign of the ſaid late Queen Elizabeth, ſhall ſtand and be repealed in ſuch ſort, as if this Act had never been made. Now it ought to be conſidered, That even this Parliament doth not fix upon the Power to Fine and Impriſon, to take that away; but upon the Original Clauſe in the Act, which gave Power to erect ſuch a Court. And this Parliament was zealous to aſſert the Ordinary Juriſdiction, and as zealous to prevent any ſuch extraordinary Juriſdictions as was in the High Commiſſion; which it ſhewed, by continuing the Repeal of that Power by which it was eſtabliſhed.

CHAP. II.

The King's Supremacy by Common Law, enquired into; Coke's fifth Report, de Jure Regis Eccleſiaſtico, examined.

Defence of Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſion, p. 8, 9.

BUT againſt this it is pleaded with ſome Appearance of Reaſon, That in Caudry's Caſe the Judges reſolved, That the Act of the firſt Year of the late Queen was not introductory of a new Law, but declaratory of the old; and that the King by the ancient Law might make ſuch an Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſion. And ſince the Act 13 Car. 2. c. 12. ſaith, That we are not to abridge or diminiſh the King's Supremacy in Eccleſiaſtical Matters and Affairs: Therefore we are ſtill to ſuppoſe, That the King hath a Power by Law to appoint ſuch a Commiſſion for Eccleſiaſtical Matters.

This is the Subſtance of what is pleaded for the Legality of the Court: And ſince the Argument is confined to Matter of Law, to clear this Matter, it will be neceſſary to give an account of theſe two things,

I. What the Ancient Law was to this Matter.

II. How far the Legal Supremacy is abridged by theſe Statutes.

I. As to the Ancient Law in this matter, It's true that the Lord Coke, in Caudry's Caſe hath endeavoured to prove, That the Statute, 1 Eliz. was not introductory of a New Law, but declaratory of the Old; but the Inſtances he produces fall very ſhort of being Demonſtrative Proofs, as he calls them:

For the true Caſe is not,

(1.) Whether the King ought not to interpoſe in Eccleſiaſtical Matters, ſo far as the Peace and good Government of his Realm was concerned. Nor,

(2.) Whether he might not order things which concerned the Right of Eccleſiaſtical Poſſeſſions; as in Biſhopricks, Commendams, Right of Patronage, Pleas of Tythes, &c. Nor,

(3.) Whether the King, by his Supreme Authority might not limit the Proceedings of ordinary Eccleſiaſtical Courts in Matters concerning his Crown and Dignity, by granting Prohibitions. Nor,

(4.) Whether the King by Common Law cannot grant a Commiſſion of Review, after the Proceedings of the Eccleſiaſtical Courts; which Judge Hutton affirmed, Was all that was determined in Caudry's Caſe. Nor, Littleto's Rep. 18).

(5.) Whether the King in Parliament may not make Laws for Reformation of Religion, and eſtabliſhing good Order therein. Nor,

(6.) Whether the Supreme Coactive Juriſdiction were not always a Right of the Crown, however it were in a great Meaſure uſurped by the Pope after King John's Reſignation.

But, whether our Ancient Law doth give the King a Power, by virtue of his Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction, to appoint Commiſſioners by an extraordinary way of Juriſdiction to proceed in prima inſtantia, againſt Perſons by Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures? And to prove this I cannot find one ſufficient Example, as I ſhall make appear by a ſhort Account of the Inſtances he produces, and the Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction exerciſed at that time.

In the time of the Saxons.

In the Saxon Times, he brings firſt an Inſtance of Kenulphus, King of Mercia, granting an Exemption to the Abbot of Abingdon: But what does this ſignifie to Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction, to prove, That the King gave the Abbot an Exemption from the Temporal Juriſdiction of the Biſhops? For, in thoſe Days there were great Diſputes between the Biſhops and Abbots about the Temporal Juriſdiction over the Lands of their Abbies; which the Biſhops claimed, and the Abbots refuſed, and put themſelves under the Protection of Princes and Great Men, as appears by the Councils of Cloveſhoe and Becanceld, in the time of Kenulphus. But Stamford puts this Matter out of Diſpute, in the Confirmation of the Charter of Kenulphus, by Edwin, for the Words are, Quod præfatum Monaſterium omnis terrenæ ſervitutis eſſet liberum: And what is this now to Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction? Stamford, *l.*3.*f.*111.

But we have manifeſt Proof in the Saxon Times, That the Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction was never exerciſed by ſuch a Commiſſion, but that all ex-extraordinary Caſes were diſpatched in Parliamentary Aſſemblies, and the Ordinary Juriſdiction was exerciſed by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, in Chief, and by the reſt of the Biſhops. The firſt extraordinary Inſtance of proceeding againſt an Eccleſiaſtical Perſon, in the Saxon Times, was that of Wilfred, Archbiſhop of York, who becauſe he would not conſent to the making three Biſhopricks in his Province, was depoſed by Theodore Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the King himſelf being preſent, and the great Council of the Nation : For ſo King Alfrith ſaith, that he was bis à toto Anglornm Concilio damnatus, as the Words are in Malmesb. l. 3. f. 152. Malmesbury ; and Eddius, who lived at that time, ſaith, That King Alfrith gave this Reaſon againſt reſtoring him, becauſe he had been condem- Edd. vit. Wilfred. c. 55. ned by the Kings his Predeceſſors, with their Council, the Archbiſhop aſſiſting, and himſelf had judged him, cum omnibus pene Britanniæ veſtræ Præſulibus, all the Biſhops, almoſt, being preſent.

Ibid. c. 45. In the Council of Neſterfield, in his Caſe, it is ſaid, The King was c. 57. preſent and Berthwaldus, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, cum totius pene Britanniæ Epiſcopis. In the Council at Nid, it is ſaid, ſedentibus Rege & Epiſcopis, cum Principibus eorum in loco Synodali ; which was a Parliamentary Aſſembly.

Not long after Tunbert was depoſed from his Biſhoprick, but it was, Florent. Wigor. f. 254. ſaith Florentius Wigornienſis, congregata Synodo ſub præſentia Regis Egfridi. The Archbiſhop Theodore likewiſe depoſed Winfred Biſhop of the Mercians, ſaith the ſame Author after Bede, for ſome Diſobedience, and conſecrated Saxulphus, the firſt Abbot of Peterborough, in his Place.

Spelm. Con. p. 154. This Winfred had been preſent at the Council at Herudford, and there conſented to the Canons then firſt received in the Engliſh Church ; and there they ſubmitted to Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures, upon the Violation of them. Mat. Weſt. A. C. 673. At this Council, ſaith Matt. Weſtminſter, were preſent not only all the Biſhops, but all the Kings and Great Men of the Nation ; ſo that the firſt Canons were received in a full Parliament. One of theſe Canons was for increaſing the Number of Biſhopricks, as the Number of Believers increaſed : And upon this Canon Theodore proceeded againſt both Wilfred and Winfred : For not long after Theodore divided his Florent. p. 559. Biſhoprick into five ; but it was done, ſaith Florentius, conſenſu ejuſdem Regis & Principum illius, as Ina divided the Weſtern Province into two Mat. Weſt. A. C. 711. Biſhopricks, Synodali Decreto, ſaith Mat. Weſtminſter, which then was the ſame, as by Act of Parliament. And the oppoſing ſuch a Diviſion ſeems to have been the Crime of Diſobedience, for which he was deprived Bed. l. 4. c. 2. by the Archbiſhop: For as Bede obſerves of him, He firſt exerciſed Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction over all England.

In the great Council at Becanceld, where King Withred was preſent, A. D. 694. with his Nobles (Ducibus & Satrapis in unum glomeratis) together with the Clergy : He there diſowns any Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdicti- Spelm. p. 190. on, and leaves it to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury ; Metropolitani Epiſcopi eſt Eccleſias Dei regere, gubernare, &c. and then follows, Presbyteros, Diaconos eligere, ſtatuere, ſanctificare, firmare & amovere. And he makes this an inviolable Law, as far as his Words could make it, Si quis autem Rex poſt nos levatus in Regnum, aut Epiſcopus, aut Abbas, vel Comes, vel ulla poteſtas hominum contradicat huic Chartulæ, aut infringere tentaverit, ſciat ſequeſtratum à Corpore & Sanguine Domini, &c. And after it follows, Hæc Lex inviolabilis uſque ad conſummationem Sæculi permaneat, &c.

Mr. Prynn, out of his old Kindneſs to the Archbiſhops of Canterbury, in his vaſt Heap of Collections, would have this rejected as ſpurious; but Sir H. Spelman, whoſe Judgment was far beyond the others, ſaith, He had peruſed five MSS. of it, whereof one was with a mixture of Saxon Letters, and he had no Miſtruſt of its Sincerity. And the Learned and Judicious Editors of the Decem Scriptores, Sir Roger Twiſden and Mr. Seldan, have thought fit to inſert it after them, out of a MS. in CCC.

Chronological Vindication. *To.*1.*f.*193.

But Mr. P. thinks it is contradicted by the Council of Bergam-ſtead, about Eccleſiaſtical Affairs, under King Withred: But I can find nothing like it. It is true, there are Laws made concerning Eccleſiaſtical Matters, by common Conſent of the King, the Nobles and Biſhops; but the very firſt is, Eccleſia libera ſit fruaturque ſuis judiciis, &c.

But beſides, in the Great Council at Cloveſhoe, where Æthelbaldus, King of Mercia, was preſent, and Cuthbert, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, with the other Biſhops, this Charter of Withred's, was read, and approved, and confirmed, with the like Sanction annexed to it.

Decem. Script. p. 2209.

In the Council at Cloveſhoe, A. C. 787. The extent of the Juriſdiction of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury was very much leſſened by the means of King Offa, who cauſed another Archbiſhoprick to be ſet up in Mercia; and the Archbiſhop of Canterbury gave his Conſent, ſaith Matt. Paris: But his former Juriſdiction was reſtored in the Council of Cloveſhoe, A. D. 803. by a general Conſent. But in the former Council the Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction was ſtrenuouſly aſſerted, in theſe Words; Sicut Reges omnibus dignitatibus præſunt, ita & Epiſcopi in his quæ ad Deum attinent. And in the latter, there is a ſevere denunciation againſt all that ſhould leſſen the Honour, or take away the Juriſdiction of that See.

From henceforward I find no diminution of the Archbiſhop's Ordinary Juriſdiction through the Saxon Times. The King had the Political Supremacy in him, by which he erected and divided Biſhopricks, and nominated Biſhops, and ſummoned Councils, and confirmed their Proceedings as he ſaw Cauſe; but the immediate Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction was left to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury in the firſt place, and to the reſt of the Biſhops as to any Publick Acts which related to Eccleſiaſtical Affairs, they were not diſpatched by particular Commiſſions, but in the Parliamentary Aſſemblies; In which, the Cuſtom was, to begin with what related to the Church, and then to proceed to other Buſineſs. Of this Ingulphus gives us an Inſtance in Ceolnothus Archbiſhop of Canterbury; for in the Parliament Aſſembled at Kingsbury, A. C. 851. in Hebdomada Paſch. (which was chiefly aſſembled pro Regni negotiis) yet even then, he propoſed, That Church Affairs might be firſt diſpatched; Divina Negotia debere primitus proponi; to which they all aſſented. And ſo Bertulphus his Charter of Crowland then paſſed; as Withlaſius his did before, at a time when the Biſhops and Nobles attended the King at London, to conſult about the Daniſh Pyrates, which very much infeſted our Coaſts.

Thus Æthelwolfus paſſed his famous Grant of the Tenth of all the Lands to the Church, in a Council at Wincheſter; himſelf, and the Kings of Mercia and Eaſt-Angles, being preſent, and all the Nobility and Biſhops giving their free Conſent; as Ingulphus relates it. Several others might be produced; but theſe are ſufficient. And the Saxon Laws are a plain Evidence, That Church Matters were in thoſe times determined in the ſame Aſſemblies, wherein the other Laws of the Kingdom were paſſed.

In the Reign of King Edward the Confeſſor.

C. 5. R. The next Inſtance is of Edward the Confeſſor, who ſaith in his Laws, That he is Vicar of the higheſt King, and he is ordained to this end, that he ſhould Govern and Rule the People of the Land, and above all things, the Holy Church, and that he defend the ſame from Wrong-doers, and root out Workers of Miſchief.

F. Parſons ſaith, All this was by Commiſſion from the Pope, ſuch as the Kings of Sicily had.

Anſ. to Coke's 5th Rep. c. 5. n. 20. But in my Opinion, this is a very bad Anſwer: For it ſuppoſes Perſons otherwiſe uncapable, to be made capable of the ſame Juriſdiction, which follows Orders, provided they have a Delegation from the Pope: Which is in effect, to confound all Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction in any, but the Pope himſelf, and thoſe to whom he commits it. But thoſe who aſſert the Right of Juriſdiction to follow the Power of Order, muſt firſt ſuppoſe a Perſon duly qualified, before he can receive from the Pope himſelf the Power of Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction. If therefore a Prince hath not an inherent Right to it, he cannot receive it by Commiſſion from the Pope. And the Powers which the King of Sicily challenges, relating to Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction, are either ſuch as other Princes have an equal Right to; or elſe they muſt imply ſuch a proper Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction as follows the Power of Order; and then, how can the Pope give the one without the other? Such a Gift is like an Appropriation of a Benefice with a Cure to a Nunnery, which the Lord Hobart ſaith, is void in Law, by reaſon of the incapacity of the Perſons. But the Supremacy which our Law gives, is not any proper immediate ſpiritual Juriſdiction, like that of Biſhops, but an Authoritative and Legiſlative Supremacy without any foreign Appeals, as will appear afterwards. But the Rights which the Kings of Sicily challenge, are theſe, 1. That they have the ſame Powers which Legates à Latere have, and may judge of the ſame Cauſes, and proceed in the ſame manner with Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures. 2. That no Appeal lies from the King's Commiſſioner, even to Rome it ſelf; and it is common to Appeal from the Cenſure of the Biſhop to him. The former is a Power, which our Kings never pretended to, by virtue of their Supremacy; for it is a Delegation of the Power of the Keys; which the Legates à Latere exerciſe by virtue of their Function, as well as their Commiſſion: But the Legal Supremacy with us, is a Right to Govern all ſorts of Men by our own Laws, without any foreign Juriſdiction, and that with reſpect to Eccleſiaſtical Matters as well as Temporal.

Hob. Rep. 1. 148.

But to prevent Miſtakes and Cavils about this Matter, it will be neceſſary to clear the Notion of Supremacy; as it hath been owned and received in the Church of England.

And for this we have two authentic Declarations of it to rely upon.

The firſt is mentioned, 5 Eliz. c. 1. 14. Where the Supremacy is declared to be taken and expounded in ſuch form as is ſet forth in the Admonition annexed to the Queen's Injunctions, publiſhed in the firſt Year of her Reign. And the Words there are, That the Queen neither doth nor will challenge any Authority, but ſuch as was of ancient time due to the Imperial Crown of this Realm, that is, under God to have the Sovereignty and Rule over all manner of Perſons, born within theſe her Realms, Dominions and Countries, of what Eſtates, either Eccleſiaſtical or Temporal poral ſoever they be, ſo as no other foreign Power ſhall or ought to have any ſuperiority over them.

The Second is in the 37th Article, wherein it is declared, That by the Supremacy is meant, that only Prerogative which we ſee to have been always given to all Godly Princes in Holy Scriptures by God himſelf, that is, that they ſhould rule over all Eſtates and Degrees committed to their Charge by God, whether they be Eccleſiaſtical or Temporal, and reſtrain with the Civil Sword the ſtubborn and evil doers.

So that granting a Commiſſion for proceeding by Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures, is no part of that Supremacy which our Church owns. And thus the Divines of our Church have underſtood it. By the Supremacy, ſaith Biſhop Andrews, we do not attribute to the King the Power of the Keys, or Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures.

Tortura Torti, p. 380.

R. Thomſon, in his Defence againſt Becanus, ſaith, The Supremacy is not to be defined by Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction, but by Supream Government.

Elenchus Refut. Tort. Torti, p. 80.

Becanus urged this as an Argument againſt the King's Supremacy, That he had no Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction. Dr. Burrhil anſwer'd, That the Supremacy implied many other things; as, the Power of calling Convocations, of confirming Canons, of giving Commiſſions of Delegates, of taking Cognizance of the Miſdemeanors of Church-men, (as well as others) but for proper Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction, he denies it to belong to Supremacy. And after aſſerts, That the King's Supremacy is preſerved, if he takes care that thoſe who have the Power of Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures do exerciſe them; and not as tho' it belonged to the Supremacy to give an immediate Power to proceed by Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures, which was not ſuppoſed to belong to it, but a ſupreme Right of governing all ſorts of Perſons by our Laws.

C. Mart. Bec. pro Tort. Torti, c. 21. p. 234.

P. 22. p. 244.

The King's Supremacy in Eccleſiaſtical Matters doth not, ſaith Maſon, imply the Power of the Keys, which the King hath not; but he may command thoſe who have them to uſe them rightly.

Maſon de Miniſt. Angl. l. 3. c. 3. p. 271.

All theſe wrote in King James I. his Reign, when the Point of Supremacy was throughly ſifted on both ſides. And the King himſelf, who very well underſtood theſe Matters, ſaith, That the Oath of Supremacy only extended to the King's Power of Judicature, over all Perſons as well Civil as Eccleſiaſtical, excluding all foreign Powers and Potentates to be Judges within his Dominions. Not as though the King hereby challenged to himſelf a Power of inflicting Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures on Perſons; but leaving the Spiritual Juriſdiction to thoſe who have the Power of the Keys, it belonged to him to exerciſe his Supreme Authority over Eccleſiaſtical Perſons and Cauſes, as he did over Temporal. For, ſaith Archbiſhop Brambal, our Laws never inveſted the King with any Spiritual Power or Juriſdiction, witneſs the Injunctions of Q. Eliz. witneſs the publick Articles of our Church, witneſs the Profeſſions of King James, witneſs all our Statutes themſelves.

Apology, &c. p. 263.

Brambal's Works, p. 340.

The King of England, ſaith he, by the Fundamental Conſtitution of the Monarchy, hath plenary Power, without the Licence, or Help, or Concurrence of any Foreign Prelate or Potentate, to render final Juſtice, that is, to receive the laſt Appeals of his own Subjects, without any Fear of any Review from Rome, or at Rome, for all Matters Eccleſiaſtical and Temporal; Eccleſiaſtical by his Biſhops, Temporal by Judges.

P. 63.

And thus our Laws were in the right, when they called the Act of Supremacy, Reſtoring the Rights of the Crown; for if we take away all the Papal Uſurpations as to Appeals, Exemptions of Perſons, Diſpenſations, Proviſions, making Canons, ſending Legates to hold Courts, to call Convocations, &c. we may eaſily underſtand what the Supremacy is, viz. a Power of Governing all ſorts of Men according to the Laws Eccleſiaſtical and Temporal, without any Foreign Juriſdiction.

But as in Temporal Matters the King's Supreme Authority is exerciſed in his ordinary Courts, ſo likewiſe in Eccleſiaſtical; which deriving their Juriſdiction from the King as Supreme, his Supremacy is preſerved in the ordinary Eccleſiaſtical Courts: But as to extraordinary Juriſdiction that depends on the Legiſlative Power; and whether that be not now taken away by it is the thing in Queſtion.

Having endeavoured to ſet this Matter in as clear a Light as I could, I now return to the Inſtance of Edward the Confeſſor.

And thoſe Words of his, as they are in Hoveden, ſignify no more than a general Right of protecting and defending the Church, which is not denied to belong to Kings, where the Pope's Authority is the moſt owned.

I cannot but take notice of a different Reading in the Lord Coke's Copy from all that I have ſeen; for where he hath it, Sanctam Eccleſiam regat & defendat; Lambard, veneretur & regat; but Hoveden, revereatur & ab injuriatoribus defendat; which is that Right of Protection which is allowed by all. The Spaniſh Lawyers hold, That there lies an Appeal to the King's Courts, by his Right of Protection, in caſe of any violent proceedings in the Eccleſiaſtical Courts. Which Violences are ſo many, as make ſuch Appeals ſo frequent and neceſſary, that whole Volumes have been written about them. And this, they ſay, Is not introductory of a new Law, but only declaratory of a natural Right. The French Lawyers allow Appeals from the Eccleſiaſtical Courts, tanquam ab abuſu; which muſt be founded on an Original Right in the King, to defend the Church both from Injuries and Abuſes. And as to the Church it ſelf, it is fully expreſſed in the Writ de Excommunicato capiendo, in the Words, Quia vero poteſtas Regia Sacroſanctæ Eccleſiæ in querelis ſuis deeſſe non debet. But ſuch a Right of Protection and Aſſiſtance is different from that of Juriſdiction; unleſs it be that which is only Coactive, which is not the Juriſdiction we now enquire into.

Covarruvias Pract. Quæſt. c. 35. n. 3.

Salgado de Regia Prot. part 1. c. 1. n. 23. Paſq. Recher. l. 3. c. 33.

But it is moſt conſiderable that King Edward ſaith, He is God's Vicar, and therefore could not look on himſelf as acting by Commiſſion from the Pope. It is true, that in the third Charter of Weſtminſter, there is a Bull of Nicholas the Second, wherein he gives to the King and his Succeſſors, the protection and defence of that Place, and of all the Churches of England, and a Power in his ſtead to make good Laws, with the Advice of the Biſhops and Abbots: But I do not find that King Edward owned that he acted in theſe Matters by any Commiſſion from the Pope, but from God himſelf.

And this Law, in Hoveden and others, overthrows any ſuch pretended Commiſſion; and yet the Pope himſelf doth not give him a Power to delegate his Authority to others, but to act in it himſelf, and that only with the Advice of Biſhops and Abbots.

The Point then which was to be proved, was not that the King had Right to protect the Church from Injuries, but ſuch an inherent Right of Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction, which he might delegate to others, whether Biſhops or not, and impower them to proceed by Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures againſt Offenders, ſummoned to appear before them. And the Queſtion now is not, Whether by the Supreme Legiſlative Power of the Nation ſuch an Authority might not in an extraordinary Caſe be committed to particular Perſons by Act of Parliament; but, Whether ſuch an Act of Parliament being granted to be taken away, the King by the ancient Law of the Realm may appoint ſuch Commiſſioners as he thinks fit, Laymen or Biſhops, to proceed againſt the King's Subjects by Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures?

And this very ſtating of the Caſe as it ought to be, ſhews how impertinent the remainder of his Examples are. But to proceed.

In the Reign of King William the Firſt.

In the time of William the Conqueror, he only mentions a Caſe out of Fitz-Herbert, That he made an Appropriation of Churches with Cure to Eccleſiaſtical Perſons, viz. to a Prebend of the Church of York. Now this, ſaith he, was agreed by all could not be done without Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction.

It is too common a Fault in ſome great Lawyers, that what they find once ſettled for Law in their Books, they imagine was never otherwiſe. Thus Appropriations after Dioceſſes were ſettled, being looked on as chiefly the Act of the Ordinary, who is to take Care of the whole Dioceſe: From hence they infer, That in all Times an Appropriation muſt argue Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction. But before the Parochial Rights were eſtabliſhed, there were many voluntary Appropiations made by particular Perſons, who thought there was no more Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction in the Appropriation of Churches, than in the Endowments of them, and in the Right of Patronage; only the one is ſettled on a Spiritual Corporation as perpetual Incumbent, and the other on particular Perſons in Succeſſion. It's true, ſince the Acts for reſtoring Juriſdiction to the Crown, the Power of making Appropriations in the King is ſaid to be from his Supreme Eccleſiaſtical Authority, Grindon's Caſe, in 1P. *f.*448. But then we are told, It was becauſe the Pope, as Supreme Ordinary, had ſuch a power without the Biſhops: Which Reaſon will not hold as to ſuch times when the Pope was not owned to be Supreme Ordinary, as he was not in the Conqueror's Time, the Canon Law not being then receiv'd in England.

But what a mean Proof is this in ſuch a buſy Time as that of William the Firſt, when ſo many great Churchmen were deprived of their Biſhopricks, being Engliſh, and the Normans put in their Places? Was this done by any Commiſſion from William to his great Lords and others, to proceed againſt them by Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures? Nothing like it. Stigand, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, (if Spot's Story be true) was too great a Friend to the Engliſh Liberties to be endured by him, but he was too great a Diſſembler to ſeem to have any thing to do in it himſelf, and therefore knowing he was of the oppoſite Party to the prevailing Pope, he privately ſends to him, to ſend a Legate for that purpoſe, (wherein the Pope and he had their ſeveral Ends) and then in Parliament Time, the King keeping his Eaſter at Wincheſter, Stigand was depoſed, and Agilmarus, Biſhop of the Eaſt Angles, and ſeveral others, without any evident Reaſon, ſaith Hoveden, but only to make way for the Normans. This was in Concilio Magno, ſaith he and the reſt; for Eaſter was one of the three Seaſons for the Parliamentary Meeting in the Year; which William kept up in Imitation of the Saxons, who at Chriſtmas, Eaſter, and Pentecoſt, held their publick Courts, and did wear their Crowns till the Times of H. 2. and then they did diſpatch Publick Affairs. Thus far he complied with the Saxon Cuſtoms, but he had a new Work to do: The Archbiſhop he could not rely upon, and therefore was put to find out a new way, by ſending for a Legate from the Pope to ſerve his turn. And thus William, for his own Ends, having ſo hard a Game to play here, called in the Pope's Aſſiſtance, who knew well enough how to draw his own Advantage out of it. But William would go no further than his Intereſt carried Ead. f. 6. him; for afterwards he declared, That he would maintain his own Rights which he enjoyed in Normandy, viz. That nothing ſhould be done without him in Convocation; no Legate come but as he pleaſed, &c. But ſtill he ſeemed to let them enjoy their Saxon Liberties in Matters of Eccleſiaſtical Proceedings, ſo far as to have them debated in Parliament. Thus the Controverſy between the two Archbiſhops was referred to Parliament, Hoveden, f. 263. the King and the Great Men, as well as the Biſhops, being preſent. The Controverſy between Lanfrank, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Eadm. f. 9. Odo, Biſhop of Baieux, was referred, ſaith Eadmerus, to a Conventus principum at Pinnedenen; and when the King heard their Reſolution, cum conſenſu omnium Principum ſuorum confirmavit, ſaith the Textus Roffenſis. He likewiſe confirmed Charters as the Saxons had done; that Selden. ad Eadmer. f. 165. to Battel Abby was Conſilio Epiſcoporum & Baronum meorum. But the moſt conſiderable thing he did as to Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction, was ſeparating the Courts Eccleſiaſtical from the Hundred Courts, by his Charter to Remigius and others; which, he ſaith, was granted in a great Council, and by the Advice of the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, and all the Great Men of his Kingdom. So that ſtill extraordinary Acts relating to Church Matters were paſſed in Parliament by General Conſent.

And what now doth the Appropriation of a Church with a Cure of Souls ſignify to prove his Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction? When thoſe things in his Time were not brought under ſuch ſtrict Rules as they were afterwards; but Appropriation might have been made by any Lay-Perſon, that never pretended to the leaſt Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction; and he might as well have brought his demoliſhing ſo many Churches in the New Foreſt, for an Inſtance of his Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction.

In the Reign of William the Second.

In William Rufus his time, a great Heat aroſe between him and Anſelm, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, about owning the Pope, Whether the Archbiſhop could do it without the King's Conſent? The Buſineſs was referred to Parliament, which the King called on purpoſe at Rocking- Ead. f. 26. ham, ſaith Eadmerus, who was there preſent; The Biſhops declared they could not deprive him (as the King would have had them) to whom they f. 30, 31. 38. had promiſed Obedience. After which it was again referred to Parliament; but Anſelm not yielding, he went out of the Land.

In the Reign of King Henry the Firſt.

In the Reign of Henry the Firſt, a new Controverſy aroſe between the King and the ſame Archbiſhop about the ancient Right of the Crown, as to Inveſtiture of Biſhops. The King calls a Parliament a- Id. f. 65, 66, 70. bout it, wherein the Biſhops and Lords joined with the King. Afterwards Anſelm deſired, The Advice of the Biſhops and Nobles might be heard at Eaſter; which ſhews that both Sides referred it to the Parliament.

In his time a Council was called, and ſeveral Canons paſſed, and the Archbiſhop deſired of the King, That the Primates Regni might ſit with 67, them; that all things might paſs utriuſque Ordinis concordi cura, with the Conſent of both Eſtates. The King afterwards takes the Advantage of theſe Canons, and proſecutes the Breakers of them, and raiſes Money f. 85, upon pretence of Forfeitures, to the great Grievance of the Clergy.
Anſelm although then in Disfavour, writes to the King about it, and tells him, This was a new Method of Proceeding, becauſe it belonged to 86, the Biſhops in their Dioceſſes to call the Clergy to an Account; or if they neglected, to the Archbiſhop and Primate. The King Anſwers, That his Barons were to meet him on Aſcenſion-day, and by their Advice he would 90, give an Anſwer; but upon Anſelm's Return this Proſecution ceaſed. Other Affairs of the Church were then referred to the Parliament at Eaſter, from thence to Pentecoſt, and by reaſon of Anſelm's Sickneſs to Auguſt; 91, and then the Biſhops, Abbots and Lords of the Kingdom, met in the King's Palace at London, and by Conſent of Parliament, Inveſtiture was turned into Homage:

In his time the Biſhoprick of Ely was erected by the King's Conſent in 95, Parliament, Regi, Archiepiſcopo, cæteriſque Principibus Regni viſum fuit, ſaith Eadmerus. The Conſecration of an elect Archbiſhop of York, was tranſacted in Parliament, the King adviſing with the Biſhops and 102, Nobles about it; for Anſelm, before his Death had ſent an Inhibition to the Biſhops, not to Conſecrate him unleſs he made the Profeſſion of Obedience to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury: The Biſhops reſolved to adhere to Anſelm's Inhibition, and the King yielded. After Anſelm's Death, the King adviſed with his Parliament at Windſor, about a 109, Succeſſor to him; and the Biſhop of Rocheſter, at the Requeſt of the Biſhops, was agreed upon: And the King filled the Abbies before he went into Normandy, conſilio Principum & Epiſcoporum ſuorum. 110.

In the latter End of Henry the Firſt, many Diſputes hapned about Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction, as between the Biſhops of St. David's and Glamorgan, which were debated in magno Placito apud London, ſaith Henry of Huntingdon: And for ſuch Cauſes, ſaith he, another Hen.Hunt. l.7. f. 220. 2.
Aſſembly was held in the beginning of Lent, and again in Rogation Week.

In all this time, when the Norman Kings aſſerted all the Rights of Sovereignty with great Zeal, yet they never pretended to appoint any Commiſſioners for Eccleſiaſtical Cauſes, but ſtill referred them to Parliament.

In the Reign of King Henry the Third.

The next Inſtance the Lord Coke brings, falls as low as the Time of Henry the Third. The firſt whereof is, the King's granting a Writ of Prohibition, if any Man ſued in the Eccleſiaſtical Court for any thing, of which by Allowance and Cuſtom, it had not Lawful-cognizance. But how doth the King's Power of granting Prohibitions, prove his Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction? It effectually proves the King's Right to preſerve his Crown and Dignity, as the Prohibition implies; but how doth it hence appear, that the Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction comes from his Crown and Dignity? The contrary ſeems rather to follow, viz. That the Eccleſiaſtical Courts were held from another Power; but all Matters of Temporal Cognizance did belong to the Crown. There is no Queſtion but ſince the Acts for reſtoring Juriſdiction to the Crown, the Supreme Juriſdiction both in the Eccleſiaſtical and Civil Courts, is derived from the Crown. And in whoſe-ſoever Names the Courts are kept, the Authority of keeping them is from the King. For it is declared by Act of Parliament, 1 Eliz. 1. 17. That all Eccleſiaſtical Power is united and annexed to the Imperial Crown of this Realm; which all Biſhops do own, in taking the Oath of Supremacy; and therefore the old Form continuing, can ſignifie nothing elſe againſt the Law of this Realm and their own Oaths. But as long as the main Points were ſecured by the Laws, there was no neceſſity apprehended of altering the Forms; for, on the other ſide, it was objected, that ſince the Laws, had placed all Juriſdiction in the Crown, it ſeemed as unreaſonable to continue the old Form of Prohibitions in læſionem Coronæ & Dignitatis Regiæ; how can this be, ſay they, when the Juriſdiction Eccleſiaſtical as well as Civil, is owned to be from the Crown? It is ſaid in Anſwer, That, a Prohibition implies that the thing is drawn into aliud Examen than it ought to be, and this is contra Coronam & Dignitatem Regiam. Why not then as well when an Eccleſiaſtical original Cauſe is brought into a Temporal Court? for that is aliud Examen then, by Confeſſion on that ſide; and if Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction be derived from the Crown, the aliud Examen muſt relate only to the Court, and not to the Crown. All that I infer from hence is, That the old Forms were thought fit to be continued; and both Parties reconciled them as well as they could to the Laws in force. But the Judges confeſſed, That although de jure both the Juriſdictions were ever in the Crown, yet the one was ſometimes uſurped by the See of Rome, which is a plain acknowledgment, that by the Matters of Fact in thoſe times, the Right could not be proved; and eſpecially in the times of H. 3. when the Pope's Uſurpations here, were at ſo great a height, that the King upon Writs of Enquiry ſent into the ſeveral Counties, found, That the Revenues of the Roman Court, by Proviſions, Extortions, &c. exceeded the Kings. And the King had ſo little Authority left, that the Pope put Biſhops upon him Rege penitus irrequiſito, ſaith Mat. Weſtm. ſo that he was ſo far from Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction, that he had not the Nomination of his Biſhops, nor ſo much as a Conſent to their Election, unleſs the Pope thought fit ſometimes to gratifie him in it. For the Pope pretended to the Right of Diſpoſal of Church Preferments, by Vertue of his Ordinary Juriſdiction, which was ſaid to be two fold. 1. Voluntary, in the Collation of Benefices. 2. Judicial, in the hearing of Cauſes; the former might be done at Rome, but the other in the Ordinary Eccleſiaſtical Courts. And Bracton, who was a Judge in his time, owns the Pope as much to have the Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction, as the King had the Temporal; but yet he adds, That, if an Eccleſiaſtical Judge did meddle with Matters out of their Cognizance, the King's Prohibition did lie againſt him, and he ought to ſuperſede his Proceedings till it were tryed in the King's Court, to whom the Juriſdiction belonged. But it is ſtill harder to prove the King's Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction, becauſe the Spiritual Courts were to certifie the Kings Courts, in caſe of Bigamy, Baſtardy, and ſuch like. For the Queſtion is not about their Temporal Subjection to the King in ſignifying the Sentence of the Court, but whence they derived their Authority of holding the Eccleſiaſtical Courts; over which Bracton ſaith, the Pope had the ordinary Juriſdiction, and the Power to delegate others to execute it.

What doth it ſignifie to the Kings Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction, that the Barons of England would not receive that part of the Canon Law which concerned the Legitimation of Children born before Wedlock? For it de-depended upon the Barons Conſent, Whether a Canon of the Church ſhould be made the Law of the Land concerning the Rights of Inheritance.

In the Reign of King Edward I.

In the Time of Ed. I. we may expect ſome brisker Sallies towards the Kingdoms Deliverance from the Pope's Uſurpations, which were thought ſo intolerable even by the Monkiſh Hiſtorians, in his Fathers Reign.

What that Bull was, the bringing whereof the Law-Books ſay, was then adjudged Treaſon, it would have been worth our while to have known. For it is hard to imagine that at that time, the meer bringing a Bull, ſhould be ſo Capital a Crime, when ſo many were brought without danger both before and after. But it ſeems by the Certificate of the Judges concerning it (ſtill in the Tower) the Matter of it was very prejudicial to the Crown. And it argues no Spiritual Juriſdiction for Princes to examine and refuſe (when they ſee Cauſe) Bulls that come from Rome. For this is practiſed in thoſe Countries which profeſs Obedience to the Pope's Juriſdiction. Covarruvias affirms it of Spain. In Portugal, when John the Second would have given up that Right to the Pope, the Eſtates of the Kingdom would not permit him. Peter the Second, Duke of Britain forbad receiving any Bull before Examination by his Council, under pain of Corporal Puniſhments, and Confiſcation of Goods. Ant. Faber ſaith, in Savoy, No Bulls have Authority there, till they are approved by the Senate, and an Appeal lies from them, tanquam ab Abuſu. Even in Naples it ſelf, Ferdinand the Catholick King, gave a ſevere Reprimand to his Vice-Roy, for not hanging up a Perſon who would have executed a Bull without his Authority. The Letter it ſelf is Publiſhed in the Jus Belgarum; where many other things may be ſeen to the ſame purpoſe.

The Right of Patronage is a Civil Right in Princes as well as others; and therefore E. I. without pretending to Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction, might juſtly puniſh the Archbiſhop of York for his obſtinate refuſing to admit the King's Clerk becauſe of a Papal Proviſion.

The Statute of Bigamy might very well be interpreted in Parliament, and yet the King have no Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction. For it was no more than declaring in what ſenſe a Law ſhould be taken, i. e. Whether it ſhould extend to Bigamy before the Conſtitution of the Council of Lyons, or after.

The Act of Parliament made at Carliſle, 35 E. I. againſt Aliens poſſeſſing Benefices, is no more than hath been done in Countries where the Popes Juriſdiction is the moſt owned. As in Spain, Covarruvias ſaith, They have Preſcription and pragmatical Sanctions againſt Aliens poſſeſſing Benefices. The Laws of Poland, and many Edicts in France exclude Strangers.

But I ſhall now produce ſome conſiderable Precedents in the time of Ed. I. to ſhew, that the Proceedings againſt the Archbiſhops and Biſhops for Miſdemeanors or Contempts, was in Parliament, and not by Commiſſioners (the inferior Clergy being left to the Juriſdiction of their Ordinaries.)

3 Ed. I. E. Warren complained to the King, That the Archbiſhop of Canterbury had contemned his Orders in not taking off Excommunication from ſome of his Servants: The King ſends to him to proceed no further againſt the Earl or his Servants uſque ad Parliamentum, where the Matter of Contempt might be debated. But in the mean time the Archbiſhop ſends to the King a true Account of the Matter, and how far he was from Contempt; which is ſtill extant in the Records of the Tower.

Clau. 7 E. 1. 7 E. 1. John Peckam, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, was ſummoned to Parliament, to anſwer to a Charge of Miſdemeanors againſt him, for ſome Paſſages in the Council at Reading; which he was fain to revoke, and to declare that no Articles there paſſed, ſhould create any Prejudice to the Crown or Kingdom.

8 E. 1. The Archbiſhop went about to Viſit the King's Free Chappels: The King hearing of it, ſent a Writ to him, to forbear, uſque ad proximum Parliamentum; ut tunc ex unanimi & mutuo conſenſu provideamus quid fieri debeat in Præmiſſis.

Placit. Parl. 21 E. 1. f. 135. 21 E. 1. John Roman, Archbiſhop of York, was Attached upon a Contempt for Excommunicating the Biſhop of Durham, while he was in the King's Service. And after a full Hearing in pleno Parliamento, he was condemned, and upon Submiſſion, was Fined to the King four thouſand Marks 28 E. 1. A Controverſie aroſe between the King and the Biſhop of Chicheſter, about his refuſing to admit a Perſon preſented to a Prebend in the Free Chappel of Haſtings; the King ſends his Writ to the Warden of the Cinque-Ports (extant in the Tower among the Writs of that Time) to enquire into this Matter, and to bring an Account next Parliament, ad quod prædictum Epiſcopum adjornavimus, are the Words of the Writ: And that the Buſineſs was heard in Parliament, appears by the Records. Placit. Parl. 28. E. 1. f. 227.

Clauſ. 31 E. 1. m. 6. 31 E. 1. The King ſeized on the Temporalties of the Biſhop of Durham, upon a Judgment given againſt him in Parliament, for extending his Spiritual Juriſdiction too far; as appears by the Record of the Concord made between the King and him.

In the Reign of King Edward the Second.

In the Reign of K. E. 2. nothing is produced but the Statute 9 E. 2. for Regulating the Proceedings between the Civil and Eccleſiaſtical Courts. But how the King's Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction is proved hereby, is hard to underſtand. It appears indeed, that the Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction is allowed and limited by Parliament. But from hence, ſaith he, it follows, that theſe Laws may be called the King's Eccleſiaſtical Laws, or the Eccleſiaſtical Laws of England.

There is no queſtion but they may: But there is a Difference between Laws, ſo called by Acceptation and Allowance; and ſuch as have their whole Force and Authority from the King. For otherwiſe, where the Pope's Juriſdiction is owned and received, the Pope muſt receive his Authority from the King. But a Liberty to exerciſe Authority, and deceiving Authority are two Things.

In the Time of E. 3. many things are alledged, and to no purpoſe; but yet a ſhort Anſwer will ſerve. If the firſt Inſtance doth hold, viz. That the Sentence of Excommunication by the Archbiſhop, holds againſt the Sentence of the Pope or his Legate, it only proves that the Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction here by Law is in the Archbiſhop, and not in the Pope or his Legate. But there may be another Reaſon, mentioned by Fitz. Herbert, viz. That the Certificate of the Archbiſhop might be more authentick than the Seal of a Legate. 16 E. 3. Tit. E. 1. com. 4.

The ſecond, ſixth, and eighth only prove the King Supreme Patron, and a Right of Patronage is diſtinct from a Right of Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction; and ſo it was reſolved in Grendon's Caſe, Pl. f. 498. That the King preſents by Lapſe as ſupreme Patron, and not as ſupreme Ordinary: For this belongs to him as King, the Land on which Churches are built being originally held of him; and this Right the King enjoyed when the Pope was owned to be Supreme Ordinary. But in the Caſe of his own free Chapels, Fitz-Herbert ſaith right, That in Caſe of Lapſe by the Dean, the King preſents as Ordinary, the Archbiſhop and Biſhop having no Authority there as Ordinaries.

The third, fourth and fifth are about Exemptions from Epiſcopal Juriſdictions granted by the King, eſpecially in his own free Chapels, which are only viſitable by Commiſſion from the King. But this very Pretence of Exemptions from Epiſcopal Juriſdiction was founded upon the Belief of the Pope's being Supreme Ordinary; for exempt Places were not ſuppoſed to be free from all Ordinary Juriſdiction, but from that of Inferior Ordinaries, being immediately ſubject to the Pope. A Biſhop, by the Canon Law, may grant an Exemption from his Right of Juriſdiction, but not from his Right of Viſitation, but the Pope from both. And in the Grant of Exemption the immediate Subjection to the Roman See is expreſſed. As to the King's free Chapels, their Exemption was by an expreſs Bull of Innocent III. to King John; and in the Caſe of the free Chapel of St. Martins, Henry III. granted a Prohibition, wherein it is inſerted, That it was a free Chapel, & ab omni Juriſdictione Epiſcopali per Sedem Apoſtolicam exempta. And 45 Hen. 3. in a Prohibition concerning the free Chapel of Wolverhampton, the Grant of Innocent III. is repeated. Lomed. de exempt. c. 3. n. 7. Chart. 16. Joh. m. 9. Pat. 22. H. 3. m. 10.

The Right to extra-parochial Tithes is proviſional, and not by way of Inheritance; and ſo it may belong to the King, although he have no Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction.

As to the ſevere Proceeding about Bulls from Rome, I have given an Account of that already in E. 1.

The anointing of Kings proves no more their Capacity of Spiritual Juriſdiction, than it proves the Kings of Iſrael to have been High-Prieſts.

There is no doubt the Eccleſiaſtical Courts may be limited by the Laws of the Land; and there are ſome Cauſes which belong to them not originally of a Spiritual Nature, but they have been a long time poſſeſſed of them by Cuſtom, and are allowed by Law; which is well expreſſed in 24 Hen. 8. c. 12. where it is ſaid, That all Cauſes Teſtamentary, Cauſes of Matrimony and Divorces, Rights of Tythes, Oblations, and Obventions, (the Knowledge whereof, by the Goodneſs of Princes of this Realm, and by the Laws and Cuſtoms of the ſame, appertaineth to the Spiritual Juriſdiction of this Realm) ſhall be determined within the King's Juriſdiction and Authority.

It doth not ſeem probable, That the King by his own Authority would remove Secular Canons, and put in Regular; when Hoveden ſaith, in the ſame Caſe, H. 2. did it by the Pope's Authority, and with the free Conſent of the Parties. Hoveden, f. 320.

The Statutes of Proviſors were excellent Statutes; but are ſaid to be enacted for the Good and Tranquility of the Realm, which no doubt the King and his Parliament were bound to take Care of. But they prove no more Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction, than the Pragmatick Sanctions of Lewis IX. and Charles VII. in France did, which were of the ſame nature.

The following Inſtances in other Reigns, are many of them of the ſame kind with thoſe already anſwered; but what ſeems to have any new Force ſhall be conſidered.

In the Reign of King Henry the Fourth.

2 H. 4. c. 15. is urged to prove, That the King, by Conſent of his Parliament, did direct the Proceedings of the Spiritual Courts in Caſes of Hereſy, and other Matters more Spiritual; but it is evident by the Act it ſelf, That the Spiritual Juriſdiction was left wholly to the Ordinaries, and only an Inforcement of it by the Civil Power was added by the Law then made; for the Words are, Whereas the Dioceſans of the ſaid Realm cannot by their Juriſdiction Spiritual, without Aid of the ſaid Royal Majeſty, ſufficiently correct, &c. Therefore a Power to Impriſon and Fine was given to the Ordinaries; who might before have proceeded by Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures: but theſe being contemned by them, the Ordinaries called in the Aſſiſtance of the Civil Power. If there had been a Power before to have proceeded againſt Hereticks by Common Law, when convict by their Ordinaries, I cannot ſee any Reaſon why that Law ſhould be made. In Caſe of Apoſtacy, i. e. Renouncing Chriſtianity, Bracton ſaith, the Perſon convict is to be burned; and he inſtanceth in the Deacon who turned Jew, in the Council of Oxford: And Fleta ſpeaks only of Apoſtates, whether Clerks or others, and thoſe are the Miſcreants in Briton; and in Horn, Hereſy was then the ſame with renouncing Baptiſm, or turning Jew or Turk, or uſing Sorcery. But after Wickliff's Time, the Ordinaries enlarged the Notion of Hereſie, and took upon themſelves to be ſole Judges in it; and for all that I can ſee, the Act 2 H. 4. owns this to be part of their Spiritual Juriſdiction. And this is one Reaſon alledged for the Repeal of this Act, 25 H. 8. c. 14. becauſe there is no Declaration of Hereſy made in it, but it is left to the Judgment of the Ordinary. And therefore this Act was ill thought upon to prove the King's Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction.

In Henry the Seventh's time the King is ſaid to be perſona mixta, becauſe he hath both Eccleſiaſtical and Temporal Juriſdiction. But this Argument is drawn only from ſome occaſional Talk, mentioned in the Year Books, 10 Hen. 8. 18. Brian ſaid, That a ſage Doctor of Law ſaid one time to him, That Prieſts might be tried at Common Law, Car il dit, quod Rex eſt perſona mixta, car eſt perſona unita cum ſacerdotibus ſaint Eglyſe. If all this be granted, it proves no more, than that the King hath Juriſdiction by his Law over Eccleſiaſtical Perſons; which is not diſputed.

CHAP.

CHAP. III.

Whether the King's Supremacy by Law extends to the Diſpenſing with Laws; Of the Nature and Original of the Power; The Inconſiſtency of ſuch a Diſpenſing Power with the Frame of our Government.

HAving thus far proceeded in clearing the ancient Legal Supremacy, I am now come to an Inſtance of greater Weight and Difficulty, and which will therefore require more Pains and Care in the Examination of it, viz.

11 H. 7, 12. By the Eccleſiaſtical Laws allowed within this Realm, a Prieſt cannot have two Benefices, nor a Baſtard can be a Prieſt; but the King may by his Eccleſiaſtical Power and Juriſdiction diſpenſe with both theſe, becauſe they be mala prohibita, and not mala per ſe.

Here we are to enquire into theſe things.

(1.) How far the King's Power and Juriſdiction did extend in the Caſes mentioned.

(2.) How far the Reaſon here given will juſtify a Power of diſpenſing with Laws.

(1.) As to the Caſes here mentioned; there is no doubt but the Canoniſts made the Power of Diſpenſing in theſe to be an Argument of the Pope's Supremacy, or the Plenitude of his Power: But doth it hence follow, That what Princes did to their own Subjects, as to the qualifying them for a Legal Poſſeſſion of Benefices, muſt argue a Supremacy in them over Eccleſiaſtical Perſons and Cauſes? And there is difference to be made between not receiving the Pope's Canons in particular Caſes, and a Power of diſpenſing with Eccleſiaſtical Laws. If the Law were ſo then, as is noted by Fineux, in 11 H. 7. 12. the plain Conſequence is, That the contrary were no part of the Eccleſiaſtical Laws allowed within this Realm. As in the famous Caſe about the Canon Law concerning Baſtardy, when the Barons ſaid, Nolumus leges Angliæ mutari; No Man can ſay, That the Barons diſpenſed with the Pope's Eccleſiaſtical Laws; but that they refuſed to execute them; for, as it is well obſerved in Standiſh's Caſe, in Kelway's Reports, 7 H. 8. Eccleſiaſtical Laws have no force, where the General Practice hath been contrary. If this were no more than a private Opinion of Fineux, of what he thought the King might do, altho' there were no Precedent for it, then it ſignifies little; but if from hence it appears what the Common Law of England was, then it follows, That this was not received at that time for the Eccleſiaſtical Law of this Kingdom. And ſo Hobart in Colt and Glover's Caſe underſtands it, f. 147. for he produces this as an Inſtance, That the Crown always kept a poſſeſſion of its Natural Power: And to this he adds, a power of Commendam, or retaining a Benefice with a Biſhoprick, 11 H. 4. 60. This he calls a Power of Diſpenſation in Spiritualibus: But with ſubmiſſion to two ſuch great Men in the Law, If the Crown always kept a Poſſeſſion of theſe Rights, there could be no Diſpenſation with the Eccleſiaſtical Law in theſe Matters, but an Excluſion of it.

C. 12. q. 2. n. 46, 37.

As for Inſtance, The Kings of France do challenge many Privileges to themſelves in their Kingdoms, in plain Derogation to the Canon Law; and for theſe Privileges they plead an ancient Right of the Crown, or an immemorial Cuſtom: As in the great Controverſy of late Years, about the Regale, the Canon Law is expreſs, That upon Pain of Excommunication, no Lay Perſon whatſoever ſhall preſume to meddle with the Profits of vacant Biſhopricks; which was decreed by two Popes in ſeveral Councils; Urban II. in a Council at Auvergne, MXCV. and Innocent II. in a Lateran Council MCXXXIX. both entred in the Body of the Canon Law: And yet the Kings of France inſiſt to this Day on the Rights of vacant Sees, as belonging to them. But can this be pleaded as a Diſpenſing with the Eccleſiaſtical Laws allowed in that Realm? No; but that this part of the Eccleſiaſtical Law was not received there; for that partly by the Feudal Right, partly by the Right of the Crown, partly by immemorial Cuſtom, the Profits of vacant Biſhopricks accrue to the King.

C. Clerici. de Judiciis. C. cum terra de elect. C. 1. & ult. de Conſuet.

It is a harder Point to defend the Regale, where the Cuſtom hath gone along with the Canon; but if the Rights of the Crown be defended in France againſt Cuſtom and Canon too, our Kings cannot be blamed for reſuming other Rights after ſo long Uſurpation by the Popes. But where the Canon Law was not receiv'd in any part of it, there it hath no Force to oblige; and where there is no Eccleſiaſtical Law in Force, there can be no diſpenſing with it; for although the latter Canon Law doth void all Cuſtoms againſt the Liberties and Privileges of the Church, Non debet in hac parte Canonibus, ex aliqua conſuetudine præjudicium generari, yet when theſe Canoniſts come to explain it, they tell us, That an immemorial Cuſtom hath Force againſt a Canon; but how? Not as a Cuſtom, but as it is a Proof of an ancient Privilege granted by the Pope, although there be not the leaſt Footſteps of it: And ſo this Inſtance of H. 7. will prove, according to this Way, only ſome ancient Privilege our Kings had, and no Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction by the Right of the Crown.

But whether the King could diſpenſe with the Eccleſiaſtical Laws in theſe Caſes or not, it is certain the Pope challenged to himſelf the Power of doing it.

For after that the Third Council of Lateran had ſtrictly forbidden Pluralities (which were then ſo common and ſcandalous) upon pain of Forfeiture, Innocent the Third complained in the Fourth Lateran, That he ſaw little or no Benefit come by that ſevere Canon; and therefore he ſeems to make one more ſevere, That Whoſoever takes another Benefice, ſhall be deprived of the former ipſo jure; and if he ſeeks to keep it, to loſe the other. Yet after all, this ends only in the Pope's Power to diſpenſe as he ſaw Cauſe, with Perſons of greater Rank or Merit, and greater Preferments.

De Multa de Præbend.

The Words are, Circa ſublimes tamen & literatas Perſonas, quæ majoribus Beneficiis ſunt honorandæ, cum ratio poſtulaverit, per Sedem Apoſtolicam poterit diſpenſari. Here the diſpenſing Power is fairly owned in the Canon it ſelf.

And in the other Caſe, of the Incapacity of Prieſthood by Illegitimation, the ſame ſtout Pope declares, That it was in his Power to diſpenſe with that too.

C. innotuit de Elect.

The Caſe was this; The Church of Worceſter, upon the Vacancy of the See, had choſen the Arch-Deacon of York for their Biſhop; he comes to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury for Confirmation; but ſecretly confeſſes to him his Illegitimacy; (which came to the Pope's Ear.) Upon Application to the Pope for his Confirmation, he demurs upon it. He could not deny that he had all other Qualifications: But there was a Canon of the former Lateran Council, which voided the Election of all Perſons Illegitimate. So then the Buſineſs is at at end. Not ſo neither. His Predeceſſor could not hinder him from Diſpenſing in this Caſe; who had equal Power with himſelf. And there were many Reaſons to induce him to grant him a Diſpenſation. Why then did he not give one? There was ſomething elſe to be done firſt. The Diſpenſing Power muſt be owned by the Church of Worceſter: And therefore they muſt firſt intreat the Pope to Diſpenſe with him, by a humble Supplication; and then expect his Favour by Poſtulation. And ſo, for the preſent he voids his Election.

Matt. Paris takes particular Notice, That in the Publication of the Decretals by Gregory 9. This Power of Diſpenſing in theſe two Caſes, was looked on as a great Innovation; but ſuch as brought great Advantages to the Court of Rome.

Mat. Paris, ad A. D. 1235.

And the ſame Pope, ſaith Matt. Weſtminſter, voided the Election of John Bloud to the See of Canterbury, becauſe he had enjoyed two Benefices with Cure of Souls, without a Diſpenſation, And Stephanus de Segrave obtained, he ſaith, of that Popes Nuncio here, a Diſpenſation of Tot quot; but it came to nothing by his Sons Death.

Matt. Weſtm. ad A. D. 1233.

Here we ſee a Power of Diſpenſing with Eccleſiaſtical Laws, publickly owned and entred in the Body of the Canon-Law; and that by virtue of the Plenitude of the Pope's Power, which could not be bounded by the Canons of the Church, nor by the Laws of his Predeceſſors; nor by the ſolemn Profeſſion every Pope makes at his Entrance, to preſerve inviolably the Canons and Conſtitutions of his Predeceſſors.

This made ſo great an Alteration in the State of the Church, that it is no wonder great Complaints were made of it; conſidering that the Conſequence of ſuch a Power, could be nothing leſs than a ſubverſion of all Orders, and Canons, and Privileges; for there could be no Security of any of them any longer than it conſiſted with the Pope's Pleaſure.

Hence came all the Complaint of Non-obſtante's, by the whole Engliſh Nation in Parliament, That by their means Oaths, Cuſtoms, Charters, Grants, Privileges ſignified nothing; for the Pope could Diſpenſe with his own Oaths and Promiſes, as well as other Mens; and ſo there could be no Truſt in any thing he ſaid or promiſed in never ſo ſolemn a manner. Which is an effectual courſe to overthrow any Government in the World. And it is a wonder, that after ſuch groſs and avowed Violations of the moſt ſolemn Engagements, Mankind did not renounce all kind of Society with him: For that is founded upon Truſt in Compacts and Promiſes; and if thoſe may be diſſolved at Pleaſure, there is no foundation of mutual Society left; there being no reaſon to expect the Performance of that from others, which they do not think themſelves obliged to do. And ſo ſuch a Power of Diſpenſing with Obligations, naturally tends to a Diſſolution of Government. For it is ſinking the main Pillars on which the whole Fabrick ſtands; which will tumble down ſooner or later, upon the heads of thoſe who do it.

But

Mat.Paris, A.D.1253. p.873.Lib. Diurnus Pontif.30.

But the great Argument then was, That Supreme Power cannot be bound; and therefore the Popes pleaded, whatſoever Canons or Laws their Predeceſſors made, they could not tie up them; becauſe Par in Parem non habet imperium: So we find Innocent 3. argued in the Canon-Law. And to the ſame purpoſe Matt. Paris ſaith, That his Succeſſor Innocent 4. did. But they did not attend to their own Profeſſions, ſtill extant in the Liber Diurnus, wherein they did declare in the moſt ſolemn manner, That they would maintain the Canons and Conſtitutions of their Predeceſſors. Which was an abſolute Bar to all Non-obſtante's, if they acted upon Principles of common Honeſty among Men.

But beſides this, in Privileges granted to others upon valuable Conſiderations (which the Popes took care of) the Perſons to whom they are granted, become Parties, and have a real Intereſt in them; ſo that they become of the Nature of Contracts; which cannot be broken without plain Injuſtice, and diſſolving that Obligation between them.

It is agreed by the moſt Learned and Judicious Lawyers, That when Grants or Promiſes do paſs into the Nature of Contracts, they are irrevocable by the Parties that made them. And this the beſt French Canoniſts do plead againſt the Pope's Power of revoking the Gallican Liberties, ſuppoſing them at firſt to have come from the Pope's Condeſcenſions to them. And the ſame Reaſon will hold as to other Liberties.

But here lies the main Difficulty, to ſhew, When the Grants that are made by Superiors, do paſs into the Nature of Contracts; ſo that they cannot be Revoked or Diſpenſed with.

The ſhort of it is, When they are rather Capitulations than Laws. For Laws are properly the Commands of thoſe who have Authority to oblige; and the Reaſon of the Obligation is drawn from the Authority of the Perſons: But Capitulations proceed upon Conſent of Parties having differing Intereſts; and theſe among private Perſons, are called Contracts; and no one queſtions, but that ſuch all Men are by natural Juſtice bound to perform.

But the Popes inſiſted on the Plenitude of their Power; and a Queſtion is put among the Canoniſts, and variouſly debated: Whether if the Pope ſwear to ſome things in the Conclave, as that he will hold a General Council within ſuch a Time, he can Diſpenſe with himſelf, or not?

Some ſay, he is guilty of Perjury, and cannot abſolve himſelf, although he ſhould apprehend that a greater Good would come by not keeping it. For that both Pope and Emperor are bound by their own Contracts; the keeping of them being a part of Natural Juſtice, which no Plenitude of Power can Diſpenſe with; ſince all Contracts give a Right to the Perſons with whom they are made; inſomuch, that Baldus his Authority is cited by them for theſe Words, Contractus qui fiunt cum Principe, habent naturam bonæ Fidei contra Dominum; and he goes ſo far as to ſay, That the Sovereign Power is ſo obliged by the Contracts made by Princes with their own Subjects, that they are not revocable by themſelves or their Succeſſors: And if they were not obliged by their own Contracts, no Man could truſt them; and conſequently all Society with them, would be diſſolved. And whatever Supreme Power may do, as to ſuch Acts as are properly its own, yet where there is Jus quæſitum alteri (as in all Contracts there is) that cannot be taken away by it.

Baldus, in c. 2. §. Si quis vero de Pace Conſt. In. l. Digna vox. In l. 1. F. De Conſt. Princip. Jacobat. De Conciliis, l 7. f. 310. C.

But all this was anſwered on the other ſide, by the Plenitude of the Pope's Power; for it was a Contradiction, they ſaid, to own that, and to ſay, That there was any Engagement by Oath, or otherwiſe, which he could not Diſpenſe with. For, as Hank. 11 H. 4. 37. ſays, Papa omnia poteſt. And therefore all ſuch Oaths and Promiſes as limit the Pope's Diſpenſing Power, are void in themſelves. And as to Eccleſiaſtical Laws or Conſtitutions, they eaſily reſolved all Difficulties about them, upon ſuch Principles as theſe.

Hob. R. f. 146.

1. That the Popes have the ſupreme Power in the Church.
2. That the Eccleſiaſtical Laws were the Pope's Laws.
3. That it is an inſeparable Prerogative in the Pope to Diſpenſe with Eccleſiaſtical Laws upon Neceſſity and urgent Occaſions.
4. That the Pope is the ſole Judge of that Neceſſity.
5. That this was not a Truſt given to the Pope by Councils or Conclaves, but by God and St. Peter, and therefore cannot be taken away from her.

But I ſhall endeavour to give a clearer Light into this Matter, by ſhewing the ſeveral Steps and Degrees how this Diſpenſing Power came into the World, and how it paſſed from the Eccleſiaſtical to other Laws, when Princes aſſumed ſuch a Plenitude of Power in Civils, which the Popes practiſed in Eccleſiaſticals.

The firſt time we read of Diſpenſations was with reſpect to the Ancient Canons of the Church; and it implied a Relaxation of the Rigour of them; not with reſpect to their Force or binding Power, but as to the Penance which Perſons were to undergo for the Violation of them. And herein the Notion of Diſpenſing was very different from what the Canoniſts made it afterwards, when they declared it to be a Relaxation of the Law it ſelf; ſo that it ſhould not have that Force upon the Conſcience which it otherwiſe had: For, a Diſpenſation with them, is a Licence to do that which they cannot lawfully do without it; and that with a non-obſtante to that which otherwiſe makes it Unlawful. De Jure illicitum fit ex Diſpenſatione licitum, & hic eſt proprie effectus Diſpenſationis, ſaith Pyrrhus Corradus; who gives a large Account of the Practice of Diſpenſations in the Court of Rome, which conclude with a non-obſtante to any former Conſtitutions or Canons of Councils: But no ſuch thing can be found in the Ancient Practice of the Church, becauſe the Popes themſelves were then believed to be under the Canons. But when it was ſuppoſed, That the ſevere Execution of the Canons would rather hinder than advance the Good of the Church, the Governours of it thought they had ſufficient Authority to abate the rigorous Execution of them: As about the Times of Pennance, the Tranſlation of Biſhops from one See to another, the Intervals of Orders, and ſuch like. But the Popes then pretended to be ſtrict Obſervers of the Canons, when the particular Biſhops took upon them to Diſpence with the Execution of them; as appears by Ivo's Preface to his Collection of Canons, where he diſtinguiſheth the Immoveable or Moral Precepts from the Canonical; which he calls Moveable. In the former, ſaith he, no Diſpenſation is to be allowed; But in thoſe things which only concern Diſcipline, the Biſhops may diſpenſe, provided there be a Compenſation, i. e. That the Church's Intereſt may be better ſecured or advanced thereby, as he there diſcourſes at large; And his Rule is, Ibi Diſpenſatio admittenda eſt, ubi rigor periculoſus eſt: But by this means the Severity of the Primitive Diſcipline was quite loſt.

Ivo. Epiſt. 236.

The Biſhops of Rome obſerving this, thought it a proper time for them to appear zealous for the ancient Canons, which gained them a great Reputation in the World; and by this means the Cuſtody of the Canons was looked on as their particular Province: Which they improved ſo well, that at laſt they turned the Guardianſhip of the Canons into a Power over them; and then they found Fault with the Biſhops Diſpenſing with them, for another Reaſon, viz. Becauſe the Diſpenſing Power was a Prerogative of the Roman See, and inferiour Biſhops could act no farther in it than they had Authority from it.

Bernard de conſider. ad Eugenium, l. 3.

We find that in St. Bernard's time, the Pope did take upon him to Diſpenſe too far, to his great Diſſatisfaction; for by his Diſpenſing Power, he ſaith, he overthrew the Order of the Church; Murmur Loquor, ſaith he, & querimoniam Eccleſiarum. The Pope diſpenſed with the Eccleſiaſtical Laws, in Exemptions of Abbots and others from that Subordination they ſtood in to their proper Superiors: He ſaith, He could not ſee how this Diſpenſing Power could be juſtified: You do indeed ſhew a plenitude of Power, but it may be not of Juſtice; you ſhew what you can do, but it is a Queſtion whether you ought or not; and you ought to conſider, firſt, Whether it be lawful; then, Whether it be decent; and laſtly, Whether it be expedient. At laſt, he allows a Diſpenſing Power in two Caſes, Urgent Neceſſity, and Common Good; otherwiſe he ſaith, It is not fidelis Diſpenſatio, ſed crudelis Diſſipatio, an overthrow of all Order and Government. In one of his Epiſtles he ſpeaks ſharply againſt getting a Diſpenſation to do that which it was not lawful to do without one: And he thinks he hath diſproved it by invincible Reaſon, for a Licence from the Pope can never make that Lawful, which without it were Unlawful.

Bernard. Epiſt. 7.

When the Practice of the Diſpenſing Power grew more common, there were two great Queſtions raiſed concerning it; whether if a Diſpenſation were granted without Juſt Cauſe, it were Lawful or not? And whether if it were not Lawful, yet it was valid? There were ſome who flattered the Diſpenſing Power ſo much, that they allowed it in all Caſes, whether there were a juſt Cauſe or not: Theſe were the high flown Canoniſts, who reſolved all Laws into Will and Pleaſure: But others, who allowed a Diſpenſing Power upon a Juſt Cauſe, yet thought it repugnant to the Original Deſign of Government, for thoſe who are entruſted with Care of the Laws to Diſpenſe with them, without ſuch a Cauſe as anſwers the End of Government: And ſome went ſo far, as to deny any Validity in a Diſpenſation granted upon Pleaſure; for as an unjuſt Law hath no Force, ſo, ſaid they, an unjuſt Diſpenſation of a Good Law hath none.

Suarez de legibus, l. 6. c 18, 19. Vaughans. Suar. c. 18. n. 6.

Upon this Point two great School-men differ. Suarez, whom the Lord Chief Juſtice Vaughan commends for his Learning in this Matter, goes upon theſe Grounds,

1. That a Prince is not Dominus, ſed Diſpenſator Legum; although the Force of a Law depends upon his Authority; and therefore in Diſpenſing with a Law he doth not Act by Abſolute Power, but by Adminſtration: For he is not Lord over the Community, but Governour.

n. 26.

2. That for him to Diſpenſe in a Law made for the Community, without a juſt Cauſe, is not only malum quia prohibitum, ſed ex ſe, & ex natura rei & ſemper malum: Therefore Suarez was far from thinking a Prince might Diſpenſe with any thing that was not malum in ſe; for he makes makes it to be ſo, for him to diſpenſe with a malum quia prohibitum, if it be prohibited by a Law made for a publick Good, and there be no juſt Cauſe for it.

3. That although a Prince ſins in diſpenſing with ſuch a Law, yet his Diſpenſation holds as to the Force of the Law; which he ſuppoſes to depend on the Will of the Prince; and therefore his Will being altered, the Obligation ceaſeth as to the Perſons diſpenſed with. C. 19. n. 6.

4. That altho' ſuch a Diſpenſation holds as to the Law, yet he thinks a Prince bound in Conſcience to revoke ſuch a Diſpenſation, becauſe it is unlawful for him to perſiſt in ſuch a Will, it being repugnant to the Common Good, and the Obligation of his Duty. n. 9.

5. That if ſuch a Diſpenſation be to the Injury of a third Perſon, then it is void in it ſelf, as being repugnant to Juſtice. n. 10.

Vaſquez ſaith, They are all agreed, That no Prince hath a Power to diſpenſe with his Laws according to his Pleaſure, or becauſe they are his Laws: But he ſaith, There is a Diſpute, Whether an unlawful Diſpenſation be valid or not? And he thinks not; and that a Man's Action after the Diſpenſation is as faulty as if there had been none. His Reaſon is, Becauſe a Prince is bound by his own Laws, ſo that he cannot diſpenſe with himſelf as to the Obligation of them; for if he could at Pleaſure diſpenſe with himſelf, he could never be bound; for how can a Man be bound to keep a Law, in which he can diſpenſe with himſelf when he pleaſes? And if he cannot diſpenſe with himſelf, much leſs with any under him. Vaſq. 1. 2. Diſp. 178. c. 4. n. 34.

Having thus endeavoured to clear the Nature and Original of the diſpenſing Power, I now come,

(2.) To the Reaſon aſſigned by Sir E. Coke, from the Year Books, why the King may diſpenſe with Laws, becauſe they be mala prohibita, and not mala per ſe.

My Lord Vaughan ſaid right concerning it, That this Rule had more confounded Mens Judgments on this Subject than rectified them. Vaugh. R. f. 332.

Which I ſhall make appear by ſhewing,

I. That it alters the Frame of our Government.

II. That it takes away all Security by Law.

III. That it contradicts the Senſe of our Nation in former Ages.

IV. That the Rule is contrary to the Precedents in Law.

1. That it alters the Frame of our Government.

For it goes upon a very falſe Ground, viz. That the King may diſpenſe with any thing which is not evil in its own Nature, or antecedently to any Human Laws; which is to ſuppoſe the whole Legiſlative Power to be lodged in the Perſon of the King.

For all who underſtand theſe Matters do agree, That a Power to diſpenſe with Laws, is the ſame with a Power to make them.

Diſpenſare, hoc eſt, lege ſolvere is ſolus poteſt, qui ferendæ abrogandæq; legis poteſtatem habet, ſaith H. Grotius. Grot. de æquit. Indulg. & facilitate, c. 2. n. 10.

Suarez ſaith, He hath the Power of diſpenſing, qui legem tulit, quia ab ejus voluntate & potentia pendet. Suarez de leg. l. 6. c. 14. n. 2.

Vaſquez, That the diſpenſing Power lies in him, qui habet poteſtatem condendi & abrogandi legem. Vaſquez 1, 2 diſp. 178. c. 2.

Pufendorf, That none can diſpenſe with a Law, but ſuch as have the Power of making it. Pufendorf de jure naturæ, & gent. l. 1. c. 6. n. 17.

But we need no Authorities in this Matter: For to diſpenſe (in the Senſe it is here taken) is to take away the Obligation of a Law; and whoever takes it away, muſt have the Power of laying it on. And there is no Difference between the Diſpenſation with a Law, and the Abrogation of it; but that a Diſpenſation is an Abrogation of it to particular Perſons, while others are under the Force of it; and an Abrogation is a general Diſpenſation, that being no more than a Relaxation of the whole Law, to thoſe Perſons who were bound by it before: But if a part of the Law be taken away, as to the whole Community, then it is called a Derogation of it; but if the Law be relaxed only for a limited Time, and under certain Conditions, then it is not an Abrogation, but an Indulgence or Suſpenſion of the Law.

To diſpenſe with a Law is more than to give an equitable Senſe, or a favourable Interpretation of a Law; for he that interprets a Law, ſuppoſes his Interpretation to agree with the Senſe and Deſign of the Law; he that diſpenſes, owns that which he diſpenſes with to be againſt the Intention of the Law, but that he hath Power to take away the Force of it, ſo far as he thinks fit.

He that ſaith, Thou ſhalt not kill, doth not reach to Legal Executioners of Juſtice, interprets the Law according to Reaſon and Equity: But when God ſaid to Abraham, Go and ſacrifice thy Son, he muſt be ſuppoſed, by virtue of his Supreme Authority, to diſpenſe with the Law in his Caſe, ſo as to make that lawful upon his Command, which would not have been ſo without it.

Some will not allow this to be called a Diſpenſation, but an Alteration of the Matter of the Law; but when that Alteration comes from the Authority of the Law Makers, it is the ſame; ſo that to interpret a Law is an Act of Diſcretion and Judgment, but to diſpenſe with it of Authority and Juriſdiction. And none can therefore diſpenſe in the Law of God, but he that made it; all that the wiſeſt and greateſt Men can juſtly pretend to, is no more than to give the true Senſe of it; and it is intolerable Preſumption for any Creature to pretend to more.

An equitable Senſe, as to Human Law, is not always that which ſeems to be moſt favourable to thoſe who go againſt the Letter of it, but that which moſt enforces the End and Deſign of the Law, although it be not comprehended in the Words of it.

If a Law mentions a Crime of a leſſer nature, in regard of Circumſtances, and in regard of thoſe Circumſtances, promiſes ſome Favour, (as Benefit of the Clergy) it can be no equitable Senſe to extend it to ſuch Acts which have worſe Circumſtances, becauſe the Ground of the Favour was the extenuation of the Fact by the Circumſtances: So that the chief Rule of Equity in the Interpretation of a Law, is to attend to the Intention and Deſign of it, more than to the bare Words.

The Intention and Deſign of the Law is not to be meaſured by particular and accidental Caſes, wherein ſome Inconveniences are to be born, but by the Publick and General Good, which more than makes amends for them; which is the Reaſon of that Maxim, Better a Miſchief than an Inconvenience; which is falſe, unleſs taken in ſuch an equitable Senſe.

There are certain Ways of Reaſon, which Mankind do allow in the equitable Interpretation of Laws, as, That no poſitive Law muſt be interpreted againſt Natural and Divine Laws: That if Laws contradict each other, one or the other muſt loſe its Force: That no Caſe which overthrows a Law by neceſſary Conſequence, was ever intended to be allowed by it; For that were to make a Law, and to give a Liberty to break it at the ſame time.

If a Law be deſigned for a Publick Good, and an Exception be afterwards made againſt it, as to the Incapacity of ſome Perſons by it for publick Service, which could not but be foreſeen and conſidered at the time of making the Law, there is no Reaſon that ſhould be alledged as a Reaſon for Diſpenſing with the Law, which was intended at firſt by the Law: For however the Caſe may be put, as to ſuch things which could not be foreſeen at the making of a Law, yet what was intended to be prevented by the making it, cannot in Reaſon be alledged againſt it; becauſe if there had not been other things to have over-balanced that Inconvenience the Law had never been paſſed.

There is no doubt but the ſame Power which makes a Law, may Diſpenſe with it if it ſees Cauſe; for if it can Abrogate a Law, as to the whole Community, it may as well Diſpenſe with it as to particular Perſons, and leave it in Force to all others.

The Queſtion then is, Whether a Prince aſſuming to himſelf a Diſpenſing Power, doth not thereby aſſume the Legiſlative too? Since it appears, That there can be no Power to take off the Obligation of a Law, but that which cauſes it, although it be with reſpect to particular Perſons; but if it amount to a General Suſpenſion of a Law, there can be no Queſtion to thoſe who underſtand what theſe things mean.

Our preſent Buſineſs was to ſhew, that if the King can diſpenſe with Mala prohibita, as ſuch, the Legiſlative Power muſt be reſolved into him, becauſe a Diſpenſing Power can be referred to no other: And if the King may diſpenſe with all Mala prohibita, he may diſpenſe with all juſt humane Laws. For no Law can be juſt which requires Malum in ſe; and therefore ſuch a Law being void of it ſelf, there can be no Exerciſe of a diſpenſing Power but concerning Mala prohibita. And if the King can therefore diſpenſe becauſe they are only prohibited, then from a Parity of Reaſon he may diſpenſe with all Laws that concern only ſuch things; and we cannot be ſecure of any Laws, but ſuch as forbid things that are evil in themſelves.

II. And this is my Second Reaſon againſt it, That it takes away all Security by our Laws, both as to our Religion and Liberties.

1. As to our Religion: I grant, that to take away all Religion is Malum in ſe; to take away the true Religion is Malum in ſe; but in a Nation divided about the true Religion, and where the Prince is of one Opinion, and the main Body of the Nation of another, concerning it, what Security can the People by this Rule have, as to the enjoying that which they account the true Religion, but the Prince doth not? The utmoſt we can ſuppoſe in this Caſe is, for ſuch Laws to be made, as they apprehend to be moſt effectual for this Purpoſe. But what Security can theſe Laws afford, if the Prince aſſume a Power of Diſpenſing with Eccleſiaſtical Laws? It is not poſſible they can have any, unleſs they can be ſecure he ſhall never exerciſe this Diſpenſing Power; for by it he may equally ſuſpend all Laws which relate to it; he may give a Diſpenſation to ſuch as are unqualified by our Laws, and put them not only into Places of Authority and Truſt, but into all Eccleſiaſtical Preferments as ſoon as he thinks fit, and that without any Check upon his Conſcience, becauſe thoſe whoſe Office it is to interpret the Laws, tell him, he hath ſuch a Power by Law to diſpenſe with Eccleſiaſtical Laws, although paſſed in the ſolemneſt manner, and with a Deſign to give Security to the People concerning the preſerving their Religion.

And the higher this Point is carried, ſtill the leſs Security. For if it be thought ſuch a Prerogative of the Crown, as voids all that is made againſt it, then Laws ſignify juſt nothing: For every Law is a Limitation of unbounded Will and Power; and therefore Laws afford no manner of Security; for either they are void of themſelves, or may be made void when a Sovereign Prince pleaſes. And I think (as Men are) meer Will and Pleaſure will never be taken for an infallible Security.

But it may be ſaid, That taking away the true Religion is Malum in ſe, and therefore by this Rule ſuch Laws cannot be diſpenſed with.

Very true; we think ſo: But ſuppoſe a King of another Opinion, and that he ſhould think it good Service to deſtroy Hereſy and Schiſm, and thoſe are Mala in ſe; what Security can there be then from this Rule? For the ſame Perſons who aſſert the Diſpenſing Power, make the King to be Judge, not meerly of the Neceſſity and urgent Occaſions, but of what is Malum in ſe, and what not? Suppoſe then he ſhould look on our Religion as Hereſy and Schiſm, what poſſible Security can this Diſtinction afford us?

2. As to our Civil Liberties, which are founded upon our Laws, made by the Conſent of King and People. But if there be ſuch an inſeparable Prerogative in the Crown, as enables the King to diſpenſe with all Mala prohibita, what becomes of all the ancient Charters of Liberties? For no one can pretend that the contrary to them all are Mala in ſe. And if there be no farther Security than what this Diſtinction affords, we are in a very precarious Condition, as to all our Liberties.

I confeſs the Caſe is different as to the Eccleſiaſtical Laws mentioned in 11 H. 7. 12. and as to our Civil Liberties; becauſe theſe Eccleſiaſtical Laws had their Force as ſuch from a foreign Power; and as far as they were the Laws of the Kingdom, it was by a Tacit Conſent and Acceptation, and not by any ſolemn enacting of them. And as to ſuch as theſe, where the Laws were not received, and the things were no farther evil, than as they were prohibited by ſuch a foreign Power, there is nothing but what is reaſonable in the Caſe of 11 H. 7. 12. as it is in the Books.

But when this hath been extended to Laws which have paſſed in the moſt ſolemn manner by the King in Parliament, it is time not only to take notice of, but to ſet forth the miſchievous Conſequences of this Diſtinction, as it is ſo applied; for it leaves us under no manner of Security by our Laws.

3. It contradicts the Senſe of our own Nation in former Ages. Which I ſhall ſhew in a remarkable Inſtance about the Statutes of Proviſors, 35 E. 1. 25 E. 3. 13 R. 2, which were prohibitory Statutes. And it cannot be ſuppoſed that at that time, when the Pope was allowed to be Head of the Church, and conſequently Supreme Patron of the Benefices of it, that the Acceptance of a Title to an Eccleſiaſtical Benefice from him ſhould be thought Malum in ſe. But theſe Statutes being in force, I ſhall make it appear, that the King did own he had no Power to diſpenſe with them, but as the Parliament thought fit to allow it.

I begin with 15 R. 2. at a time when the Kingdom was in quiet, and however could not be in any diſturbance on the Account of the Statute of Proviſors, which the Nation deſired, and only thoſe who depended on the Court of Rome oppoſed. But the Court-Biſhops ſuggeſted that it was for the King's Intereſt in dealing with the Court of Rome, to have a Power to Relax and to Diſpenſe with theſe Statutes as he ſaw Cauſe. Therefore the Archbiſhop of York, then Chancellor, propoſed it in the opening of the Parliament, as one of the things for which it was called, viz. To find out a Temperament in that Matter, ſo as the Pope might not loſe his Right, nor the King his. Rot. Par. 15. R. 2. n. 1. After this Matter was debated the Commons declare their Aſſent en plein Parliament, That n. 8. without prejudice to the Rights of thoſe who were in poſſeſſion by virtue of the Statute, the King by the Advice and Conſent of the Lords, might diſpenſe with the ſaid Statute, ſo as ſhould ſeem reaſonable and uſeful till the next Parliament, but ſo as the ſaid Statute be repealed in no Article of it. And they reſerve to themſelves the Liberty of diſagreeing the next Parliament. And they conclude with a ſolemn Proteſtation, That this was a Novelty not practiſed before, and ought not to be drawn into Example and Precedent for the future; and they deſire this Proteſtation might be Entred and Recorded in the Rolls of Parliament; which the King commanded to be done. Doth this now look like a Declaratory Act, and made in Affirmance of the King's Diſpenſing Power? It might as well be ſaid, That an Act for Reſtraining the Prerogative, is made in Affirmance of it. It is true, there is a Diſpenſing Power granted, but with ſuch Reſtrictions and Limitations as ſhew, that ſuch a Power was not then thought to be inherent in the Crown. For,

1. Why ſhould it be propoſed to the Parliament to grant it, if the King had it before? Did the King ever put it to the Parliament to grant him a Power to Pardon Malefactors? But in the caſe of Diſpenſing with a Law, it was not only propoſed but aſſigned, as one Reaſon of calling the Parliament.

2. Why till the next Parliament, if it were owned to be an inherent Right of the Crown? Would the Parliament go about to bound and limit an inſeparable Prerogative in ſuch a manner?

3. Why is it called a Novelty, and a thing not to be drawn into example? Was ever any thing like this ſaid of a Declaratory Act? The Natural Conſequence whereof is juſt contrary; that whereas ſome Juſt Right of the Crown hath been conteſted and denied, for the future it ought to be owned and ſubmitted to by all Perſons. It is hard to think of Words more inconſiſtent with a meer Declaratory Act than thoſe, Ne ſoit trait en enſample nen Conſequence en temps avenir.

4. If this were a Declaratory Act, what need it be repeated ſo often in Parliament afterwards? Were the Commons ſo forgetful of the King's Prerogative, as to need making ſo many Declaratory Acts about the ſame thing? Yet thus we find it about this Diſpenſing Power, as to the Statutes of Proviſors.

For 16 R. 2. The Archbiſhop of York again declared in the opening of the Parliament, That one Cauſe of calling it, was to ſettle this Matter about Proviſors. Rot. Parl. 16. R. 2. n. 8. And the Commons again yielded, The King ſhould have ſuch a Power to moderate it, as he ſhould with his Council judge expedient, but ſo as it be all laid open before the next Parliament, that they might upon good Advice agree to it.

17 R. 2. Tydeman, Abbot of Beauley, was by the Pope's Proviſion, made Biſhop of Landaff. Rot. Parl. 17. R. 2. n. 22. But the King, notwithſtanding the former Proceedings, did not take upon him to Diſpenſe with the Statute, but left it to the Parliament; and his Diſpenſation was paſſed ſed by Act of Parliament, the King, Lords and Commons aſſenting thereto.

Rot. Parl. 20. R. 2. n. 21. 20 R. 2. The Commons in Parliament do again Aſſert, de bon gre de leur parte en plein Parliament, That the King with his Council may diſpenſe with the Statute of Proviſors, as ſhall ſeem fit, ſo as the ſame be heard and examined the next Parliament, and ſo corrected as ſhall be thought convenient by the King, with the Advice of his Council in Parliament.

Rot. Parl. 1 H. 4. n. 85. 1 H. 4. The Commons in like manner give their Aſſent, That the King ſhould have the ſame Power of Diſpenſing with the Statute, which his Predeceſſors had, and to Repeal and Annul it, as ſhould ſeem expedient to him. Which was no more than a General Diſpenſation. Yet notwithſtanding this was recorded in Parliament.

Rot. Parl. 2 H. 4. n. 26. 2 H. 4. The Commons appearing before the King and the Lords, it was declared, That the Diſpenſation ſhould not extend to Cardinals or other Strangers. n. 42. At the ſame Parliament a Petition was preſented to the King, That if any one did accept a Benefice by Papal Proviſion, againſt the Statute, and had his Pardon from the King for it; yet if he went about to diſturb the preſent Poſſeſſor, by virtue of his Proviſion, then his pardon ſhould be void, and he ſhould incur the Penalty of the Statute, to which the King gave his Aſſent.

Rot. Parl. 7 H. 4. n. 134. 7 H. 4. The King having granted particular Licences for Diſpenſations as to this Statute, and finding the great Inconveniences which came by them, he generally and univerſally revoked them, and promiſed in Parliament to find out ſome proper Remedy in this Matter.

Rot. Parl. ib. 7 H. 4. The King was moved in Parliament to Confirm that Revocation; but he then took time to conſider. But 9 H. 4. c. 8. the King reinforced in Parliament all the Statutes againſt Proviſors; as it is in Print.

Rot. Parl. 1 H. 5. n. 22. 1 H. 5. The Commons pray, That the Statutes may ſtand in full force againſt Proviſors; and that no Protection or Grant made by the King to hinder the Execution of the ſaid Statutes, ſhall be allowable, or of any force; and whatever is done contrary to them, ſhall be null.

The Anſwer is, Let the Statutes be obſerved and kept. But if the Statutes were to be ſtrictly obſerved, what ſaving can there be to the King's Prerogative? ſince the Statutes were Univerſal, and the King's particular Grants in this Caſe were the great Motive of the Commons Deſire to have them reinforced, in the beginning of this King's Reign: And theſe Statutes continued in full Force to the Time of H. 8. inſomuch, that Cardinal Woolſey was proſecuted by the King's Attorney, for offending againſt them by his Legatine Power, although he had the King's Aſſent to it, and he exerciſed it ſeveral Years by his Permiſſion. Stephen Gardiner in his Letter to the Protector, ſaith, That he obtained his Legatine Power by the King's Aſſent: From whence he obſerves, What Danger they may fall in, who break the Law with the King's Conſent; for in the Cardinal's Caſe, he ſaith, That becauſe his Legatine Power was againſt the Laws of the Realm, the Judges conclude the Offence to be ſuch as incurred the Præmunire: And this he Aſſerts was the Senſe of the Lawyers of that Time; and for confirmation of it, he brought the Caſe of the Lord Tiptoft, who ſuffered on Tower-Hill, becauſe in Execution of the King's Commiſſion, he had offended againſt the Laws of the Realm: And of many Judges who had Fines ſet on their Heads in like Caſe, for acting againſt the Law of the Realm by the King's Commandment.

But it is pleaded on the other ſide, That the Commons, 1 H. 5. n. 22. put in the ſaving the King's Prerogative into their Petition concerning the Statute of Proviſors, that it may ſtand in full Force: And this was an owning the King's Diſpenſing Power by all the Commons in Parliament, when they were in a high Debate with the Crown.

Short Account, p. 25.

This ſeems to have a good ſhew of Reaſon to any one that doth not conſider the Practice of thoſe Times, in Acts of Parliament; for the Petitions of the Commons, before 2 H. 5. were not taken entire and juſt as they delivered them; but ſeveral Clauſes were inſerted by the Court, eſpecially ſuch as ſeemed to preſerve the King's Prerogative; which the Commons found ſo inconvenient, That the next Year, as Serjeant Glanvil obſerved, (and probably on the Occaſion of theſe Savings, 1 H. 5. n. 15, and n. 22.) the Courſe was altered, and hath ſo continued.

Ruſhworth's Collections, vol. 1. p. 574.

Therefore methinks ſo great Weight ſhould not be laid on theſe Savings, as if they implied the owning the Diſpenſing Power, when the Deſign of the Law was againſt it. And the King's Anſwer is, Let the Statutes be held and kept.

I appeal to any Man's Underſtanding, whether the ſaving the King's Prerogative can be any other than a General Clauſe put in, without reſpect to the Diſpenſing Power; ſince the Petition is againſt the Exerciſe of it, and the Anſwer, That the Statutes ſhould be obſerved. If they were obſerved, what Uſe of the Diſpenſing Power; for that lay in giving leave not to obſerve them? What ſtrange Senſe is this, The King promiſes, The Statutes ſhall be kept, ſaving his Prerogative, that they may not be kept? For they feared the not keeping them from ſuch a Prerogative: and when the King therefore yields that they ſhall be kept, he doth give up ſuch a Prerogative, or elſe he doth not anſwer their Petition.

The Truth is, when the Kings had got this Power into their Hands, tho' it were with ſuch Limitations at firſt, yet they found Arts from time to time to keep it, till at laſt they were unwilling to part with it; as appears by H. 4. but upon the reſtleſs Importunity of the Commons it was laid down by him. And now in the beginning of H. 5. the Commons took Care to prevent its Riſing in a new Reign; but he being a Prince not ready to part with any thing which looked like Power, was in probability, not eaſie to be brought to confirm the Statutes of Proviſors, without ſome general Words of ſaving his Prerogative, which the Commons might yield to, that they might gain the main Point; ſince thoſe Words could ſignifie nothing againſt the very intention and deſign of the Law.

IV. The Precedents in Law do contradict this Rule; as will appear by thoſe which are produced by the Lord Chief Juſtice Vaughan, in the Caſe of Thomas and Sorrel.

Vaugh. Rep. f. 337.

1. The King cannot Diſpence with a Common Nuſance, for, The King, he ſaith, cannot pardon continuing Nuſances; but the Penalty he may.

The King cannot diſpenſe with a Nuſance to the High-Ways, by 11 H. 7. he cannot pardon or diſcharge the Nuſance, or the Suit for the ſame, the High-Ways being neceſſary for ſuch as Travel; but Common Nuſances are not mala in ſe, which are not Evils at Common Law, (as ſome underſtand them) but things ſo intrinſecally Evil, that no Circumſtances can make them lawful. Malum in ſe is a Moral Evil, in its own Nature; and therefore can never be diſpenſed with; but a Nuſance at Common Law is but a Natural Evil, and all the Moral Evil of it lies in the Prohibition by Law: And yet in theſe, it is granted, That the King cannot diſpenſe: And the Year Book ſaith, That a Licence to make a Nuſance in the High-Way were void: For what Reaſon? Is it a thing forbidden by the Natural or Divine Law? Cannot the King, for his Will and Pleaſure, Licence the making a Nuſance? and yet is it poſſible for Men of Senſe to imagine, That he can by his Diſpenſing Power give leave to do ſuch things, as in conſequence overthrow our Laws and Religion? Doth the Law take greater Care of the High-Way than of our Liberties and Religion? This would ſeem ſtrange Doctrine to People of another Country, viz. That by the Law of England the King hath no Power over the High-Way, to diſpenſe with a Common Nuſance therein, but he hath over the Laws made for the moſt Publick Good and Security of the Nation. And truly this cannot but ſeem ſtrange to as many among our ſelves, as allow themſelves the Liberty of thinking; Doth the Law only take care of Oxen and High-Ways?

f.358. But it is well obſerved by the Learned Chief Juſtice Vaughan, That Publick Nuſances, are not mala in ſe, but mala politica & introducta; and when a thing is ſaid to be prohibited by the Common Law the meaning is no more but that the Ancient Record of ſuch a Prohibition is not to be found.

f.333. f.334. 2. The King cannot pardon the Damage done to particular Perſons, ſaith the ſame Chief Juſtice, where the Suit is only the Kings, but for the Benefit and Safety of a third Perſon, the King cannot diſpenſe with the Suit, but by Conſent and Agreement of the Party concerned. And again, f.335. Penal Laws, the Breach whereof are to Men's particular Damage, cannot be diſpenſed with.

f.29. And the Chief Juſtice Herbert owns, That the King cannot diſpenſe with Laws which veſt the leaſt Right or Property in any of his Subjects.

Here we ſee, the Prerogative bounded, where the Intereſt of particular Perſons is concerned; but doth the Law take more Care of them than of the Publick Intereſt, and the Concernment of the whole Nation?

Short Account, p.21. But I find another Diſtinction in this Caſe, viz. “There is Bonum Publicum; and Laws made for that may be diſpenſed with; And there is Bonum ſingularem Populi; and with Laws that concern that the King cannot diſpenſe.

This is admirable Learning, if it be brought out of theſe Terms: And the meaning is, The King can do nothing to the prejudice of the People in their private Capacities, but he can do what he will with the Publick. I had thought, a Prince had been, in the firſt place, bound to regard the good of the Publick, and to take Care of the ſalus Populi complicati, (as it is called) i. e. as they are imbodied together, and not of the private Intereſts of particular Men, which can never be preſerved, when the Publick Safety is not ſecured.

V.R.f.342. 3. It is granted, That in Penal Laws, by Act of Parliament, where the Offenders are puniſhable at the King's Suit, but where the Offence is to the immediate Wrong of particular Perſons, and for which the Law gives them ſpecial Actions, the King cannot diſpenſe.

Never was Law more tender of the Intereſt of particular Perſons than ours: But ſuppoſe a penal Law by Act of Parliament relates immediately to the Publick, and gives no particular Perſons any ſpecial Actions; is ſuch a Law therefore diſpenſable, becauſe only the publick Good, and the Safety of the Nation are concerned? Which are not (it ſeems) to be valued with the private Intereſts of particular Men. They who affirm ſuch things may be very learned in Book Caſes, but they do not ſeem to have ſtudied the Jus Publicum, as Bracton calls it, which concerns Statum Reipub. or the political Law of this Nation; which ſhews the great Reſpect which the Good of the Community ought to have above private Intereſts: But when Perſons take up their Notions and Maxims from Laws relating to Meum and Tuum, they are very apt to judge of publick Laws according to thoſe Meaſures. Bract. l. c. 5. n. 2.

4. It is granted, That the King cannot licenſe a Baker, Brewer, or Victualler to break the Aſſize of Bread or Ale, nor a Miller to take more Toll than the Law appoints, (therefore theſe are mala prohibita) nor a Taverner to break the Aſſize of Wine; nor a Butcher to ſell meaſled Swines Fleſh, or Murrain Fleſh; nor any Man to foreſtal the Market, by a Non-obſtante of the Statute de Piſtoribus, which prohibits all theſe under ſeveral Penalties. f. 349.

Nor can he licenſe Butchers, Fiſhmongers, Poulterers, or other Sellers of Victuals, nor Hoſtlers, to ſell Hay and Oats at what Price they pleaſe, by a Non-obſtante of the Statute of 23 E. 3. c. 6. and 13 R. 2. c. 8.

Still the Law is extreamly tender of us, as to Meat and Drink, and not only for our ſelves, but for our Horſes too; ſo that the King cannot diſpenſe with the Laws about them: And yet can we think ſo meanly of the Wiſdom of our Anceſtors, that they would take ſuch Care of Bread, and Wine, and Horſe-Meat, that the King himſelf could not inhance the Price of them; but that as to their Laws, which relate to the Publick, they were content to leave them to the Will and Pleaſure of their Prince? No one that reads the Hiſtory of our Anceſtors, and the Conteſts they had with Kings to obtain their publick Liberties, could ever entertain ſuch a Thought concerning them.

5. If Foreign Manufactures or Foreign Corn be prohibited for ſupport of the Natives, a Licence to one or more to bring them in, if general, is void by the Caſe of Monopolies, notwithſtanding a Non-obſtante. f. 344.

This is certainly Malum prohibitum, and yet the King cannot diſpenſe with it. And it is really a very hard Caſe, if the King cannot diſpenſe with a Monopoly in Trade, and may diſpenſe with a Monopoly in Religion, i. e. That notwithſtanding all the Laws for ſettling our Religion at Home, he may grant a Licence to Foreigners to introduce another, although never ſo repugnant to our Laws; for none who underſtood our Affairs, could imagine, That this diſpenſing Power was ſet up for any other End.

But what ſhall we ſay to the Precedents on the other ſide? I ſhall paſs by others, which have been ſufficiently anſwered already, and only ſpeak to that which above all others hath been declared to be the Foundation of the diſpenſing Power, and therefore deſerves to be further cleared, and that is,

The Caſe of diſpenſing with the Statutes about Mens continuing Sheriffs more than a Year; which is urged as plain and concluding, becauſe it was for a publick Good, and preventing great Miſcheefs; yet the King's Power of diſpenſing in this Caſe was allowed by all the Judges of England, 2 H. 7. and this hath been cited as adjudged in ſeveral Books of great Au- Short Account, p. 3.

thority,

thority, Fitz-Herbert, Plowden, Coke, &c. and the Practice hath ever ſince been accordingly.

This is the whole ſtrength of the Argument. And I ſhall not repeat what others have already ſaid, to ſhew that this was not the Reaſon of the Judicial Sentence then given; but the particular Ground of one of the Judges, after they had declared the Patent to be good. But however that were, it cannot be deny'd, that great Lawyers ſince that time have taken it to have been the Senſe of the Judges then. For Coke's Words are expreſs in Calvin's Caſe, It is enacted by the Parliament of 23 H. 6. That no Man ſhould ſerve the King as Sheriff of any County above one Year, and that notwithſtanding of any Clauſe of Non-obſtante to the contrary, that is to ſay, notwithſtanding that the King ſhould expreſly diſpenſe with the ſaid Statute; howbeit it is agreed in 2 H. 7. That againſt the expreſs purview of that Act, the King may by a ſpecial Non-obſtante diſpenſe with that Act. 7 R. 14.

Here it is plain, that in Coke's Opinion at leaſt, the Judges did agree, that although the King and Parliament had made an Act which made void any Grant with a Non-obſtante, yet that ſuch a Grant made afterwards, with a ſpecial Non-obſtante, was good.

I am not much concerned, whether it were their Opinion or not, becauſe I think there is much greater Reaſon and ſtronger Authority on the other ſide.

1. As to Reaſon: If a Non-obſtante from the King be good, when by Act of Parliament a Non-obſtante is declared void, what doth an Act of Parliament ſignifie in ſuch a Caſe? Muſt we ſay, It is a void Clauſe? But then to what purpoſe was it put in? Did they who made the Act, underſtand it to be a void Clauſe when they put it in? Certainly, it was then thought otherwiſe; and if it were ſo, we have the Authority of the Parliament againſt the Opinion of the Judges. If it were not a void Clauſe then, how came it to be ſo afterwards? What Alteration was made in the Law of England in that Interval, and by whom? How comes a Clauſe that had force in 23 H. 6. to have none, 2 H. 7? Could Radcliff or the reſt, by their Opinions deſtroy the Force of an Act of Parliament?

12 R. f. 18. No; But Coke ſaith, No Act can bind the King from any Prerogative which is ſole and inſeparable from his Perſon; but he may diſpenſe with it by a Non-obſtante, as a Sovereign Power to command any of his Subjects to ſerve him for the Publick Weal, and this ſolely and inſeparably is annexed to his Perſon; and this Royal Power cannot be reſtrained by any Act of Parliament, neither in Theſi, nor in Hypotheſi; but that the King by his Royal Power may diſpenſe with it; for upon the Commandment of the King, and Obedience of the Subject, does his Government conſiſt, as it is provided by the Statute of 23 H. 6. c. 8. That all Patents made or to be made of any Office of a Sheriff, &c. for Term of Years, or for Life, in Fee Simple or in Tail, are void and of none effect, any Clauſe or Parole of Non-obſtante put or to be put into ſuch Patents to be made notwithſtanding. And further, Whoſoever ſhall take upon him or them to accept or occupy ſuch Office of Sheriff, by virtue of ſuch Grants or Patents, ſhall ſtand perpetually diſabled to be or bear the Office of Sheriff within any County of England, by the ſame Authority. And notwithſtanding that by this Act, 1. The Patent is made void. 2. The King is reſtrained to grant a Non-obſtante. 3. The Grantee diſabled to take the Office; yet the King by his Royal Sovereign Power of commanding, may command by his Patent (for ſuch Cauſes as he in his Wiſdom doth think meet and profitable for himſelf and the Commonwealth, of which he himſelf is ſole Judge) to ſerve him and the Weal Publick, as Sheriff for ſuch a County, for Years or for Life, &c. And ſo was it reſolved by all the Juſtices of England in the Exchequer-Chamber, 2 H. 7.

Here the Point is reſolved into an inſeparable Prerogative in the King, which no Act of Parliament can reſtrain, although made with his own Conſent. Is there no Act of Parliament then, which this great Lawyer will allow to reſtrain the King's Prerogative, ſo as he cannot diſpenſe with it? What ſaith he to the Caſe of Buying Offices at Court? Cannot the King, by virtue of his Prerogative, order his Houſhold as he pleaſes, to diſpoſe of Offices about him as he thinks fit? No. The ſame 1 Inſt. 234. Lawyer ſaith, That no Non-obſtante could diſpenſe with the Act againſt buying of Offices. And yet one would think that the King had as great a prerogative in the Court, as over the Kingdom.

But how comes he to ſay, That the King can diſpenſe notwithſtanding the Diſability, when elſewhere he ſaith, The King cannot diſpenſe in the Caſe of a Diſability by Law? For the Reaſon he gives why the King 1 Inſt. 120. cannot preſent a Man to a Living who is convict of Simony, is becauſe 3 Inſt. 154. the Law hath diſabled him. Very well. And yet in this Caſe, although the Law hath diſabled him, the King may diſpenſe. Where are we now? The King can diſpenſe with a Diſability, and he cannot diſpenſe with it. This is indeed a very dark learning of Diſpenſations, as Chief Juſtice Vaughan well called it; for we cannot yet find the way through it.

Can the King diſpenſe with ſuch a Diſability in Law or not? If not, the Caſe of Sheriffs is gone. If he can, then why not in the caſe of Simony? Why not, as to ſitting in Parliament without taking the Oaths? No; here is a Diſability in Law. What then? Cannot the King diſpenſe with a Diſability in one Caſe as well as the other? But the ſame Perſon ſaith, That in that Caſe, becauſe the Words amount to a Diſability, 3 Inſt. 154. the King cannot diſpenſe; and here, where the Diſability is expreſſed, he may.

But we are lately told, there are two ſorts of Diſabilities; one is Short Account, actually incurred, as that upon the Members who ſit without taking the Oaths; p. 38. and the other is a Diſability annexed to the Breach of a Law as a penalty, and that penalty not to be incurred before a Legal Conviction; and in this Caſe the King's Diſpenſation coming before the Conviction doth prevent it, by making that lawful which would not have been ſo without it. But when P. 30. a Diſability is actually incurred, it cannot be taken off but by Act of Parliament.

I anſwer, That if the Law which makes the Diſability, doth allow of a Diſpenſation antecedent to the Conviction, then I grant, that the Diſpenſation before Conviction prevents the Diſability. As in Digby's Caſe; if the Diſpenſation had come before Inſtitution, the Diſability, as to 4 Rep. holding the former Living, had been prevented, becauſe the Law doth expreſly allow of a Diſpenſation in the Caſe. But here is no ſuch thing. The Act of Parliament ſuppoſes no Diſpenſation, but makes an utter Diſability, as to the holding the Office in Sir Edward Hales his Caſe; but a diſpenſing Power is ſet up againſt the Act of Parliament, and ſuch a Diſpenſation neither before nor after Conviction can prevent a Diſability. If it could, I can by no means ſee why it might not as well hold as to Members of Parliament, (at leaſt as to the Oath of Supremacy) if they take their Diſpenſation before ſitting in the Houſe. For the Diſa- bility doth not take place till they enter the Parliament, 5 Eliz. c. 1. And he that entreth the Parliament without taking the ſaid Oath, ſhall be deemed no Knight, Citizen, Burgeſs or Baron, nor ſhall have any Voice, but ſhall be as if he had been never returned or elected.

The Intention of the Law for the Teſt was a diſability to hold the Office; but it allows time for Perſons to qualify themſelves, as appears by the Act for the Teſt. Is not this plain overthrowing the deſign of the Law, for Perſons, inſtead of doing what the Law requires, to take out a Diſpenſation for not doing it, and ſo prevent the Diſability? And what doth a Law ſignify, when the very deſign of it is overthrown? And what is the Power of making Laws by common Conſent in Parliament, if without ſuch Conſent the whole force of the Law may be taken away by a diſpenſing Power? So that this doth not merely make Laws to ſignify nothing but according to Will and Pleaſure, but it makes our very Conſtitution inſignificant, which requires to every Law the Conſent of the People in Parliament.

Dionyſ. Halycarn. l. 2. As for Inſtance, By the firſt Conſtitution of the Roman Government, the King had the Cuſtody of the Laws, but no Laws were to be made but by the Conſent of the Roman People in the Curiæ, (thence called Leges Curiatæ. Would any one have thought this any Privilege, if after theſe Laws were paſſed, the King ſhould claim an inſeparable Prerogative of diſpenſing with them as he ſees Cauſe? For it is implied in ſuch a Fundamental Coutract as this, that Laws when made ſhould not loſe their Force without their Conſent who made them. Elſe it is no Contractus bonæ Fidei.

I will not diſpute whether this were the Original Contract of our Nation or not; but this I may ſay, That when our Government came to a Settlement after long ſtrugglings, this was one of the Fundamental Articles of it, That no Laws ſhould paſs, or Burdens ſhould be laid upon the People but by their own Conſent in Parliament. Bract. l. 1. c. 1. c. 3. 1. Bracton ſaith, That a Law among us ſuppoſes the Authority of the Prince and Council, and Conſent of the great Men, and Agreement of the Common-wealth.

L. 1. c. 2. n. 6. And he adds further, That our Laws being thus made and eſtabliſhed, mutari non poterunt, nec deſtrui ſine communi Conſenſu & Conſilio eorum omnium quorum Conſilio & Conſenſu fuerunt promulgatæ: Which are very remarkable Words againſt a diſpenſing Power. For that doth imply a Power to change the Law, and in effect to deſtroy it, without the Advice or Conſent of thoſe that made it. He ſaith indeed, The Law may be improved without their Conſent, i. e. by the Judges Interpretation as to parallel Caſes not expreſſed. But if any new or hard Caſe happens, it ought, he ſaith, to be reſpited uſque ad magnam Curiam, i. e. to the Parliament, ut ibi per Conſilium Curiæ terminetur, that being the Supreme Judicature of the Nation.

Forteſcue, 2. c. 13. f. 32. Forteſcue, who very well underſtood our Conſtitution, ſaith, That the King, although he be the Head of the Political Body, can neither change our Laws, nor take away Property without Conſent.

C. 18. f. 40. And that our Laws are made, not by the Princes Will, but by the General Conſent; Totius Regni Aſſenſu: He ſaith, They may be changed, but it muſt be, Non ſine Communitatis & procerum Regni Aſſenſu, quali ipſæ primitus emanarunt.

C. 34, 35. He takes notice, That ſeveral of our Kings did not like our Conſtitution, but Affected a more Arbitrary, and therefore approved the Civil Law for that Maxim, Quod Principi placuit Leges habet vigorem. But he ſhews our Conſtitution to be better for King and People. For here he ſaith, The King levies no Taxes, nor alters Laws, nor makes new ones, ſine Conceſſione vel Aſſenſu totius Regni ſui in parliamento ſuo expreſſo. C.36.*f.*84.

But certainly diſpenſing with Laws, is altering them; not as to their Words, but as to the Intention and Deſign of them, which is the main thing in a Law; and he that alters the Law, as to any one, whoſe Caſe is common with others, may alter it as to all others in equal Circumſtances. And what doth ſuch a Law then ſignifie?

In the Charter of King John, the Commune Conſilium Regni, was to paſs all Aids; and beſides particular Summons to the Great Men, general Summons were to be given to others, to appear within forty days; and if they did not, Matters were to go on however. This very Charter, as appears by Matt. Paris, was renewed, 9 H. 3. But he had learned the Trick of a Non obſtante from his good Friend the Pope; and when he was urged with his own Grants, he ſaid, Doth not the Pope void his Grants with a Non-obſtante? Why may not I do the ſame by the Grants of my Self and my Predeceſſors? To whom a ſharp Reply was made. As long as he obſerved Juſtice in his Actings, he would be King, and no longer. Which I only mention to ſhew, that the Uſe of a Non obſtante was then looked on as a Violation of Juſtice. Matt. Paris, f. 854.

And ſo it muſt needs be, if our Laws, as Bracton ſaith, be Communis Reipub. Sponſio; for then they are of the Nature of Contracts, and when Laws are ſo, it is agreed by thoſe who write of theſe Matters, although otherwiſe no Eenemies to a diſpenſing Power, That they are not to be diſpenſed with by a non obſtante.

If a Prince makes a Grant of any thing wherein he hath power to oblige himſelf in Juſtice, it becomes, ſaith Baſelius Pontius, of the nature of a Contract, which gives a Right to thoſe to whom it is made, and lays an Obligation of Juſtice upon him. Baſel. Pontius De Matr. l. 8. de diſpenſat. c. 5. n. 7.

Where a Grant is made for the Benefit of others, and is accepted by them, it is not in the Granter's power to revoke it, as Sanchez ſhews from many Authorities. Sanchez de matr. l. 8. diſpenſ. c. 17.

And the Lawyers are of the ſame mind, as appears by what is already produced out of Baldus and others; but I ſhall mention ſome who declare the Opinion of others.

Explorati juris eſt eas Conſtitutiones quæ in contractum tranſeunt ita ligare Principes ut iis derogare nequeant, ſaith Geil. Buxtorffius. n. 29. Buxtorff. in auream bullam, c. 1. ſect. 7.

Gail ſaith, That Princes are bound by all Grants made per modum contractus de Jure Communi; and that is the general Opinion. Gail. obſerv. l. 1. obſ. 41. n. 4.

One of the lateſt Writers, de Jure Gentium, ſaith, That Princes are more ſtrongly bound by Laws, which paſs by way of Contracts, than by any poſitive Laws made by abſolute Power, although they relate to the weightieſt points of Government. Joh. Wolf. Textor de jure gent. c. 11. n 26.

That a Prince cannot grant a non-obſtante to ſuch Laws as he hath ſworn to obſerve is not only the Opinion of other Lawyers, but of ſome of the higheſt Canoniſts: And it is a Rule among them, That no Clauſe of non-obſtante can take away Conſtitutionem Juratam. Bellug. ſpic Princ. rubr. 7. n 4. Hier. Grat. conſ 41. n. 21. Rol a valle, conſ. 62. n. 5. vol. 2. Celſus Hugo, de clauſulis, n. 23.

Where there is therefore not only a Contract with others in the paſſing of a Law, but an Oath to obſerve the Laws, I do not ſee how a non-obſtante or a diſpenſing Power can take place.

2. We have the the advantage in point of Authority as well as Reaſon, as to this very Caſe of diſpenſing with the Statute of 23 H. 6.

For I take it for granted, That the Authority of Parliament is more to be regarded than the Opinion of Judges: And I think we have good Reaſon to believe, That the Parliament did not think this Act could be voided by a non-obſtante.

(1.) The Parliament that declared, any non-obſtante againſt the Act to be void, was certainly of that Opinion; or elſe they did a ridiculous thing, to put in a Clauſe which was void of it ſelf.

(2.) The Parliament, 28 H. 6. c. 3. was of that mind; for what need an Indemnity by Act of Parliament, if the King could by his Diſpenſing Power have made it lawful for the Sheriffs to continue?

(3.) The Parliament, 8 E. 4. 4. continued in the ſame mind, for, whereas in the beginning of his Reign Sheriffs were continued more than a Year, by reaſon of the Trouble, it was not then thought, (tho' in a Caſe of ſuch Neceſſity) That the King could diſpenſe with this Law; but they were indemnified by Act of Parliament, and the Act declared to ſtand in full Force.

(4.) The Parliament, 6 H. 8. c. 18. after the ſuppoſed Judgment, 2 H. 7. And in the time of a Prince who would loſe none of his Prerogatives, was ſtill of the ſame Judgment; for it not only recites the Statute, but particularly takes notice of the voiding all Pardons and non-obſtante's; and by an Act of Parliament indemnifies the Under-Sheriffs of Briſtol, and gives them the ſame Privilege which thoſe of London had. What need all this, if it had been thought good Law at that time, that the King might by his diſpenſing Power have given Sheriffs leave to have acted againſt that Statute?

And now I leave any Man of Reaſon to judge, Whether this famous Caſe be a ſufficient Foundation for the ſetting up a diſpenſing Power, either as to a particular Statute made for the Security of our Religion, or for a Suſpenſion of our Eccleſiaſtical Laws.

CHAP. IV.

Of the Alterations made in the Supremacy, by the Statutes of Henry the Eighth; whith an ANSWER to the OBJECTIONS.

I Now come to the Alterations made in our Laws, about the King's Supremacy in the time of Henry the Eighth.

24 Hen. 8. c. 12. An Act paſſed, for taking away all Appeals to Rome, which is founded on the King's Natural and Independent Right of Governing, and doing Juſtice to all his People; and the Sufficiency of his own Clergy, for Hearing and determining ſuch Matters as belonged to their Function; and therefore all Cauſes are to be Heard, Diſcuſſed, Examined, finally and definitively Adjudged and Determined within the King's Juriſdiction and Authority, and not elſewhere in the Courts Spiritual and Temporal: But if the King be concerned, then it is refeferred to the Upper Houſe of Convocation.

The Preamble of this Act againſt Appeals to Rome, is conſiderable: Whereas by divers authentick Hiſtories and Chronicles, it is manifeſtly declared and expreſſed, That this Realm of England is an Empire governed by one Supreme Head and King, &c. with plenary, whole, and entire Power, Preheminence, Authority, Prerogative and Juriſdiction, &c. for final determination of Cauſes, &c. ſo that here is an Appeal to ancient Hiſtory in this Matter, and we have ſtill ſufficient Evidence of it before the Pope's Enchroachments prevailed.

The Biſhops and Barons told Anſelm in William Rufus his time, It was a thing unheard of, and contrary to the Cuſtom of his Realm, for any one to go to Rome without the King's Leave; which is after explained by way of Appeal: Anſelm made but a ſhuffling Anſwer to this, although he had ſworn to obſerve the Cuſtoms of the Realm, and he could not deny this to be one; but he pretended, It was againſt St. Peter's Authority, and therefore could not obſerve it; for this were, ſaith he, to abjure St. Peter. From whence I infer, That the Cuſtom of the Realm was then thought by Anſelm to be inconſiſtent with the Pope's Authority: For whatever they talk of St Peter, it is the Pope they mean.

In the Reign of H. 1. the Pope complains grievouſly, That the King would ſuffer no Appeals to be made to him; and that due Reverence was not ſhewed to St. Peter in his Kingdom; and that they ended Eccleſiaſtical Cauſes at Home, even where Biſhops were concerned; and very learnedly quotes the decretal Epiſtles againſt them.

Eadmer. *f.*113,115.

Afterwards, the Pope ſent his Legate, and the King denied him Entrance, and the whole Parliament rejected it, as contrary to the ancient Cuſtom and Liberty of England.

That Paſſage in the Laws of H. 1. c. 5. which ſeems to allow of Appeals, is a mere Forgery, the whole Chapter being a Rhapſody taken out of the Canoniſts.

H. Huntingdon ſaith, That Appeals were brought in King Stephen's time, by Henry Biſhop of Wincheſter, his Brother being the Pope's Legate.

Hunt. f. 266.

By the Conſtitutions of Clarendon, c. 8. the Appeal lay from the Archbiſhop to the King, which is well expreſſed by Robert of Glouceſter.

> And the K. amend ſolde the Archbiſhops deed,
> And he as in the Pope's ſted, and St. Thomas it withſteed.

And although H. 2. in his Purgation for the Death of the Archbiſhop, did ſwear, That he would hinder no Appeals to Rome in Eccleſiaſtical Cauſes; and that he would quit the ancient Cuſtoms of the Realm: Yet Hoveden ſaith, The Conſtitutions of Clarendon were renewed in the Parliament at Northampton, and the Juſtices in Eyre were ſworn to obſerve them, and to make others obſerve them inviolably: And for thoſe who went out of the Kingdom (in caſe of Appeals) the Juſtices were to enquire per conſuetudinem Terræ, according to the Ancient Cuſtom; and if they did not return and ſtand to the King's Court, they were to be outlawed.

In the time of R. 1. the Popes complained much of Geoffry, Archbiſhop of York, for ſlighting Appeals made to Rome, and impriſoning thoſe that made them. Celeſtine doth it twice, and in the ſame Words: And Innocent the Third, in King John's time, renews the ſame Complaint of him, That he ſhewed no regard to Appeals made to the Apoſtolick See.

Hoveden, *f.*426,433, 465.

But when the Rights of the Crown were given up by King John to the Pope, no wonder if the Liberties of Appeals were granted by him: But yet, in the ſucceeding Reigns, we have ſeveral Inſtances upon Record, of Perſons impriſoned by the King for making Appeals to Rome.

K. James his Premon. p. 300. John of Ibſtock, in the time of Edw. 1. The Abbot of Walden, and a Prebendary of Banbury, in the Reign of Edw. 2. The Parſon of Lighe, Harwoden, and the Prior of Barnwel, in the time of E. 3. So that this Right was ſtill owned by our Princes, when the Matter came into conteſt, and therefore the Act of H. 8. againſt Appeals was but a juſt Reſuming of the ancient Rights of the Crown.

25 H. 8. c. 19. A Commiſſion is appointed for reviewing the Canons: And it is obſervable, That becauſe it could not be done in Parliament time, the King hath Power given him by Act of Parliament to nominate the thirty two Perſons to act in this Matter, in theſe Words; Be it therefore Enacted by the Authority aforeſaid, That the King's Highneſs ſhall have Power and Authority to nominate and aſſign at his pleaſure the ſaid thirty two perſons of his Subjects; whereof ſixteen to be of the Clergy, and ſixteen to be of the Temporality of the Upper and Neither Houſe of Parliament.

And becauſe the laſt Reſort was to the Archbiſhop in the former Acts of Appeals; therefore to prevent any Inconveniences thereby, a new Power is granted by this Act, i. e. upon an Appeal to the King in Chancery, a Commiſſion is to be directed to ſuch Perſons as the King ſhall appoint, who are to hear and determine ſuch Appeals, and the Cauſes concerning the ſame.

25 H. 8. c. 21. After the Submiſſion of the Clergy, and the King being owned Supreme Head, yet the Power of diſpenſing with the Canons in particular Caſes, did not paſs by Commiſſion from the King, but by Act of Parliament. The Words are, It ſtandeth therefore with natural Equity and good Reaſon, that all and every ſuch Laws humane, made without this Realm, or induced into this Realm by the ſaid Sufferance, Conſents and Cuſtom, your Royal Majeſty, your Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons repreſenting the whole State of your Realm, in this your High Court of Parliament, have full Power and Authority not only to diſpenſe, but alſo to Authorize ſome elect Perſon or Perſons, to diſpenſe, &c. So that the Power of granting Faculties at a time when the Prerogative was higheſt, was not executed by Commiſſion from the King by virtue of his Supremacy and Prerogative Royal, but was granted to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, in the manner expreſſed in that Act.

Viſitatorial Power, &c. p. 262. A late Author has ſtretched this Statute to a Power of diſpenſing in other Caſes, beſides thoſe which depended on the Canon Law. For, ſaith he, the Pope uſurped ſuch a Power in derogation of the Authority Royal, and then that Power muſt be originally in the King: otherwiſe, in the Conſtruction of the Act, it could be no Uſurpation. But this is a very falſe way of Reaſoning; The Pope uſurped ſuch a Power on the Crown, therefore the Crown hath it of Right: For the Pope's Uſurpations were many of them unreaſonable (his Primacy, according to the Canons, being allowed) and our Law did reſtore to the King the antient Right and Juriſdiction of the Crown, and not put him into the poſſeſſion of all the extravagant Power which the Pope uſurped. For this Law charges the Pope with intolerable Exactions of great Sums of Money, in Penſions, Cenſures, Peter-Pence, Procurations, Fruits, Suits for Proviſions and Expeditions ditions of Bulls, for Arch-biſhopricks and Biſhopricks, and for Delegates and Reſcripts in Cauſes of Contentions and Appeals, Juriſdictions Legantine, as well as Diſpenſations, Licences, Faculties, Grants, Relaxations, Writs, called Perinde valere, Rehabilitations, Abſolutions, &c. Now all theſe were Uſurpations in Derogation of the Crown; but doth it therefore follow that the Crown hath a Right to them all? But to go no further than the Buſineſs of Diſpenſations, Hath the King a Right by this Statute to diſpenſe as far as the Pope? The Pope uſurped a Power of diſpenſing in Matrimonial Contracts, in Oaths, in Vows, in ſome poſitive Divine Laws, which I ſuppoſe H. 8. by virtue of the Supremacy, never pretended to. So that it is a very miſtaken Notion of ſome Men, That the King had all the Power which the Pope uſurped. And as to the Act, it is plain by the Words of it, That the Original Power of diſpenſing was lodged in the King, Lords and Commons, and the Miniſterial Execution of it with the Arch-biſhop of Canterbury even with reſpect to the King himſelf. But if the King had pretended to all the Power which the Pope uſurped, he muſt have diſpenſed with himſelf.

But this Author offers to prove, That there is a Power in the Crown P. 266. to diſpenſe with Acts of Parliament, even ſuch as concern the Conſecration of Biſhops, becauſe it is ſaid, 8 Eliz. That the Queen by her Supreme Authority had diſpenſed with all Cauſes or Doubts of any Imperfection or Diſability in the Perſons, &c.

To give a clear Anſwer to this, we muſt conſider theſe Things:

1. That 1 Eliz. 1. The Act of 25 H. 8. for the Order and Form of Electing and Making Archbiſhops and Biſhops, was revived, as appears by the ſame Act, 8 Eliz. 1. 7.

2. That by another Act, 1 Eliz. 2. The Book of Common-Prayer, and Adminiſtration of Sacraments, and other Rites and Ceremonies of the Church of England, which were in uſe in the time of 6 E. and repealed by Queen Mary, were re-inforced, 1 Eliz. 2. 2. and the Repeal annulled. But by the Act 5 and 6 E. 6. c. 1. §. 5. the Form and Manner of making Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Prieſts, and Decons, was added to the Book of Prayer, as of like Force and Authority with it.

3. That the Act of E. 6. being revived with the expreſs mention of the Alterations and Additions made to it, there was no Neceſſity apprehended, 1 Eliz. to make a diſtinct Act for that which was in force already by the Name of Additions therein added and appointed by that Statute. And this, I conceive, was the true Reaſon why a Bill did not paſs 1 Eliz. to that purpoſe: For I find by the Journals of the Houſe, a Bill was prepared and read the third time in the Houſe of Lords; but upon Conſideration, it was laid aſide as ſuperfluous.

4. That the Popiſh Party took Advantage of this, and pretended, that the Book of Conſecration, &c. was not eſtabliſhed by Law, being not expreſly mentioned, and therefore the Biſhops made by it, were not Legal Biſhops. And upon this Bonner reſolved to ſtand the Trial againſt Horn, Biſhop of Wincheſter, as may be ſeen in Dyer, R. f. 234. So that the Papiſts then ſtood upon it, That the Crown could not diſpenſe with Laws, otherwiſe Bonner's Plea ſignified nothing. For if there were ſuch an inherent Right in the Crown to diſpenſe with Laws in Eccleſiaſtical Matters, then theſe were Legal Biſhops, having all the Queen's diſpenſing Power for them.

5. The Clauſe in the Queen's Letters Patents for diſpenſing with Imperfections and Diſability was put in out of abundant Caution, and not for any

any Neceſſity that we can find: But it was cuſtomary in the Pope's Bulls to put in ſuch kind of Clauſes, and therefore they would omit no Power in that Caſe which the Pope did pretend to, which the Act ſaith, was for avoiding all Ambiguities and Queſtions.

6. But after all, leſt there ſhould be any Colour for diſputing this Matter left, according to the expreſs Letter of the Law, therefore it was declared, 8 Eliz. 1. 3. That not only the Book of Common-Prayer, but the Form of Conſecrating Archbiſhops, Biſhops, &c. which was ſet forth in Edward the Sixth's Time, and added to the Common-Prayer, ſhall ſtand and be in full Force and Effect: And all Acts done by it are declared to be good and perfect to all Intents and Purpoſes: So that this Act of Parliament doth rather overthrow a diſpenſing Power; for if there were then ſuch a Supreme and Abſolute Power in the Crown, as to Eccleſiaſtical Matters, what need ſuch an Act of Parliament to confirm and ratify what our Author ſuppoſes done by virtue of it.

But to return to the 25th of H. 8. in the ſame Act of Parliament care is taken for the viſiting exempt Places, as Monaſteries, Colleges and Hoſpitals, by a particular Commiſſion under the Great-Seal.

But that which comes neareſt to our Buſineſs, is, That 26 H. 8. c. 1. another Act paſſed, wherein the King's Supremacy is acknowledged, and a Power given by Act of Parliament for him to viſit, redreſs, and amend all Errors, Hereſies, Abuſes, Contempts, and Enormities whatſoever, which by any manner of Spiritual Authority or Juriſdiction ought or may lawfully be reformed in any Uſage, Cuſtom, Foreign Laws, Foreign Authority, Preſcription, or any Thing or Things to the contrary hereof notwithſtanding,

If the King had this Power by virtue of his Supremacy and Prerogative Royal, can we imagine H. 8. ſo weak a Prince, and ſo little a valuer of his own Prerogative, as to have that given him by Act of Parliament, which was acknowledged to be in him before? But the Words are expreſs, And that our Sovereign Lord, &c. ſhall have full Power and Authority from time to time to viſit, &c. From whence it follows, That in the Judgment of H. 8. and the Parliament, ſuch a Power was not perſonally inherent in him, but that it did belong to the Legiſlative Power, and therefore an Act of Parliament was required for it: So that the Supremacy, as then ſettled by Law, lay in a total rejecting any Foreign Juriſdiction, and governing this Church and Kingdom by our own Laws; which is well expreſſed in the Preamble to the Act againſt Appeals, viz. That this Realm of England is an Empire governed by one Supreme Head and King, having the Dignity and Royal Eſtate of the Imperial Crown of the ſame, unto whom a Body Politick, compact of all ſorts and degrees of People, divided in Terms and by Names of Spiritualty and Temporalty, been bounden and ought to bear, next to God, a natural and humble Obedience.

By virtue of this Act Cromwel was made Vicegerent and Vicar General, (for both are in the ſame Commiſſion) and the King gave to him omnem & omnimodam Juriſdictionem, Authoritatem ſive poteſtatem Eccleſiaſticam, quæ nobis tanquam ſupremo Capiti hujuſmodi competit, &c. Which are the Words of his Commiſſion.

It's true, That the Power of granting a Commiſſion to exerciſe this Power, is not expreſſed in the Act of Parliament, but it being veſted in the King by the Act, he might appoint one or more Commiſſioners to do it in his Name; but the Caſe is very different where that very Power of Delegation is taken away by Act of Parliament, for that is the preſent Caſe.

To make this clear, we muſt conſider the Words of this Act, and compare them with 1 Eliz. 1. the [illegible] Car. 1. 12. and the preſent Commiſſion.

The Words, 26 H. 8. 1. are the ſame in effect with thoſe 1 Eliz. 1. but with this obſervable Difference, That whereas the Statute of H. 8. gives the King, his Heirs, and Succeſſors, full Power and Authority from time to time to viſit, &c. That 1 Eliz. 1. unites the Juriſdiction to the Imperial Crown of this Realm, but then it doth not proceed as the other did, To give full Power and Authority to her, her Heirs, and Succeſſors, to viſit, &c. But the Words are, And that your Highneſs, your Heirs, and Succeſſors, Kings or Queens of this Realm, ſhall have full Power and Authority by this Act, by Letters Patents under the Great Seal of England to aſſign, name and authorize, when and as often as your Highneſs, your Heirs, and Succeſſors ſhall think meet to exerciſe, uſe, occupy and execute under your Heighneſs, your Heirs and Succeſſors, all manner of Juriſdictions, Privileges and Preheminences, in any wiſe touching or concerning any Spiritual or Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction, &c. So that the Adminiſtration of this extraordinary Juriſdiction is by this Act limited to ſuch who are nominated and appointed by the Letters Patents. The Fountain of all Juriſdiction is acknowledged to be in the Imperial Crown of this Realm, but the Adminiſtration is two-fold; Ordinary, in the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, and Eccleſiaſtical Courts; and to ſecure their Dependance on the Crown, the Oath of Supremacy is required by this Act to be taken by every Archbiſhop, Biſhop, and all Eccleſiaſtical Perſons and Officers. But beſides this, it was then thought fit, That there ſhould be an Extraordinary Adminiſtration of it, which is limited by this Act to ſuch as ſhould be nominated and appointed in Letters Patents, &c. and no other Reaſon can be given of the Change from what it was in the Time of Henry the Eighth; for it is not now placed abſolutely, as then, in the Queen, her Heirs, and Succeſſors, but the Juriſdiction is annexed to the Crown, and the extraordinary Adminiſtration to be by Commiſſion under the Broad-Seal.

Now ſince this Power of nominating Commiſſioners for Extraordinary Juriſdiction is taken away by Act of Parliament, the only Queſtion is, Whether notwithſtanding the Right of Juriſdiction being ſtill in the Crown, a new Commiſſion may not be granted for Extraordinary Juriſdiction?

There had been no Queſtion in this Caſe, if the Adminiſtration of Extraordinary Juriſdiction had not been ſettled, 1 Eliz. 1. to be by Commiſſion, and that very Power of granting ſuch a Commiſſion had not been taken away by Act of Parliament.

But as the Matter now ſtands, the only Pretence left for it, is, That the ſame Act which confirms the Repeal, hath a Salvo for the King's Supremacy, in theſe Words, Provided always, That this Act ſhall not extend, or be conſtrued to extend to abridge or diminiſh the King's Supremacy in Eccleſiaſtical Matters or Affairs. If theſe Words be taken ſtrictly, with reſpect to the ſame Matter, they make the Act inconſiſtent with it ſelf; for then the Meaning would be, The King's Supremacy ſhall not extend to the ſetting up ſuch a Court, always provided, That his Supremacy, notwithſtanding this Act, may extend to the ſetting up ſuch another Court. Is it conſiſtent with the Wiſdom of a Parliament to make ſuch de-any Neceſſity that we can find: But it was cuſtomary in the Pope's Bulls to put in ſuch kind of Clauſes, and therefore they would omit no Power in that Caſe which the Pope did pretend to, which the Act ſaith, was for avoiding all Ambiguities and Queſtions.

6. But after all, leſt there ſhould be any Colour for diſputing this Matter left, according to the expreſs Letter of the Law, therefore it was declared, 8 Eliz. 1. 3. That not only the Book of Common-Prayer, but the Form of Conſecrating Archbiſhops, Biſhops, &c. which was ſet forth in Edward the Sixth's Time, and added to the Common-Prayer, ſhall ſtand and be in full Force and Effect: And all Acts done by it are declared to be good and perfect to all Intents and Purpoſes: So that this Act of Parliament doth rather overthrow a diſpenſing Power; for if there were then ſuch a Supreme and Abſolute Power in the Crown, as to Eccleſiaſtical Matters, what need ſuch an Act of Parliament to confirm and ratify what our Author ſuppoſes done by virtue of it.

But to return to the 25th of H. 8. in the ſame Act of Parliament care is taken for the viſiting exempt Places, as Monaſteries, Colleges and Hoſpitals, by a particular Commiſſion under the Great-Seal.

But that which comes neareſt to our Buſineſs, is, That 26 H. 8. c. 1. another Act paſſed, wherein the King's Supremacy is acknowledged, and a Power given by Act of Parliament for him to viſit, redreſs, and amend all Errors, Hereſies, Abuſes, Contempts, and Enormities whatſoever, which by any manner of Spiritual Authority or Juriſdiction ought or may lawfully be reformed in any Uſage, Cuſtom, Foreign Laws, Foreign Authority, Preſcription, or any Thing or Things to the contrary hereof notwithſtanding,

If the King had this Power by virtue of his Supremacy and Prerogative Royal, can we imagine H. 8. ſo weak a Prince, and ſo little a valuer of his own Prerogative, as to have that given him by Act of Parliament, which was acknowledged to be in him before? To make this clear, we muſt conſider the Words of this Act, and compare them with 1 Eliz. 1. the 17 Car. 1. 12. and the preſent Commiſſion.

The Words, 26 H. 8. 1. are the ſame in effect with thoſe 1 Eliz. 1. but with this obſervable Difference, That whereas the Statute of H. 8. gives the King, his Heirs, and Succeſſors, full Power and Authority from time to time to viſit, &c. That 1 Eliz. 1. unites the Juriſdiction to the Imperial Crown of this Realm, but then it doth not proceed as the other did, To give full Power and Authority to her, her Heirs, and Succeſſors, to viſit, &c. But the Words are, And that your Highneſs, your Heirs, and Succeſſors, Kings or Queens of this Realm, ſhall have full Power and Authority by this Act, by Letters Patents under the Great-Seal of England to aſſign, name and authorize, when and as often as your Highneſs, your Heirs, and Succeſſors ſhall think meet to exerciſe, uſe, occupy and execute under your Heighneſs, your Heirs and Succeſſors, all manner of Juriſdictions, Privileges and Preheminences, in any wiſe touching or concerning any Spiritual or Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction, &c. So that the Adminiſtration of this extraordinary Juriſdiction is by this Act limited to ſuch who are nominated and appointed by the Letters Patents. The Fountain of all Juriſdiction is acknowledged to be in the Imperial Crown of this Realm, but the Adminiſtration is two-fold; Ordinary, in the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, and Eccleſiaſtical Courts; and to ſecure their Dependance on the Crown, the Oath of Supremacy is required by this Act to be taken by every Archbiſhop, Biſhop, and all Eccleſiaſtical Perſons and Officers. But beſides this, it was then thought fit, That there ſhould be an Extraordinary Adminiſtration of it, which is limited by this Act to ſuch as ſhould be nominated and appointed in Letters Patents, &c. and no other Reaſon can be given of the Change from what it was in the Time of Henry the Eighth; for it is not now placed abſolutely, as then, in the Queen, her Heirs, and Succeſſors, but the Juriſdiction is annexed to the Crown, and the extraordinary Adminiſtration to be by Commiſſion under the Broad-Seal.

Now ſince this Power of nominating Commiſſioners for Extraordinary Juriſdiction is taken away by Act of Parliament, the only Queſtion is, Whether notwithſtanding the Right of Juriſdiction being ſtill in the Crown, a new Commiſſion may not be granted for Extraordinary Juriſdiction?

There had been no Queſtion in this Caſe, if the Adminiſtration of Extraordinary Juriſdiction had not been ſettled, 1 Eliz. 1. to be by Commiſſion, and that very Power of granting ſuch a Commiſſion had not been taken away by Act of Parliament.

But as the Matter now ſtands, the only Pretence left for it, is, That the ſame Act which confirms the Repeal, hath a Salvo for the King's Supremacy, in theſe Words, Provided always, That this Act ſhall not extend, or be conſtrued to extend to abridge or diminiſh the King's Supremacy in Eccleſiaſtical Matters or Affairs. If theſe Words be taken ſtrictly, with reſpect to the ſame Matter, they make the Act inconſiſtent with it ſelf; for then the Meaning would be, The King's Supremacy ſhall not extend to the ſetting up ſuch a Court, always provided, That his Supremacy, notwithſtanding this Act, may extend to the ſetting up ſuch another Court. Is it conſiſtent with the Wiſdom of a Parliament to make ſuch de-deluſory Acts? Therefore we muſt underſtand the King's Supremacy in other Matters. And there was this Reaſon for it, All the Acts of Parliament touching the Supremacy in Henry Eighth's Time, were repealed by Queen Mary, and the Reſtoring the Supremacy to the Crown, was by the ſame Act which ſet up the High Commiſſion; and therefore when part of that Act was repealed, and that Repeal confirmed, it was fitting to add a Clauſe, That there was no Intention to abridge or diminiſh the Supremacy ſettled by Law, eſpecially ſince by that Act the Ordinary Juriſdiction of the Biſhops in their Courts was revived; and it is very well known, what Clamours had been made, as though the Biſhops Courts being held in their own Names were inconſiſtent with the King's Supremacy: And although the Judges had declared, July the firſt, 1637. That there was no neceſſity that Proceſſes Eccleſiaſtical ſhould be in the King's Name; and the King, Auguſt the eighteenth, in 13 Car. 1. publiſhed a Proclamation to that purpoſe; yet all this did not ſatisfy ſome but the Biſhops were ſtill thought by them, in their Ordinary Juriſdiction, to uſurp upon the King's Supremacy, and to abridge and diminiſh it; therefore when this Act paſſed to revive their Juriſdiction, it was no more than reaſonable to add ſuch a Clauſe to prevent Miſconſtruction, viz. That this Act, nor any thing in it, be conſtrued to extend to abridge or diminiſh the King's Supremacy in Eccleſiaſtical Matters, as the Ordinary Juriſdiction of the Biſhops had been thought to do.

Vindication Eccleſ. Com p. 19.

And the Vindicator of the Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſion could not forbear a Marginal Note to that purpoſe; The Court held by his Majeſty's Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſioners is more legal than the Biſhop's Court; This in the King's Name, theirs in their own Name only: As though the new ſetting up a Court forbidden by Law did not make it illegal, in whoſe Name ſoever it were; and as though Courts expreſly owned and allowed by Law, were illegal, merely becauſe the Forms of their Proceedings do not run in the King's Name. But I deſire him to take an Anſwer from his own Oracle the Lord Chief Juſtice Coke, Now albeit the Proceedings and Proceſs in the Eccleſiaſtical Courts be in the Name of the Biſhops, &c. it followeth not therefore, that either the Court is not the King's, or the Law, whereby they proceed, is not the King's Law. For taking one Example for many, every Leet or View of Frank Pledge holden by a Subject, is kept in the Lord's Name, and yet it is the King's Court, and all the Proceedings therein are directed by the King's Laws; and many Subjects in England have and hold Courts of Record, and other Courts, and all their Proceedings be according to the King's Laws and Cuſtoms of the Realm.

Co. 5. R. f. 39.

But there is a material Objection or two yet to be anſwered.

2 Cr. f. 37. Moor. f. 755. Noy. f. 100

1. It is objected, That 2 Jac. the Judges declared in the Star-Chamber, That the Deprivation of Non-conformiſts was lawful, becauſe the King had ſupreme Eccleſiaſtical Power, which he hath delegated to the Commiſſioners, whereby they had Power of Deprivation by the Canon-Law of this Realm; and the Statute of 1 Eliz. doth not confer any new Power, but explain and declare the ancient Power: And therefore they held it clear, that the King without a Parliament might make Orders and Conſtitutions for the Government of the Clergy, and might deprive them if they obeyed not.

To which I anſwer,

1. Our Queſtion is not, Whether the King, without a Parliament, may not require the Obſervation of Canons paſſed the Convocation, ſo as to deprive the Obſtinate, by virtue of his Supreme Power in Eccleſiaſtical ſiaſtical Matters? But whether he may appoint a Commiſſion with Power to deprive againſt an Act of Parliament; which hath taken away the Legal Power of any ſuch Commiſſion.

2. In matters of this nature, it is ſafer truſting the Supreme Judicature of the Nation in Parliament, than the Extrajudicial Opinion of the Judges.

And in this Caſe the Parliament hath declared it ſelf another way; as appears by the Canons, 1640. which were not only condemned in Parliament afterwards (which then might be imputed to the heat of the Times) but in the moſt Loyal Parliament after the King's Return, particular Care was taken, that neither the Canons of 1640. ſhould be confirmed, nor any other Eccleſiaſtical Laws or Canons, not formerly confirmed, allowed, or enacted by Parliament, or by the eſtabliſhed Laws of the Land as they ſtood in the Year of the Lord, 1639. Which implies, that the Senſe of the Parliament then was, that we are not to own any Canons but ſuch as were confirmed, allowed, or enacted by Parliament, or by the eſtabliſhed Laws of the Land before 1639. And therefore no new Injunctions without a Parliament or Convocation, can make the Clergy liable to a Legal Deprivation. No, not that which the Defender is ſo pleaſed with the thoughts of, viz. to give their Aſſent and Conſent to the King's Declaration, on pain of Deprivation. P. 14.

3. The Temporalties of the Clergy, eſpecially the Biſhops, are ſecured by ſeveral Acts of Parliament without a Tryal at Law. Which, becauſe I ſee none of our great Lawyers take notice of, I ſhall here ſet down.

14 Edward the Third, c. 3. We Will and Grant for us and for our Heirs, that from henceforth We nor our Heirs ſhall not take nor cauſe to be taken into Our Hands, the Temporalties of Archbiſhops, Biſhops, &c. or other People of Holy Church, of what Eſtate or Condition ſoever they be, without a true and juſt Cauſe, according to the Law of the Land and Judgment thereupon given. Statut. pro Clero.

25 Edward the Third, c. 6. The Title of the Statute is, A Biſhop's Temporalties ſhall not be ſeized for a Contempt. And this was received for good Law, 9 E. 4. 28. Br. Ord. 12. Reg. f. 32.

But a very late Writer tells the World, That the Poſſeſſions of Eccleſiaſtical Perſons are but Conditional Freeholds; and although Abſolute Freeholds require a due Courſe of Law, yet Conditional do not; ſo that if a Man chance to be deprived of his Office, his Freehold is gone. Viſitatorial Power, &c. p. 302.

This is touching Clergymen's Freeholds to purpoſe; and no doubt out of pure Zeal to the Church of England: But ſee the Equity and Impartiality of this Man!

He had undertaken before to give publick Aſſurance of Abby-Lands to the preſent Poſſeſſors: And for what Reaſon? Becauſe the Pope granted a Diſpenſation with a non-obſtante to the Canon Law: And yet in this Book he proves, That a non-obſtante is no ways binding to the Supreme Power; ſo that no Man could more effectually overthrow his own Aſſurance than he hath done himſelf: For, ſaith he, Preſent Sovereigns, whether King or Pope, cannot bind their Succeſſors. And again, Acts of Graces and Favours, are alterable and ſuſpendable at the pleaſure of the Succeeding Sovereign: Why then ſhould any be ſo weak as to think the Plenitude of the Pope's Power as to Abby-Lands, can be bound up by the Act of any former Pope? I confeſs the comparing theſe two Books together hath extreamly leſſened his Aſſurance of Abby-Lands with me. Aſſurance of Abby-Lands, p. 164, 184. Viſitatorial Power, &c. p. 297, 298.

p. 200. And his Anſwers to the Power of Revocation are ſo weak, that they come at laſt to no more than this, It is a thing which cannot well be done at preſent, therefore there is no fear it ever ſhould be done. Here is ſome Security, at leaſt till it can be done. But as to the Poſſeſſions of the Eccleſiaſtical Perſons of the Church of England, he endeavours to prove, That they can have no Security at all of their preſent Poſſeſſions, notwithſtanding any Promiſe, or a Legal Title: For if, as he p.297,298. ſaith, The King by his Paramount Juriſdiction can make any Exceptions null; and ſo void a ſolemn Oath; not to accept a Diſpenſation from that Oath; why ſhould he not as well make void any Promiſe of his own, when he henders (as he thinks) a greater Good, eſpecially if the Prerogative cannot be bound? But then, as to a Legal Title, that is the vaineſt thing imaginable, as to ſuch conditional Freeholds which Clergymen have; for if the Commiſſioners deprive them by their Power ab Officio & Beneficio, their Attendant Freehold, ſaith he, is gone, without any Courſe of Law. Defence, p. 24. And the Defender ſaith, The Commiſſioners may deprive if Clergymen ſhould not aſſent and conſent to all contained in the King's Declaration, if he required it. But it is to be hoped, That Princes will not take the Meaſures of Juſtice and Wiſdom, and Honour from ſuch Men: We will therefore ſet aſide the Omnipotent Engine of a Non-Obſtante, which doth not batter ſo much as it undermines, and conſider the Legal Security of theſe Conditional Freeholds.

I. All Freeholds are in ſome Senſe Conditional, or elſe they could never be forfeited: Which ſhews, that there are none Abſolute, with Reſpect to the Law. And as to their Original among us, it is agreed, That by the Ancient Right of Tenures, all Fees are Conditional; for they ſuppoſe Fealty, the non-performance whereof is Felony: Which is not that which is done felleo animo, as Sir Edward Coke trifles, but it is the ſame with Falſhood or Treachery. The Laws of H. 1. c. 5. Si Dominus de Felonia vel Fide mentitus compellat hominem ſuum: And in another Law, the Puniſhment of Felony is Forfeiture of the Land, c. 43. and therefore the Feudiſts ſay, That Felony is delictum Vaſalli adverſus Dominum; From the Gothick Fell or Fehl, which ſignifies in general, a Fault; And in this Caſe, the Breach of Truſt towards his Lord: Of which ſort of Felonies the Feudiſts reckon up ſome twenty, ſome thirty, any of which makes a Forfeiture: So that here is no ſuch mighty difference, that the poor Clergymen muſt only have Conditional and Attendant Freeholds, as though other Men's were Abſolute, whereas Sir Rep. Angl. l. 3. c. 10. Thomas Smyth affirms, all in England are Fiduciary, i. e. Conditional Freeholders, beſide the King: It is eaſie enough for any one to frame ſuch a Diſtinction of Freeholds; and to ſay, That thoſe who have but ſuch a Freehold may be ejected, without any Tryal at Common Law: But he ought to have ſhewed, That Magna Charta or the ancient Laws made ſuch a difference between Eccleſiaſtical Freeholds and others; which he hath not pretended to do; and therefore ſuch a Diſtinction ought Inſtit. 51. not to be allowed, eſpecially ſince I have produced an Act of Parliament 14 Edward 3. c. 3. which ſaith, That Clergymen ſhall not be ejected out of their Temporalties without a true and juſt Cauſe, according to the Law of the Land: This was none of thoſe Statutes which are in Print, but Cotton's Abr. p. 23. never enrolled, for Sir Robert Cotton owns the Enrolment of it, and that it was made into a Statute; and Mr. Prynn himſelf had nothing to object againſt it: But now it ſeems their Conditional Freeholds may be taken from them without any due Courſe of Law.

II. There is more to be ſaid concerning the Rights of Eccleſiaſtical Perſons in Colleges, becauſe they are Lay Corporations. For in Appleford's Caſe it was declared to be the Opinion of all the Judges in Patrick's Caſe, That a College was a Temporal Corporation: And therefore ſome notable Difference in point of Law muſt be ſhewed, why Men may be deprived of ſome Freeholds without due Courſe of Law, and not of others; for I cannot imagine, That Colleges being founded for the Encouragement of Learning, ſhould lay Men more open to Arbitrary Proceedings, than any other Legal Societies are: However Deprivation in Coveney's Caſe, was agreed to be a Temporal Thing; and for that Reaſon his Appeal was rejected, as not relating to a Matter of Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction, which was only provided for 24 and 25 Henr. 8. But it was allowed, That he might bring an Action at Common Law. Our Author ſeveral times mentions this Caſe; but puts it off till he comes to Treat of Appeals, i. e. to the Place he knew it to be improper in. For the Queſtion is not, Whether an Appeal doth lie to the King in Chancery, in Caſe of Deprivation? but, Whether there be not a Remedy at Common Law, if a Perſon be deprived of a Freehold without due Form of Law? And after a great deal of Impertinency, about the manner of Appeals, he at laſt concludes, The Remedy had been at Common Law only; which is clear giving up the Point. For then, in caſe a Perſon be deprived without due courſe of Law, of his Freehold, he grants, that he is to have his Remedy at Law; and conſequently, that a Deprivation of ſuch a Freehold without due courſe of Law, is not ſufficient. For the Law provides no Remedy where there is no Injury done, nor juſt Cauſe to ſeek for Redreſs. And ſo I come to the ſecond Objection; which is this;

Mod. Rep. f. 84.

Dier, f. 209.

p. 224.

2. That to deny the Juriſdiction of this Court, is to deny the King's Supremacy; and that is a dangerous thing by the Law.

The Caſe was this; Dr. F. of Magdalen College in Oxford, being ſummoned before the Commiſſioners, denied the Authority of the Court, and perſiſted in ſo doing; which our Author ſaith, in another King's Reign perhaps might have been interpreted a Queſtioning the very Supremacy it ſelf; which, how fatal it was to John Fiſher, Biſhop of Rocheſter, and Sir Thomas Moore, is worthy to be conſidered, both as a Demonſtration of our King's Clemency, and that the Doctor hath not ſo much reaſon to complain of his hard Uſage.

Viſitatorial Power, p. 313.

The Meaning whereof is this, That if they had proceeded in Juſtice againſt him, he ought to have ſuffered as Biſhop Fiſher and Sir Thomas Moore did. This is more than a bare Inſinuation, That to deny the Juriſdiction of this Court, is to deny the King's Supremacy; and that it is meer Clemency not to deal by them who do it, as Henry the Eighth did by Biſhop Fiſher and Sir Thomas Moore.

But, 1. It is by no means evident, That thoſe two Perſons ſuffered meerly on that Account. For their Attainder in Parliament, was for refuſing the Oath of Succeſſion; and King James the Firſt, mentions the Words of Sir Thomas Moore to that purpoſe, which he ſpake to the Lords when he was condemned. And their Attainder, if I miſtake not, was in the ſame Parliament which made it Treaſon to dreprive the King of his Dignity, Title or Name of his Royal Eſtate, and therefore could not be by an Act not then paſſed.

King James his Works, p. 283.

But, 2. Suppoſe that they were at laſt proceeded againſt on the Act then paſſed, what is this to the preſent Caſe? when Coke ſaith, This Act

p. 200. And his Anſwers to the Power of Revocation are ſo weak, that they come at laſt to no more than this, It is a thing which cannot well be done at preſent, therefore there is no fear it ever ſhould be done. Here is ſome Security, at leaſt till it can be done. But as to the Poſſeſſions of the Eccleſiaſtical Perſons of the Church of England, he endeavours to prove, That they can have no Security at all [illegible] their preſent Poſſeſſions, notwithſtanding any Promiſe, or a Legal Title: For if, as he p.297,298. ſaith, The King by his Paramount Juriſdiction can make any Exceptions null; and ſo void a ſolemn Oath; not to accept a Diſpenſation from that Oath; why ſhould he not as well make void any Promiſe of his own, when he henders (as he thinks) a greater Good, eſpecially if the Prerogative cannot be bound? But, 2. Suppoſe that they were at laſt proceeded againſt on the Act then paſſed, what is this to the preſent Caſe? when Coke ſaith, This

Act

4 Inſt. f. 42. Act was twice repealed. And it is no extraordinary Clemency, not to be proceeded againſt by a Law that hath no force.

3. The Statute in Force, 5 Eliz. c. 1. is againſt thoſe who defend or maintain the Authority, Juriſdiction, or Power of the Biſhop of Rome, or of his See, heretofore claimed, uſed, or uſurped within this Realm, or by any Speech, open Deed, or Act, adviſedly, wittingly attribute any ſuch manner of Juriſdiction, Authority, or Preheminence to the ſaid See of Rome, or any Biſhop of the ſame, for the time being within this Realm. So that it cannot be denied, that there is occaſion for his Majeſty's Clemency; but it is to another ſort of Men.

4. It is very hard ſtraining to make the denying the Juriſdiction of this Court, to be denying the King's Supremacy, when a Perſon hath done all which the Law requires him to do towards owning the Supremacy. If he had ſaid Dr. F. had taken Poſſeſſion of his Fellowſhip there, without taking the Oath of Supremacy, which the Law requires, he had then indeed given ground to ſuſpect him for denying the King's Supremacy; but to take no notice of thoſe who refuſed to do as the Law requires, and to talk thus of what Severity might be uſed to one that hath done it, looks in him neither like Clemency nor Juſtice.

5. It was always looked on, as a Legal Right to make Exception to the Juriſdiction of a Court, eſpecially when newly eſtabliſhed, without Act of Parliament, and to any ordinary Underſtanding, in flat Contradiction to it. It is very new Doctrine that in a Legal Government Exceptio Fori ſhall be interpreted a Denial of Supreme Authority, which was not only allowed by the Canon and Civil Laws, but by the moſt ancient Common Lawyers we have.

Bracton obſerves ſeveral things, which are material to this purpoſe.

Bract. l. 5. de Excep. c. 1. 1. The firſt general Exception which is allowed, he ſaith, is contra Juriſdictionem. Exceptions are either dilatory or peremptory. Some that are only dilatory, as to the Action, may be peremptory as to the Juriſdiction. And theſe are to be put in ante Litem conteſtatam, ad perimendum Judicium, ne procedat. And the firſt of this ſort, are the Exceptions contra Juriſdictionem, & contra Perſonas Judicantium, quibus deficit Autoritas judicandi. So that he ſuppoſes, that ſuch who do not deny the King's Supreme Authority, may have a legal and juſt Exception againſt the Authority of a Court.

L. 2. c. 8. n. 9. 2. It was an allowable Exceptio Fori then, if any Lay-Perſons did take upon them to proceed by Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures.

In Eccleſiaſtical Caſes, ſaith he, a Secular Judge hath no Cognizance, becauſe he hath not the Power of Coercion proper to them, viz. by Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures; therefore, he ſaith, in his Cauſis pertinet Cognitio ad Judices Eccleſiaſticos. His Reaſon is, Becauſe thoſe only are the competent Judges, who have the Power of Coercion proper to the Court. And for the ſame Cauſe, Eccleſiaſtical Judges are not to interpoſe in Secular Cauſes, cum jura ſint ſeparata & limitata. And although the Exemption of Eccleſiaſtical Perſons from the Civil Courts, be certainly taken away by the Acts of Supremacy; yet it hath been ſtill alledged by our Divines, That the Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures were ſtill reſerved to the Eccleſiaſtical Functions; either in the way of Ordinary or Delegate Juriſdiction. If the High Commiſſion did ſeem to go further, then that Power being taken away by Act of Parliament, it muſt return to the ancient Courſe.

L. 5. de Exc. c. 14. 3. There muſt be a Legal Authority to conſtitute a Legal Juriſdiction.

Ad hoc quod rata ſint judicia videre oportet an Juſtic. Warrantum habeat à Rege quod judicare poſſit. Si Warrantum non habuerit, non valebit quod coram eo actum fuerit, quaſi coram non ſuo judice, quia primo legi debet Breve Originale, & poſtmodum Breve per quod Juſticiar. conſtitutus eſt, & ſi nullum omnino habuerit, aut ſi habuerit non tamen ad manum, non erit ei parendum niſi ita forte ſit, quod Breve Originale de Juſticiaria ſua faciat mentionem, Bracton, l. 5. De Except. c. 14.

1. There muſt be a Commiſſion from the King, which muſt be read; and if either they have it not, or it be not at hand, the Juriſdiction is not to be owned, unleſs it be mentioned in the Original Writ. For Commiſſions in thoſe days were moſt commonly granted by Writ, ſaith the Lord Coke. 2 Inſt. f. 418.

But by Bracton's Words it appears, That commonly there was an Original Writ and a Commiſſicn beſides; but ſometime the Commiſſion was in the Original Writ, and then the reading of that was ſufficient.

The Mirror ſaith, That the Juriſdiction may be denied, if the ſeeing or hearing the Commiſſion be denied. Mirror de Juſtic. *c.*3. §. 6.

2. The Bounds of the Juriſdiction muſt be expreſſed; and if thoſe be exceeded, he ſaith an Exception lies: Which ſignifies nothing unleſs the Commiſſion be known.

3. The Commiſſion muſt be according to Law; for that is Bracton's ſtanding Rule: Nihil aliud poteſt Rex in Terris, cum ſit Dei Miniſter & Vicarius, niſi id ſolum quod Jure poteſt. So that a Commiſſion againſt Law is void in Law. He mentions the Common Saying in the Civil Law, Quod Principi placet, Legis habet Vigorem; and anſwers it thus, Quod Princi placet is not to be underſtood of his Preſumptive, but his Legiſlative Will (Animo condendi Jura) and with the Advice of his Magiſtrates, the King himſelf giving Authority; which is the Deſcription of an Act of Parliament, as we now call it. L. 3. de Action. c. 9. n. 3.

Which he more fully expreſſes elſewhere, Legis vigorem habet, quicquid de Conſilio & de Conſenſu Magnatum & Reipublicæ Communi Sponſione Authoritate Regis, ſine Principis præcedente, juſte fuerit definitum & approbatum. L. 1. c. 1 n. 2.

If this were the ancient Law of England, how comes the Exception againſt a Court to be a Denial of the King's Supremacy, unleſs it be ſuppoſed impoſſible that there ſhould be an illegal Court with the King's Commiſſion.

But we may ſuppoſe it poſſible for a new kind of Star-Chamber, or Court of Wards to be ſet up; muſt no Man queſtion the Legality of ſuch a Court, without denying the King's Authority? For this is a Queſtion in Point of Law; and the King's Authority always goes with the Law: And therefore to ſuppoſe it to be in any thing againſt Law, is to ſuppoſe it to be contradictory to it ſelf.

But our Author ſaith, It is neceſſary for every Court to aſſert its own Juriſdiction. Very true, and to clear it too, if it be liable to a juſt Exception. I am very far from denying the King's Supremacy; yet I may be as far from thinking ſuch a Court to be Legal, if an Act of Parliament can make a Court illegal: And to ſay no more for it, but that every Court muſt aſſert its own Juriſdiction, is to level it with the infamous High Court of Juſtice, which, when King Charles the Firſt, of Bleſſed Memory, denied their Authority, all the Reply was, That the Court was ſatisfied of its own Authority; which could give Satisfaction to no body elſe. P. 317.

And if this be all can be ſaid for the Legality of it, for all that I can ſee, there is juſt Reaſon to deny it.

OF THE JURISDICTION OF THE BISHOPS IN Capital Cauſes.

102.2.P.

DISCOURSE III.

Chap. I.

The Queſtion ſtated, and General Prejudices removed.

Letter, p. 12. THE Queſtion in debate, as it is ſtated by the Author of the Letter, is, Whether the Biſhops may be preſent, and Vote judicially in Capital Caſes, which come to be judged in Parliament, either in giving the Judgment it ſelf, or in reſolving and determining any Circumſtance preparatory, and leading to that Judgment?

For our better proceeding towards a Reſolution of this Queſtion, it will be neceſſary to take notice of ſome things granted on both ſides, which may prevent needleſs Diſputes, and be of great uſe in the following Debate.

P. 93. 1. It is granted, That the Biſhops do ſit in Parliament by virtue of their Baronies, and are bound to ſerve the King there. And one part of the Service due to the King there, is to ſit in Judgment; for the Author of the Book entitled, The Juriſdiction of the Houſe of Peers aſſerted, proves at large, That the Right of Judicature belongs to the Barons in Parliament; and that the Lords Spiritual have a conſiderable ſhare therein, appears by this Paſſage in the Title-Page of that Book, tranſlated into Engliſh.

The Judgment of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal is according to the Uſe and Cuſtom of Parliament.
The Uſe and Cuſtom of Parliament is the Law of Parliament.
The Law of Parliament is the Law of England.
The Law of England is the Law of the Land.
The Law of the Land is according to Magna Charta.
Therefore the Judgment of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal is according to Magna Charta.

Some Right then of Judicature in Parliament the Biſhops have by Magna Charta; which, whatever it be, is as much theirs by that Charter as any Right of Temporal Perſons, and cannot be invaded or taken from them without breach of that Charter, any more than the Rights of the Lords Temporal, or of any other Perſons whatſoever. But how far that Right doth extend, is now the thing in Queſtion.

2. It is not denied, That the Biſhops do ſit in Parliament by the ſame kind of Writs that other Barons do. They are ſummon'd to adviſe and debate about the great and difficult Affairs of the Kingdom; cum Prælatis, Magnatibus & Proceribus dicti Regni noſtri Angliæ colloquium habere & tractatum, i.e. to join therein with the Biſhops and other Lords of the Kingdom. So that by the King's Writ of Summons they are impower'd and required to confer and treat of all the weighty Affairs that ſhall be brought before them. And no Inſtance is ſo much as offer'd to be produc'd of any Writ wherein the King doth limit and reſtrain the Biſhops, any more than any other Lords of Parliament, as to any matter of Conſultation, or Point of Judicature, belonging to that Houſe. They have then by their Writ of Summons as good right to ſit in all Caſes as in any: And ſince the other Lords by their Writs are ſummoned to adviſe with the Prelates in all matters that ſhall come before them, without limitation, it is not to be conceived how this can be done, if the Biſhops in ſome of the moſt important Debates be excluded.

3. It is yielded, That if the Houſe proceeds in a Legiſlative way by passing Bills of Attainder, the Biſhops have a Right to ſit and vote therein as well as other Lords; at theſe it is ſaid, That the Biſhops are or ſhould be all preſent at the paſſing of them, for then they act as Members of the Houſe of Lords in their Legiſlative Capacity. But Men do as certainly die that are condemned in the Legiſlative, as in the Judicial way. Is not this then really as much a Caſe of Blood as the other? If the Biſhops ſhould give their Votes in the Legiſlative way to condemn a Perſon for Treaſon, and yet think they had not Voted in a Caſe of Blood, they would then indeed be like Chaucer's Fryar, mentioned by the Author of the Letter, that would have of a Capon the Liver, and of a Pig the Head, yet would that nothing for him ſhould be dead. Doth a Bill of Attainder cut off a Man's Head without making it a Caſe of Blood? There can be then no Objection now made againſt the Biſhops Right from any Canons of the Church; for thoſe allow no ſuch diſtinction of proceeding in the Legiſlative or Judicial way. And the late Author of the Peerage and Juriſdiction of the Lords Spiritual doth grant, That the Canons do prohibit the Biſhops voting in Bills of Attainder, as much as in any Caſe whatſoever. P. 118. P. 66. P. 21.

But we are not to ſuppoſe a Perſon of ſuch Abilities as the Author of the Letter, would go about to exclude the Biſhops from their Right of Voting in a Judicial way in Caſes Capital, unleſs there were ſome great appearance of Law on his ſide; becauſe he profeſſes ſo great a Deſire that Right may prevail; and, That his Deſign in writing was, to ſatisfy himſelf and others where that Right is. The diſcovery whereof is our preſent buſineſs. Yet before the Author of the Letter comes to a cloſe Debate of the matter of Right, he lets fall ſome general Inſinuations to create a Prejudice in the Reader's Mind, as to the Biſhops meddling at all in ſecular Affairs, as though it were inconſiſtent with their Function, P. 2, 3.

and with ſome Paſſages in the Imperial Law. And becauſe Men may ſometimes do more harm by what they tell us they will not ſay, than by what they do ſay, it will be fit to prevent the danger of ſuch Inſinuations before we come to conſider his Arguments.

P. 5. 1. The firſt is, That meddling at all in Secular Affairs ſeems to be the doing that which the Apoſtles declared they would not do, viz. leave the Word of God, and ſerve Tables. But are all Perſons of Eſtates now bound to part with them as the Chriſtians then did? The ſerving of Tables was a full Employment; and they who attended that Office were the Treaſurers of the Church, to diſtribute to every one as they judged fit, out of the common Stock. Is it no Service to God, to do Juſtice, and to ſhew Mercy? To attend upon the publick Affairs of the Kingdom, when they are called to it by their Sovereign? Or are all Biſhops now in the ſame Circumſtances the Apoſtles were when the Chriſtian Church was to be planted in the World, and ſo few Perſons as the 12 Apoſtles made choice of for that Work? Is there no difference to be made between a Church conſtituted and ſettled and incorporated into the Commonwealth, and one not yet formed, but labouring under great Difficulties, and making its way through conſtant Perſecutions? May it not be as well argued, that Biſhops are not to ſtay in one Country, nor to have any fixed Habitation, becauſe the Apoſtles paſſed from Place to Place preaching the Word of God? Doth not the Author of the Letter himſelf confeſs, That the Clergy are one of the Three Eſtates of the Kingdom? And by the Act 8 Eliz. 1. the Clergy are called one of the greateſt States of this Realm. And is there not then great Reaſon, that thoſe who are the chief part of it, as he confeſſeth the Biſhops to be, ſhould have a ſhare in Affairs that concern the whole Nation? And would it not ſeem ſtrange to the Chriſtian World, that we alone of all the Kingdoms of Europe ſhould exclude the Biſhops from having an equal Intereſt with the other Eſtates in Parliament? For it were eaſy to prove from unqueſtionable Teſtimonies, that as ſoon as the Chriſtian Religion was well ſettled in any of theſe Northern Kingdoms, the Biſhops were admitted into all the publick Councils; and have ſo continued to this Day, where the Convention of the Eſtates hath been kept up, Bohemia only excepted ſince the Days of Sigiſmond.

Hincmar. Epiſt. de ordine Palatii. I begin with France, where Hincmarus ſaith, There were two great Councils every Year: One of the States of the Kingdom, for ordering the Affairs of the enſuing Year, and redreſſing of Grievances; and in theſe the Biſhops were always preſent: and the other of the King's Council, which managed the intervening Affairs; and into this the chief of the Biſhops were always choſen. It were endleſs to repeat the ſeveral Parliaments in France in the time of the Merovingian and Caroline Race, wherein Laws were paſſed, and the great Affairs of the Kingdom managed by the Biſhops, Noblemen, and others. Thoſe who have looked into the ancient Annals and Capitulars of France cannot be ignorant of this. There is one thing remarkable to our purpoſe in the famous Council of Franckford, which oppoſed the Worſhip of Images ſo ſtoutly, viz. that after the matters of Religion were agreed, then, according to the Cuſtom of that Age, the other Eſtates being preſent, they proceeded to other matters; and then Taſſilo, Duke of Bavaria, was brought upon his Knees for Treaſon; and the Cauſe of Peter, Biſhop of Verdun, was heard, who was likewiſe accuſed of Treaſon, and there purged himſelf. Concerning both which Caſes there are 2 Canons ſtill extant among the Canons nons of that Council; and in another, the Biſhops are appointed, by conſent of the King, to do Juſtice in their ſeveral Dioceſſes. And that they had not only a ſhare in the Legiſlative, but in the Judiciary part, appears by one of the ancient Formulæ in Marculphus, where it is ſaid, that the King ſat in Judgment, unà cum Dominis & Patribus noſtris Epiſcopis, vel cum plurimis Optimatibus noſtris; (vel, in the Language of that Age, is the ſame with, &c.) This was the Palatine Court, where Bignonius ſaith, the greater Cauſes were heard, the King himſelf being preſent; (or the Comes Palatii,) Epiſcopis & Proceribus adſidentibus, the Biſhops and Lords ſitting in Judicature together with him. And this was not only the Original of the Parliament of Paris, as a ſtanding Court of Judicature; but the like in England was the true foundation of the Supreme Court of Judicature in the Houſe of Peers. So that in the eldeſt and beſt Times of France, after Chriſtianity had prevailed there, neither Conſultation about publick Affairs, nor Adminiſtration of Juſtice were thought inconſiſtent with the Function of Biſhops.

In Spain during the Gothick Power, all the great Affairs of the Kingdom, and even the Rights of their Princes, were debated and tranſacted by the greateſt of the Clergy and Nobility together; as may be ſeen in the ſeveral Councils of Toledo in that time, in the Caſe of Suintilas, Siſenandus, and others. And in one of them it is ſaid, that after they had diſpatched Matters of Religion, they proceeded ad cæterarum Cauſarum negotia, to the handling of other Cauſes. In the 13 Council of Toledo, the Caſe of Impeachments of Treaſon is brought in; and Rules ſet down for the due proceedings therein. And yet from one of theſe Councils of Toledo it is, that all the ſtir hath been made in the Canon-Law about Biſhops not being preſent in caſes of blood.

In Germany, the firſt Laws that were ever publiſhed were thoſe by Lotharius II. in Comitiis Regni, ſaith Goldaſtus; and there were preſent 33 Biſhops, 34 Dukes, 72 Counts, beſides the People. And by the Matriculation-Roll of the States of the Empire, it appears what a great Intereſt the Clergy have preſerved therein, from the firſt times of the prevalency of Chriſtianity there. And Arumæus, a conſiderable Proteſtant Lawyer of the Empire ſaith, the Biſhops of Germany ſit in a double Capacity in the Diets, both as Biſhops, and as Princes of the Empire. And he commends the prudence of that Conſtitution with reſpect both to Juſtice, and the Honour and Safety of Religion.

For the Kingdom of Bohemia, Goldaſtus, a learned Proteſtant, ſaith, that there, as in all other well-conſtituted Kingdoms among Chriſtians, there were 3 Eſtates, of Prelates, Nobles, and Commons; and this continued, he ſaith, from the time Chriſtianity was receiv'd, till the days of Sigiſmond.

No ſooner was Chriſtianity received in Hungary, but their Princes, Stephanus and Ladiſlaus, called their great Councils of their Prelates and Nobles; and the Laws made in the Concilium Zabolchianum were paſſed by the King, with all his Biſhops and Nobles, and with the conſent of the whole Clergy and People.

In Poland, Starovolſcius ſaith, that their Anceſtors, after they received Chriſtianity, out of regard to Religion, gave the Biſhops the firſt place in the Senate; and admitted the Clergy to the great Offices of the Kingdom. And Sigiſmond in his Conſtitution ſaith, the States of Poland conſiſt of the Biſhops, Barons, and Delegates, called Nuncii terreſtres.

In the Northern Kingdoms, Adamus Bremenſis ſaith, that the Biſhops after the People received Chriſtianity, were receiv'd into their publick Councils. And Loccenius reckons up among the ſeveral Eſtates, the Biſhops, Nobles, Knights, and Deputies of the Country and Cities. And it appears by the Hirdſtraa, or the ancient Laws of Norway, the Biſhops as well as Nobility were preſent in the Convention of the States, and all publick Councils.

The like might be proved here in the Saxon times, from the Converſion of Ethelbert downward. This is ſo very evident, that he muſt blind his Eyes that doth not ſee it, if he doth but caſt them on the Hiſtory of thoſe times.

Theſe things I have laid together with all poſſible brevity and clearneſs, that in one view we may ſee a conſent of all theſe parts of the Chriſtian World, in calling Biſhops to their publick Councils, and moſt ſolemn Debates; and how far they were from thinking ſuch Imployment inconſiſtent with their Sacred Function, and charging them, that thereby they left the Word of God to ſerve Tables. Neither can this be looked on as any part of the Degeneracy of the Church, or the Policy of the Papacy; ſince as the fore-cited Arumæus ſaith, they were admitted to this Honour before the Papal Power was advanced; and were ſo far from carrying on the Pope's Deſigns, that they were, in moſt Countries, the greateſt Oppoſers of them. And when the Popes began to ſet up the Monarchy, their buſineſs was, to draw them off from meeting in theſe Councils, under ſeveral pretences of Caſes of Blood, and other things; the better to keep them in a ſole Dependency on themſelves. As will appear by the following Diſcourſe.

Lett. p. 3, 4.

2. The next thing ſuggeſted is, that the Imperial Law doth forbid Clergy-men having any thing to do with Secular Matters. And for this a Reſcript of Honorius and Theodoſius is mentioned, and a Decree of Juſtinian. To which I anſwer, Stat. Merton. c. 9. 20 H. 3. Diſſert. ad Flet. c. 9. S. 2.

1. The Imperial Edicts are not the Law of England. Our diſpute is about a Right by our own Laws; which a Reſcript of Honorius and Theodoſius can neither give nor take away. What would become of the whole frame of our Government, and of our juſt Rights and Properties, if the producing of Imperial Edicts would be ſufficient to overthrow them? When the Biſhops once pleaded hard in Parliament in behalf of an Imperial Conſtitution, lately adopted into the Canon-Law; the Anſwer given by all the Temporal Lords was, Nolumus leges Angliæ mutare, quæ huc uſque uſitatæ ſunt & approbatæ. They did not mean they would make no Alterations in Parliament, for that very Parliament did ſo in ſeveral things; but their meaning was, as Mr. Selden obſerves, that they owned neither Canon nor Imperial Laws here, any farther than they were agreeable to the Laws of the Land.

Soz. hiſt. l. 1. c. 9. Capitul. Carol. & Ludov. l. 6. c 281. ed. Lindenb. c. 366. ed. Baluz.

2. The Imperial Conſtitutions do give liberty to Church-men to have to do in Secular Affairs. The Emperor Conſtantine, whoſe Conſtitutions deſerve as great regard as thoſe of Honorius and Theodoſius, to ſhew his reſpect to the Chriſtian Religion, permitted all Men to bring their Cauſes before the Biſhops, without ever going to the other Tribunals, as Sozomen, a Lawyer of Conſtantinople, relates. And this is the true foundation of the Conſtitution De Epiſcopali Judicio; as Gothofred confeſſeth. Which is at large inſerted into the Capitulars, with a more than uſual Introduction; and made a Law to all the Subjects of the Empire, Franks, Saxons, Lombards, Britains, &c. and therefore is more conſiderable to theſe parts than a bare Reſcript of Honorius and Theodoſius. And yet theſe very Emperors, in a Conſtitution of theirs, do ſo far ratifie the Judgment of Biſhops upon Trial by conſent before them that no Appeal doth lie from their Decree. What Reſcript then is this of theirs which ſo utterly forbids Clergy-men having any thing to do with publick Functions, or things appertaining to the Court? I ſuppoſe that Conſtitution of Honorius is meant, which confines the Biſhops Power to what concerns Religion; and leaves other Cauſes to the ordinary Judges and the Courſe of Law. But two things are well obſerved by Jac. Gothofred concerning this Reſcript of Honorius: 1. That it is meant of abſolute and peremptory Judgment without Appeal; 2. That whatever is meant by it, not many Years after, this Conſtitution was repealed by Honorius himſelf, and the Biſhop's Sentence made as abſolute as before. So that Honorius is clearly againſt him, if a Man's ſecond Judgment and Thoughts be better.

3. The Practice of the beſt Men in thoſe Ages ſhews, that they thought no Law in force to forbid Church-men to meddle in Secular Affairs; as might be at large proved from the practice of Gregory Thaumaturgus and St. Baſil in the Eaſt; of Silvanus Biſhop of Troas, of St. Ambroſe, St. Auguſtine, and others of the greateſt and moſt devout Church-men of thoſe times. And St. Auguſtine was ſo far from thinking it unlawful, that in his Opinion St. Paul commanded the Biſhops to do it. Conſtituit enim talibus Cauſis Eccleſiaſticos Apoſtolus Cognitores. And the learned Gothofred of Geneva ſaith, Mos hic frequens & legitimus eundi ad Judices Epiſcopos. It was then a common and legal practice to go to Biſhops as to their Judges. Which would never have been if there had been a Law in force to forbid Biſhops meddling in Secular Affairs.

4. The Emperors ſtill reſerved to themſelves the Power of diſpenſing with their own Reſcripts, and the Canons of the Church. Therefore the Council of Sardica, when it prohibits Biſhops going to Court, excepts the Princes calling them thither. Upon which Balſamon hath this Note; that although the Canons prohibit it, yet if the Emperor commands, the Biſhops are bound to obey, and to do what he commands them; without any fault either in the Emperor or them. And in other places, he aſſerts the Emperor's Power of diſpenſing with the ſtricteſt Canons againſt Churchmens meddling in Secular Affairs: Thence he ſaith, the Metropolitan of Side was chief Miniſter of State under Michael Ducas; and the Biſhop of Neocæſarea made the Laws of the Admiralty for Greece. And the Gloſſe upon Juſtinian's Novels, obſerves that Biſhops may meddle with the Affairs of the Commonwealth, when their Prince calls them to it. And this is the preſent Caſe; for the Biſhops are ſummon'd by the King's Writ to ſerve him in the publick Council of the Nation; and therefore no Imperial Reſcript, if it were of force in England, could have any in this Caſe, which was allowed by the Imperial Laws themſelves.

5. There is a great Miſtake about Juſtinian's Decree. For the Biſhops are not ſo much as mention'd in it; but the Defenſores Eccleſiarum; who were Lawyers, or Advocates of the Church: as appears by a Conſtitution of Honorius; where Gothofred proves they were not ſo much as in Orders. It is true, Juſtinian doth appropriate the Probate of Wills to the Maſter of his Revenue; but the Law and Cuſtom of England, as Lynwood obſerves, hath alter'd that Conſtitution; and which muſt we regard more, Juſtinian, or our own Laws?

I find one thing more ſuggeſted by way of Prejudice to the Cauſe in Lett. p. 4. hand, viz. the Common Law of England, which hath provided a Writ upon a Clergy-man's being choſen an Officer in a Mannor, ſaying it was contra Legem & Conſuetudinem Regni, & non conſonum. The Argument had been altogether as good, if it had been taken from a Miniſter of a Pariſh not being capable of the Office of Conſtable; and it had as effectually proved, that Clergy-men ought not to meddle in Secular Affairs.

CHAP. II.

The RIGHT in Point of LAW debated. Concerning the Conſtitution of CLARENDON and the PROTESTATION, 11 R. 2.

HAving removed theſe general Prejudices, I now come to debate more cloſely the main Poinr. For the Author of the Letter un-Lett. p. 68. dertakes to prove, that Biſhops cannot by Law give Votes in Capital Caſes in Parliament. Which he doth two ways, 1. By Statute-Law; 2. By Uſe and Cuſtom, which he ſaith is Parliament-Law; and for this he produceth many Precedents.

I. For Statute-Law; two Ratifications, he ſaith, there have been of it in Parliament; by the Conſtitutions of Clarendon, and the 11 R. 2.

Lett. p. 69. 1. The Conſtitutions of Clarendon; which he looks on as the more conſiderable, becauſe they were not the enacting of new Laws, but a declaration of what was before. And for the ſame Reaſon I value them too, and ſhall be content this Cauſe ſtand or fall by them.

The Conſtitution in debate is the 11th, which is thus repeated and tranſlated in the Letter. Archiepiſcopi, Epiſcopi, & univerſæ Perſonæ Regni qui de Rege tenent in Capite, habeant poſſeſſiones ſuas de Rege, ſicut Baroniam, & inde Reſpondeant Juſticiariis & Miniſtris Regis, & ſequantur & faciant omnes conſuetudines Regias: Et ſicut cæteri Barones, debent intereſſe judiciis Curiæ Regis, quouſque perveniatur ad diminutionem membrorum, vel ad mortem.

The Archbiſhops, Biſhops, and all the dignified Clergy of the Land that hold of the King in Capite, ſhall hold their Poſſeſſions from the King, as a Barony, and anſwer for their eſtates unto the King's Juſtiſices and Miniſters, and ſhall obſerve and obey all the King's Laws: And together with the other Barons, they are to be preſent at all Judgments in the King's Courts, till it come to require either loſs of Member or Life.

Lett. p. 71, 72. The Argument from hence he enforceth from the ſolemn Recognition and publick Confirmation of theſe Conſtitutions, and the Oath taken to obſerve them; from whence he concludes this to be Teſtimoninium irrefragabile; An irrefragable and invincible Teſtimony. And ſo I foreſee it will prove, but to a quite contrary purpoſe from what he intended it.

The whole Queſtion depends upon the meaning of the latter Clauſe of Lett. p. 61. this Conſtitution. The meaning he gives of it is this, that the Prelates of the the Church ſhould not be preſent at the Judgments given in the King's Courts, when loſs of Member or Life was in queſtion.

The meaning of it, I conceive to be this, that the Biſhops are required to be preſent in the King's Courts as other Barons are, till they come to give Sentence as to diſmembring, or loſs of Life.

Whether of theſe is the true meaning is now to be conſidered; and that will beſt be diſcovered theſe three ways; 1. By the Occaſion. 2. By the plain Senſe of the Words, according to their true Reading. 3. By the ſubſequent Practice upon this Conſtitution in the Parliament at Northampton ſoon after.

1. By the Occaſion. The Author of the Letter aſſigns that Occaſion for this Conſtitution, for which there is not the leaſt Colour, viz. That the Prelates of that time were ambitious of a kind of Omnipotency, Lett. p.73. (in Judicature I ſuppoſe he means) and that to reſtrain their Power of Judging Capital Caſes, this Conſtitution was made: And becauſe this ſeemed to be a Diminution of their Power, therefore Matt. Paris ranks it amongſt the Conſuetudines iniquas, the wicked Cuſtoms of the former times. For all which there is not the leaſt Shadow of Proof. Beſides that, it is ſo repugnant to the Hiſtory of thoſe Times, that I can hardly believe a Perſon of ſo much Learning and Judgment, as is commonly ſaid to be the Author of the Letter, could betray ſo much Unſkilfulneſs in the Affairs of thoſe Times. For this is ſo far from being true, that the Biſhops did then affect ſuch a Power of Judging in all Secular Cauſes, that they looked on their Attendance in the King's Court in the Trial of Cauſes, as a Burthen which they would fain have been rid of; becauſe they accounted it a Mark of Subjection to the Civil Power, and contrary to that Eccleſiaſtical Liberty, or Independency on Princes, which from the Days of Gregory VII. they had been endeavouring to ſet up. Which H. II. being very ſenſible of, reſolved to tie them to the Service of their Baronies, and to an attendance on the King's Courts together with other Barons. But leſt they ſhould pretend any force on their Conſciences, as to the Canons of the Church, this Conſtitution doth not require, but ſuffers them to withdraw when they came to Sentence in matters of Blood. And that this was the true occaſion, I prove by theſe two invincible Arguments.

1. By the Complaint which they made of the Baronies as too great a Mark of Subjection to the Civil Power. This is plain from Matt. Paris Matt. Paris, ad A. D. 1070. himſelf, to whom the Author of the Letter refers; for when he ſpeaks of William the Conqueror's bringing the Temporalties of the Biſhops into the Condition of Baronies, i. e. forcing them to hold them of him in Chief, upon certain Duties and Services, he calls it Conſtitutionem peſſimam, a moſt wicked Conſtitution; juſt as he calls the Cuſtoms of Clarendon, Conſuetudines iniquas, wicked Cuſtoms. And he adds, That many were baniſhed rather than they would ſubmit to that Conſtitution. For their Privileges were ſo great with the Frank-almoign they enjoyed in the Saxon times, and their Deſires ſo hearty (eſpecially among the Monks, who from Edgar's time had gotten into moſt Cathedral Churches) to advance the Papal Monarchy, that they rather choſe to quit all, than to give up the Cauſe of the Church's Liberty, by accepting of Baronies. Therefore Matt. Paris calls the Rolls that were made of the Services belonging to theſe Baronies, Rotulas Eccleſiaſticæ Servitutis, the Rolls of Eccleſiaſtical Slavery; than which nothing could be more contrary to that Eccleſiaſtical Liberty which was then ſetting up by Pope Hilbebrand. And to put this out of all diſpute, Petrus Bleſenſis, a Name well known in this diſpute, in that very Book where he complains of the Biſhops Hypocriſy about Caſes of Blood, in being preſent at hearing and trying Cauſes, but going out at Sentence, complains likewiſe of their Baronies as thoſe which gave occaſion to that Hypocriſy, and as the Marks of the vileſt Slavery. Et in occaſione turpiſſimæ Servitutis ſeipſos Barones appellant. They may think it an Honour to be called the King's Barons, but he accounts it the greateſt Slavery; and applies that Place of Scripture to them, They have reigned but not by me; they are become Princes, and I know them not. Now Pet. Bleſenſis lived in the Time of H. II. and knew the whole Proceedings of the Conſtitutions of Clarendon, and was a zealous Maintainer of Becket's Cauſe, or, which was all one, of the Liberties of the Church, as they call'd them, againſt the Civil Power.

Pet. Bleſ. de Inſtitut. Epiſc. p. 451.

2. By the fierce Conteſt between the Civil and Eccleſiaſtical Power, about the Liberties of Church-men. This was carried on from the time that William I. brought them into Subjection by their Baronies: His Sons ſtood upon the Rights of the Crown, whilſt Anſelm and his Brethren ſtruggled all they could, but to little purpoſe, till after the Death of H. I. Then Stephen, to gratify the great Prelates, by whoſe favour he came to the Crown, yielded all they deſired; but he ſoon repented, and they were even with him for it. Malmesbury takes particular notice, that he yielded they ſhould have their Poſſeſſions free and abſolute; and they promiſed only a conditional Allegiance to him as long as he maintained the Liberties of the Church. When King Stephen broke the Canons, as they ſaid, by impriſoning 2 Biſhops, the Biſhop of Wincheſter and his Brethren ſummoned him to anſwer it before them in Council; and there declared that the King had nothing to do with Church-men, till the Cauſe was firſt heard and determined by themſelves. All his Time they had no regard to his Authority when it contradicted their Wills; and when the Peace was made between Him and H. II. Radulphus de Diceto takes notice, That the Power of the Clergy increaſed by it. In this ſtate H. II. found Things, when Gul. Neuburgenſis ſaith, The great Buſineſs of the Church-men was to preſerve their Liberties. Upon this the great Quarrel between Him and Becket began: This made the King ſearch what the Rights of the Crown were which his Anceſtors challenged; to theſe he was reſolved to make Becket and his Brethren ſubmit. For this purpoſe the Parliament was called at Clarendon; and after great Debates the 16 Conſtitutions were produced, which were thoſe the King was reſolved to maintain, and he made the Biſhops as well as others ſwear to obſerve them. Now when the reſt of them relate to ſome Exemptions and Privileges which the Church-men challenged to themſelves about their Courts, Excommunications, Appeals, and ſuch like, and which the King thought fit to reſtrain them in. (From whence in Becket's Epiſtles it is ſaid, thoſe Conſtitutions were framed ad ancillandam Eccleſiam, to bring the Church in ſubjection, as Baronius ſhews out of the Vatican Copy. And Fitz-Stephen ſaith, All the Conſtitutions of Clarendon were for ſuppreſſing the Liberty of the Church, and oppreſſing the Clergy:) I ſay, conſidering this, is there not then great Reaſon to underſtand this 11*th Conſtitution* after the ſame manner, viz. That notwithſtanding King Stephen's Grant, H. II. would make them hold by Baronies, and do all the Service of Barons in the King's Courts as other Barons did; and he would allow them no other Privilege, but that of with- withdrawing when they came to Sentence in a Caſe of Blood? What is there in this ſenſe, but what is eaſy and natural, and fully agreeable to the ſtate of thoſe Times? Whereas there is not the leaſt foundation for the pretence of the Biſhops affecting to be preſent in all Cauſes, which the King muſt reſtrain by this Conſtitution.

This ſenſe of it is not only without ground, but abſolutely repugnant to all the Hiſtory of that Age. For if this Conſtitution was intended to reſtrain the Biſhops from trying Cauſes of Blood, then the Biſhops did deſire to be preſent in thoſe Cauſes, and the King would not ſuffer them. Whereas it is evident that the Biſhops pretended ſcruple of Conſcience from the Canons that they could not be preſent; but in truth ſtood upon their Exemption from the Service of Barons, which they call'd Eccleſiaſtical Slavery. And therefore that could not be the ſenſe of the Conſtitution, to reſtrain them in that which they deſired to be freed from, and which by this Conſtitution of Clarendon was plainly forced upon them againſt their Wills. For Lanfranc had brought the Canon of the 11*th Council* of Toledo into England, That no Biſhop or Clergy-man ſhould condemn a Man to Death, or give Vote in the Sentence of Condemnation: At which Council were preſent 2 Archbiſhops, 12 Biſhops, and 21 Abbots. And before H. II's Time this Canon of Toledo was received into the Body of the Canon-Law, made by Ivo, Burchardus, Regino, and Gratian, who lived in the Time of King Stephen. And when they ſaw ſuch a Canon ſo generally received, is there not far greater Reaſon to think they deſired to withdraw, than that they ſhould preſs to be preſent, and the King reſtrain them? But the Conſtitution is ſo framed on purpoſe to let them underſtand, that the King expected in all Judgments they ſhould do their Duty as other Barons: But leſt they ſhould think he purpoſely deſigned to make them break the Canons, he leaves them at liberty to withdraw when Sentence was to be given. So that I can hardly doubt but the Author of the Letter, if he pleaſe calmly to reflect upon the whole Matter, will ſee Reaſon to acknowledge his miſtake; and that this Conſtitution was ſo far from intending to reſtrain the Biſhops from all Judicature in Caſes of Blood, that, on the contrary, it was purpoſely framed to oblige them to be preſent, and to act in ſuch Cauſes as the other Barons did, at leaſt till the Cauſe was ripe for Sentence; which laſt Point the King was content to yield to them, out of regard and reverence to the Canons of the Church. For the Words of the Law are not Words of Prohibition and Reſtraint from any thing, but of Obligation to a Duty; which was, to be preſent and ſerve in the King's Courts of Judicature, in like manner as the other Barons did.

Spelm. Concil. To. 2. p. 8, 9, 11

From all which it is evident, I think, beyond contradiction, That the Occaſion of this Law was not the Ambition of the Prelates, (as the Author of the Letter ſuggeſts) to thruſt themſelves into this kind of Judicature; but an Ambition of a worſe kind, (though quite contrary) viz. under a pretence of Eccleſiaſtical Liberty and Privilege, to exempt themſelves from the Service of the King and Kingdom, to which by virtue of their Baronies they were bound, ſicut cæteri Barones, as well as the other Barons. And therefore it is ſo far from being true, that the Biſhops exerciſe of this Juriſdiction together with the Temporal Lords is a Relique of Popery, and one of the Encroachments of the Clergy in thoſe Times of Ignorance and Uſurpation, as ſome well meaning Proteſtants are now made to believe; that, on the contrary, the Exemption

tion of the Clergy from this kind of Secular Judicature was one of the higheſt Points of Popery, and that which the Pope and his Adherents conteſted for with more Zeal than for any Article of the Creed. This was one of thoſe Privileges which Thomas Becket ſaid Chriſt purchaſed for his Church with his Blood, and in the obſtinate defence whereof againſt the King, he himſelf at laſt loſt his Life. And now to put the matter beyond all doubt, I appeal to any Man skilled in the Hiſtory of thoſe Times, whether Thomas Becket oppoſed the Conſtitutions of Clarendon to the Death, and broke the Oath he had taken to obſerve them, becauſe by them (among other things) the Biſhops were excluded from Judicature in Caſes of Blood? Or for the quite contrary reaſon, (among others) becauſe this Service of the King in his Courts, impos'd on them by virtue of their Baronies, was look'd upon by him as a violation of the Privileges of the Church, and a Badge of Eccleſiaſtical Slavery, which by all means he deſir'd to caſt off. And if the latter be the true Reaſon, I leave it to the impartial Reader, and even to the Author of the Letter himſelf upon ſecond Thoughts, whether he have not widely miſtaken both the Occaſion and Meaning of this Law.

2. Let us conſider the plain Senſe of the Words according to the true reading of them. The Author of the Letter hath made uſe of the moſt imperfect Copy, viz. that in Matt. Paris; I cannot tell for what reaſon, unleſs it be that in the laſt Clauſe [in Judicio] is there left out, which is put in the Copy extant in Gervaſe, and in the Vatican Copy, and in ſeveral MSS. in all which it runs thus, Et ſicut Barones cæteri debent intereſſe judiciis Curiæ Regis cum Baronibus, uſque perveniatur in judicio ad diminutionem membrorum, vel ad mortem. Now here are two things to be diſtinguiſhed.

1. Something expreſly required of the Biſhops as to their Preſence in the King's Courts, viz. That they muſt attend as other Barons, and ſit together with them; and therefore it is expreſſed twice, Et ſicut cæteri Barones, in the beginning of that Clauſe, and cum Baronibus again after, and debent intereſſe in the middle. And can any one ſoberly think, that the meaning of all this is, they muſt not be preſent in Caſes of Blood? No: the Conſtitution ſaith, they ought to be preſent as other Barons, and ſit with other Barons in the Trials of the King's Courts. And yet the Author of the Letter doth (to ſpeak mildly) very unfairly repreſent this Conſtitution, as if it did forbid the Prelates to be at all preſent in the Judgments of the King's Courts in Caſes of Blood, and that in expreſs Words. For, ſpeaking of the Conſtitutions of Clarendon, he hath this Paſſage, And one of theſe Conſtitutions was, That the Prelates of the Church ſhould not intereſſe Judiciis Curiæ Regis, be preſent at the Judgments given in the King's Courts. Whereas this Conſtitution (as he himſelf cites it afterwards) runs thus, Debent intereſſe Judiciis Curiæ Regis, quouſque, &c. They ought to be preſent in the Judgments of the King's Courts till it come to loſs of Members or Life. So that this Law expreſly ſays, That they ought to be preſent in the Judgments of the King's Courts, till it come, &c. And when it comes to Loſs of Members or Life, it doth not ſay, (as the Author of the Letter affirms) that they ſhould not be preſent then, nor do the Words of the Conſtitution imply any ſuch thing; but only require (as I ſhall evidently make appear) their Preſence ſo far, and when it ſhould come to Sentence, leaves them at liberty to withdraw in obedience to the Canons of the Church, which they pre- P. 61.

pretended themſelves bound in Conſcience to obſerve. And this is the true Reaſon, why, among the 16 Conſtitutions of Clarendon, (whereof 10 were condemned, 6 tolerated, but none approved, by Pope Alex. III.) this 11 was one of the 6 which eſcaped with an Hoc toleravit, this the Pope was content to tolerate; becauſe in the laſt Clauſe of it there was regard had to the Canons of the Church. Of this miſrepreſentation of the Conſtitution under debate, though it might have deſerved a more ſevere animadverſion, I ſhall ſay no more, becauſe I have no deſign to provoke the Author or any body elſe, but only to convince them. Baronius ad Ann. 1164.

2. Something allowed to the Biſhops as peculiar to themſelves, viz. that when the Court hath proceeded ſo far in judicio, in a particular Trial, for before it is Judiciis in general that Sentence was to be given either as to diſmembring, or loſs of life, then they are at liberty; but till then they are required. As ſuppoſe Charles V. had required the Proteſtant Princes to attend him to Maſſe, as other Princes did; only when the Maſs-Bell tinkled they might withdraw; would not any reaſonable Man underſtand by this, that they were obliged to their Attendance till then? So it is here: The King commands their Attendance till it comes to ſuch a point; therefore before it comes thither, their Preſence is plainly required, by this Conſtitution. And ſo inſtead of there being a Statute-Law to exclude the Biſhops at ſuch Trials, there is one to require their Preſence in judicio, in the Proceedings of ſuch a Trial, till it comes to Sentence. All that can be ſaid in this Caſe is, That the laſt Clauſe is not to be underſtood of the Sentence, but of the kind or quality of the Cauſe; i. e. they are to be preſent in the King's Courts, till they come to a Cauſe wherein a Man's Life or Members are concerned. But that this cannot be the meaning will appear.

1. There is a great deal of difference between quouſque perveniatur ad judicium mutilationis membrorum, vel mortis, that might have been underſtood of a Cauſe of Blood; and quouſque perveniatur in judicio ad mutilationem membrorum, vel ad mortem, for this ſuppoſeth a Trial already begun, and the Biſhops preſent ſo far in it; but when it comes to the point of mutilation or death, then they have leave to withdraw. So that this laſt Clauſe muſt either be underſtood of Execution, which no one can think proper for the King's Courts; or for the Sentence given by the Court, which is moſt agreeable.

2. The Senſe is beſt underſtood by the Practice of that Age. For, if the meaning of the Conſtitution had been, they muſt not be preſent in any Cauſe of Blood, and the Biſhops had all ſworn to obſerve it; can we imagine we ſhould find them practiſing the contrary ſo ſoon after? And for this I appeal to Petrus Bleſenſis, whoſe Words are ſo material to this purpoſe, that I ſhall ſet them down. Principes Sacerdotum & Seniores Populi, licèt non dictent judicia ſanguinis, eadem tamen tractant diſputando & diſceptando de illis; ſeque ideo immunes à culpa reputant, quòd mortis aut truncationis membrorum judicium decernentes, à pronunciatione duntaxat & executione pœnalis ſententiæ ſe abſentent. Whereby it is evident that the Biſhops were preſent at all Debates, and gave Votes in Cauſes of Blood; but they abſented themſelves from the Sentence, and the Execution of it. It's true, Pet. Bleſenſis finds fault with them for this. But what is that to the Law, or to the practice of that Age? I do not queſtion, but Pet. Bleſenſis condemned the obſervation of the other Conſtitutions of Clarendon, as well as this; and in all probability this Pet. Bleſ. de Inſtit. Epiſc. p. 454.

paſſage of his was levelled at thoſe Biſhops who did obſerve this 11. Conſtitution.

3. We have a plain way to underſtand the meaning of this Conſtitution, by what happen'd ſoon after in the Parliament at Northampton, which was ſummon d upon Becket's Obſtinacy and Contempt of the King's Authority; where Fitz-Stephen ſaith, he was accuſed of Treaſon; and the Biſhops ſate together with other Barons; and becauſe it did not come to a Sentence of Death, after great debate between the other Lords and the Biſhops about pronouncing the Sentence, the Biſhop of Wincheſter did it. Wherein we have as plain evidence as can be deſired, that the Biſhops did ſit with the other Barons, and vote with them in a caſe of Treaſon.

To this Precedent the Author of the Letter anſwers ſeveral things.

Fitz-Stephen Vit. T. Becket. de Concilio apud Clarendon.

1. That none of the ancient Hiſtorians of thoſe Times, ſay any thing of his being accuſed of Treaſon: and therefore he thinks one may modeſtly affirm, that it was a miſtake in Fitz-Stephen to ſay ſo. But what if H. II. and Becket himſelf both confeſs that he was charged with Treaſon? H. II. in his Letter to Reginaldus ſaith, that by conſent of his Barons and Clergy he had ſent Ambaſſadors to Pope Alexander, with this Charge, That if he did not free him from that Traitor Becket, he and his Kingdom would renounce all Obedience to him. And Becket did not think this a bare term of reproach; for in one of his Letters he ſaith, that defending the Liberties of the Church, læſæ Majeſtatis reatus ſub perſecutore noſtro eſt, was looked on as Treaſon by the King. And even Gervaſe himſelf, to whom the Author of the Letter appeals, ſaith, ſome of his Friends came to him, at Northamptom, and told him, if he did not ſubmit to the King, he would be proceeded againſt as a Traitor, for breaking the Allegiance he had promiſed to the King, when he did ſwear to obſerve the ancient Cuſtoms at Clarendon. And Fitz-Stephen ſaith, the King's Council at Clarendon ſaid it was Treaſon, or taking the King's Crown from his Head, to deny him the Rights of his Anceſtors.

Lett. p 63.

2. That it was a ſtrange kind of Treaſon Becket was charged with at Northampton, viz. for not coming when the King ſent for him; which at the moſt was only a high Contempt; and Fitz-Stephen, who was a Creature of the Archbiſhop's, might repreſent it ſo, to draw an odium on the King. And therefore he looks on this as a weak precedent for the Biſhops to lay any weight upon, being at beſt out of a blind MS. of an Author juſtly ſuſpected of partiality, againſt the tenor of all the ancient Writers that give an account of the ſame buſineſs. What truth there is in this laſt ſuggeſtion appears in part already, and will do more by what follows. Muſt all the unprinted Records be anſwered with ſaying, they are blind MSS? I cannot but take notice how unreaſonable a way of anſwering this is. It is like turning of that preſſing Inſtance of the Biſhops making a Proctor in Capital Caſes, by ſaying it was Error temporis; which becauſe it will anſwer all Inſtances whatſoever as well as that, is therefore an anſwer to none. Juſt ſo it is equally an anſwer to all MSS, to ſay they are blind; and to all printed Books too, becauſe they were once MSS, and, for any thing that appears to the contrary, as blind as Fitz-Stephen's. For ſurely no Authority is added to a Book by its being printed; unleſs in the Opinion of the Common People, who are ſaid to take all for true that is in print. I do not go about to parallel Fitz-Stephen with Parliament Rolls; but I ſay, his Authority is very good; being preſent upon the Place, and the beſt we have, of all the Proceedings in the Parliament ament at Northampton. And if the Author of the Letter had taken the pains to peruſe him, he would not have contemned the Precedent drawn from thence; which being ſo near the Parliament at Clarendon, (that, as himſelf confeſſeth, the one was in February, the other in October following,) it gives the beſt Light into this matter of any thing in that Age; and being not yet fully printed, it will be worth our while to ſet it down. Mr. Selden hath indeed printed very exactly the Proceedings of the firſt Judgment upon Becket about the Cauſe of Contempt, for not coming upon the King's Summons, at the complaint of John the Marſhall; wherein the Biſhops did certainly ſit in Judgment upon him with the other Barons; but there is a farther ſtrength in this Precedent, not yet taken notice of. Which is, that after this Judgment paſſed Becket behaved himſelf with ſo great inſolency towards the King and the Biſhops, upon the King's calling him to farther account, for many other things laid to his Charge, as diverting the King's Treaſure and applying it to his own uſe, and great Accounts to the King while he was Chancellor, &c. that the King required him to ſtand to the Judgment of his Court. Becket gave a dilatory Anſwer: the King ſummons the Biſhops and Earls and Barons to give Judgment againſt him; the Biſhops tell the King, Becket had appealed to the Pope, and prohibited them to give any farther Judgment upon any Secular Complaint againſt him. Whereupon the King ſent ſome Earls and Barons to him to expoſtulate the matter, ſince he was the King's Subject, and had ſo lately ſworn to the Conſtitutions at Clarendon; and to know whether he would give Security to the King about making up his Accounts, and ſtand to the Judgment of his Court. Becket refuſeth to give anſwer to any thing, but the Cauſe of John the Marſhal, for which he was ſummoned to appear, ſlights his Oath, as contrary to the Rights of the Church, and confirms his Appeal to the Pope. And ſuch an owning of the Pope's Power, in derogation to the Rights of the Crown, Sir Edward Coke ſaith, was Treaſon by the ancient Common-Law, before any Statutes were made. However, the King charges the Biſhops by virtue of their Allegiance, that, together with the Barons, they would give Judgment upon the Archbiſhop. They excuſed themſelves on the account of the Archbiſhop's Prohibition. The King replied, That had no force againſt the Conſtitution of Clarendon, ſo lately made aud acknowledged by them. The Words of Fitz-Stephen are theſe: Rex, reſponſo Archiepiſcopi accepto, inſtat Epiſcopis, præcipiens & obteſtans per homagium & fidelitatem ſibi debitam & juratam, ut ſimul cum Baronibus de Archiepiſcopo ſibi dictent Sententiam. Illi ſe excuſare cœperunt per interpoſitam Archiepiſcopi prohibitionem. Rex non acquievit, aſſerens, quòd non teneat hæc ejus ſimplex Prohibitio contra hoc quod Clarendonæ factum & initum fuerat. So that H. II. in the Parliament at Northampton declared, that Biſhops were bound, by virtue of the Conſtitution of Clarendon; to be preſent, and to give their Votes in caſes of Treaſon. And the Biſhops did not deny this, but uſed prudential Arguments to diſſwade the King from proceeding any farther, the Appeal being made; and that it was for the Good of King and Kingdoms, for them to ſubmit to the Prohibition. And the Biſhop of Chicheſter told Becket, he made them go againſt the Conſtitutions of Clarendon, which they had ſo lately ſworn to obſerve; in theſe remarkable Words; Quo contra nos venire compellitis, interdicendo, nè ei quod de nobis exigit adeſſe poſſumus Judicio. By which we ſee this Conſtitution is indeed an irrefragable Teſtimony; but it is to prove that Biſhops are bound to be preſent even in Caſes of Treaſon, when the King ſummons them. And as to the caſe of Becket's Treaſon, the ſame Biſhop told him, it lay in breaking his Oath about thoſe Conſtitutions, wherein the Rights of the Crown were declared. And if this be not Treaſon by the Common Law, Sir Edward Coke's Preface to his fifth Book of Reports ſignifies nothing.

pag. 14. The late Author of the Peerage and Juriſdiction of the Lord's Spiritual takes it for granted, that by the Conſtitution of Clarendon, the Juriſdiction of Biſhops was limited, that it ſhould not extend ad diminutionem membrorum, vel ad mortem. But the foregoing Diſcourſe hath, I ſuppoſe, made it evident, that thoſe Words contain no Limitation but a Privilege or Indulgence to them with reſpect to the Canon-Law. And he takes very needleſs pains to prove this to be declarative of the Common Law; and that the Meeting at Clarendon was a full Parliament: which are very much beſides the buſineſs.

All that looks towards this matter is, that he ſaith, this Statute was confirmed by a Council at Weſtminſter; for which he cites Rog. Hoveden's Authority. But I wiſh he had produced the Canon entire as he there found it; for then the ſenſe of it would have been better underſtood. In this Synod at Weſtminſter, Richard, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, produceth ſeveral ancient Canons, which he thought fit to be obſerved here. Among the reſt he mentions that of the Council of Toledo. The Words are theſe: His qui in Sacris Ordinibus conſtituti ſunt, Judicium ſanguinis agitare non licet. Here he makes his &c. and leaves out the Prohibition which declares the meaning and extent of this Canon: Unde prohibemus, ne aut per ſe membrorum truncationes faciant, aut inferendas judicent; wherefore we forbid them, either to diſmember any Perſons themſelves, or to give Judgment for the doing of it. Both which were practiſed in Spain in the time of the Council of Toledo, which was the occaſion of this Canon. And then follows the Sanction of Deprivation if Men did otherwiſe. And what now doth this ſignifie more to the Conſtitution of Clarendon, than that the ſame Canons were now revived; which gave the occaſion to that Permiſſion of withdrawing, when the Sentence came to be pronounced as to diſmembring or loſs of Life.

pag. 18. But he urges farther about this Conſtitution, that it muſt be ſo underſtood, as to exclude the Biſhops from all antecedent and præliminary things which do relate or tend ad diminutionem, &c. or elſe ſaith he, it muſt be only the exemption of the Prelates from doing the Office of Executioners, which is Nonſenſe. Why ſo? Though it be not the whole ſenſe of the Canon, yet ſurely it is Senſe. But he might have thought of giving Sentence, which the Canons forbid, and is different from Execution, and doth not exclude the Biſhops preſence at præliminaries. The Conſtitution of Weſtminſter, he ſaith, is plainer, Non debent agitare judicium ſanguinis; which he ſaith, excludes the exerciſe of any Judicial Power in Caſes of Blood. Whereas it appears by the Prohibition there extant, nothing is forbidden but giving Sentence; at which the Conſtitution of Clarendon allows them to withdraw.

Lett p.73. 2. The ſecond time we are told that the Excluſion of the Biſhops in Caſes Capital received a confirmation in Parliament, was the 11. of R. II. when the Archbiſhop and the other Biſhops, upon their withdrawing then from the Parliament, in regard matters of Blood were there to be agitated and determined, in quibus non licet alicui eorum perſonaliter intereſſe, as they ſay, in which it was not lawful for any of them to be preſent in Perſon, did therefore enter a Proteſtation, with a Salvo to their Right of Sitting and Voting in that and all other Parliaments, when ſuch matters were not in Queſtion; which Proteſtation of theirs was at their deſire enrolled in full Parliament by the King's Command, with the Aſſent of the Lords Temporal and Commons. So that it is here ſaid to be a perfect and compleat Act of Parliament; and if it had not been a Law before, would then have been made one. This is the ſubſtance of what is more largely inſiſted on in another Place; and what ſtrength is there added ſhall be duly conſidered.

To underſtand this buſineſs aright, it will be neceſſary to ſet down the Proteſtation it ſelf at large, as it is taken out of Courtney's Regiſter, and the Parliament-Rolls; and then examine the Points that do ariſe from thence. The Proteſtation runs thus: Rot. Parl. 11. R. 2. n. 9.

In Dei nomine Amen. Cùm de jure & conſuetudine Regni Angliæ, ad Archiepiſcopum Cantuarienſem, qui pro tempore fuerit, necnon cæteros ſuos Suffraganeos, Confratres & Coëpiſcopos, Abbatéſque, & priores, alioſque Prælatos quoſcunque, per Baroniam de Domino Rege tenentes, pertineat in Parliamentis Regis quibuſcunque, ut Pares Regni prædicti, perſonaliter intereſſe, ibidémque de Regni Negotiis, & aliis ibidem tractari conſuetis, cum cæteris dicti Regni Paribus, & aliis ibidem jus intereſſendi habentibus, conſulere, tractare, ordinare, ſtatuere, & definire, ac cætera facere quæ Parlamenti tempore ibidem imminent facienda; in quibus omnibus & ſingulis, Nos Willielmus Cantuar. Verum quia in præſenti Parlamento agitur de nonnullis materiis in quibus not licet nobis, aut alicui eorum, juxta Sacrorum Canonum inſtituta quomodolibet perſonaliter intereſſe, ea propter pro nobis & eorum quolibet proteſtamur & eorum quilibet hìc præſens etiam proteſtatur, quòd non intendimus, nec volumus, ſicuti de jure non poſſumus, nec debemus, intendit, nec vult aliquis eorundem, in præſenti Parlamento, dum de hujuſmodi materiis agitur, vel agetur, quomodolibet intereſſe; ſed nos & eorum quemlibet in ea parte penitùs abſentare, jure paritatis & cujuſlibet eorundem intereſſendi in dicto Parlamento, quoad omnia & ſingula mihi exercenda, noſtris & eorum cujuſlibet ſtatu & ordine congruentia, in omnibus ſemper ſalvo. Ad hæc inſuper proteſtamur, & eorum, quilibet proteſtatur, quòd propter hujuſmodi abſentiam, non intendimus, nec volumus, nec eorum aliquis intendit vel vult, quòd proceſſus habiti & habendi in præſenti Parlamento ſuper materiis antedictis, in quibus non poſſumus, nec debemus, ut præmittitur, intereſſe, quantum ad nos & eorum quemlibet attinet, futuris temporibus quomodolibet impugnentur, infirmentur, ſeu etiam infringentur.

This Proteſtation, ſetting aſide the legal Formalities of it, conſiſts of 3 Parts; 1. A Declaration of their undoubted Right as Peers of the Realm, by virtue of their Baronies, to Sit and Vote in all Debates of Parliament. 2. Of their intention to withdraw this Parliament, becauſe ſeveral matters were to be handled, at which it was not lawful for them, according to the Canons, to be preſent. 3. That by this abſenting themſelves they did not intend, as far as concerned them, to null the Proceedings of that Parliament.

Here now ariſe three main Points to be diſcuſſed.

1. Upon what Grounds the Prelates declared, it was not lawful for them to be preſent in Parliament, at ſuch matters?

2. How far the Parliament's receiving that Proteſtation makes it a Law?

3. Whether on ſuppoſition it were a part of Canon-Law then in force, it continues ſo ſtill ſince the Reformation.

1. Upon what Grounds they declared it unlawful for them to be preſent in Parliament at ſuch matters? One would think the very reading the Proteſtation were ſufficient to convince any Man; for the Biſhops declare as plainly as Men could do, that it was out of regard to the Canons of the Church, and not from any Law of the Land. For how was it poſſible that the ſame Men ſhould declare, That by Reaſon of their Baronies, they had full Right to be perſonally preſent in all Debates of Parliament, if there were ſome Law in force which made it unlawful for them to be perſonally preſent? The greater force there is in the Proteſtations being receiv'd in Parliament, the greater ſtrength there is in this Argument. For if the Proteſtations being allow'd by King, Lords, and Commons, make it (as the Author of the Letter affirms) a perfect and compleat Law, then their Right to be preſent in all Debates in Parliament is a Law; and ſo much the more conſiderable, becauſe it is no enacting Law, making that to be ſo which was not before, but declarative of what was confeſſed to be their undoubted Right by King, Lords, and Commons. And therefore I do not wonder, that the Author of the Letter, ſo conveniently to his purpoſe, left out all the beginning of the Proteſtation, which ſo fully clears the ſenſe of the reſt. For the very ſame thing which afterwards the Biſhops ſay they are forbid to do by the Canons, that is, perſonaliter intereſſe, to give their perſonal Attendance, they ſay at firſt, by Right of their Peerage, as Barons by tenure, did belong to them; for there the Words are perſonaliter intereſſe too. Therefore that perſonal Attendance in ſuch matters, which they ſaid was unlawful to them by the Canons, they challenge to themſelves as their juſt Right by virtue of their Baronies. But is it poſſible to imagine, if they had been precluded from ſitting by any antecedent Law, that ever ſuch a publick avowing their Right would have paſſed the King and both Houſes? So unſucceſsful hath the Author of the Letter been in his Statute-Laws, that there can be no ſtronger Evidence of the Biſhops Right to ſit in ſuch Caſes, than thoſe which he produceth againſt them.

But he goes about to prove, this Prohibition cannot be underſtood Letter, p. 21, 22. only of the Canon-Law; for the Canon-Law, ſaith he, was to them above all Laws; and what was forbidden by that Law, they could not have a Thought, that it could in any ſort be lawful for them to challenge as their Right, upon any Account. I confeſs I can ſee no force in this Reaſoning: For when a thing is forbidden to Men meerly by a poſitive Law of the Church, and the Penalty of it is a bare Irregularity by the Canons, why may not ſuch Men challenge their own Right notwithſtanding thoſe Canons, becauſe the Irregularity might be diſpenſed with, when the Conſt. Othob c. Nè Clerici. Pope ſaw convenient? And by the Conſtitutions of Othobon, which were made in the Time of H. III. we find, that if an inferiour Clergyman tranſgreſſed this Canon, it was in the Power of the Dioceſan to abſolve him from his Irregularity. And this Canon was received and en-enforced moſt here in England on the inferiour Clergy, as appears by the Canons of Stephen Langton in the Council of Oxford, and other Synodal Conſtitutions here. For it is a Rule in Lynwood, Clericus ex vi verbi non comprehendit Epiſcopum, ſed cum adjuncto, ſic in quantum illud adjunctum poteſt concernere Epiſcopum. That by Clerici we are not to underſtand Biſhops, unleſs there be ſome adjunct that implieth it. And among the Decretals, there is one from Alexander III. to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, under the Title Ne Clerici, to the ſame purpoſe. Where the Gloſs, I grant, comprehends Prelates; therefore I will not deny, but they were to be irregular by the Canon-Law as well as others. But then we are to conſider how far the Legatine Power, veſted in the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, might extend in ſuch a Caſe; and that there was the ſame Severity in the Canons againſt Clergy-men's taking upon them any Secular Office; and yet in this very Parliament, Thomas Arundel, Biſhop of Ely, was Lord-Chancellor; and after him William of Wickham, Biſhop of Wincheſter; and before them, R. Baybroke, Biſhop of London; and the Biſhops of Durham and Exeter were Lords-Treaſurers under *R.*II. And in *H.*III's Time we find 3 Clergy-men Lords Chief Juſtices, Pateſhull, Lovell, and Manſell, notwithſtanding theſe Canons: And in Edward III's Time almoſt all the great Offices of the Court were executed by Clergymen. By which we ſee they did not think themſelves ſo ſtrictly bound to obſerve thoſe Canons, or it was ſo eaſy to be diſpenſed with, that they had great Reaſon to inſiſt upon the challenge of their own Right, notwithſtanding the Canon-Law.

Spelman. *Con.To.*2.p. 183.*p.*451. Lynwood ad tit. de Loc.&con. c. vendentes, Si quis Clericus. Decretal 3. tit. 50. c. 5.

The Truth is, The Canon-Law, as it was managed in thoſe Days, was one of the moſt myſterious pieces of Eccleſiaſtical Policy: It was an Engine, which the artificial Church-men could ſcrew up or let down as they pleaſed. If it were in a matter likely to be prejudicial to their Intereſt, (as it was moſt apparently the Caſe in 11 R. II. when matters grew ſo high between R. II. and the powerful Lords, and ſo many Favourites were to be impeached, and among them Alexander Archbiſhop of York) then it was a time to quote the Canons, and to enter a Proteſtation, and to withdraw: If the Times were calmer, and more ſettled, or ſome great Reaſon moved them, then they could ſtick to their Right of Peerage, and make uſe of it, either in Perſon or by Proxy, as they thought convenient. Nor was it ſo eaſy a matter to reſolve what was Canon-Law in England, but they might with ſome Colour make uſe of either of theſe Pleas. For in this very Parliament 11 R. II. the Commons deſire that thoſe may be reputed Traitors who brought in the Pope's Bulls of Volumus & Imponimus; which ſhews that they did not think all Canon-Law that paſſed for ſuch at Rome. And 15 R. II. Sir Will. Brian was ſent to the Tower, for bringing a Bull from Rome which was judg'd prejudicial to the King, and derogatory to his Laws. And in 16 *R.*II. Will Courtney, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, (the ſame who enter'd the Proteſtation before-mentioned) makes another of a different kind, owning the Rights of the Crown in oppoſition to the Pope's Encroachments. Now, by the ſame reaſon, no Canon made at Rome, no Legatine or Synodal Conſtitutions could have any force againſt the King's Authority. But the King himſelf being under a force at that time, as he always declared afterwards; and that being, as Knighton ſaith, it was called, Parlamentum ſine Miſericordia, the King having tied himſelf up, not to pardon any without Conſent of the Lords; he might be willing to let the Biſhops excuſe themſelves, becauſe that might give ſome colour to

to call in queſtion the Proceedings then, as it did 21 R. II. when all the Acts of this Parliament were nulled; and the Lords and Commons might be very willing to let the Biſhops withdraw, that their buſineſs might proceed with leſs difficulty againſt all the King's Miniſters. So that here was a concurrence of many circumſtances, which made the Biſhops think fit not to appear in the Houſe this Parliament; and the King, Lords and Commons to be willing to receive their Proteſtation. But in the Anti-Parliament to this, that I mean 21 R. II. the Commons pray the King, That ſince divers Judgments were undone heretofore, for that the Clergy were not preſent, they might appoint ſome common Proctor with ſufficient Authority to that purpoſe. This is a Paſſage which deſerves Conſideration, and tends very much to clear the whole Matter.

For the Houſe of Commons declare, That divers Judgments had been undone for want of the Preſence of the Clergy. Therefore their Concurrence, in the Judgment of the Houſe of Commons, was thought neceſſary to make a Judgment valid. A very late Author finds himſelf ſo perplexed with this, that he knows not how to get off from it. He cannot deny this to be in the Rolls of Parliament, and to be the firſt Petition of the Commons; but then he blames them for Raſhneſs and Error, and want of due Examination of Precedents; as though it were poſſible for any Man now to underſtand the Law and Practice better than the whole Houſe of Commons then did. He ſaith, They were miſtaken palpably de facto in ſaying that divers Judgments have been heretofore undone; and yet preſently confeſſeth, That the two Judgments againſt the two Spencers were reverſed for this Cauſe; but he ſaith, There are no more to be found. Where doth he mean? In his Study? Or not now extant in the Parliament-Rolls? But have we all the Rolls of Parliament that were then in being? Or muſt Men ſo boldly charge the Houſe of Commons with Ignorance, Error, breaking the Laws, becauſe they ſpeak againſt their Fancies? But this Gentleman very peremptorily concludes the Houſe of Commons then guilty of a very ſtrange and unaccountable Overſight. It is great pity a certain Gentleman had not been there to have ſearched Records for them, and to have informed them better. But we think a Judgment of the whole Houſe of Commons in ſuch a Caſe, declared in ſo ſolemn a manner, without the leaſt contradiction from the King or the Lords, might deſerve a little more reſpect; and it had certainly had it, if it had made for the other ſide. But we ſee the Houſe of Commons it ſelf is reverenced or not, as the Judgment of it ſerves Mens purpoſes. And yet this was more than the bare Judgment of the Houſe of Commons: for a Petition was made upon it, and that Petition granted; and conſequently a Common Proctor appointed, and that Proctor allowed by King, Lords and Commons. So that this was a Judgment ratified by Conſent of the King and the whole Parliament. For if a Petition were made on a falſe ground, what had been more proper than for the Lords to have open'd this to the Commons, and to have told them how unadviſed and falſe their Judgment was? Whereas the Lords conſented, and the Proctor was admitted, and gave his Vote in the Name of the Clergy. But there is ſomething more to confirm this Judgment of the Commons, and that is, the Parliament 11 R. II. making Petition to the King, That all Judgments then given might be approved, affirmed, and ſtabliſhed, as a thing duly made for the Weal and Profit of the King our Sovereign Lord, notwithſtanding that the Lords Spiritual and their their Procurators were abſent at the time of the ſaid Judgments given. What means this Petition, if there had been no doubt at that time, that theſe Judgments might be reverſed, as not duly made, by reaſon of the abſence of the Prelates? The only anſwer in my mind is, that it was Error Temporis, they were of that mind then, but ſome are reſolved to be of another now.

But from hence we plainly ſee, that even in R. II's time the Concurrence of the Biſhops was thought ſo neceſſary, that one Parliament declared Judgments had been reverſed for want of it; and that very Parliament wherein they abſented themſelves, got a Clauſe inſerted on purpoſe to prevent the nulling of thoſe Judgments; which ſignified nothing to the Parliament 21 R. II. which reverſed them all.

There is ſomething more conſiderable to our purpoſe in this Parliament; viz. that the ſame Author produceth the Teſtimony of a MS. Chronicle, which largely handles the Affairs of that Parliament, wherein it is confeſſed, that the Biſhops, by concurring with the Lords in the Revocation of the Earl of Arundel's Pardon, did give Vote in a Caſe Capital; for ſo the Words are there cited, Dederunt ergo locum Prælati judicio Sanguinis in hoc facto. Which ſhews that the Biſhops did then give their Votes about the validity of the Pardon: Which the Author of that Chronicle indeed condemns them for, and tells us ſome thought they incurred Irregularity by it. From whence it follows, that all the Penalty ſuppoſed to be incurred was only Canonical; but he never charges them with going againſt the Law or Cuſtom of Parliament therein. Diſcourſe of the Peerage, &c. p. 20.

But the Author of the Letter ſaith, Whatever was done this Parliament ſignifies nothing, becauſe the whole Parliament ſtands repealed by 1 H. IV. and all done in it declared null and void. Yet, to our comfort, the ſame Author tells us, the three Henrys were Uſurpers; and therefore I deſire to be ſatisfied, whether an Uſurper, by a Parliament of his calling, can null and repeal what was done by a King and his Parliament. If he may, then the King loſt his Title to the Crown by the late Uſurpers; if not, then the Parliament 21 R. II. could not be repealed by that 1 H. IV, If the Author of the Letter had conſidered this, he is a Perſon of too great Judgment and Loyalty, to have mention'd, more than once, the Repeal of that Parliament, by the ſubſequent Parliament, 1 H. IV. Lett. p. 30. p. 79. p. 80. p. 115.

From all this we ſee, that by the Judgment of the whole Parliament, both 11 R. II. and 21 R. II. the Biſhops had a Right to ſit, ſo far that Judgments were reverſed where they were not preſent; and therefore all the pretence they could have for withdrawing muſt be from the Canon-Law: which although not ſufficient to bind them, if the matter had been conteſted, yet it ſerved them for a very colourable pretence of abſenting themſelves in ſuch dangerous times, as thoſe of 11. R. II.

Here the Author of the Peerage and Juriſdiction of the Lords Spiritual thinks he brings ſeaſonable relief to the Cauſe, when he undertakes to prove, that the Biſhops withdrawing was not meerly on the account of the Canon-Law. This, I confeſs, is home to the buſineſs, if he can make it out. (1) He ſaith, there was an Act of Parliament before, that did expreſly prohibit them to exerciſe Juriſdiction in thoſe Caſes. This we utterly deny. And the Conſtitution of Clarendon, to which he referrs, proves the contrary. (2.) The Biſhops made bold with the Canons when they p. 19. p. 20.

they thought fit, as 21 R. II. But how could they do that, unleſs they had a Parliamentary Right to be preſent? He ſaith, the conſtituting a Proxy was as great a violation of the Canons, as being perſonally preſent: and what then? therefore the Parliament would not have ſuffer'd them to do that, if there had been a Law to exclude them. How doth this prove that the Biſhops did not withdraw on the account of the Canons 11 R. II. becauſe they made a Proxie 21 R. II? But why did they not appear perſonally, if they had no regard to the Canons; when the receiving their Proxie ſhewed they had a legal Right to appear? But he grievouſly miſtakes the meaning of the Canon of Stephen Langton in Lynwood, when he interprets Literas pro pœna ſanguinis infligenda ſcribere vel dictare, againſt making of Proxies; which is only meant of p. 21. giving or writing the Sentence for Execution. (3.) He ſaith, they were excluded by ancient Cuſtom; which, by a very ſubtle way of reaſoning, he proves to have been part of the Fundamental Contract of the Nation, as he ſpeaks. Seeing then, ſaith he, it is without doubt that there was ſuch a Cuſtom, that the Prelates ſhould not exerciſe Juriſdiction in Capital Caſes; (not ſo altogether without doubt, unleſs it were better proved than we have yet ſeen it;) and there is no Record that doth mention when it did begin, nor any time when it could be ſaid there never was ſuch an Uſage; (yes, before the Council of Toledo being publiſhed in Spain, and receiv'd here;) it muſt of neceſſity be ſuppoſed, that it is as ancient as the Government it ſelf, and part of the Fundamental Contract of the Nation. Which looks ſo like a Jeſuitical Argument, that one would have thought he had been proving Tranſubſtantiation by it. For juſt thus the Argument runs at this day among the Party; There was a time when it was receiv'd, and no time can be inſtanced in wherein it was not, therefore it was a part of the Fundamental Religion of Jeſus Chriſt. The plain Anſwer in both Caſes is the ſame: If we can produce unqueſtionable Authority to which a Doctrine or Practice is repugnant, we are not obliged to aſſign any punctual time in which it muſt firſt come in. But in this caſe, we do aſſign the very time and occaſion of the Biſhops abſenting themſelves in Capital Judgments, and that was from the receiving the Canon of the Council of Toledo here: For no ſuch practice can ever be proved before. And therefore this can never be proved to be any part of the ancient Common Law of England. And that this came in by way of imitation of other Countries, appears by the citing the Council of Toledo both by Lanfranc and Richard in the p. 23. Council of Wincheſter. (4.) He ſaith the Practice is ancienter than any of the Canons of the Church. But how doth that appear? The eldeſt Canon he can find is that of Stephen Langton in Lynwood, which was made above 50 Years after the Parliament at Clarendon. But we have made it evident, there was a Canon receiv'd here in Lanfranc's time, long before the Conſtitution of Clarendon. And ſo a full Anſwer is given to theſe Objections.

But we are told, by the Author of the Letter, that the Biſhops Proteſtation being receiv'd and enter'd in the Roll or Journal-Book, makes it to paſs for a Law, it being agreed to by the King and two Houſes; ſo as whatever was the Law before, if it were only the Canon-Law, it is now come to be the Law and Rule of Parliament, and the Law of the Land.

2. This is therefore the ſecond Point to be examined, Whether the receiving this Proteſtation amounts to a Law of Excluſion? which it can by no means do for theſe two Reaſons: 1. From the nature of Proteſtations in general; 2. From the particular nature of this Proteſtation.

2. From the nature of Proteſtations in general. For a Proteſtation is only a Declaration of their Minds that make it, and not of theirs who receive it, or ſuffer it to be enter'd in the Acts or Records of the Court; unleſs it be receiv'd in ſuch a manner, as implies their conſent. For the very next Parliament after this, 13 R. II. the two Archbiſhops, in the name of the whole Clergy, enter a Proteſtation, That they gave no aſſent to any Law or Statute made in reſtraint of the Pope's Authority; and it is ſaid in the Rolls of Parliament, that at their requeſts theſe Proteſtations were enrolled. Will any Man hence inferr, that theſe Proteſtations were made Acts of Parliament? If the Cauſe would have born any better, a Perſon of ſo much Skill in Proceedings of Parliament would never have uſed ſuch an Argument as this. Beſides, it is a Rule in Proteſtations, Si Proteſtatio in Judicio fiat, ſemper per contrarium actum tollitur, ſaith Hoſtienſis; A Proteſtation, although allowed in Court, is taken off by a ſubſequent Act contrary to it. Which ſhews, that a Proteſtation can never have the force of a Law; becauſe it may be deſtroy'd by the Act of the Parties themſelves. If therefore the Biſhops did afterwards act contrary to this Proteſtation, they took away all the force of it.

Sum. l. 1. de Conſtit. n. 18. p. 24.

2. The particular nature of this Proteſtation is ſuch, as doth moſt evidently preſerve their Right to be perſonally preſent on the account of their Peerage and Baronies; and the great deſign of a Proteſtation is, to preſerve a Right, notwithſtanding ſome Act which ſeems to deſtroy it; as their abſenting themſelves on the account of the Canons might ſeem to do: But of this already.

3. We are now to conſider the third Point, Whether, on ſuppoſition that on the account of the Canon-Law, the Biſhops had always withdrawn in the time of Popery, that had continued in force ſtill ſince the Reformation? I think not, upon theſe Reaſons,

1. Becauſe the Canon-Law was founded upon a Superſtitious Fancy, viz. that if Clergy-men be preſent in Cauſes of Blood, they contract Irregularity ex defectu perfectæ Lenitatis, as the excellent Canoniſt, Navarr ſaith, becauſe it argues a want of perfect Lenity. But if we conſider the Caſes they allow, which do not incur Irregularity, and thoſe they do not allow, which do incurr it, we ſhall find all this ſtir in the Canon-Law about this matter, to be only a Superſtitious kind of Hypocriſy.

Manual. c. 27.

1. If a Man in Orders gives another Man Weapons, without which he could not defend himſelf, and by thoſe Weapons he maims him that aſſaulted him; this doth not make him irregular; but if he kills him, it doth: and yet the Canons make the caſe of Diſmembring and Death the ſame.

2. It makes a Man act againſt the Law of Nature to prevent Irregularity. For they ſay, if it be for the defence of Father or Mother, or prevent the ruin of his Country, although the Cauſe be never ſo juſt, a Clergy-man that diſmembers, or takes away another's Life, is irregular.

3. If a Clergy-man diſcovers Treaſon, or accuſes another for Treaſon, without a Proteſtation, that he doth not do it with a deſign to have him puniſhed; he is irregulur; but if he makes that Proteſtation, although death follows, he is not.

4. If a Clergy-man be in an Army, and perſwades the Soldiers to fight manfully, and kill as many as they can; this doth not make him irregular; nay, although he beats them, if they will not fight: But if he happens to kill an Enemy himſelf, then he is.

5. If he gives a Soldier a Sword or a Gun, by which he diſpatches his Enemies, if he did it with a particular intention that he ſhould ſlay or maim them, he is irregular; if only with a general Intention, that he ſhould overcome, he is not. This being ſomewhat a nice Caſe, the Canoniſts take more than uſual pains to prove it. And from hence they defend their Prieſts and Jeſuits in the Indies, who carry the Croſs before their Armies into the Field, and encourage them to kill all they can; and yet Navarr ſaith, they are ſo far from being irregular, that they are regulariſſimi, as his Word is.

6. If a Man, to gain an Indulgence, carries a Faggot to burn an Heretick, if it be with a deſign to take away his life, he is irregular; but if he be hanged firſt, or dead before it be thrown into the fire, then he is not.

7. If a Man in Orders helps a Chirurgeon in cutting off a Man's Leg, he is not irregular: but if a Man be juſtly condemned to have his Leg cut off, if he then gives any aſſiſtance, he is irregular: becauſe the one is moved out of Mercy, and the other out of Juſtice.

8. If the Biſhops ſit and condemn a Man for Hereſy, and deliver him over to the Secular Power for Execution; yet they free this from Irregularity, or elſe the practice of the Inquiſition were loſt. This ſeems a very difficult Caſe; but the Canoniſts ſalve this, by ſaying, that the Inquiſitors, when they deliver them over to the Secular Power, do pray that they may not be hurt either Wind or Limb; as it appears by the Forms uſed in the Directorium Inquiſitorum. And if this be not the height of Hypocriſie, let the World Judge. And therefore this part of the Canon Law is not conſiſtent with the Sincerity of the Reformation.

Covarruv. ad Clem. ſi furioſ. p. 2. §. 5. n. 6.

2. This part of Canon Law is inconſiſtent with the King's Power over Eccleſiaſtical Perſons. For it ſuppoſeth them liable to the Penalty of a Law, which he hath no cogniſance of, and derives no force or authority from him; which tends to the diminution of the King's Prerogative Royal, and therefore it is nulled by the Stat. 25 H. VIII. c. 19. I do very much queſtion whether this ever were any part of the Canon-Law of England, notwithſtanding the Pope's Decretals; i. e. Whether theſe Canons ever received Confirmation by the Royal Authority, either in Synodal Conſtitutions, or elſewhere. And it would be a very hard caſe, if our Kings had not the ſame Privileges which are allow'd in Popiſh Countries, viz. that nothing paſſes for Canon-Law within their Territories, till it paſs the examination of the King's Council, and approbation by his Authority, Thence in France nothing paſſes without the King's Pareatis; nor in Spain or Flanders, without the King of Spain's Placet; no nor in the Kingdom of Naples, without the Royal Exequatur. It is well known, that the 6. Book of Decretals was not allowed in France, becauſe of the quarrel betwen the King and Boniface VIII. and that even the Council of Trent it ſelf was not allowed by Philip II. till it had been ſtrictly examined by the King's Council, that nothing might be allowed which tended to the diminution of his Prerogative. How then will Men juſtifie the making that part of the Canon-Law of England, which was repugnant to the Rights of the Crown, and deprives the King of the Power of taking Advice of thoſe of his Subjects whom he hath ſummon'd for that end?

3. The Sanction of this Law is ceaſed, which was Irregularity? And ſome of our moſt Learned Judges have declared, that is taken away by the Reformation. But in caſe any be of another Opinion, I ſhall urge them with this Inconveniency, viz. That the great Inſtrument of diſcovering the Plot falls under Irregularity by it. For it is moſt certain, by the Canon-Law, that a Man in Orders accuſing others of Treaſon, without making his due Proteſtation in Court, is irregular. But if this be now thought unreaſonable, as it is in the Perſon of an Accuſer, why ſhould it not be ſo in the caſe of Judges? And if the Irregularity be taken away, then the Sanction is gone; and if the Sanction be taken off in a meer poſitive Law, the force of the Law is gone too. And therefore this Canon-Law, which forbids Clergy-men being preſent in Capital Caſes, and giving Votes therein, is wholly taken away by the Reformation. And we do not find any mention of it for 80 years and more after the Reformation, till about the Time of the Earl of Strafford's Trial, a Book being printed about the Privilege of Peers, wherein this Proteſtation was mention'd, hold was preſently taken of it, by Men who thought they could not compaſs their ends without removing the Biſhops out of the Houſe: And when the Biſhops inſiſted on their Right, and could not be heard, but at laſt were willing to ſalve their Right by Proxies, the Lords of the Cabal prevailed with their Friends, to declare they would uſe no Proxies themſelves, and ſo by that artifice ſhut the Biſhops out of Doors.

4. The Practice hath been ſo contrary ſince the Reformation, that I find no manner of regard hath been ſhewed to it. For the Archbiſhop of Canterbury was the firſt nominated in the Commiſſion for the Trial of the Queen of Scots, as appears by the Commiſſion it ſelf in Cambden; which is directly contrary to the Canon-Law. Some diſtinguiſh the Biſhops acting by Commiſſion, from their being Judges in Parliament. For which there is no manner of Reaſon with reſpect to the Canon-Law, which is rather more expreſs againſt any kind of Commiſſions in Caſes of Blood; as appears by the Council of Toledo, the Synodal Conſtitution, and the Pope's Decretals. And there hath never been any ſcruple about Divines ſitting on the Crown ſide as Juſtices of the Peace, when Sentence of death is pronounced; nor in the Ordinary's declaring Legit or Non Legit, when a Man's Life depends upon it. But which is yet more to our preſent purpoſe, in the Parliament 22 May, 1626. upon the Impeachment of the Earl of Briſtol of High Treaſon, 10 Biſhops, 10 Earls, 10 Barons, were appointed to examine the Evidence; and upon their Report he was ſent to the Tower by the whole Houſe. All which ſhews, that there hath been no regard had to the force of the Canon-Law in this matter ſince the Reformation; that being a Spirit lay'd long ſince by the Principles of our Church: and it would be ſtrange, if ſome Mens Zeal againſt Popery ſhould raiſe it again.

CHAP. III.

The Precedents on both ſides laid down: thoſe againſt the Biſhops examined and anſwered.

II. I Now come to examine the Precedents, and ſhall proceed therein according to due Order of Time.

Lett. p. 57. And ſo the firſt is taken from the Saxon times, viz. from Brompton's Relation about Edward the Confeſſor's appealing to the Earls and Barons about Earl Godwin's murthering of his Brother Alfred. Here we

P. 59. ſee, ſaith the Author of the Letter, it was only ad Comites & Barones, that he appealed, and they were only to judge of it, and not Biſhops or Prelates.

I have 2 things to anſwer to this Precedent; 1. That we have great reaſon to ſuſpect the Truth of it. 2. That if it were true, we have no reaſon to ſuſpect the Biſhops to be excluded.

1. For the Truth of the Story. That there is great reaſon to ſuſpect it, appears, in that it is the ſingle relation of Brompton againſt the conſent of the other Hiſtorians, (and ſome of them much ancienter, and nearer to that time) who mention K. Edward's charging Earl Godwin with the Death of his Brother, not in Parliament, but as they were at Table together at Wincheſter, upon the occaſion of a Saying of Earl Godwin's, upon the King's Cup-bearer ſtumbling with one Foot, and recovering with another; See, ſaith he, how one Brother helps another. Upon which Matth. Weſtminſter, Knighton, and others ſay, that the King charged him about the Death of his Brother Alfred. Whatever the occaſion was, our beſt Hiſtorians of that time, Malmesbury and Ingulphus ſay, it was at an Entertainment at Wincheſter, and that Earl Godwin died upon the Place, being choaked, as they ſay, with a Morſel of Bread he took with a great Execration upon himſelf if he were not innocent. Knighton ſaith, he was queſtioned for the Death of his Brother by Hardeknute, and that he cleared himſelf, by ſaying, he did nothing but by the King's Command. But ſuppoſe Edward to be never ſo weak a Prince, is it likely this ſhould be done by an Appeal in Parliament by the King himſelf; and that afterwards, by the Judgment of his Earls and Barons, he and his Sons and 12 Kinſmen ſhould make the King amends, by as much Gold and Silver as they could carry between their Arms? Beſides, Brompton ſaith, this was done by Godwin when he returned to England, after King Edward's coming to the Throne; whereas Malmesbury ſhews, that it was through Earl Godwin's Intereſt that ever he came to it, and ſo the marrying his Daughter would make any one believe.

2. But ſuppoſe it true. What reaſon is there to conclude the Biſhops not preſent, who were never abſent through all the Saxon Times, after Ethelbert's Converſion, in any publick Councils of the Nation? They had no Canon then to be afraid of; for that of the Council of Toledo was brought in by Lanfranc. And it was not againſt the Practice of thoſe Times. For if we believe as true a Story as this of Brompton, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury himſelf condemned King Edward's Mother Emma to a Trial by hot Irons, which was preſent Death without a Mi-

Miracle; and this, it is ſaid, was done by the conſent of the King and the Biſhops; which is as good a Precedent againſt Temporal Lords, as the other is againſt the Biſhops. However, this is certain, that the Biſhops then ſate in the County Court at all Judgments. And whereas the Author of the Letter would avoid this, by ſaying that no Capital Crimes P. 110. were tried there; the contrary is moſt certainly true. For the Laws of King Edward, as they were ſet forth by H. I. c. 31. mention the Capitalia Placita that were there held. And the Author of the MS. Life of S. Cuthbert ſaith, that when one of Earl Godwin's Sons was Earl of Northumberland, and one Hamel, a very bad Man, was impriſon'd by him, his Friends interceeded earneſtly with him, Nè capite plecteretur, that he ſhould not loſe his Head, by which it appears, That Caſes Capital were heard and determin'd in thoſe Courts, the Biſhop and Earl ſitting together in Judgment. And here the Point is plainly gain'd, becauſe the Author of the Letter grants that the Biſhops ſate in all Judgments in the County Courts, and then puts the matter upon this Iſſue, whether Capital Crimes were there tried or not; which I have clearly proved that they were. But I ſhall make another Advantage of this againſt the Author of the Peerage, &c. for it plainly overthrows that confident Aſſertion of his, That without doubt there was a Negative Cuſtom, That P. 21. the Prelates ſhould not exerciſe Juriſdiction in Capital Caſes, ſo ancient as to be part of the Fundamental Contract of the Nation. It were a thouſand pities, that ſuch well-ſounding Words, ſo handſomely put together, ſhould ſignify nothing. I dare not be ſo poſitive as he is, but am of Opinion, that if he could be perſwaded to produce this Fundamental Contract of the Nation, which I perceive he hath lying by him, it would not amount to ſo much as a blind Manuſcript. If it be ſaid, that Brompton only mentions Earls and Barons, and Biſhops were not then made Barons: I anſwer, That Baronies were brought into England by the Conqueror, and therefore Brompton muſt ſpeak improperly, and conſequently, taking it only for a Title of Honour, he means no more than thoſe who were the great Men of that time, and ſo may take in the Biſhops too, of which more afterwards. But there is one thing more in the Laws of H. I. (which were only a reſtoring K. Edward's Laws) that implies that Biſhops had then a Power of Judging in Caſes Capital; which is, c. 58. Qui occiderit Epiſcopum ſit in arbitrio Principis & Epiſcoporum, He that killed a Biſhop was to be left to the Will of the King and the Biſhops. Which ſhews that they were to hear and examine the whole Evidence, and to give Judgment according to it.

After the Saxon times, the firſt Precedent produced is of the 33 Edw. P. 55. I. concerning Nicholas Segrave, who was ſummon'd to appear in Parliament, and after his Offences were open'd, the King adviſes only with the Temporal Lords, who declared, ſuch a Man deſerved to loſe his Life. But is he ſure the Biſhops were not preſent? No: he ſaith, that doth not appear by the Record; but it appears clearly they were not to meddle with it. How ſo? The King declares, that he would have the Advice Comitum, Baronum, Magnatum, & aliorum de Conſilio ſuo. But is he ſure they are not comprehended under Magnates, and that there were no Clergy-men at that time of the King's Council? What thinks he of William de Hamilton, Dean of York, who was made Lord-Chancellor, Jan. 16. 33 Edw. I. and this Parliament was held the next Sunday after St. Matthias, which was the latter end of February? And in the 35*th* Year, Ralph de Baldock, Biſhop of London, was made Lord-Chan-

Chancellor; and ſcarce any other but Church-men had that Office all his Days. The Biſhop of Bath and Wells was Chancellor near twenty Years of his Reign; after him the Biſhop of Ely, after him the Dean of Chicheſter, and then comes the Dean of York. And among the Lords-Treaſurers of his Time were the Arch-deacon of Dorſet, the Abbot of Weſtminſter, two Biſhops of Bath and Wells, whereof one was Treaſurer at this time. Theſe two, I hope, we may ſuppoſe to be of the King's Council in this buſineſs, who we are certain were both Church-men. And if they adjudged Nic. de Segrave worthy of Death, who ſo likely to deliver that Judgment as the Chancellor? But ſuppoſe theſe were not there, whom doth he mean by the Magnates then diſtinct from Earls and Barons, who were of the Houſe of Peers? Mr. Selden will inform him, if he need it, that there were no Dukes till the 11 of Edw. III. nor the Title of Marqueſs till R. II. nor of Vicount till H VI. And yet here were Magnates in Parliament, who were neither Earls nor Barons; and therefore we muſt in all reaſon underſtand the great Church-men, who were not ſo nice of meddling with Criminal Cauſes in Parliament of the higheſt nature in the time of Edw. I. as appears by the great Cauſe ſo much agitated in Parliament 20 Edw. I. concerning the Earls of Hereford and Glouceſter; where this latter is charged with raiſing Arms without Commiſſion, and committing Murthers and horrible Devaſtation in the Lands belonging to the other; and the King in Parliament appoints the Biſhop of Ely with others to be a Committee for examination of this matter. And when they had both ſubmitted to the King's Pleaſure, we have theſe remarkable Words in the Placita Parlamentaria, Per Conſilium Archiepiſcoporum, Epiſcoporum, Comitum, Baronum, Cæterorumque de Conſilio ſuo exiſtentium, facere volens in præmiſſis & ut voluntas ſua juſta ſit & rationabilis, prout decet, eorumque aſſenſum in præmiſſis petiit, & Conſilium. Propter quod, habito tractatu diligenti coram ipſo Domino Rege & Conſilio ſuo ſuper prædictis, tam ipſi Domino Regi quam cæteris Prælatis & Magnatibus, & ſingulis de Conſilio ſuo, videtur quoad Comit. Gloceſtr. and that follows the Sentence; which I confeſs did not extend to Life, but to a Forfeiture of his Eſtate to the King. However, we ſee hereby that the Biſhops were preſent at all the preliminary Debates, and the King asked their Advice: ſo that they had their Votes in the Sentence, whether it ſhould extend to Life or not.

In the Reign of Edw. II. we meet with a remarkable Precedent in behalf of the Biſhops Right, which is of a Judgment reverſed, made by the Lords without the Prelates, viz. the Judgment againſt the two Spencers, 15 *E.*II. which Judgment is ſaid to be paſſed at Oxford that year, but in the Parliament at York the ſame year it was nulled and made void before the King, Lords and Commons; and one of the Reaſons given for it is, becauſe the Lords Spiritual, who were Peers, aſſented not to it. This Precedent had been cited and allowed by Mr. Pryn, in his Plea for the Lords, and therefore it is to be wonder'd the Author of the Letter takes no notice of it. But the later Author of the Diſcourſe about the Biſhops Peerage and Juriſdiction, owns the truth of the thing, ſaying, That the two Judgments againſt the two Spencers were reverſed, 15 Edw. II. for this Cauſe, through the great Favour and Intereſt they then had at Court. But then he thinks he hath taken off the force of this Precedent, by ſaying that 1 Edw. III. c. 1. this Judgment is declared good, and therefore the ſaid Reverſal null and void; and the two Spencers upon this affir- mance of the Judgment were executed. This laſt Aſſertion every one knows to be a grievous miſtake, that hath but looked into our Hiſtory: for the Spencers were executed before Edw. III. came to the Crown; the elder in October, 19 Edw. II. the other the latter end of November 20 Ed. II. And whereas he inſiſts upon the Affirmance of the Judgment 1 Edw. III. he had done well to have look'd a little farther; and then he would have found that Act alſo repealed 21 R. II. So that if the Act of 1 Ed. III. which affirms the firſt Judgment may ſeem to take off the force of this Precedent, the repealing of that Act in the 21 R. II. reſtores it again, and leaves it in its full force. Eſpecially if it be conſidered, that the Act of 1 Ed. III. was not barely repealed, but declared in Parliament to be unlawful, becauſe Ed. II. was living, and true King and impriſon'd by his Subjects at the time of that very Parliament of 1 Ed. III.

Rot. 64. 21 R. 2.

Thus far this Precedent is good. But I will conceal nothing that may with any colour be objected againſt it. And I cannot deny but what the Author of the Letter objects againſt the Biſhops conſtituting a Proctor to repreſent them in Capital Cauſes, ſeems to be of equal force againſt this Precedent, viz. That this Parliament of the 21 R. II. and all that was done in it, was repeal'd in the 1 H. IV. And if that be ſo, (and thoſe Acts of State which then paſſed had not again been repealed 1 Ed. IV.) then the Repealing of that of 1 Ed. III. ſignifies nothing, and conſequently the Affirmance of the firſt Judgment againſt the two Spencers is good notwithſtanding that Repeal. And therefore that we may examine this matter to the bottom, I ſhall ſet down the very Words of the Author of the Letter concerning it. Speaking of the Declaration made by the Lawyers in the 10 Ed. IV. concerning the Biſhops making a Procurator in Capital Cauſes, he hath theſe Words: It is true, here is mention made of their making a Proctor, which was Error temporis, the Error of thoſe Times, grounded upon what was ſo lately done, (as they looked upon it) though irregularly done, in the laſt Parliament of R. II. whom they conſider'd as their lawful King; and in truth he was ſo, the three Henry's that came between being but Uſurpers. And again, ſpeaking of the ſame buſineſs of a Proctor in the 21 R. II. he hath this remarkable paſſage: I have already ſhewed, that this whole Parliament was repeal'd for the extravagant things that were done in it, of which this was one. And therefore nothing that was then done can ſignifie any thing to a leading caſe any ways to be followed; and this as little as any: except it could be made appear, which I am confident it cannot, that ſome Judgment had been reverſed upon that account, becauſe the Prelates were not preſent, and had not given their aſſent to it.

Now if I can make out theſe two things, 1. That the Parliament of R. II. was not legally repeal'd; 2. That the Judgment againſt the two Spencers was revers'd, and that the repeal of that Reverſal in 1 Ed. III. was revok'd in 21 R. II. upon this very account, becauſe the Prelates were not preſent, and had not given their aſſent to it; I hope the Author of the Letter will be ſatisfy'd, that both this Precedent, and the Caſe of a Proctor, are very ſignificant in this Cauſe; and that there is a great difference between being confident and certain of any thing.

1. That the Parliament of 21 R. II. was not legally repeal'd. And for this I take the Authors own acknowledgment that R. II. was in truth lawful King, and that H. IV. was but an Uſurper: Nay, I add farther, ther, that R. II. was alive and in Priſon when H. IV. repeal'd the Parliament of 21 R. II. For ſo it is ſaid in the very Act of Repeal, that R. II. late King of England was purſued, taken, put in ward, and yet remaineth in ward. And now I leave it to the Author of the Letter, whether a Parliament call'd by a Lawful King, and the Acts of it, ought to be deem'd legally repeal'd by a Parliament that was call'd by an Uſurper, and held whilſt the lawful King was alive and detain'd in Priſon.

2. That the Judgment againſt the two Spencers was reverſed and the Repeal of the Reverſal of it in 1 Ed. III. revok'd in 21 R. II. and that upon this very account, becauſe the Prelates were not preſent, and had
p. 15. not given their aſſent to it; which the Author of the Letter is confident cannot be made appear. That this Judgment was reverſed for this Reaſon I have already ſhewn, viz. in the Parliament at York, 15 Ed. II. And I ſhall now ſhew, that the Repeal of that Reverſal in 1 Ed. III. was revok'd in 21 R. II. and that upon the account mentioned. For in this Parliament, Tho. de Spencer, Earl of Gloceſter, exhibited two Bills, in which he prayeth, that the Revocation of the Exile of the two Spencers in 15 Ed. II. might be brought before the King and confirmed, and that the Repeal of the ſame made in the 1 Ed. III. might be revoked. Of which Act of Repeal theſe Errors are aſſigned, among o-
Rot. 55. thers: becauſe the Prelates, who are Peers of the Realm, did not aſ- 56.21 R.2. ſent to the Judgment; and becauſe it was made only by the Earls and Barons, Peers of the Realm, &c. and becauſe it was made againſt the form of the Great Charter of England, in which it is contain'd, that no Man ſhall be exil'd, or otherwiſe deſtroyed, but by the lawful Judgment of his Peers, or by the Law of the Land. So that it ſeems it was look'd upon as a breach of the Great Charter, for the Temporal Lords to condemn a Peer without the Aſſent of the Biſhops, and that ſuch a Judgment was not eſteem'd a lawful Judgment by his Peers. And thoſe Errors of the firſt Judgment aſſign'd in the Revocation of it in 15 Ed. II. are allowed in this Parliament of 21 R. II. and that Revocation confirm'd and the Re-
R. 2. 21. peal of it in 1 Ed. III. revok'd upon the ſame account. I ſhall only obſerve, that in this Parliament (as before in 15 Ed. II.) the Biſhops are declared to be Peers; Peers of the Realm, Rot. 55. Peers in Parliament, Rot. 56. & 61; but moſt fully and diſtinctly in the Roll laſt cited, Peers of the Realm in Parliament. Of which farther uſe may be made in the laſt Chapter concerning the Peerage of the Biſhops.

And now to ſum up the force of this Precedent for the Juriſdiction of the Biſhops in Caſes of Treaſon. Here is a Reverſal of a Judgment, becauſe made without the Aſſent of the Prelates, by the Parliament at York in 15 Ed. II. And whereas it is ſaid, this Reverſal was Repealed, and the firſt Judgment affirm'd in 1 Ed. III. I have ſhew'd, that this was no legal Repeal becauſe Ed. II. was alive and lawful King, or elſe Ed. III. could never have been ſo) in the time of that firſt Parliament of Edw. III. and conſequently Ed. III. at that time was an Uſurper, and the Proceedings of that Parliament null and void. So that the Reverſal in 15 Ed. II. ſtands good notwithſtanding the Repeal in 1 Ed. III. Beſides that this Repeal (whatever it was) is ſolemnly revoked in 21 R. II. And H. IV. who reverſ'd all the Proceedings of the Parliament of 21 R. II. during the Life of R. II. is acknowledg'd by the Author of the Letter to have been an Uſurper and R. II. to have been a lawful King. And now I think that this Precedent hath all the advantage that can be, and that the Juriſdi- ction of the Biſhops in Caſes of Treaſon could not have been aſſerted in a higher manner, than to have a Judgment in Caſe of Treaſon ſolemnly revers'd in two Parliaments for this very cauſe, becauſe the Biſhops, who are Peers, aſſented not to it. And this Precedent own'd by the Houſe of Commons, in their Petition to have a Common Proctor appointed by the Clergy, in this very Parliament of 21 R. II. as is acknowledg'd by the p. 115.

Author of the Letter.

To conclude this matter; whether the Acts of Parliament which contain this Declaration of the Peerage of Biſhops, and their Juriſdiction in Caſes of Treaſon, were ſufficiently repeal'd or not; this ſolemn Aſſertion of it in two ſeveral Parliaments, together with the Petition of the Commons mentioned before, are a moſt clear evidence, that in the general Opinion of the King, Lords, and Commons, this Juriſdiction did of right belong to the Biſhops: And I am ſure they are a Demonſtration againſt the Author of the Peerage his Aſſertion, of a Negative Cuſtom, ancient as the Conſtitution of the Nation, that Prelates ſhould not exerciſe Juriſdiction in Capital Caſes. For had this been a clear and undoubted Cuſtom from the firſt Original of this Nation, it is morally impoſſible it could have entred into the minds of two Parliaments, ſolemnly to have raiſed this doubt, whether a Judgment given in a caſe of Treaſon by the Temporal Lords without the Aſſent of the Biſhops were valid, and to have determined that it was not; when yet there was no manner of reaſon to imagine that the Biſhops ever had any Juriſdiction in ſuch Caſes, nay, when there was an immemorial Cuſtom and Uſage to the contrary, namely, that the Temporal Lords had in all times exerciſed this Juriſdiction alone, and the Biſhops had been excluded from any ſhare in it.

And in the Apology of Adam D'Orleton, Biſhop of Hereford, and after of Wincheſter, for his impriſoning R. de Baldock, a great Confident of Hugh de Spencer's, he declares, that the reaſon why he was carried to Newgate was through the violence of the People; although ſaith he, the Parliament then ſitting, there was no cauſe of fear but Juſtice would be done. His Words are, Domino Rege, Prælatis, Comitibus, ac aliis terræ Optimatibus Lundoniæ tunc congregatis & præſentibus, pro Juſtitia ibidem in Parlamento convocatis omnibus exhibenda. Which ſhews that the Prelates then did ſit in Matters of Juſtice in the Houſe of Lords, and in Caſes Capital; for this R. de Baldock was arraigned at Hereford for the ſame Crimes that Hugh de Spencer was.

But the main ſtrength of the Cauſe is ſuppoſed to lie in the Precedents produced out of the Rolls of Parliament from the 4 Ed. III. to the 38 H. VI. The force of theſe Precedents will be better underſtood, if we conſider theſe things.

I. That many of them are meer Negative Teſtimonies. So 4 Ed. III.
at the Trial of Roger Mortimer, it is ſaid, the Earls, Barons and Peers Lett. p. 6. of the Realm were preſent, therefore the Biſhops were not 5 Ed III. only the p. 9.
Great ones returned, therefore the Biſhops did not. So in the Caſe of Sir John Grey. From whence he infers, that the Biſhops were not to Judge ſo much as of a Battery. 25 Ed. III. in Sir William Thorp's Caſe, the p. 10.
Grantz de Parliament were asked their advice, therefore not the Biſhops.
1 R. II. in the Caſe of Weſton and Gomenitz, the Biſhops not mention'd; p. 13.
but other Lords, Barons and Bannerets, Sir Ralph de Ferrers Caſe 4 R. II. p. 16.
the Biſhops not preſent, becauſe not compriſed under les Seigneurs de Parliament.
The like in Sir John Oldcaſtle's Caſe, 5 H. V. The Queſtion, p. 37.
he

he ſaith is, whether Biſhops be comprehended under les Seigneurs de ceſt preſent Parliament. p. 151. In the Earl of Devonſhire's Caſe 31 H. VI. the ſtrength lies in this, that the Peers are only mention'd; and he ſuppoſes no Man will Juriſdiction of the Houſe of Peers aſſerted, p. 91. ſay, the Biſhops were his Peers or Lords of the Realm. So that here are eight Precedents that are no more than Negative Teſtimonies; concerning which in general, the Author of the Juriſdiction of the Houſe of Peers aſſerted, hath a good Obſervation; viz. That one, or two, or twenty Precedents in the Negative, nay, I ſay more, were the number equally as many in the Negative as in the Affirmative, yet it could not diſprove their Juriſdiction: It would only ſhew, their Lordſhips were free Agents, to do it, or not to do it, as they ſaw Cauſe; but their Juriſdiction remained entire ſtill, to do it whenſoever they would. So I ſay here; ſuppoſing that the Spiritual Lords were not preſent in theſe Caſes, it only ſhews that they were free Agents, and might withdraw at ſome times, and be perſent at others; which cannot overthrow their Right, for theſe Reaſons.

(1.) Several of his Negative Precedents if they prove any thing, prove the Biſhops were not there, when he confeſſes they might have been there. As,

Lett. p. 11. 1. In Caſes of Miſdemeanours. At the Trial of Sir John de Lee, 42 Ed. III. being charged with ſeveral Miſdemeanours, the Record ſaith, p. 12. the Prelates were preſent, 50 Ed. III. Several Perſons were accuſed by the Commons for Miſdemeanours, and the Biſhops he confeſſeth were preſent; as Rich. Lions, John Lord Latimer, William Ellis, John Peecher, Lord John Nevil; at all theſe Trials the Biſhops, ſaith he, were preſent; and no body ſays but they might. So in the Caſe of Alice Perrers, 50 p. 14. Ed. III. the Record ſaith, the Prelates were preſent, and gave Judgment as to Baniſhment, and Forfeiture of her Eſtate. 10 R. II. Mich. de la Pool, Lord Chancellor, was accuſed by the Commons for ſeveral Miſdep. 18. meanours before the King, Prelates and the Lords. Here he yields the Prelates were Judges of Miſdemeanours, together with other Lords. And yet if ſeveral of his Negative Precedents do prove any thing they prove too much, viz. that the Biſhops ought not to be preſent at the Trial of Miſdemeanours: For, he ſaith, the Biſhops were not preſent at the Trial of Weſton and Gomenitz, 1 R. II. nor at the Trial of the Biſhop of Lett. p. 10. Norwich, 7 R. II. nor at ſuch Judgments as that of Sir William de Thorp, 25 Ed. III. who was condemned for Bribery; and yet he yields they were at the Trial of Mich. de la Pool, 10 R. II. But if they ought not to be preſent at thoſe of 25 Ed. III. and 1 R. II. and 7 R. II. neither ought they to have been preſent at the Trial of Mich. de la Pool. Either therefore his Argument doth not prove they were not preſent at the former, being only from general Words; or they ought not to have been preſent at the latter, which he confeſſes they were. This will beſt appear by comparing the Caſes together. 1 R. II. the Commons deliver in a Schedule to the Lords of their Demands, before they would proceed to a Subſidy; among which one was, That all ſuch who without cauſe had loſt or given up any Caſtle, or Town, or Fortreſs, to the diſhonour of the King, or damage of the People, may be put to their Anſwer before the Lords and Commons that Pharliament. Here was no particular Impeachment of theſe Perſons; but upon this the Lords ſent for theſe two Perſons who were Priſoners in the Tower upon this account; and the Charge againſt them was, delivering two Towns in Flanders without Commiſſion. Weſton made a long and plauſible Defence, to which no Anſwer was given; yet both were condemned to die. The Biſhop of Norwich was charged with ſeveral Miſcarriages and Miſdemeanors, ſaith P. 17. he; why might not the Biſhops be preſent at this Trial? To that he ſaith, he was charged with one Capital Crime, viz. betraying Graveling to the French; but he confeſſeth, he cleared himſelf of this before they came to Judgment: And yet he would have the Biſhops excluded at this Judgment, and that of Sir William Elmham, Sir Thomas Trivet and others; but confeſſes they were preſent at the Trial and Judgment of Mich. de la Pool. Let us then ſee what kind of Trial this was. He was impeached in the Name of the Commons of England, and 6 Articles were exhibited againſt him. The main were, concerning defrauding the King, and miſemploying the Aids granted to the King laſt Parliament, whereby much Miſchief happen'd to the Kingdom; as may appear by the Rolls, and the Articles printed in Knighton. Upon theſe Articles, the Knighton de Event. p. 2684. Record ſaith that the Commons prayed that Judgment of Death might paſs upon him, as it did upon Sir William de Thorp for receiving 20 l. by way of Bribery. And yet this Judgment of Sir William de Thorp is one of the Precedents againſt the Biſhops being preſent; when he allows they were preſent at the whole Trial of this Mich. de la Pool, when a great Miniſter of State was ſo hotly charged by the Commons, for offences of ſo great a nature, and which in their Judgment deſerved no leſs than Death. From whence it follows, by his own confeſſion, that the Biſhops may be preſent when the Miniſters of State are impeached by the Commons of ſuch Crimes which, in their Judgment, deſerve no leſs than Death.

2. In Acts of Attainder, when the Houſes proceed in a Legiſlative way, he grants the Biſhops may be preſent; and yet if ſome of his Precedents ſignify any thing, they prove they ought not to be preſent at the paſſing of them. As, Lett. p. 6.

1. In the Caſe of Roger Mortimer and others accuſed and tried in Parliament, 4 Edw. III. He confeſſeth the Roll cannot be read, and therefore refers to 28 Edw III. where Roger of Wigmore deſires that the Attainder may be examined, which was reverſed by Act of Parliament; and therefore we may juſtly ſuppoſe the Judgment given againſt him was ratified in Parliament. And ſome of our Hiſtorians ſay, he was Ceſtrenſ. l. 7. c. 44. Knighton, p. 2558. condemned judicio Parlamenti. And in the petition of Roger Wigmore, he prays that the ſaid Statute and Judgment may be reverſed and annulled. If therefore the Prelates could not be preſent here, then they are not to be preſent in the Legiſlative way: If they were preſent in Acts of Attainder, then this general Negative way of arguing proves nothing; for then the Biſhops were comprehended under the Name of Peers; which, without any reaſon, he ſaith the Biſhops cannot pretend to be, when it is notorious that they challenged it in Parliament, 11 R. II. and it was then allowed as well as their proteſtation.

In caſe of the Murther of John Imperial, 3 R. II. an Act of Parliament paſſed to make it Treaſon; and he proves the Biſhops had no vote in P. 15. it, nor were preſent at the preparing it. And yet he confeſſes that the P. 3, 118. Biſhops have a right to ſit in all Acts of Attainder, becauſe they ſit then in their Legiſlative Capacity. Therefore theſe Negative Precedents prove nothing.

(2.) The Inſufficiency of theſe Negative Precedents appears by this, that we can make it appear by good Teſtimonies, that the Biſhops have been often comprehended under the general Titles of Grantz, Peers, and Lords of Parliament, without any expreſs mention made of them.

And becauſe the great force of many of his Teſtimonies lies wholly in this, that the Biſhops are not comprehended under the Names of Grantz, Seigneurs, and Peers, I ſhall endeavour to make it clear beyond Exception, that if the Precedents muſt be determined by the general Words, all the advantage lies on the Biſhops ſide.

It is certain that in elder times the Baronagium Angliæ did take in all the Lords of Parliament, both Spiritual and Temporal. But I betake my ſelf to the Expreſſions uſed in the Records; and becauſe the matter of the Debate is confined within the Times of Edw. II. and IV. I ſhall take notice of the Language of Parliament within that time; reſerving that of their Peerage to the proper place for it.

I begin, as the Author of the Letter doth, with 4 Edw. III. and in that year, n. 6. the Record runs thus; El eſt aſſentu & accorde per noſtre Seigneur le Roi, & tout le Grantz en pleyn Parlement, where a Law was paſſed concerning Trial by Peers; and in the paſſing of a Law our Author allows the Biſhops to be preſent. But it is more plain, *n.*12. Acorde per noſtre Seigneur le Roi, & les Grantz de meſme le Parlement; It is agreed by the King, and the Great ones in Parliament. But that the Biſhops are comprehended under theſe Grantz is evident; for it is there ſaid, That the Petitions of Edmund Earl of Kent, and Margaret Counteſs of Kent, to which that Agreement refers, were read before the King, the Prelates, the Counts, the Barons, and other Grantz of the Parliament. In the ſame year, n. 14. we meet with les Prieres, des Prelatz & autres Grantz, the petition of the Biſhops and other Great Men; and then it follows, Noſtre Seigneur le Roi en pleyn Parlement, per aſſent, accord, prieces & conſeil des ditz Prelatz & autres Grantz; Our Lord the King in full Parliament, by the aſſent, accord, petition and advice of the ſaid Prelates and other Grantz. Which ſhews that they are ſome of the Grantz of Parliament.

5 Ed. III. n. 3. Touz les Prelatz & autres Grantz: n. 13. Grantz in general is uſed in the Debate between the Abbot of Crowland and Sir Thomas Wake: and n. 15. le Roi & as autres Grantz en pleyn Parlement: n. 16. Item fu accorde per le Roi & touz le Grantz en meſme le Parlement, auxibien per Prelatz come per autres; It was agreed by the King and the Great Men of the Parliament, as well by the Prelates as others. Nothing can be plainer than that the Biſhops are called Grantz, as well as the other Lords of Parliament.

6 Ed. III. n. 1. Devant noſtre Seigneur le Roi, & touz le Prelatz, & autres Grantz; The Articles were read before the King, the Prelates, and other Great Men. If the Biſhops had not been comprehended under Grantz, the Record would have only uſed Grantz, and not autres Grantz. But the ſame Expreſſion is again uſed, n. 5. In the ſecond part of the Rolls of that year, n. 1. we find three ſeveral ways of expreſſing the Perſons then preſent: The firſt, les Prelatz, Countes, Barons, & autres Grantz du Parlement; the next is, queux Prelatz & autres Grantz; the third is, touz le Grants en meſme le Parlement: and all theſe are uſed to expreſs the ſame Perſons. And again, n. 3. touz le Grantz du dit Parlement, which are there oppoſed to Chivalers des Countes; and are more diſtinctly mention'd before in theſe Words, les ditz Prelatz, Countes, Barons, & autres Grantz, & les Chivalers des Countes, & tote la Commune. Sometimes the Grantz are taken in general ral for all of the Houſe of Peers, and the Commons for the Lower Houſe. So 21 Ed. III. n. 63. il aſſentuz per lui, les Grantz, & la dit Communalte a ſon Parlement; and again, ditz Grantz & de tote la Come ſuſditz; and, le Roi per aſſent des Grantz commanda a la ditz Come. From theſe Examples, and many more which might, if it were needful, be produced, it evidently appears that the Biſhops were Grantz in Parliament, according to the Language of that Time; and therefore the Precedents produced wherein only the Grantz are mentioned, are of no force at all againſt the Preſence of the Biſhops. And that Aſſertion of the Author of the Peerage, &c. appears to be without any ground, viz. that the Biſhops are never ſpoken of in any Record, but by the Name of Biſhops or Prelates, or ſome ſuch Name, to diſtinguiſh them from the Laity. P. 15. Theſe general Negatives are very bold and dangerous things; and one Affirmative overthrows them. But I have produced many Inſtances to the contrary, and might do many more. Such Men who dare venture upon ſuch bold Sayings, muſt be preſumed to have read over all the Records themſelves, and muſt preſume that none elſe ever ſo much as looked into them. But that Author diſcovers too much his Second-hand Learning in theſe matters; and we might have wanted ſeveral of his Precedents, had it not been for Mr. Selden's Baronage.

As to the Title of Seigneurs du Parlement, being common to the Biſhops, I am prevented by another hand. Rights of the Biſhops, p. 56, 57, &c.

I ſhall only add two Precedents more, not taken notice of by others. The one 7 R. II. The Anſwer of Mich. de la Pool is ſaid to be coram Magnatibus & Communitate in Parlamento; where the Author of the Letter confeſſeth the Biſhops were preſent, and therefore comprehended under the Magnates. The other 15 H. VI. One Phillips complained againſt the Biſhop of London to the Houſe of Commons; they ſent the Complaint up to the Lords; the Biſhop asks the Advice of the Houſe, who gave this Anſwer, Non conſentaneum fuit aliquem Procerum alicui in eo loco reſponſurum. Which had ſignified nothing, if the Biſhops had not been allowed to be Proceres Regni. So much for his Negative Precedents.

II. Some of his Precedents were condemned in Parliament to be irregular and erroneous in other reſpects; and therefore it is no wonder if they ſhould be ſo in this.

1. The Judgment upon Roger Mortimer, Earl of March, 4 Ed. III. was reverſed in Parliament 28 Ed. III. as defective and erroneous in all Points, being without any Proof or Witneſſes, or bringing the Perſon to anſwer for himſelf. And therefore it was an Honour for the Biſhops not to be preſent.

2. The Judgment upon Haxey, 20 R. II. is confeſſed by the Author to be moſt unjuſt, and would not only have ſhaken, but wholly deſtroyed the very Foundation of Parliament; and reverſed 1 H. IV. as againſt Right and Courſe of Parliaments. And he confeſſeth the Biſhops were preſent at condemning it, but not at paſſing it. Which alſo makes much for their Honour. Letter, p. 24

III. Some of his Precedents prove that when the Biſhops did withdraw, they did it voluntarily, and took care to preſerve their Right, either by proteſtation or appointing a proxy.

[1.] That they withdrew voluntarily. So 5 Ed. III. it is ſaid, That the Biſhops did withdraw at that time, being of Opinion that it did not properly belong to them to give Counſel about keeping the Peace, and puniſhing P. 8.

ing of Malefactors; and ſo, ſaith he, they went away by themſelves, and returned no more. But altho' this proves nothing but a voluntary Act of the Biſhops in withdrawing; yet the Repreſentation made of this matter is ſo partial, and different from the Record, that I cannot but take a little more notice of it.

1. He ſaith, That the Prelates being of Opinion that it belonged not properly to them to give Counſel about keeping the peace, or puniſhing ſuch Evils, they went away by themſelves, and returned no more. Thereby inſinuating, that they looked on this matter as wholly unfit for them to meddle in, and thereupon left the Houſe. Whereas the Words of the Record are, Si alerent meſmes les Prelatz & les Procurators de la Clergie per eux meſmes a conſeiler de choſes ſuſdites, & les ditz Countes, Barons & autres Grantz per eux meſmes; So the Prelats and Proctors of the Clergy went by themſelves to conſult about the aforeſaid matters, and the Earls, Barons, and other Great Men by themſelves. So that this withdrawing was but into ſeveral Committees, as was uſual at that time, by which the Senſe of the Three Eſtates was beſt underſtood; and then they met together, and agreed upon what was fit to be made a Law. This appears by 6 Edw. III. A queu jour de Joedi eu one tret, & deliberation, ceſt aſſavoir les ditz Prelatz per eux meſmes, & les ditz Countes, Barons, & autres Grantz, per eux meſmes, & auxint les Chivalers des Countes per eux meſmes; Upon which Thurſday they enter'd upon debate, (concerning the News from Scotland) the Prelates by themſelves, the Lords and other Great Men by themſelves, and ſo the Knights of Counties by themſelves. The Houſes being then not wholly ſeparate, not always together, but dividing into Committees, and not into Houſes, as occaſion required, and then joining together to expreſs their common Senſe. So 40 Ed. III. when the occaſion of their meeting was deliver'd, which was an extraordinary Meſſage from Rome, the Pope ſending for Tribute and Homage, it is ſaid, The Biſhops went by themſelves, and the other Lords by themſelves, and the Commons by themſelves; and then met together, and declared their unanimous Reſolution to oppoſe to the uttermoſt any ſuch Demand. Such a withdrawing of the Biſhops it was in this caſe. For they and the Proctors of the Clergy (whether by them we underſtand the Procuratores Cleri, who, according to the Modus tenendi Parlamentum, made a part of the Parliament, or the proxies of the abſent Biſhops, who were allow'd to ſupply their places, as appears by 35 Ed. I. and the Caſe of the Biſhops of Durham and Carliſle in the Parliament at Weſtminſter, Ed. II. and 17 R. II. and many other Inſtances afterwards) thought fit to conſider in this matter what was moſt proper for them. And accordingly we find Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures added to the Civil Sanctions, and brought in by the Prelates at that time, which are ſtill extant in the Record.

2. Whereas he ſaith, the Biſhops returned no more, the Record ſaith the contrary. For it expreſly ſaith, That the Orders for keeping of the Peace agreed on by the Committee of Lords were read before the King, the Biſhops, the Knights of Counties, and the Commons, and did pleaſe them all; & per noſtre Seigneur le Roi, Prelatz, Countes, Barons, & autres Grantz, & auxint per les Chivalers de Countes & gentz de Commun, furent pleynment aſſentuz & accordez. And the ſame is immediately ſaid of the Cenſures brought in by the Biſhops. Which made me extremely wonder at his ſaying, that the Biſhops returned no more; whereas it is very plain, they did not only return, but the Orders were read before them, and they did give their aſſent to the paſſing of them.

In the Parliament 11 R. II. that it was only a voluntary withdrawing, I prove from the Conceſſions of the Author of the Letter; viz. that they might be preſent in all Acts of Attainder. For it is evident from the printed Statutes, that they proceeded by way of Attainder againſt the Miniſters of State; and therefore they might have been preſent, if they pleaſed, upon the Author's own grounds. How is it then poſſible for him to underſtand de Jure non poſſumus, in their Proteſtation 11 R. II. of the Law of the Land, when he grants that in all Acts of Attainder, they may de jure be preſent and give their Votes?

[2.] When they did ſolemnly withdraw they took care to preſerve their Right two ways; (1.) By Proteſtation, (2.) By Proxy.

1. By Proteſtation, ſaving their Right; which was received by the Houſe, and enter'd; of which before. The late Author of the Peerage and Juriſdiction of the Lords Spiritual will not allow the Proteſtation to be an Argument of any Right; neither, ſaith he, doth the permiſſion or allowance of any Proteſtation yield the Right which the Proteſtor is deſirous to ſave, but only ſaves the Right which he had before, if he had any. Whereas the Author of the Letter makes it as good as a Law, being entred in the Journal-Book, that ſuch a thing was agreed by the King and the two Houſes. I will not deny that the former Author ſpeaks more reaſonably in this matter, when he ſaith, That the utmoſt a Proteſtation can do is, to anticipate a Concluſion, or Eſtoppel; i. e. to provide that the doing of any ſuch Act as is contained in the Proteſtation, ſhall not be conſtrued to the prejudice of the Party, ſo as to bar or conclude him from claiming afterwards that which in truth is his Right. It is true, this Proteſtation paſſed with greater Solemnity than uſually; for it was with the Conſent of the King and both Houſes; but however it retained the nature of a Proteſtation. And there was no diſtinction at that time between a Journal-Book and the Rolls of Parliament. For a good Author aſſures us, the Journals of the Upper Houſe began 1 H. VIII. and therefore the Author of the Peerage, &c. deſerved no ſuch ſevere Reproof on that account. But this is all I plead for, viz. That this Proteſtation was a Salvo to their Right; which meeting with no Conteſt or Oppoſition in the Houſes, but paſſing with unanimous Conſent, is a certain Argument the Houſes did not think there was any Law to exclude them. And therefore the Author of the Judicature very well ſaith, That had it not been for the Canon-Law, (for which he refers to the Synodal Conſtitutions at Weſtminſter 21 H. II. which is only reviving the Council of Toledo's Canon) they might have been preſent both by Common Law, and by the Law of God.

p. 24

Selden's Bar. p. 6. Rights of the Biſhops, p. 76.

2. By Proxy, or one common Procurator to appear in Parliament for them, and to vote in the name of the whole Body. This was receiv'd and allow'd 21 R. II. upon the Petition of the Houſe of Commons, becauſe Judgments had been reverſed without their concurrence. Againſt this the Author of the Letter objects many things which are eaſily anſwer'd.

1. That hence it appears they could not be perſonally preſent. On the contrary, from hence it follows they had a Parliamentary Right to be preſent; although they ſaid by Canon-Law they could not.

Lett. p. 28.

2. That it was never practiſed but in this one Parliament. That is ſtrange, when himſelf confeſſeth, that it paſſed for good Law, 10 Ed. IV.

p. 78.

IV. Term. Paſch. n. 35. and the ſame is cited by Stamford Placit: Cor. l. 3. f. 153. To which Judgment of the Lawyers, and the greateſt of their time, (for Littleton was then Judge 10 Ed. IV.) we have a very extraordinary Anſwer called Error Temporis; which will equally make void the Law or Judgment of any Age. But is it poſſible, that ſhould paſs for Law 10 Ed. IV. which was never practiſed but once 21 R. II. and the contrary practice had been only allowed all the intermediate times? Thus a ſhort Anſwer may be given to the Conſtitution of Clarendon, it was Error Temporis; to the allowing the Proteſtation, 11 R. II. it was Error Temporis; and ſo on to the end of the Chapter. If there were any Error Temporis in this matter, it lay in this, that they took this Precedent 21 R. II. for a ſufficient Ground, that the Biſhops ſhould only appear by Proxy in ſuch Caſes; whereas the Canon-Law being taken away ſince the Reformation as to theſe matters, their Right of Perſonal appearing doth return to them of courſe. p. 79.

Lett. *p.*79. 3. That this Parliament was repealed 1 H. IV. But this I have anſwer'd already from his own Words, wherein he acknowledges him to be an Uſurper, and conſequently the Repeal not made by a legal Parliament. And this Repeal was again taken off 1 Ed. IV.

4. That it is not at all Parliamentary, for one or two Men to repreſent a whole Body. The Conſequence then is, that they ought to enjoy their own Perſonal Right. All that we urge from hence is, that the Biſhops kept up their Right ſtill by their Proxies, when they thought the Canons would not allow voting in their own Perſons.

IV. Some of his Precedents do prove, that after the Proteſtations and Proxies, they did aſſert their own Perſonal Right, and were preſent both at Examinations, and at the whole Proceedings.

Lett. *p.*31. 1. At Examinations. As in the Caſe of Sir William Rickill 1 H. IV. who was brought to Parliament before the King and the two Houſes, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal and the Commons then aſſembled together. And he grants the Biſhops were preſent at his Examination.

p. 41. to p. 48. 2. At the whole Proceedings, 28 H. VI. where he confeſſeth, the Biſhops were not only perſonally preſent, but did act and bear a principal part in a Judicial proceeding in Parliament, in a Caſe that was in it ſelf Capital, viz. of William de la Pool, Duke of Suffolk. Which is very fully related by the Author, and needs no repetition. All that he hath to ſay to this, is, that the whole proceedings were irregular, and not to be drawn into Precedent. Whereas a great Lawyer in his time, Sir E. C. made uſe of this as a ſufficient Precedent in a Caſe of great moment, about Commitment upon a general Accuſation. But there is not any Irregularity expreſſed or intimated in the Biſhops appearing and judging as other Lords did; and the Judgment was not reverſed becauſe of their being there, as we have ſhewed others have been for their being abſent.

V. None of all his Precedents do prove that the Biſhops were ever excluded from ſitting, by any Vote of the Houſe of Lords or Commons. That they might voluntarily withdraw, we deny not; or not be preſent at giving of Judgment out of regard to the Canons; which is all that is proved by the Precedent of John Hall 1 H. IV. of the Earls of Kent, Huntington, &c. 2 H. IV. of Sir John Oldcaſtle, 5 H. V. and of Sir John Mortimer, 2 H. VI. And this we have made appear was done by them out of regard to the Canon-Law; the force of which being taken away by the Reformation, the Biſhops are thereby reſtored to their juſt Parliamentary Right. Neither can any Diſuſage be a bar to that Right, ſince the ground of that Diſuſage was ſome thing then ſuppoſed to be in force, which is now removed by the Reformation. And I fear, if this kind of arguing be ſufficient to overthrow the Biſhops Rights, much ſtronger of the ſame kind may be uſed to overthrow the King's Supremacy in matters of Religion. So great care ought Men to have, leſt under the colour of a mighty zeal againſt Popery, they do not overthrow the very Principles of our Reformation.

VI. There are Precedents upon Record in the Rolls of Parliament, which are not mention'd by the Author of the Letter, which do prove that the Biſhops were preſent at the Examination of Treaſon and Capital Offences in Parliament. And that within the time, wherein he pretends p. 5, 51. to give an account of all the Trials recorded in the Rolls. Which ſhews how eaſily Men paſs by thoſe things they have no mind to ſee.

I begin with 4 Ed. III. and I muſt do him that right, as to ſay, that he doth not only mention the Trial of Roger Mortimer, but of Sir Simon Bereford and others who were accuſed and tried in Parliament. p. 6. But pretending, that the Roll of that Parliament is ſo defaced that it cannot be read, he runs to that of 28 Ed. III. and ſo gently paſſes over all the other Trials which are in the Record, and are more plain and expreſs as to this matter. Among the Articles againſt Roger Mortimer, Earl of March, one is, that after he knew certainly the death of Edw. II. he made uſe of Inſtruments to perſwade Edward Earl of Kent, that King's Brother, that he was ſtill living, and ſo drew him into a deſign for his Reſcue; for which he was attainted at Wincheſter, and there ſuffer'd death for it. Among theſe Inſtruments the chief was one Mautravers, who for that Reaſon was attainted this Parliament; and the Words of the Record are, Treſtouz les Prieres, Counts & Barons aſſemblez a ceſt Parliament a Weſt. Rot. Parl. 4. Ed. 3. n. 3. ſi ont examine eſtraitement, & ſur ce ſont aſſentuz & accordez, que John Mautravers, ſi eſt culpable de la mort Cimon Count de Kent, &c. All the Peers, Counts and Barons aſſembled in this preſent Parliament, upon ſtrict examination do aſſent and agree, that John Mautravers is guilty of the death of Edmund Earl of Kent. Here we have the ſtrict Examination of a Capital Caſe in Parliament, and all the Peers are ſaid to be preſent at it. It is uſed as an Argument by the Author of the Letter, that in the caſe of Roger Mortimer, the Biſhops could not be comprized under the general name of Peers, ſince the Barons are firſt in Rank. p. 7. But here the Peers are mentioned before Counts and Barons; and it will be impoſſible for him to aſſign any other Peers at that time, that were named before them, but the Prelates; who frequently are ſo put in the Records of that time: as in the ſame Parliament, n. 12. Prelatz, Countes, Barons, n. 13. Et per aſſent des ditz Prelatz, Countes, Barons; ſo again, n. 14. 15, 17, 24, 25. But the Author of the Letter ſaith, they cannot pretend to be Peers of the Realm. p. 7. Let him name then other Peers of the Realm at that time, who were neither Counts nor Barons, and were before them. But if we are to judge who are Peers of the Realm by the Records of Parliament, I do not queſtion but I ſhall make it evident, that the Biſhops were ſo eſteemed, and that ſome Perſons, who pretend to great Skill in Records, either have not ſearched ſo diligently, or have not obſerved ſo carefully about this matter as they might have done. But of this afterwards.

In the ſame Parliament Judgment was paſſed upon Boges de Boyons, John Deveril, Thomas Gurnay, William Ocle; but being by way of Attainder, and not upon particular examination, which is mentioned in the caſe of Mautravers, I paſs them over.

In the Pleas of the Crown held before the King in this Parliament, we find another Caſe which relates to our preſent debate, viz. of Thomas Lord Berkley and Knight, who was arraigned for the *death of King Ed.*II. who came before the King in pleno Parlamento, in full Parliament, and there pleaded Not guilty; and declared he was ready to clear himſelf as the King's Court ſhould adviſe. Then they proceeded to particular Examination of him, how he could acquit himſelf, being Lord of the Caſtle where the King was murthered, he being committed to his Cuſtody and John Mautravers. He pleaded for himſelf, that he was then ſick at Bradley, and knew nothing of it. They charged him, that the Keepers of the Caſtle were of his own appointing, and therefore he was bound to anſwer for them. He anſwer'd, that they with Mautravers having receiv'd the King into their cuſtody, he was not to be blamed for what they did: and for this he put himſelf upon his Country. At the day appointed for his Trial, he appears again, coram Domino Rege in pleno Parlamento; and the Jury returned him Not guilty. But becauſe he appointed Gurnay and Ocle to keep his Caſtle of Berkely, by whom the King was murthered, the King appoints him a day the next Parliament to hear his Sentence; and in the mean time he was committed to the Cuſtody of Ralph Nevil, Steward of the King's Houſe. In the next Parliament 5 Ed. III. n. 18. The Prelates, Earls and Barons petition the King, that he might be diſcharged of his mainpriſors: the which was granted, and a farther day given him to appear next Parliament. But we read no more of him, till the Summons he had 14 Ed. III. as one of the Lords in Parliament. The great force of this Precedent lies in underſtanding what is meant by appearing before the King in full Parliament. If under this the Biſhops be comprehended, then this will be an uncontroulable Precedent of the preſence of the Biſhops in the Examination of a Caſe Capital.

What the importance of this phraſe of full Parliament is, will beſt appear by the uſe of it in the Records of that time. 4 Ed. III. n. 6. Et eſt aſſentu & accorde per noſtre Seigneur le Roi, & touz les Grantz en pleyn Parlement. Where it was agreed, that the proceedings at that time by the Lords againſt thoſe who were not Peers ſhould not be drawn into conſequence; and that the Peers ſhould be charged only to try Peers. Which hath all the formality of an Act of Parliament: and therefore all the Eſtates were preſent, n. 8. Accorde eſt per noſtre Seigneur le Roi & ſon Conſeil en pleyn Parlement. Which was an Act of Pardon concerning thoſe who followed the Earl of Lancaſter, 5 Ed. III. n. 10. we have the particular mention of the Biſhops, as ſome of thoſe who do make a full Parleament. Accorde eſt per noſtre Seigneur le Roi, Prelatz, Countes, Barons, & autres Grantz du Royalm en pleyn Parlement; and n. 17. En pleyn Parliment ſi prierent les Prelatz, Countes, Barons, & autres Grantz de meſme le Parlement, a noſtre Seigneur le Roi, &c.

6. Ed. II. n. 5. the Archbiſhop of Canterbury made his Oration en pleyn Parlement, which is explained by en la preſence noſtre Seigneur le Roi, & de touz les Prelatz, & autres Grantz. n. 9. Si eſt accorde & aſſentu per touz en pleyn Parlement; who thoſe were, we are told before in the ſame number, viz. Les Prelatz, Countes, Barons, & touz les autres ſomons a meſme le Parlement. Which is the cleareſt explication of full Parliament, in the preſence of all thoſe who were ſummon'd to Parliament. From whence it follows, that where a full Parliament was mention'd at that time, the Biſhops were certainly preſent, and conſequently did aſſiſt at the Trial of Thomas Lord Berkely, who appeared before the King in full Parliament; as Nich. de Segrave did 33 Ed. I. and there the Biſhops are expreſly mention'd as preſent; as appears by what hath been ſaid before concerning his Caſe.

5 H. IV. Henry Hotſpur, Son to the Earl of Northumberland, was declared a Traitor by the King and Lords in full Parliament; and the ſame day the Father was, upon examination, acquitted of Treaſon by the Peers. It is not ſaid that this was done in full Parliament, as the other was; but there are ſeveral Circumſtances which make it very probable the Biſhops were then preſent. (1.) When the Earl of Northumberland took his Oath of Fidelity to the King, he did it, ſaith the Record, upon the Croſs of the Archbiſhop; which was to be carried before him, if he went out of the Houſe. (2.) The Archbiſhop of Canterbury pray'd the King, that foraſmuch as himſelf and other Biſhops were ſuſpected to be in Piercie's Conſpiracy, that the Earl might upon his Oath declare the Truth, who thereupon did clear them all; which ſhews that the Archbiſhop was then preſent in the Houſe. And for the ſame reaſon that he was preſent, we may juſtly ſuppoſe the other Biſhops to have been ſo too. (3.) The Earl of Northumberland beſeeched the Lords, and Earls, and Commoners, that if he brake this Oath, they would intercede no more with the King for him. Now the better to underſtand this, we are to conſider, that H. IV. takes notice in his Declaration, upon the Rebellion of Walſingh. hiſt. Angl. p.366. Sir Henry Piercy, That the Earl of Northumberland and his Son gave out, That they could have no acceſs to the King, but by the Mediation of the Biſhops and Earls, and therefore did beſeech them to intercede with the King for them. It is not then probable, that thoſe ſhould be now left out, when the Words are large enough to comprehend them, and no one Circumſtance is brought to exclude them. For that general one, of their not being Peers, will be fully refuted afterwards.

But that which puts this out of diſpute is, (4.) that the Record ſaith, n. 17. the Commons not only gave the King Thanks for the Pardon of the Earl of Northumberland, but the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, in theſe remarkable Words, Et aux meſmes les Coes remerciermt le Seigneurs Eſpirituelx & Temporelx de lour bon & droiturel judgment quils voient fait come Piers du Parlement; And likewiſe the Commons gave Thanks to the Lords Spiritual and Temporal for the good and right Judgment which they had given in this Caſe as Peers of Parliament. Which is a clear Precedent of the Biſhops judging in a Capital Caſe, and that as Peers.

2 H. VI. n. 9. John Lord Talbott had accuſed James Boteler, Earl of Ormond, of ſundry Treaſons before the King and his great Council; and after, before John Duke of Bedford, Conſtable of England. The King takes advice of his Parliament about it, and then it is expreſly ſaid in the Record, De aviſamento & aſſenſu Dominorum Spiritualium & Temporalium ac Communitatis Regni Angliæ, in eodem Parlamento exiſtent', facta fuit quædam abolitio delationis, nuntiationis & detectionis prædict', &c. Here the King adviſeth with the Lords Spiritual in an Accuſation of Treaſon; and therefore they muſt be preſent in the Debates concerning it.

I leave now any conſiderate Perſon to judge impartially on which ſide the Right lies. For on the one ſide,

1. There is the Conſtitution of Clarendon interpreted by H. II. and the Biſhops at Northampton.

2. A Proteſtation of their Right enter'd and allowed by King, Lords and Commons, 11 R. II.

3. A Reverſing of Judgments owned by Parliament for want of their Preſence, 21 R. II.

4. A preſerving of their Right by Proxy, when they thought their perſonal Attendance contrary to the Canons.

5. A Bar to a total diſcontinuance of their perſonal Right, by an allowed Precedent, 28 H. VI.

6. A reſtoring them to their former Right, by removing of the force of the Canon-Law upon the Reformation.

7. No one Law or Precedent produced for excluding them, even in thoſe Times, when they thought the Canons did forbid their Preſence.

8. Several Precedents upon Record, wherein they were preſent at Examinations and Debates about Caſes Capital.

On the other ſide,

1. The Precedents are General and Negative.

2. Or relating to ſuch Caſes wherein they are allowed to be preſent.

3. Or of Judgments condemned as erroneous by Parliament.

4. Or of voluntrary withdrawing, with Proteſtation of their Right, and making of Proxies.

5. Or of not being preſent at the paſſing of Judgment out of regard to the Canon-Law.

And now on which ſide the Right lies, let the Author of the Letter himſelf judge.

CHAP. IV.

The Peerage of the Biſhops cleared: How far they make the Third Eſtate in Parliament. Objections againſt it anſwered.

THERE remain Two things to be conſidered, which are put in by way of Poſtſcript by the Author of the Letter: The one concerns the Peerage of the Biſhops, the other their being a Third Eſtate in Parliament.

I. Concerning their Peerage. To prove this Two Statutes had been alledged, 25 Ed. III. c. 6. and 4 Hen. V. c. 6. and the Opinion of Judges and Lawyers out of the Year-Books. But although theſe had been very ſignificant, if they had been againſt them; they have the hard fortune to ſignify nothing, when they are for them. A meer Proteſtation becomes good Law, very ſubſtantial Law, if it be ſuppoſed to make againſt the Biſhops; and yet in that very Proteſtation the Right of Peerage is expreſly challenged (as well as it is aſſerted and taken for granted in the Statutes mention'd.) Is that part of the Proteſtation invalid? And muſt nothing paſs for Law but what is againſt them? Is it credible that a Right of Peerage ſhould be owned and received in Acts of Parliament, in Proteſtations, in Year-Books, time after time, and no Oppoſition made againſt it by the Temporal Lords all that time, in caſe they believed the Biſhops had challenged that which by no means did belong to them? Did not the Temporal Lords underſtand their own Privileges? Or were they willing to ſuffer the Biſhops to aſſume their Titles to themſelves without the leaſt Check or Contradiction, and let their Proteſtations be enter'd in the Rolls of Parliament without any contrary Proteſtation? I do not queſtion but the Author of the Letter did read the Biſhops Proteſtation at large in the Parliament-Rolls, 11 R. II. And can any thing be plainer, than that therein they challenge a Right of Peerage to themſelves, ut Pares Regni——cum cæteris Regni Paribus, &c? And this Proteſtation, he ſaith, was enter'd by conſent of the King, Lords Temporal, and Commons; as is expreſſed in the Rolls. Were the Temporal Lords awake? Or were they mean and low-ſpirited Men? No, they were never higher than at this time, when the King himſelf durſt not withſtand them. What could it be then but meer Conviction of their juſt Right of Peerage, which made them ſuffer ſuch a Proteſtation as that to paſs, after ſo ſolemn and uſual a manner, and to be enrolled par Commandment du Roy, & aſſent des Seigneurs Temporels & Communs; as it is in the Rolls? Was all this only Complement to the potent Clergy at that time? But who can imagine, that King, Lords, and Commons, ſhould Complement at that rate, as to ſuffer the Biſhops to challenge a Peerage to themſelves in Parliament, if they had not an undoubted Right to it? This one Argument is ſufficient to convince any reaſonable Man. Eſpecially when we conſider, that in the ſame Parliament, before the Proteſtation was brought in, a Motion was made, n. 7. by all the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, which they claimed, come leur libertez & franchiſe, as their Liberty and Privilege, that all weighty matters moved in this Parliament, or to be moved in any to come, touchant Pieres de la Terre, concerning the Peers of the Realm, ſhould be determined, adjudged, and diſcuſſed by the courſe of Parliament; and not by the Civil, nor by the Common-Law of the Land, uſed in inferior Courts of the Realm. The which Claim, Liberty, and Franchiſe, the King moſt willingly allowed and granted in full Parliament. From whence it is evident, that the King and Parliament did allow the Right of Peerage in the Lords Spiritual; for it is ſaid expreſly in the Record, that all the Spiritual as well as Temporal Lords joyned in this Claim: Which being allowed them in full Parliament, is an evidence beyond contradiction of their Right of Peerage.

But againſt this, no leſs is pretended than Magna Charta, viz. that every Man who is tried at the King's Suit, muſt be tried by his Peers. Lett. p.85. Now if a Biſhop be tried for any Capital Offence, he is tried by the Commoners, and that is the Common-Law of England; it hath ever been ſo, never otherwiſe; then muſt Commoners be his Peers, and he and Commoners muſt be Pares.

To this Argument, how ſtrong ſoever it appears, theſe two things may be juſtly anſwered.

1. That the matter of Fact cannot be made out, that a Biſhop hath always been tried by Commoners.
2. That if it could, it doth not overthrow their Peerage in Parliament.

(1.) That the matter of Fact cannot be made out, viz. That if a Biſhop be tried for a Capital Offence, he is tried by the Commoners; that it

Ant. Brit. p. 223. hath ever been ſo, never otherwiſe. For in 15 Ed. III. John Stratford, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, was, at the King's Suit, accuſed of Capital Crimes, viz. of no leſs than Treaſon, and Conſpiracy with the French King. He put himſelf upon his Tryal in Parliament. A Parliament was called; and he at firſt refuſed Admiſſion into the Houſe; which he challenged tanquam major par Regni poſt Regem, & Vocem primam in Parlamento habere debens, As the firſt Peer of the Realm after the King, and having the firſt Vote in Parliament. Upon which, and the Interceſſion of his Friends, he is admitted into the Houſe; and there he put himſelf upon the Tryal of his Peers. At which time a great Debate aroſe in the Houſe, which continued a whole Week; and it was reſolved, that the Peers ſhould be tried only by Peers in Parliament. Whereupon the Archbiſhop had twelve Peers appointed to examine the Articles againſt him: Four Biſhops, viz. London, Hereford, Bath, and Exeter; Four Earls, Arundel, Saliſbury, Huntingdon, and Suffolk; and four Barons, Percy, Wake, Baſſet, and Nevil. Here we have all that can be deſired in the Caſe. Here is a Biſhop tried at the King's Suit, and for a Capital Crime; and yet not tried by Commoners, but by his Peers, and that after long debate in the Houſe concerning it. If it be ſaid, that he was tried by the Lords as Judges in Parliament, and not as his Peers; it is anſwer'd, 1. Then Biſhops are Judges in Parliament in Caſes Capital; for ſo this was; and 4 Biſhops appointed to examine it. 2. The Debate in the Houſe was about Tryal of Peers by their Peers; and upon that it was reſolved, that the Archbiſhop ſhould be tryed by the Houſe. For the King deſigned to have him tried in the Exchequer for the matters objected againſt him, and the Steward of the King's Houſe and Lord Chamberlain would not ſuffer him to enter into the Houſe of Lords, till he had put in his Anſwer in the Exchequer. Upon which the great Debate aroſe; and therefore the Reſolution of the Houſe is as full a Precedent in this Caſe as can be deſired.

I do not deny, that the Rolls of Parliament of that Year ſeem to repreſent the 12 Peers, as Birchinton calls them, not as appointed to examine the particular Caſe of Stratford; but to draw up in form the deſire of the Peers, as to a Trial by their Peers, in Parliament; the which is extant in the Record, 15 Ed. III. n. 7. However, this Argument doth not loſe its force, as to the Peerage of the Biſhops; but it is rather confirmed by it. For there they pray the King, by the Aſſent of the Prelates, Counts and Barons, that the Peers of the Realm may not be judged but in Parliament, & per lour Piers, and by their Peers; and after it follows, that they may not loſe their Temporalties, Lands, Goods and Chattels, &c. Who were capable of loſing their Temporalties, but the Prelates? Therefore this Law muſt reſpect them as well as others. As farther appears not only by the Occaſion, but by the Conſequent of it. For it follows, n. 8. that the Archbiſhop of Canterbury was admitted into the King's Preſence; and to anſwer for himſelf in Parliament devant les Piers, before his Peers; which the King granted. So that the Rolls of Parliament put this matter beyond contradiction.

In 21 R. II. Thomas Arundel, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, was impeached of High Treaſon before the King and Lords in Parliament. The King's Anſwer was, That foraſmuch as this Impeachment did concern ſo high a Perſon, & Pier de ſon Royalm, (it is in the Record, but left out in the Abridgment) and a Peer of the Realm, The King would be adviſed. But ſoon after he was condemned for Treaſon by the Houſe, the Proxie of the Biſhops, Sir Tho. Percy, giving his Vote. The force of this doth not lie barely in his being impeach'd before the Houſe of Peers in time of Parliament; but that the King called him in his Anſwer a Peer of the Realm.

And becauſe two Laws were already paſſed, the one, that Peers were to try none but Peers, 4 Ed. III. n. 6. the other, that Peers were to be tried only by their Peers, 15 Ed. III. n. 7. the former of theſe, the Author of the Juriſdiction of the Houſe of Peers aſſerted (one well known to the Author of the Letter) would have only looked on as a Temporary Order of the Houſe. But our greateſt Lawyers are of another Opinion. And an eminent Lawyer ſtill living urged this as an Act of Parliament, becauſe it is ſaid, that the King in full Parliament aſſented to it; and he added, that the Words are both Affirmative and Negative; they ſhall not be bound, or charged to try any other than Peers, but be thereof diſcharged; and that therein they declare it to be againſt Law for them to exerciſe Juriſdiction on thoſe who were not their Peers. From whence it follows, that ſince Stratford and Arundel, Archbiſhops of Canterbury, were allow'd to be tried by the Houſe of Peers, (without Impeachment from the Commons) they were looked on as Peers by the whole Houſe.

Coke 2. Inſt. c. 29. p. 50.
Sir J. M. Arg. concerning the Juriſdiction of the Peers, in Skinner's Caſe.

The latter Act, the ſame Author cannot deny to be a binding Law; but he hath a ſtrange fetch to avoid the force of it; viz. that this Law was made with reſpect to the Caſe of Roger Mortimer, 4 Ed. III. and not to the Caſe of Stratford then in Agitation: which is without all colour of Reaſon. For the Caſe then was of a different nature, viz. about the Peers trying thoſe who were not Peers, as Sir Simon Bereford, &c. but here the Caſe was, whether Peers ſhould be tried by any others than their Peers; and the King granted they ſhould not. Now upon this Stratford was allowed to be tried by his Peers in Parliament; and therefore this Trial upon theſe Acts is an invincible Argument of the Peerage of the Biſhops.

p. 193.

In 28 H. VI. when William de la Pool, Duke of Suffolk, waved being tried by his Peers, and ſubmitted to the King's Mercy; the Record ſaith, (as the Author of the Letter himſelf confeſſeth) that Viſcount Beaumont, on the behalf of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and by their advice, aſſent and deſire, moved the King, that a Proteſtation might be enter'd in the Parliament Roll, that this ſhould not be, nor turn in prejudice nor derogation of them, their Heirs, nor of their Succeſſors in time coming; but that they may have and enjoy their Liberties and Freedoms as largely as ever their Anceſtors and Predeceſſors had or enjoy'd them before this time. Which Sir R. Cotton more briefly expreſſeth, n. 52. that neither they nor their Heirs ſhould by this example be barred of their Peerage. The Author of the Letter more fully puts in Succeſſors, as well as Heirs; for this Proteſtation was made in behalf of the Lords Spiritual as well as Temporal. But very unfairly leaves out the moſt material Words in the Record, viz. [after Freedoms,] in caſe of their Peerage. And I appeal to the Author himſelf, whether theſe Words be not in the Record; and with what ingenuity they are left out, I cannot underſtand. I do not charge the Author of the Letter himſelf with this; but whoſoever ſearched the Records for him, hath dealt very unfaithfully with him. And I ſuppoſe, if he had ſeen this paſſage himſelf, he would never have ſo peremptorily denied the Peerage of the Biſhops; nor aſſerted with ſo much aſſurance, that they are only to be tried by the Commoners, and that it was always ſo, and never otherwiſe.

p. 47.

(2.) Suppoſe the Biſhops have been tried by Commoners out of Parliament, this doth not take away their Right of Peerage in Parliament. For all our diſpute is, concerning the Right of their Peerage in Parliament; and if that be allowed, we are not to diſpute concerning the difference that in ſome reſpects may ariſe by Cuſtom, or Practice of Common Law, between Peers by Deſcent, and Peers by Tenure in Right of their Baronies. And therefore the Author of the Peerage of p 3,4, &c. the Lords Spiritual might have ſpared all the needleſs pains he takes about this; for we do not contend that they have an Inheritable Peerage, but that they are Peers in Parliament, having a Right to ſit and Judge there by virtue of their Baronies.

But from hence he undertakes to prove, that by Magna Charta they p. 4. cannot be Judges of ſuch who are ennobled in Blood. This comes home to our preſent buſineſs, and therefore muſt be conſidered.

1. He ſaith, that he who had only a Prædial or Feudal, and not Perſonal, Peerage, can have no Juriſdiction but ſuch as is ſuitable to the nature of his Peerage; and therefore can only extend to matters of property and poſſeſſion, and not to matters of blood. But that this is a very trifling and ill-conſider'd Argument appears by this, that he grants a Lord Keeper, Lord Privy Seal, Lord Treaſurer, to be Peers by their Offices; for, as he ſpeaks, after Regradation their Peerage is ended; and he will not deny that theſe may ſit as Judges in Capital Caſes, although they be Peers only by their Offices. Thoſe that are Peers in Parliament p. 5. have Right to judge in all Caſes that belong to the Judicature of Parliament.

2. He ſaith, that the Reaſon of Magna Charta is, that the Judges and Priſoner may be under the ſame Circumſtances. But this kind of arguing as well excludes a Lord Keeper, who is no Baron, as a Biſhop; and ſuppoſes that Mens Capacity for Judgment depends upon perfect equality of Circumſtances, whereas Knowledge and Integrity go farther towards conſtituting one that is a Peer but in one reſpect, a juſt Judge, than bare Inheritance of Honour can do. But to give a full Anſwer to this Argument, on which that Author lays ſo much weight, and challenges any Perſon, to give a rational account wherein the Advantage of a Man's being tried by his Peers doth conſiſt; I ſhall (1.) ſhew that this was not the Reaſon of Trial by Peers; (2.) give a brief account of the true and original Reaſon of it.

[1.] That this was not the Reaſon.

1. Not in the Judgment of the Peers themſelves, as that Author hath himſelf ſufficiently proved, when he takes ſo much pains to prove, p. 3. that a Writ of Summons to Parliament doth not ennoble the Blood; and conſequently, doth not put Perſons into equality of Circumſtances with thoſe whoſe Blood is ennobled; and yet he grants, that thoſe who ſat in the Houſe of Peers by virtue of their Summons, did judge as Peers; as is manifeſt from his own Precedents, p. 15. from the 4 Ed. 3. From whence it follows, that this was not thought to be the Reaſon by the Peers themſelves in Parliament.

2. That this was not the Reaſon in the Judgment of our greateſt Lawyers; becauſe they tell us, that where this Reaſon holds, yet it doth not make Men Judges. As for inſtance, thoſe who are ennobled by Blood, if they be not Lords of Parliament, are not to be Judges in the caſe of one ennobled by Blood. Only a Lord of the Parliament 2 Inſt. p. 48. of England, ſaith Coke, ſhall be tried by his Peers being Lords of Parliament;

ment; and neither Noblemen of any other Country, nor others that are called Lords, and are no Lords of Parliament, are accounted Pares Peers within this Statute. Therefore the Parity is not of Blood, but of Privilege in Parliament.

3. The Practice it ſelf ſhews that this was not the Reaſon. For this Reaſon would equally hold, whether the Trial be at the King's Suit, or the Suit of the Party; but in the latter caſe, as in an Appeal for Murder, a Man whoſe Blood is ennobled muſt be tried by thoſe whoſe Blood is not ennobled; even by an ordinary Jury of 12 Men. And I deſire our Author to conſider what becomes of the inheritable quality of Blood in this Caſe, when Life and Fortune lies at the mercy of 12 Subſtantial Freeholders? who, it is likely, do not ſet ſuch a value upon Nobility as Noble-men themſelves do; and yet our Law, which ſurely is not againſt Magna Charta, allows an Ordinary Jury at the Suit of the Party to ſit in Judgment upon the greateſt Noblemen. Therefore this Reaſon can ſignifie nothing againſt the Biſhops, who are Lords in Parliament, as I have already proved.

Coke 2 Inſtit. p. 49. Selden's Titles of Honour, 4. tc. p. 347.

[2.] I ſhall give a brief account of the true and original Reaſon of this Trial by Peers; without which, that Author it ſeems is reſolved to conclude, that the Juriſdiction of the Biſhops in Capital Caſes is an abuſe of Magna Charta, and a Violation offer'd to the Liberties of Engliſh Subjects.

As to the general Reaſon of the Trial by Peers, it is eaſie to conceive it to have riſen from the care that was taken, to prevent any unfair Proceedings in what did concern the Lives and Fortunes of Men. From hence Tacitus obſerves of the old Germans, that their Princes, who were choſen in their great Councils to do juſtice in the ſeveral Provinces, had ſome of the People joyned with them, both for Advice and Authority. Theſe were Aſſeſſors to the Judges; that Mens Lives and Fortunes might not depend on the pleaſure of one Man; and they were choſen out of the Chief of the People, none but thoſe who were born free being capable of this Honour. In the latter times of the German State, before the ſubduing it by Charlemaign, ſome learned Men ſay, their Judges were choſen out of the Colleges of Prieſts, eſpecially among the Saxons. After their being conquer'd by him, there were 2 Courts of Judicature eſtabliſhed among them, as in other parts of the German Empire.

De Morib. Germ. c. 12.

1. One ordinary and popular, viz. by the Comites, or great Officers ſent by the Emperor into the ſeveral Diſtricts; and the Scabini, who were Aſſiſtants to the other, and were generally choſen by the People. The number of theſe at firſt was uncertain; but in the Capitulars they are required to be ſeven, who were always to aſſiſt the Comes in paſſing Judgments. But Ludovicus Pius, in his ſecond Capitular, A. D. 819. c. 2. enlarged their number to 12. And if they did not come along with him, they were to be choſen out of the moſt ſubſtantial Free-holders of the County; for the Words are, De melioribus illius Comitatûs ſuppleat numerum duodenarium. This I take to be the true Original of our Juries. For our Saxon Laws were taken very much from the Laws of the Chriſtian Emperors of the Caroline Race, as I could at large prove, if it were not impertinent to our buſineſs; and thence diſcover a great miſtake of our Lawyers, who make our ancient Laws and Cuſtoms peculiar to our ſelves. As in this very caſe of Trial by Peers, which was the common practice of theſe parts of the World. Therefore Otto Friſingenſis takes notice of it as an unuſual thing in Hungary; Nulla ſententia tentia à Principe, ſicut apud nos moris eſt, per pares ſuos expoſcitur——ſola ſed Principis voluntas apud omnes pro ratione habetur; that they were not judged by their Peers, but by the Will of their Prince. Which ſhews, that this way of Trial was looked on as the practice of the Empire, and as preventing the inconveniences of arbitrary Government. And it was eſtabliſhed in the Laws of the Lombards, and the Conſtitutions of Sicily. In the one it is ſaid to be Judicium Parium; in the other, proborum virorum. In the Saxon Laws of King Ethelred at Wanting, c. 4. Twelve Free-men are appointed to be ſworn to do Juſtice among their Neighbours in every Hundred. Thoſe in the Laws of Alfred are rather 12 Compurgators than Judges; however ſome make him the Author of the Trial by Peers in England. But by whomſoever it was brought into requeſt here, it was no other way of Trial, than what was ordinary in other parts of Europe; and was a great inſtance of the Moderation of the Government of the Northern Kingdoms.

2. There was an extraordinary or Royal Court of Judicature: and that either by way of Appeal, which was allowed from inferior Courts; or in the Cauſes of Great Men, which were reſerved to this Supream Court. In which either the King himſelf was preſent, or the Comes Palatii, who was Lord High Steward; and all the Great Perſons were Aſſeſſors to him. In ſuch a Court Brunichildis was condemned in France; and Taſſilo Duke of Bavaria in the Empire; and Erneſtus, and other Great Men, A. D. 861. and Erchingerus and Bartoldus under Conradus, the laſt of the French Race. And among the Cauſes expreſly reſerved for this Supreme Court, were thoſe which concerned the Prelates as well as the Nobles. Ut Epiſcopi, Abbates, Comites, & potentiores quique, ſi cauſam inter ſe habuerint, ac ſe pacificare noluerint, ad noſtram jubeantur venire præſentiam: neque illorum contentio alicubi judicetur. But in this Court they challenged that as their Privilege to be tried by their Peers; who were called Pares Curiæ. So the Emperor Sigiſmund, in his Proteſtation before the States of the Empire; Cùm ſecundùm juris communis diſpoſitionem, nec non uſum, morem, ſtylum & conſuetudinem ſacri Romani Imperii, feudalis contentio per Dominum feudi, ac Pares Curiæ terminanda ſit, &c. And again, niſi Parium noſtræ Curiæ arbitrio. So likewiſe in France, as Tilius ſaith, Hæc judiciorum ratio, ut de cauſis feudalibus judicent Feudales Pares, in Gallia eſt perantiqua. So in Fulbertus one Count ſends word to another, that their Cauſe ſhould not be determin'd, niſi in Conventu Parium ſuorum. And many other Examples might be produced; but theſe are ſufficient to make us underſtand the true Original of this Right of Peerage; which was from the Feodal Laws; and all thoſe who held of the ſame Lord, and by the ſame Tenure, were ſaid to be Pares, Peers. And therefore ſince the Biſhops in England were Barons by Tenure ever ſince William I. by conſequence they were Peers to other Barons; and had the ſame original Right of Trial by other Barons as their Peers, holding by the ſame Tenure, and ſitting in the ſame Court. And thus I hope I have given (what that Author ſo impatiently deſired, viz.) a rational account of the Trial by Peers; and have thereby ſhewed, that this is ſo far from being any diſadvantage to the Biſhops Cauſe, that it adds very much to the Juſtice of it.

And that this is ſo far from being a violation of Magna Charta, that it is within the intention and meaning of it, I thus prove. In the 14. ch. of Magna Charta we read, Comites & Barones non amercientur niſi per Pares ſuos: but by the Common Law the Amerciament of a Biſhop is the ſame with that of a Lay-Baron; and therefore in the ſenſe of the Law, they are looked on as Peers. And all the Parlamentary Barons, whether Biſhops os Abbots, were amerced as Barons. Thence 15 Ed. 2. a Writ was directed to the Juſtice of the Common Pleas, that they ſhould not amerce the Abbot of Crowland tanquam Baro, becauſe he did not hold per Baroniam aut partem Baroniæ. And it is confeſſed by the moſt learned Lawyers, that the Lords Spiritual do enjoy the ſame legal Privileges, in other reſpects, which the Temporal Barons do; as in real Actions to have a Knight returned in their Jury; as to a day of Grace; hunting in the King's Foreſt; Scandalum Magnatum, &c. Now ſince the Law of England allows only a double Party, viz. as to Lords of Parliament, and Commons, whether Knights, Eſquires, Gentlemen, or Yeomen, without any Conſideration of the great inequality of Circumſtances among them; (Yeomen having as little ſenſe of Gentility, as Commons can have of the Privileges of Nobles;) it is apparent that this Trial by Peers was not founded upon equality of Circumſtances; and that in all reaſon, thoſe who do enjoy the legal Privileges of Peers, are to be looked on as ſuch by Magna Charta.

Clauſ. 15. E..m. 12.

Selden of Baron. p. 152.

Titles of Hon. 4. to p. 347.

But the great Objection is, that the Lawyers are of another Opinion, as to this Trial by Peers; and not only the common ſort, who take all upon Truſt, which they find in the modern Law-Books, but thoſe who have ſearched moſt into Antiquity, ſuch as Mr. Selden and Sir Ed. Coke.

To this therefore I anſwer,

1. The Author of the Peerage, &c. proves the Biſhops are not Peers, becauſe not to be tried by Peers. This conſequence Mr. Selden utterly denies; for he ſaith, it is true and plain that the Biſhops have been Peers. For which he quotes the Biſhop of Wincheſter's Caſe, who was queſtion'd in the King's Bench for leaving the Parliament at Salisbury in the beginning of Ed. III. and he pleaded to the declaration, quod ipſe eſt unus è Paribus Regni, that he was one of the Peers of the Realm; which, he ſaith, was allowed in Court. And from other Book-caſes and Parliament-Rolls he there evidently proves, that the Biſhops were Peers; which he not only aſſerts in that confuſed Rhapſody, which went abroad under his name; but in his elaborate Work of the laſt Edition of his Titles of Honour, in which he corrected and left out the falſe or doubtful paſſages of his firſt Edition. And among the reſt, that paſſage wherein this Author triumphs, A Biſhop ſhall not be tried by Peers in Capital Crimes. The ſame thing I confeſs is ſaid in the Privileges of the Baronage; which he there calls a point of Common Law as it is diſtinguiſhed from Acts of Parliament; i. e. the cuſtom and practice hath been ſo. And the only evaſion he hath for Magna Charta is this; that it is now to be interpreted according to the current practice, and not by the literal interpretation of the Words. Which is an admirable anſwer, if one well conſiders it, and juſtifies all violations of Magna Charta, if once they obtain and grow into Cuſtom. For then, no matter for the expreſs Words of Magna Charta, if the contrary practice hath been received and allowed in legal Proceedings. This is to do by Magna Charta, as the Papiſts do by the Scriptures, viz. make it a meer Noſe of Wax, and ſay, it is to be interpreted according to the practice of the Church.

2. Some things are affirmed about this matter with as great aſſurance as this is, which have not been the conſtant practice. Coke is poſitive, that Biſhops are not to be tried by their Peers; but ſo he is in the ſame page, that a Nobleman cannot wave his Trial by his Peers, and put him- himſelf upon the Trial of the Countrey: Whereas it is ſaid in the Record, 4 Ed. III. that Thomas Lord Berkely, ponit ſe ſuper Patriam, puts himſelf upon his Countrey, and was tried by a Jury of 12 Knights. And 28 H. VI. the Duke of Suffolk declined the Trial of his Peers, and ſubmitted to the King's Mercy. By which it appears, that this was a Privilege which was not to be denied them, if they challenged it; but, at leaſt before 15 Ed. III. they might wave it if they pleaſed, and after that too, if they were tried out of Parliament. For this Trial by Peers was intended for a Security againſt arbitrary Power in taking away Mens Lives; and therefore it was allowed at the King's Suit, but not at the Suit of the Party. But if Biſhops were tried out of Parliament, and did voluntarily decline the challenge of this Privilege, this is no argument at all againſt their Right of Peerage; and ſo I find ſome ſay it was in the Caſe of Fiſher, Biſhop of Rocheſter, in H. VIII's time; which is the great Precedent in the Law-Books.

Godwin. vit. Rich. Scroop Archiep. Eborac.

3. The method of Proceeding as to the Trial of Biſhops by Common Juries, while the Pope's Power continued in England, is not ſo clear, that any forcible Argument can be drawn from thence. Becauſe the Biſhops then looked on themſelves as having no Peers out of Parliament, in point of Judgment, but Biſhops. As in the famous Caſe of Adam Biſhop of Hereford, under Ed. II. who was reſcued from the King's Bench by his Brethren the Biſhops, becauſe they looked on his appearing there as a Violation of the Liberties of the Church. I do not go about to defend theſe Proceedings; but I am ſure the Author of the Peerage, &c. very much miſrepreſents this buſineſs; for he makes it as if the Biſhops were legally convicted in Court by a common Jury, and that after conviction he was deliver'd to the Archbiſhop, to the intent, as he ſuppoſes, that he ſhould be degraded. Whereas, in truth, the Biſhops carried him out of the Court, without his giving any Anſwer to the Indictment; and when he was abſent, the King commanded the Jury to bring in their Verdict; and without ever being heard to make any Defence for himſelf, they found him guilty in all the Articles laid to his Charge. That Author very freely beſtows the terms of Impudence on the Biſhops of that time, and Ignorance on thoſe who go about to defend them; but I deſire to know, whether of theſe two makes a Man thus miſrepreſent a matter of fact? For it was ſo far from being true, that upon Conviction he was deliver'd to the Archbiſhop to be degraded; that he never appeared in Court after, but continued under the Archbiſhop's care, till, after a while, he fully reconciled him to the King; notwithſtanding the Jury found him guilty of Treaſon. I deſire to be informed, whether we are to underſtand Magna Charta by ſuch a Trial as this? Whether he were judged by his Peers, I know not, but I am ſure he was not by the Law of the Land; which I think is as good a part of Magna Charta as the other. And this, our Hiſtorians tell us, is the Firſt Inſtance of any Trial of this kind, of any Biſhop in England; which hath too much of force and violence in it, to be a good Interpreter of Magna Charta.

p. 7.

Walſingh. p. 119.

Antiq. Cantuar. in Walt. Raynolds p. 215. ed. Han.

The Second Precedent is verbatim out of Mr. Selden, concerning John de Iſle, and the Biſhop of Ely his Brother; which concerns ſuch matters, wherein himſelf confeſſes the Privilegium Clericale was allowed; and the Record ſaith, the Archbiſhop entring his plea, that he was to be deliver'd to him as a member of his Church, he was accordingly deliver'd, after the Jury had given in their Verdict. Which ſhews, indeed, the good will that was then uſed, to take away even the allowed Privileges of the Clergy by common Juries. And this is another ſtout Interpreter of Magna Charta, when Bracton, Briton, Fleta, Stat. Weſt. 1 Articuli Cleri, c. 15. are confeſſed, even by Sir Edw. Coke, to be ſo clear in the Clergy's behalf in theſe matters. 2 Inſtit. f. 633. &c.

The Third Precedent, which is likewiſe out of the ſame Author, is of Thomas Merks, Biſhop of Carliſle; who, for his fidelity to R. II. and the true Heirs of the Crown, againſt the Uſurpation of H. IV. was found guilty of Treaſon by a common Jury. But Mr. Selden is ſo ingenuous as to take notice, that the Writ directed to the Juſtices had in it a Non-obſtante to a Statute lately made at Weſtminſter; Licèt in Stat. apud Weſtm. nuper edito inter cætera continetur, quòd nullus Archiep. nec Epiſcopus coram Juſticiariis noſtris occaſione alicujus criminis impetatur, abſque ſpeciali præcepto noſtro, quouſque, &c. Which was read in Court: But the Judges urging, That the Liberties of the Church did not extend to High-Treaſon, then it is ſaid he did ponere ſe ſuper Patriam; juſt as Thomas Lord Berkely did, 4 Ed. III. This is the only Precedent that proves that a Biſhop, before the time of H. VIII. did put himſelf upon a common Jury; and yet we find as good a Precedent of this ſort, concerning an allowed Peer of the Realm. And whether this ſingle Precedent be ſufficient to interpret Magna Charta, againſt the plain Senſe of theſe Words, and to make a conſtant Practice, I leave any rational Man to judge.

But if this were yielded in Caſes of High-Treaſon, wherein the Privilege of Clergy holds not, (eſpecially ſince the Statutes 25 Ed. III. c. 4. and 4 H. IV. c. 2, 3.) Mr. Selden tells them, that there is no conſequence from hence, becauſe they are not to be tried by Peers, therefore they are not Peers; ſince the Common Law may limit this Privilege of Peers in one particular Caſe, which may hold in all others. As it is no diminution to the Peerage of the Temporal Lords to be tried by a common Jury at the Suit of the Party. I conclude the Anſwer to this Argument, as Mr. Camden doth his Diſcourſe about this Subject; who having proved that the Biſhops do enjoy all other Privileges of Peers, except this of being tried by them, (which he ſeems to attribute to a kind of Revenge upon them, for pleading ſuch Exemptions by the Canon-Law.) After all, he leaves it to the Lawyers to determine, whether this be juris explorati. The meaning of which I am ſure is not, as the Author of the Letter expreſſeth it, that it was always ſo, and never otherwiſe. Camden. Brit. p. 123.

But the great difficulty to ſome is, That a Prædial or Feudal Barony doth not ennoble the Blood, and therefore can give no Right of Peerage. Whereas it is well known, that all the Baronies of England were ſuch from the Conqueror's time till after the Barons Wars, when, for Reaſon of State, it was thought neceſſary to make the Nobility more dependant on the Crown. And all that were Barons were Pares, i. e. Peers. So du Freſne quotes an old Poem of the Common Laws of England, Barons nous appellons les Piers del Realm.

In France, from whence our Baronies firſt came, Eccleſiaſtical Perſons with prædial Baronies are thought as capable of Peerage as any. For, there at firſt all the Barones Regni (who both in France and England were the ſame with the Barones Regis, however ſome of late have diſtinguiſhed them) ſate in the great Council, and all publick Affairs paſſed through them, and they were judged by their own Order; and theſe were called Pares Regni, among whom the Biſhops were comprehended. At laſt Lewis VII. A. D. 1179. (as moſt Authors agree) choſe Twelve out of the great number of the Peers of France, of which half Gloſſar. v. Pares.

the number were Biſhops who held Feudal Baronies of the King; and the Archbiſhop of Rheims is the firſt of the whole Number. And becauſe theſe enjoyed greater Privileges than other Peers, their number was increaſed by particular Favour, but the ancient Right of Peerage remained to all the Barons of the Realm. In Scotland, when they appointed Twelve Peers for the King's Council, they were 4 Biſhops, 4 Earls, 4 Barons. So that in the neighbour Nations Feodal Baronies were never thought inconſiſtent with Peerage; and we have as little Reaſon to think them ſo with us, ſince to this Day the Biſhops do enjoy not only the great Right of Peerage, of ſitting and voting in the Houſe of Peers, but have ſome perſonal Privileges of Peers allowed them by the Common Law, as is already ſhewed.

Walſingh. ad A. D. 1296. Mat. Weſt. A. 1295.

II. The laſt thing to be conſidered is, the Capacity in which they ſit in the Houſe, whether as a Third Eſtate or not? The Author of the Letter not only denies it, but oppoſes it with great Vehemency, and offers many Authorities and Reaſons againſt it. All which muſt be weigh'd with the ſame Calmneſs and Impartiality which hath been hitherto uſed in this Diſcourſe. And there are three things to be diſtinctly handled for the clearing of this Matter: 1. His Foundation. 2. His Authorities. 3. His Reaſons.

P. 93. (1.) His Foundation whereupon he builds, which is, That the Biſhops ſit in the Houſe only in the Capacity of Temporal Barons, William the Conqueror having brought the Temporalties of Biſhops under the Condition of Baronies. That they do ſit there in the Right of their Baronies, was yielded at firſt; but whether they ſit there only in that Capacity, is the thing in Queſtion.

And here I crave leave to make uſe of this Author's diſtinction, and to apply it to this purpoſe, viz. of the Biſhops ſitting in the Houſe in a Judicial way, and in the Legiſlative way. When they ſit in the Judicial way, as Members of the Supreme Court of Judicature, I grant that they ſit only in the Capacity of Temporal Barons, as appears by the Conſtitution of Clarendon; where the King requires their Attendance in Judicature as his Barons: But that in the Legiſlative way they have a further Capacity, as repreſenting a Third Eſtate in Parliament, I prove by theſe Arguments.

[1.] During the Vacancy of Biſhopricks, Writs were ſent to the Guardians of the Spiritualties, to attend the Parliament. Which Mr. Selden, who cannot be ſuſpected for partiality in this matter, ſaith is obvious in the Rolls of Parliament; and which he cannot deny to be an evidence of the Biſhops ſitting in Parliament as Biſhops, and as Spiritual only, as they did in the Saxon times, in the Wittena gemot. So likewiſe, the Vicars General had Writs when the Biſhops were beyond Sea. But neither of theſe could ſit in Parliament as Temporal Barons.

Titles of Honour, p. 2. ch. 5. n. 17. 23.

But becauſe ſo much depends on the Proof of this, and no Man hath yet undertaken it, I ſhall bring clear Teſtimonies of the conſtant Practice of it, from the Records of the Tower.

In all theſe years, there are Writs directed, either to the Guardians of the Spiritualties in the Vacancies of the Sees, or to the Vicars-general or Chancellours in their abſence beyond the Seas. Which are ſufficient to prove this to have been the conſtant Practice of Parliaments in thoſe times.

[2.] Some Church-men were ſummon'd to Parliament who could have no pretence to ſit there as Temporal Barons. For 49 H. III. the Deans of York, Exeter, Wells, Salisbury and Lincoln were ſummon'd with the like Writ as the reſt. And Mr. Selden obſerves, that in the times of Edw. I. Edw. II. Edw. III. where the Clauſe Præmunientes is omitted in the Writ to the Biſhops, their particular and ſeveral Writs were ſent to ſome Deans and Priors of Cathedral Churches, to appear in Parliament.

Ib. n. 12.

But to prove more fully the intereſt the Clergy had then in Parliaments, it is worth our obſerving, that in the ancient Records there are 4 ſeveral ſorts of Writs wherein the Clergy were concerned.

1. In the common Writs of Summons to Parliament ſent to the Archbiſhops and Biſhops, with the Clauſe of Præmunientes, which runs thus; Præmunientes Priorem & Capitulum, or Decan. & Capit. Eccleſiæ veſtræ, Archidiaconos, totumque Clerum veſtræ Dioceſ. facientes, quod idem Prior & Archidiaconi in propriis perſonis ſuis, ac dictum Capitulum per unum, idemque Clerus per duos Procuratores idoneos, plenam & ſufficientem poteſtatem ab ipſis Capitulo & Clero habentes, prædictis die & loco interſint, ad conſentiendum hiis quæ tunc ibidem de communi conſilio ipſius Regni noſtri, divina favente Clementia, contigerint ordinari. So Mr. Selden repreſents it from the 50 Edw. III. member. 6. And with him Sir Edw. Coke agrees; who ſaith, by this Clauſe in the Writ of Summons to the Biſhops, they are required to ſummon theſe perſons to appear perſonally at the Parliament: But he proves they had no Voices there, becauſe they had required only ad conſentiendum, &c. Which is a very weak argument. For, (1.) His own great Authority, Modus tenendi Parlamentum, ſaith expreſly, they were called ad tractand. & deliberand. and that their names were called over in the beginning of Parliament; and that they had a voice there, and did make up part of the Commons of England. Not that the Procuratores Cleri did ſit together with them, after they had a Speaker of their own; of which I find no Precedent: But they ſate by themſelves, having a Prolocutor of their own; which is the very ſame name uſed in the Rolls for the Speaker of the Houſe of Commons. (2.) Theſe words do not exclude them from being part of the commune Concilium Regni, but only ſhew, that their Conſent was required, according to the Cuſtom of that time. And 23 Ed. I. the Clauſe is more full, ad tractand. ordinand. & faciend. the like 24 Ed. I. But in 27 Ed. I. the words are, ad faciend. & conſentiend. (3.) The ſame argument would exclude the Commons from any Voices: for in 23 Ed. I. the Writ for chuſing Knights and Burgeſſes ran after the ſame manner; ita quod dicti milites plenam & ſufficientem poteſtatem pro ſe & Commun' Comit' prædict' & dicti Cives & Burgenſes pro ſe & Communit' Civit' & Burg' tunc ibidem habeant, ad faciend' tunc quod de communi Concilio ordinabitur in præmiſſis. Would any man be ſo unreaſonable to infer from hence, that the Houſe of Commons have no Votes? The ſame form is uſed 26 Ed. I. ——30 of the ſame. In 5 Ed. II. it is, ad conſentiendum, &c. 6 Ed. II. it is, ad faciend. quod de communi Conſilio contigerit ordinari. 7 Ed. II. ad faciendum & conſentiend. and ſo it continued to the 26 Ed. III. when firſt came in, ad tractand. conſulend. faciend. but 44 Ed. I. it was only, ad conſulend. & conſentiend. 46 Ed. III. it was, ad faciendum & conſentiendum his quæ tunc de communi Conſilio Regni contigerit ordinari: ſo 47 Edw. III. Which hath been the general form, ever ſince obſerved, and would exclude the Houſe of Commons from any Votes in Parlament, as well as the Clergy.

2. There were other Writs of Summons to Parliament wherein the Clauſe Præmunientes was left out; and then particular Writs were ſent to ſuch Deans and dignified Clergy-men as the King thought fit. So it was not only 49 H. III. but there were two Summons 23 Ed. I. and in one of them the Clauſe Præmunientes was inſerted, in the other not. It was left out 25 Ed. I. and in one 27 Ed. I. and put in in another, and left out again 28. and 30. of Ed. I. Inſerted 1 Ed. II. in one Writ, and omitted in others; and ſo in the 3 following years: But afterwards generally inſerted, except 6 Ed. II. 13. 16. 18. In 5 Ed. III. it was omitted, and ſo in 6. and ſome few years afterwards: But then it generally obtained, that the Clauſe Præmunientes was put into the Writs of the Biſhops Summons to the Parliament.

3. There were Writs of Summons to great Councils, which were no Aſſemblies of the Eſtates; and then only ſome great Biſhops and Lords, or other Great Men were ſummon'd, without any Writs to others, or any notice taken of them. In ſuch a Summons 2 Ed. II. only 4 Biſhopt are named; 18 Ed. II. only 6; 19 only 5; 2 Ed. III. only 2. and the Guardians of the Spiritualties of the See of Canterbury: and ſo 4 Ed. III. and in another the ſame year, 3 beſides the Archbiſhop of Canterbury. 5 Ed. III. Summons were ſent to the Archbiſhop of York, and 19 Biſhops more. 11 Ed. III. the Writ was directed to the Archbiſhop of York, and ſuch Biſhops, Earls, and Great Men as were of the King's Council: And two more were ſummon'd the ſame year. The form of the Writ differs little from that to the Parliament, only the Clauſe Præmunientes is always left out, and only ſome particular Biſhops and Nobles are called, and no Writs for Elections of Knights or Burgeſſes. In the 16 Ed. III. the Writ is ſent to the Archbiſhop and 7 Biſhops more; but none to Abbots, Priors, Sheriffs, &c. Which ſhews that this was Magnum Concilium, as it is ſometimes called, but no Parliament.

4. There were Writs to ſummon a Convocation diſtinct from the Writ of Summons to the Parliament with the Clauſe Præmunientes. This will appear by the firſt Writ of Summons to a Convocation, which I have ſeen; which bears date at Lincoln 17 Feb. 9. Ed. II. but the Parliament was ſummon'd 16. of October before, to meet at Lincoln in quindenâ S. Hilarii; with the Clauſe Præmunientes in the Writ to the Biſhops. In which Summons to Convocation it is expreſſed, that thoſe Biſhops and others of the Clergy, who were ſummon'd to Parliament, did, as far as they were concern'd, unanimouſly yield to a Subſidy; but ſo, that others of the Clergy who were not ſummon'd to Parliament ſhould meet in Convocation, and conſent thereto. Therefore the King ſends his Writ to the Archbiſhop to ſummon all the Prelates, whether Religious or others, and others of the Clergy of his Province, to meet at London poſt 15. Paſch. ad tractand. & conſentiend. &c. Here we have the plain difference between the Writs to Parliament, and to Convocation. The Writs to the Parliament were ſent to the Archbiſhops and all the Biſhops, with the clauſe Præmunientes, &c. ſummoning thoſe of the Clergy who were then thought neceſſary to the Aſſembly of the three Eſtates in Parliament: But when a Convocation was called, then the Writs were only directed to the two Archbiſhops, who were to ſummon the reſt of the Clergy, and not only thoſe who held by Baronies, but others of the dignified Clergy, tam exemptos quàm non exemptos, with the Proctors of the Chapters and Clergy of the Dioceſe, ad tractand' & conſulend' ſuper præmiſſis una vobiſcum & aliis per Nos tunc mittendis. So it is expreſſed in the Writ for Convocation 11 Ed. III. 29 Ed. III. 31 Ed. III. 7 R. II. 28 H. VI. 23 Ed. IV. only theſe two laſt have this difference, ad tractand', conſentiend', conclud' ſuper præmiſſis, & aliis quæ ſibi clarius exponentur tunc ibidem ex parte noſtra.

Theſe things I have laid together, not barely to clear this intricate matter, (as it hath been made) of the intereſt the Clergy then had in Parliaments as well as Convocation; but chiefly to prove from hence, that all the intereſt they had in Parliaments was not meerly on the account of the Temporal Baronies which the Biſhops and many of the Abbots then had. Which is the great, but common miſtake of the Author of the Letter.

[3.] After the Biſhopricks were made Baronies, the diſtinction even in Parliament is kept up between the ſeveral Eſtates of the Clergy and Laity. For although Baronagium doth often taken in all; yet ſometimes they are ſo remarkably diſtinguiſhed, that we may ſee they were looked on as two diſtinct Eſtates in Parliament. So Eadmerus, (ſpeaking of what paſſed in Parliament 3 H. I.) ſaith it was done utriuſque Ordinis concordi curâ & ſolicitudine, by the conſent of both Eſtates. So Matt. Paris, ſpeaking of the Summons to appear in the beginning of H. I. comprehends all under thoſe 2 Eſtates, Clerus Angliæ, & Pop. univerſus: And again, Reſpondente Clero, & Magnatibus cunctis. Speaking of a Parliament under H. II. he ſaith, Convocato Clero Regni, ac Populo. In 39 H. III. deſcribing a Parliament, he calls thoſe aſſembled Nobiles Angliæ, tam viri Eccleſiaſtici quàm Seculares. And in the Writs of Summons the diſtinction hath been always preſerved between the Prælati and the Magnates: For in thoſe to the Biſhops it is, cum cæteris Prælatis, Magnatibus, &c. in thoſe to the Temporal Lords, cum Prælatis, Magnatibus, &c. In thoſe to the Biſhops they were commanded, in Fide & Dilectione quibus nobis tenemini: in thoſe to the Temporal Lords, in Fide & Homagio; or, ſince Ed. III. in Fide & Ligeancia. Which ſhews that they were not ſummon'd meerly as Temporal Barons.

The ancient Right of the Commons, p. 61.

[4.] The Author of the Letter confeſſeth, the Clergy to be one of the three Eſtates of the Kingdom; but denies them to be one of the three Eſtates in Parliament. From whence I argue thus, Either the Clergy muſt be repreſented in Parliament, or one of the Eſtates of the Kingdom is not at all repreſented there. And if one of the Eſtates of the Kingdom be not there repreſented, how can it be a perfect Repreſentative? So that this diſtinction of the Three Eſtates of the Kingdom, and the Three Eſtates in Parliament, unavoidably overthrows the Parliaments being a compleat Repreſentative. But in 23 H. VIII. n. 33. as Mr. Petyt obſerves, there is this paſſage in the Parliament Rolls. It is conſidered and declared by the whole Body of this Realm, now repreſented by all the Eſtates of the ſame aſſembled in this preſent Parliament. Therefore all the Eſtates of the Kingdom muſt be repreſented in Parliament. And 1 Eliz. c. 3. The Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and the Commons are ſaid to repreſent in Parliament the Three Eſtates of the Realm. From whence it follows, that, according to the ſenſe of the Parliament, if the Clergy be an Eſtate of the Kingdom, as he ſaith they are, they muſt be repreſented in Parliament, or the whole Body of the Realm cannot be there repreſented.

(2.) We now come to conſider the weight of Authority in this matter. For which I ſhall premiſe two things.

1. That the whole Parliament aſſembled are the beſt Judges, which are the Three Eſtates in Parliament; and their Authority is more to be valued, than that of any particular Perſons, whether Lawyers or others.

2. That no Parliaments can give better Teſtimony in this matter, than thoſe which have aſſumed moſt to themſelves. For if there be Three Eſtates in Parliament, and the Biſhops be none, then the King muſt be One of the Three; as the Author of the Letter inſinuates, throughout this Diſcourſe; and the natural conſequence from hence ſeems to be a coordination; or that two joyning together may over-rule the third. Therefore in all Reaſon, if any Parliaments would have made the King one of the Three Eſtates, it would have been either the Parliameat 1 H. IV. which depoſed one King, and ſet up another; or that 1 R. III. which diſinherited the Children of Ed. IV. and ſet up their Uncle.

I ſhall therefore firſt from the Rolls of theſe two Parliaments ſhew, which are the Three Eſtates in Parliament; and from them, evidently prove that the King is none, but the Biſhops are the Third Eſtate.

I begin with the Parliament 1 H. IV. by the Rolls it appears, (1.) That R. II. appointed two Procurators to declare his Reſignation of the Crown, coram omnibus Statibus Regni, before all the States of the Kingdom. From whence it unavoidably follows, 1. That the King was none of them; 2. That the Eſtates of the Kingdom, and the Eſtates in Parliament are the ſame thing. (2.) Among the Articles againſt R. II. one is concerning the Impeachment of Tho. Archbiſhop of Canterbury, coram Rege & omnibus Statibus Regni, before the King and all the Eſtates of the Realm. The King then was none of the Eſtates. (3.) The Commiſſioners for the Sentence of Depoſition are ſaid to be appointed per Pares & Proceres Regni Angliæ Spirituales & Temporales, & ejuſdem Regni Communitates, omnes Status ejuſdem Regni repræſentantes; by the Peers and Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and the Commons of the Kingdom, repreſenting all the States of the Kingdom. Where obſerve, 1. The Biſhops are called Peers, as well as the Temporal Lords. 2. The Eſtates of the Parliament are to repreſent all the Eſtates of the Kingdom. 3. The Three Eſtates in Parliament are the Lords Spiritual, the Lords Temporal, and the Commons of the Realm; and Fabian expreſly calls them the Three Eſtates of this preſent Parliament, repreſenting the whole Body of the Realm. Fabian. 7. par. R. 2. fol. 158.

In the Rolls of Parliament 1 R. III. it is recorded, that before his Coronation, certain Articles were delivered unto him in the name of the Three Eſtates of the Realm of England; that is to ſay, of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and of the Commons by Name, &c. Now foraſmuch as neither the ſaid Three Eſtates, neither the ſaid Perſons which in their name preſented and deliver'd (as it is aforeſaid) the ſaid Roll unto our ſaid Sovereign Lord the King, were aſſembled in form of Parliament, divers Doubts have been moved, &c. Now by the ſaid Three Eſtates aſſembled in this preſent Parliament, and by Authority of the ſame, be it ratified, and enrolled, &c. Upon which Mr. Pryn himſelf makes this Marginal Note, The Three Eſtates muſt concur to make a Parliament; no one or two of them being a full or real Parliament, but all conjoyned. Abridgment of Records, p.710.714.

But leſt I ſhould ſeem to take advantage only of theſe two Parliaments, I ſhall now ſhew this to have been the conſtant ſenſe of the Parliaments; as will appear by theſe following Records.

In 1 H. VI. n. 12. All the Eſtates of the Realm are ſaid to be aſſembled in Parliament, 3 H. VI. n. 19. the Three Eſtates aſſembled in this preſent Parliament.

6 H. VI. n. 24. the Duke of Glouceſter deſired an explanation of his Power as Protector; in the Anſwer, drawn up by the Lords appointed for that purpoſe, it is alledged that H. V. could not by his laſt Will, nor otherwiſe, alter, change, or abroge, without the Aſſent of the Three Eſtates; nor commit or grant, to any Perſon, Governance or Rule of this Land, longer than he lived. Nevertheleſs they add, It was adviſed and appointed by the Authority of the King, aſſenting the Three Eſtates of this Realm. Which ſhews how far the King was from being thought one of the Three Eſtates in Parliament at that time.

10 H. VI. n. 17. Ralph Lord Cromwell put in a Petition to the Parliament, that he was diſcharged the Office of King's Chamberlain in a way contray to the Articles for the Council ſworn, 8 H. VI. coram tribus Regni Statibus, before the Three Eſtates of the Realm, as they were aſſembled in Parliament; which appears by the Record 8 H. VI. n. 27.

11 H. VI. n. 10. The Duke of Bedford appeared in Parliament, and declared the Reaſons of his coming coram Domino Rege & tribus Regni Statibus, before the King and the Three Eſtates of the Realm; as it is in the Record, but not mention'd in the Abridgment.

n. 11. Domino Rege & tribus Regni Statibus in præſenti Parlamento exiſtentibus, the King and the Three Eſtates of the Realm being preſent in Parliament. Nothing can be plainer, than that the King is none; and that the Three Eſtates of the Kingdom are the Three Eſtates in Parliament.

11 H. VI. n. 24. Lord Cromwell Treaſurer exhibits a Petition in Parliament, wherein he ſaith, The Eſtate and Neceſſity of the King and of the Realm, have been notified to the Three Eſtates of the Land aſſembled in Parliament.

In an Appendix annexed to the Rolls of Parliament that Year, the Duke of Bedford ſaith, in his Petition to the King, how that in your laſt Parliament yit liked your Highneſs, by yadvis of Three Eſtates of yis Land, to will me.

23 H. VI. 11. Præſente Domino Rege & tribus Regni Statibus in præſenti Parlamento exiſtentibus, &c.

28 H. VI. n. 9. Domino Rege & tribus Regni Statibus in pleno Parlamento comparentibus, &c.

p. 86. After theſe I ſhall inſiſt upon the Precedents cited by the Author of the Letter himſelf; viz. the Ratification of the Peace with France by the Three Eſtates 9 H. V. and 11 H. VII. which he alledges as an extraordinary thing, that the Three Eſtates joyned in theſe Tranſactions; whereas in truth it was nothing but a Ratification of the Peace in Parliament; and conſequently, thoſe Three Eſtates of the Kingdom, are the Three Eſtates of Parliament. Bacon, H. 7. p. 144. Hiſt. Angl. p. 404. For the Parliament was then ſitting at both theſe Ratifications; and no other Aſſembly of the Three Eſtates was ever known in England. Walſingham ſaith, that H. V. called a Parliament, which was ſitting at that time; for the King kept St. George's Feaſt at Windſor that Year, from thence he went to the Parliament at London, which ended within a Month; and the ratification of the Peace bears date May 2. Judge then, whether theſe were not the Three Eſtates in Parliament? But to prove this more fully, it ſeems by 23 H. VI. n. 24. that a Statute was made in the time of H. V. that no Peace ſhould be made with France without the conſent of the Three Eſtates of both Realms; which was then repealed. But whom they meant by the Three Eſtates here in the time of H. VI. appears by 28 H. VI. n. 9. when the Chancellor in the preſence of the King, gave thanks to the Three Eſtates, and prorogued the Parliament; wherein it is plain, the Three Eſtates in Parliament were meant, and that the King could be none of them. In 38 H. VI. n. 38. the Chancellor again, in the preſence of the King and of the Three Eſtates, having given thanks to all the Eſtates, diſſolved the Parliament. But that which puts this matter out of doubt is, that in the Parliament 1 H. VI. the Queen Dowager in her Petition mentions the Ratification made in Parliament, 9 H. V. and ſaith, it was not only ſworn by the King, but by the three Eſtates of the Kingdom of England: Ceſt aſſavoir, les Prelatz, Nobles, & Grands, & per les Comuns de meſm le Roialm D'engleterre: that is to ſay, by the Prelates, Nobles, and other Grandees, and by the Commons of the Realm of England; as appears more fully, ſaith that Petition, by the Records and Acts of the ſaid Parliament. And the King there declares in four ſeveral Inſtruments, that the ſaid Articles of Peace were approved and ratified by Authority of Parliament, in theſe Words, Qui quidem Pax, Tractatus, concluſio & concordia, omneſque Articuli contenti in eiſdem, in Parlamento dicti Patris noſtri apud Weſtm. 2° die Maii A. R. 9. tento, Auctoritate ejuſdem Parlamenti approbati, laudati, auctorizati & acceptati. Nothing can be plainer from hence, than that the Three Eſtates of the Kingdom were no other than the Three Eſtates in Parliament. And the ſame appears by another Petition of the ſame Queen, 2 H. VI. n. 19.

For latter Times I ſhall inſtance only in the Parliament 1 Eliz. c. 3. wherein the Lords Spiritual and Temporal and Commons declare, that they do repreſent in Parliament the Three Eſtates of the Realm. From whence it follows, 1. That the Three Eſtates of the Kingdom muſt be repreſented in Parliament. 2. That the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and the Commons do repreſent thoſe Three Eſtates of the Kingdom, and therefore are the Three Eſtates in Parliament. 3. That the King can be none of the Eſtates in Parliament, becauſe he doth not repreſent any of the Eſtates of the Kingdom.

And it is a wonder to me, that any Man, who conſiders the Conſtitution of the Government of Europe, and how agreeable it was in all the Kingdoms of it, as to the Aſſemblies of the Three Eſtates, could ever take the King to be one of the Three Eſtates in Parliament. For the Queſtion would ſeem ridiculous to Perſons of any other Nation, if we ſhould aſk them whether the King was reckon'd among the tres Ordines Regni? For by the Three Eſtates they all mean the Three Ranks of Men, the Clergy, Nobility, and Commonalty. But the Author of the Letter P. 88. could not deny that theſe were the three Eſtates of the Kingdom; but he ſaith, the Three Eſtates of Parliament are clean another thing; which I may reaſonably ſuppoſe, is ſufficiently diſproved by the foregoing Diſcourſe.

But he quotes ſeveral Authorities for what he ſaith, which muſt now be examined, and will appear to be of no weight, if compared with the evidence already given on the other ſide.

The firſt Authority is of King James, in his Speech at the Prorogation of P. 98. the Parliament 1605. wherein he ſaith, The Parliament conſiſts of a Head and a Body; the King is the Head, the Body are the Members of the Parliament. This Body is ſubdivided into two parts, the Upper and the Lower Houſe. The Upper conſiſts of the Nobility and the Biſhops, the Lower of Knights and Burgeſſes. The force of the Argument lies in King James his making the Biſhops but a part of the Upper Houſe: But that this doth not exclude their being a Third Eſtate, I prove by a parallel Inſtance. In 5 H. IV. the Biſhop of London being Chancellor compared the Parliament to a Body, as King James did; but he made the Church the Right Hand, the Temporal Lords the Left Hand, and the Commonalty the other Members; yet preſently after, he calls theſe the ſeveral Eſtates which the King had called to Parliament. But that the Biſhops ſitting in the ſame Houſe with the Temporal Lords doth not hinder their being a diſtinct Eſtate, will appear when we come to anſwer his Reaſons. And for King James his ſenſe as to this matter, we may fully underſtand it by this Paſſage in his Advice to his Son. As the whole Subjects of our Country Baſilic. Dor. l. 2. p. 159 of his Works. (by the ancient and fundamental policy of our Kingdom) are divided into Three Eſtates, &c. Theſe Words are ſpoken of the Kingdom of Scotland, but the ancient and fundamental policy of that is the ſame with England; and he that believed the Subjects made the Three Eſtates there, could never believe the King to be one of them here.

The next Authority is of King Charles I. in his Anſwer to the 19 Propoſitions, June 2, 1642. P. 100. wherein he tells the two Houſes, that neither one Eſtate ſhould tranſact what is proper for two, nor two what is proper for three. To which I anſwer, that the Penner of that Anſwer was ſo intent upon the main buſineſs, viz. that the two Houſes could do nothing without the King, that he did not go about to diſpute this matter with them, whether the King were one of the Three Eſtates or not? But taking their Suppoſition for granted, he ſhews that they could have no Authority to act without the King's Concurrence. But the unwary Conceſſions in that Anſwer were found of dangerous Conſequence afterwards, when the King's Enemies framed the Political Catechiſm out of them, which is lately reprinted, no doubt, for the good of the People.

In 2 H. 4. n. 33. he makes the Houſe of Commons to declare to the King P. 101. and Lords, That the Three Eſtates of the Parliament are the King, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal. Whereas the Truth of that matter is this: A difference had happen'd in the Houſe of Lords, between the Earl of Rutland and Lord Fitz-Walter; whereupon the Houſe of Commons go up to the King and the Lords, and having, it ſeems, an eloquent Speaker, who ventured upon dangerous Metaphors, he makes bold with the Similitude of the Trinity, becauſe that would help him to perſwade them to Unity; but if he had left the King out, he might have been ſuſpected ـcted to have ſet up an independant Power in the Three Eſtates; therefore leſt he ſhould loſe his Similitude, (which goes a great way with an eloquent Man) he ſtrains another point, and draws the King into his Trinity. And is ſuch an Expreſſion to be mention'd in compariſon with the expreſs Declaration but the Year before, 1 H. IV. of both Houſes concerning the Three Eſtates in Parliament?

Next to this Similitude, that of Stephen Gardiner ought to be mention'd, who compared Faith, Hope and Charity concurring to Juſtification, to the Concurrence of the Three Eſtates in Parliament, i. e. the King and two Houſes to the making of Laws. But I wonder the Author of the Letter, who expreſſeth ſo much diſlike of his Divinity, would take his Judgment in Politicks. But this Notion of making the King one of the Three Eſtates, how valuable ſoever it be to ſome Men, is, it ſeems, only to be met with in ſome grave ancient Similitudes. But of what Authority theſe are againſt the conſtant Senſe of Parliaments ſo fully declared, I leave any Man of Underſtanding to judge.

P. 103. For the Judgment of eminent Lawyers, he quotes but one in King James his Time, viz. Finch, in his Book of Law, l. 2. ch. 1. who doth indeed, in the Words quoted by him, make the King, Lords and Commons to be the Three Eſtates. But I can hardly imagine how a learned Lawyer could fall into ſuch a groſs Miſtake, unleſs the Modus tenendi Parlamentum ſhould give occaſion to it; which was accounted no blind MS. in thoſe Days, but a very great Treaſure, as appears by Sir E. Coke, who cites it on all occaſions. And very few Lawyers had the Judgment in Antiquity which Mr. Selden had, who firſt diſcovered the juſt Age and Value of that MS. This Author indeed, towards the concluſion of his Treatiſe, makes the King the firſt of the Eſtates; but then he makes Six Eſtates in Parliament, or Degrees, as he calls them; and delivers this for good Doctrine at the very end of his Treatiſe, That if any one of all theſe be ſummoned, and do not appear, yet with him it is notwithſtanding a full Parliament; nay, he expreſly ſaith, The King may hold a Parliament without a Houſe of Lords. But there are ſo many other ſuch Poſitions diſcover'd by others in that Treatiſe, that I need to ſay no more of it. And as to this point of the King's being one of the Eſtates in Parliament, Sir Ed. Coke, who otherwiſe too much admired that Treatiſe, declares againſt it in the very beginning of his Treatiſe of the Parliament. This Court, ſaith he, conſiſteth of the King's Majeſty, ſitting there as in his Royal Politick Capacity, and of the Three Eſtates of the Realm, viz. of the Lords Spiritual, Archbiſhops and Biſhops, the Lords P. 86. Temporal, and the Commons of the Realm. And however the Author of the Letter may ſlight Mr. Selden's Judgment in this matter; yet theſe two may be ſufficient to weigh down the Scales againſt any one Lawyer's Authority to the contrary, eſpecially, ſince they were never ſuſpected, I dare ſay, for any partiality towards the Clergy.

(3.) But the Author of the Letter thinks to carry this Point by meer ſtrength of Reaſon. We muſt therefore diligently conſider the Force of his Arguments.

P. 89. 1. If Biſhops were one of the Eſtates in Parliament, Reaſon would they ſhould vote by themſelves ſeparately from other Lords, which would make another Eſtate: But they do not only not vote apart by themſelves, the whole Body of them together; but that Body is divided and ſeparated within it ſelf, one part from another. If both Houſes ever ſate together, as ſome imagine, (and as they do in a Neighbour Kingdom) this way of Reaſoning will make but one Eſtate in Parliament all that Time. But to give a clear Anſwer to this Objection; I diſtinguiſh two things in the Biſhops, their Spiritual Capacity, by which they repreſent; and their Civil Capacity as Barons, in which they vote, according to the Rules of the Houſe. For the manner of giving their Votes is a thing under the Regulation of the Houſe, and depends upon Cuſtom; but their Spiritual Capacity as Biſhops, in which they repreſent, doth not. And the Reaſon of their ſitting together with other Lords, is upon the account of their Writs of Summons; which, as Mr. Selden confeſſeth, ever ſince the latter end of Edw. III. hath been, for the Biſhops cum cæteris Prælatis, Magnatibus & Proceribus, colloquium habere & tractatum; and therefore they are bound to ſit together in the ſame place with the Temporal Lords, or elſe they cannot adviſe and confer together. And I leave the Author of the Letter to conſider, whether his Reaſon or the King's Writ ought to take place.

2. If the Biſhops were a Third Eſtate, they muſt have a negative Voice to all that paſſeth there: but the Biſhops are intermingled with the Temporal Lords in making up the Majority, as a part of it. Since I have evidently proved the Clergy to be one of the Three Eſtates in Parliament, if he be ſure that every Eſtate ought to have a negative Voice, then I am ſure that this Objection lies more upon him to anſwer, than upon the Biſhops. But to prevent any new Diſputes, I ſhall return this Anſwer to it. Since it is agreed on both ſides, that the Biſhops do ſit in the Houſe as Temporal Barons, and in that reſpect do make up the Majority of Votes in the Houſe of Lords, it could not but ſeem unreaſonable, that they who voted as Barons in the Houſe ſhould have a negative Voice in another Capacity; and by this means they loſt their diſtinct negative Voice, becauſe by the King's Writs they were to ſit and vote with the Temporal Lords. Juſt as it is in the Diets of Germany: Since the diſtribution of that Aſſembly of the Eſtates of the Empire into the ſeveral Chambers, the Prelates vote according to their Ranks; the Three Electors in the Electoral College; the other Biſhops, that are Princes of the Empire, in the Chamber of Princes; and thoſe who are not Princes, with the Counts and Barons. So that here the Votes of the Biſhops are mingled with the reſt, without a diſtinct negative Voice, and yet no one queſtions but the Biſhops do repreſent a diſtinct Eſtate of the Empire. P. 89.

3. This is a Diſparagement to the Houſe of Lords, that another Eſtate muſt be joined with them to make up their Negative. No more than to the Princes of the Empire to have the Biſhops joined with them, when the Imperial Cities vote by themſelves. But what Diſparagement is this, for thoſe to make up the Majority of the Votes of the Baronage, who ſit there as Barons by Tenure, by a Right as ancient as Will. the Conqueror, by the Author's own Confeſſion. P. 90.

4. If the Biſhops make a Third Eſtate, then a Parliament could not be held without them: but a Parliament hath ſate excluſo Clero, as that of Ed. I. and that it may do ſo in point of Law appears by the Reſolution of the Judges in Keilway's Reports, becauſe the Biſhops ſit in Parliament by reaſon of their Baronies. This is the great Objection, to which I ſhall give a full Anſwer. P. 91.

[1.] It is dangerous arguing from extraordinary Caſes, to the excluding any one of the Eſtates of the Kingdom from being repreſented in Parliament; becauſe no one can tell where this way of arguing will ſtop. If a Parliament may be good without one Eſtate, why not without out another? And we have ſeen an Houſe of Lords excluded as unneceſſary, upon ſuch kind of Arguments; becauſe they ſit in their own Perſons, and repreſent none but themſelves. If we once depart from the ancient and legal Conſtitution of Parliaments, there will be no end of Alterations. Every new Modeller of Government hath ſomething to offer that looks like Reaſon, at leaſt to thoſe whoſe intereſt it is to carry it on. And if no precedents can be found, then they appeal to a certain inviſible thing called the Fundamental Contract of the Nation: which being a thing no where to be found, may ſignifie what any one pleaſeth. Suppoſe one extraordinary caſe happens through the diſorder of Times, that the Clergy have been left out in a Parliament; what doth this ſignifie towards altering the legal Conſtitution and conſtant Courſe of Parliaments, which from the beginning of Parliaments in this Nation, have had the Eſtate of the Clergy repreſented in them? as ſufficiently appears by Mr. Petyt's learned Preface to his late Diſcourſe of the ancient Right of the Commons. p. 7, &c. The firſt after King Ethelbert's Converſion was, Commune Concilium tam Cleri quam Populi. That under Ina was, omnium Epiſcoporum, & Principum, Procerum, Comitum, & omnium Sapientium, Seniorum & Populorum totius Regni. That under Edmund the elder was, Concilium magnum Epiſcoporum, Abbatum, Fidelium Procerum & Populorum. Concil. Brit. p. 182. 189. 318. 327. 336. 340. 344. 428. 534. I might add many more: as that at Becanceld under King Withred A. D. 694. Epiſcopis, &c. Ducibus & Satrapis in unum glomeratis. At Cloveſhoo under Kenulphus of Mercia; at Calecyth, at London, at Kingſton. Nay, not one can be found by me in the Saxon times, wherein the Biſhops are not expreſly mention'd. So that if there be ſuch a thing to be found as the Fundamental Contract of the Nation about the Conſtitution of Parlaments, I do not queſtion but they have their ſhare in it. Inſomuch that Sir H. Spelman makes it his deſcription of the Wittena-Gemot, that in it, as Mr. Petyt obſerves, Convenêre Regni Principes, tam Epiſcopi quàm Magiſtratus, liberique homines; i. e. it was an Aſſembly of the three Eſtates. So that before there were any ſuch things as Baronies, they were an Eſſential part of the Engliſh Parliament. And muſt all this clear and undoubted evidence from the firſt mention of Parliaments be rejected, becauſe once upon a time, a certain King called a certain Parliament, wherein, upon ſome Diſtaſt between the King and the Clergy, the other Eſtates continued ſitting without them?

[2.] This ſingle Inſtance about the Parliament under Ed. I. is much miſunderſtood, as will appear by theſe conſiderations.

1. That the Clergy excluded themſelves and were not ſhut out by the Act of the King and the other Eſtates. For upon the Bull of Pope Boniface VIII. forbidding the Clergy giving any more Subſidies (which was procured by Archbiſhop Winchelſee, as our Hiſtorians relate) a Parliament being called by Ed. I. at Saint Edmondsbury on purpoſe for Subſidies, the Clergy refuſe, upon the Pope's prohibition, till they had conſulted the Court of Rome; and go away every one to their own homes: notwithſtanding which, the King proceeds with the other two Eſtates, and gets Subſidies from the Laity. So that the excluſion of the Clergy came from their own voluntary Act; when the King deſired no ſuch thing, nor the other two Eſtates, but were all extremely provoked at this withdrawing of the Clergy. That this Parliament was called purpoſely for the Subſidy, appears by the Writ ſtill upon Record; wherein the Archbiſhop is ſummon'd to appear, ad ordinandum de quantitate & modo ſubſidii memorati.

2. Whereas it is inſinuated, that great matters were done, and good Laws paſſed, when the Clergy were excluded; I find no ſuch thing. It is true, the confirmation of Magna Charta by Ed. I. (which was a great thing indeed) is ſaid, in the Statute-Books, to be done the ſame year, viz. 25 Ed. I. But that it could not be done in that Parliament, I thus prove. That Parliament was called craſt. Animarum; the King appoints another at London craſt. Hilarii: where the difference ſtill continuing, he appoints a new Parliament on the day of S. Peter ad Vincula, or Lammas-day, wherein he was reconciled to the Archbiſhop and Clergy. Then Fealty is ſworn to his Son, before his going into Flanders: and the King excuſed himſelf as to the great Taxes and Subſidies, on the account of his Wars. While he was about Winchelſea, a Remonſtrance is ſent to him of the Grievances of the Nation, in the name of the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Earls, Barons, and the whole Commons of England, wherein they complain of illegal Taxes, and the breach of Magna Charta. The King gives a dilatory anſwer, and paſſes over into Flanders. In his abſence the people refuſe to pay the Taxes, and the Lords combine together, and all things tend to an open Rebellion. His Son Ed. II. calls a Parliament at London, and promiſes a Confirmation of the Charter, and that no Taxes ſhould hereafter be raiſed, either on Clergy or Laity, without their conſent. Which being ſent over Ed. I. confirmed it with his own Seal: which was all done within the compaſs of this year. But he again ratified it in the Parliament 27 Ed. I. So that nothing was done in that Parliament at S. Edmundsbury, but granting a 12 of the Laity to the King. And when the great Laws were paſſed, the King and Clergy were reconciled, and they ſate in Parliament. And the Archbiſhop of Canterbury fell into the King's diſpleaſure afterwards, for being ſo active a promoter of them. The ſumm then of this mighty argument is, that the Lords and Commons once granted their own Subſidies, without the concurrence of the Clergy; therefore the Clergy are no eſſential part of the Parliament.

Clauſ. 24. Ed. 1. M. 7. dorſo.

3. The Reaſon aſſigned in Keilway's Reports, why the King may hold a Parliament without the Biſhops, is very inſufficient: viz. becauſe they have no place in Parliament by reaſon of their Spiritualty, but by Reaſon of their Temporal poſſeſſions. The inſufficiency of which reaſon will appear by two things.

1. That it is not true: as appears by this, that the Clergy are one of the Eſtates of the Kingdom; and all the Eſtates of the Kingdom muſt be repreſented in Parliament.

2. Were it true, it is no good Reaſon. For why may they be excluded becauſe they ſit on the account of their Baronies? Where lies the force of this Reaſon? Is it becauſe there will be Number enough without them? That was the Rump's Argument againſt the Secluded Members. And I hope the Author of the Letter will not juſtifie their Cauſe. Or is it becauſe they hold their Baronies by Tenure? ſo did all the ancient Barons of England: and why may the King hold his Parliament with the other Barons, without the Biſhops; and not as well with the Biſhops, without the other Barons? Which I do not ſee how it can be anſwer'd upon thoſe grounds. Suppoſe the queſtion had been thus put, ſince all the ancient Lords of Parliament were Barons by Tenure, and Parliaments were held for many Ages without any Barons by Patent or by Writ, why may not the King hold his Parliament after the ancient way, only with Barons by Tenure? I do not ſee, but as good a

Reaſon may be given for this, as that in Keilway's Reports. All that I plead for is, that our good, ancient and Legal Conſtitution of Parliament may not be changed for the ſake of any ſingle Precedents, and rare Caſes, and obſcure Reports built upon weak and inſufficient
p. 68. Reaſons. For, as the Author of the Letter very well ſaith, Conſuetudo Parlamenti eſt Lex Parlamenti, The conſtant Practice of Parliaments (and not one ſingle Inſtance) is the Law of Parliaments. And ſuppoſe that Precedent of 25 Ed. I. as full as could be wiſhed in this caſe; yet I return the Anſwer of the Author of the Letter in a like caſe;
p. 49. This is but one ſingle Precedent, (of a Parliament without Biſhops,) againſt multitudes wherein they were preſent; it was once ſo, and never but once. And can that be thought ſufficient to alter and change the conſtant courſe and practice of Parliaments, which hath been otherwiſe?

Nothing now remains, but a ſevere reflection on the Popiſh Biſhops
p. 99. for oppoſing the Statute of Proviſors, and the ſeveral good Acts for the Reformation. But what this makes againſt the Votes of Proteſtant Biſhops is hard to underſtand. If he thinks thoſe could not make a good third Eſtate in Parliament, who took Oaths to the Pope contrary to their Allegiance, and the intereſt of the Nation, ſo do we. If he have a great Zeal for the Reformation, ſo have all true Members of the Church of England, who, we doubt not, will heartily maintain the Cauſe of our Church againſt the Uſurpations of Rome, though the heat of others ſhould abate. For did not our Proteſtant Biſhops ſeal the Reformation with their Blood, and defend it by their admirable Writings? What Champions hath the Proteſtant Religion ever had to be compared in all reſpects with our Cranmer, Ridley, Jewel, Bilſon, Morton, Hall, Davenant, and many other Biſhops of the Church of England? And notwithſtanding the hard fortune Archbiſhop Laud had in other reſpects, not to be well underſtood in the Age he lived in; yet his Enemies cannot deny his Book to be written with as much ſtrength and judgment againſt the Church of Rome, as any other whatſoever. I ſhall conclude with ſaying, that the Clergy of the Church of England have done incomparably more Service againſt Popery, from the Reformation to this day, than all the other Parties among us put together: And that the Papiſts at this time wiſh for nothing more, than to ſee Men, under a pretence of Zeal againſt Popery, to deſtroy our Church; and while they cry up Magna Charta, to invade the legal Rights thereof, and thereby break the firſt Chapter of it; and from diſputing the Biſhops preſence in Caſes Capital, to proceed to others; and ſo by degrees to alter the ancient Conſtitution of our Parliaments, which will unavoidably bring Anarchy and Confuſion upon us: From which, as well as Popery, Good Lord deliver us.

The Caſe of Viſitation of Colleges, in the Houſe of Lords, in Exeter-College Caſe.

My Lords,

THE Noble Lord who ſpake laſt, hath put us into the right Method of purſuing this Debate, ſo as to bring it to a good Iſſue. For the Point before Your Lordſhips is not about the whole Proceeding of the Biſhop of Exeter, as Viſitor of Exeter-College; but whether his Judicial Proceedings againſt the Rector of that College, may be Examined and Reverſed by the Court of King's Bench? For it comes hither by a Writ of Error, which relates to the Judgment there given; and the main Error is, That they gave Judgment in a matter which did not legally come before them. If this can be made out, then the Judgment is to be Reverſed, and the matter to remain as it was before it was brought thither. But I am ſenſible of a very great prejudice which lies in the way, before I enter upon the Debate, which is, That if the Judgment of the Biſhop be not Reverſible at Common Law, then his Power is Abſolute and Concluſive, being without any farther Appeal; which ſeems to be the ſetting up an Arbitrary Power among us, which is againſt Law.

Truly, my Lords, I think this Objection ought to be removed in the firſt place; for I would not be ſo miſunderſtood, as if I were for ſetting up a Power againſt Law; for the Law is the greateſt ſecurity of our Religion, and Lives, and Liberties. But there is a great difference to be made between an Arbitrary Power againſt Law, and a Concluſive Power by Law. I cannot underſtand how a Power given by the Law, ſhould be a Power againſt Law. And the Queſtion before Your Lordſhips is, Whether the Law hath not given ſuch a Power to Viſitors, as to determine matters, without the liberty of Appeal, and if there be no Appeal, their Judgment muſt be Final.

But that ſuch a Power in Viſitors is not againſt our Law, appears by that excellent Statute, 43 Q. Eliz. c. 4, concerning Commiſſions for Charitable Uſes, where Viſitors have ſuch a Power given them by Law, that they are not liable to be called to an account, by any Commiſſion, or by Court of Law or Chancery. So that our Law doth think fit on ſome occaſions, eſpecially as to Eleemoſynary Foundations, to lodge ſuch a Power in ſome Perſons, and this ſurely cannot be called an illegal Power.

But it hath been urged with great plauſibleneſs, That the Viſitor's Power is no other than the Founder's Power, for he acts as Founder, and by his Right; but no Founder can eſtabliſh ſuch an Arbitrary Power, and therefore it is Illegal.

I confeſs, my Lords, I am of Opinion, that if the Viſitor hath no other Power but the Founders, he could not ſettle ſuch an Arbitrary Method of Proceeding, that the Viſitors Judgment ſhould not be called in queſtion by the Courts of Law. For the Founder was but a private Subject in the preſent Caſe; and I do not ſee how the Founder of Exeter-College, by an inherent Power in himſelf can debar any Perſon from an Appeal, in caſe of Injury done to him, in a Society ſettled by Law. I know very well how much it hath been pleaded, and what weight hath been laid upon it by the learned Council at the Bar, viz. That the Right of Ownerſhip, or the Property of the Lands in the Founder, gives him a Viſitatorial Power in Law; which he may leave to ſuch as he ſhall think fit to intruſt with it, and that this Power comes not from any Eccleſiaſtical Canons, (which I freely grant) but from the Common-Law, which placeth it in the Founder and his Heirs, unleſs he ſettle it upon others. And although Corporations for publick Government, be ſubject to the Courts in Weſtminſter-Hall; which have no particular Founders, or ſpecial Viſitors, yet Corporations for Charity, founded and endowed by private Perſons, are ſubject to the Rules and Government of thoſe that erect them. But where the Perſons to whom the Charity is given are not incorporated, there is no ſuch Viſitatorial Power, becauſe the Intereſt of the Revenue is not inveſted in them; but where they are, the Right of Viſitation ariſes from the Foundation, and the Founder may convey it to whom, and in what manner he pleaſes; and the Viſitor acts as Founder, and by the ſame Authority which he had, and conſequently is no more accountable than he had been.

This ſeems to be a very fair and reaſonable Account of this matter; but if we look narrowly into it, we ſhall find that it will not clear the difficulties of the preſent Caſe; which relate to a Society incorporated by Law, and not to a meer Arbitrary Society, depending on the Will of the Founder. Now if a private Founder cannot by his own Power Incorporate ſuch a Society, then I cannot ſee how he can give ſuch a power to a Viſitor to remove any one out of it; ſo as not to be accountable to any other Court.

We muſt therefore go farther than the meer power of the Founder in this matter. And I take it for granted, that every ſuch Corporation muſt have a Legal Authority, beſides the Will of the Founder, and that 10 R. 29. muſt be either by Common-Law or by Preſcription (which is not pretended in the Caſe of Colleges) or by Act of Parliament, as Hoſpitals are, 39 Eliz. c. 5. or by Royal Charter; for the King by his Authority can make a Society to be Incorporated ſo, as to have the Rights belonging to Perſons as to Legal Capacities. So it is expreſſed in the Words
Mon. 11. 4. 83. of the Charter of the Foundation of a Charitable Society, Ut ſint unum corpus, habeantque Succeſſionem perpetuam, ac ſint Perſonæ habiles & capaces in lege.

In the Foundation of Queens-College in Oxford, Ed. 3. by his Charter 18 Jan. A. D. 1340. makes the Provoſt and Fellows, Verum Collegium, & ut Collegium licitum & approbatum agnoſcimus, Authoritate noſtrâ plenâ quâ poſſimus, ratificamus & confirmamus.

In the Charter of the Foundation of Lincoln-College, A. D. 1427. H. 6. gave the Founder Authority to found a College, conſiſting of a Rector, Scholars, and Chaplains.

So All-Souls was founded by the King's Authority, A. D. 1437. 16 of H. 6. although Archbiſhop Chichely gave the Revenues.

Corpus Chriſti College had not only a Charter of Foundation from the King, A. D. 1516. but Biſhop Fox the Founder had firſt a Licence from the Crown to found a College, conſiſting of a Preſident, and 30 Scholars.

If the Founder changed his mind after the firſt Grant, then he obtained a new Grant from the Crown, as in the Caſe of Corpus Chriſti: The Founder at firſt intended a Seminary for Monks, but altering his mind, that Grant was brought into Chancery, and there voided, and then obtained a new Grant.

The like happened as to St. John's College there, A. D. 1557.

The laſt College founded in Oxford was Pembroke-College, A. D. 1624. and that had a Charter from the Crown for its Incorporation; and for enjoying all the Privileges belonging to ſuch a Body.

So this College (which had not the Name of Exeter College at firſt) but the Society was incorporated by a Charter under the Broad Seal, 10 May, 7 E. II. Ann. 1314. But although the ſeveral Kings, made the Colleges to be ſuch in Law, i. e. legal Corporations, yet they left the particular Founders Authority by their Charters to appoint what Statutes they thought fit for the Regulation of them.

So Archbiſhop Chichely ſent the Body of his Statutes under his Hand and Seal to All-Souls; ſo did Wickham before to New-College; ſo did Waynflet to Magdalen College, and Fox to Corpus Chriſti; and ſo did the Founders of St. John's, Braſen-Noſe, Trinity, and Wadham: Lincoln College wanted Statutes by the Death of their Founder. Wolſey ſent Statutes to his Foundation, but that being diſſolved, and a new one erected by the King, thoſe Statutes were ſuppos'd to have loſt their Force. In Magdalen College, the Founder had Liberty to keep the Government of the College for ſome time in his own Hands, and when he was about making Statutes, he changed them ſeveral times. So Walter de Merton ſent Statutes under his Seal to Merton College, Ann. 1278. which he afterwards revoked, and ſent others A. D. 1275. But ſtill we ſee, although the Corporation was made by the King's Charter, yet the Statutes were left to the particular Founders.

And not only the Statutes, but the appointing of Viſitors was left to them, and the manner of Government, and the ſeveral Conditions, on which any Perſons were to be made or to continue Partakers of their Bounty.

By the firſt Statutes of Exeter College, the Rectorſhip was to be from Year to Year; but upon a Review of the Statutes, A. D. 1566. it was to continue as others did. But that which I particularly obſerve is, that theſe Founders of Colleges did take ſpecial Care to prevent, as much as poſſible, all Law Suits among the Members of their Societies, as moſt deſtructive to the Peace and Unity of their Body, and the Tranquility neceſſary for their Studies: For they knew very well, that if any Incouragement were given to Suits at Law, thoſe places would in time become Nurſeries for Attorneys and Solicitors, which were to pervert the main Deſign of their Foundation. Walter de Merton, the firſt Founder of a College in Oxford, with Revenues to ſupport it, took ſuch care about this, that he puts the Caſe in his Statutes, of a Wardens being deprived, and knowing that Men are apt to complain when they ſuffer, and to endeavour one way or other to be reſtored, (which cauſes great Heats and Animoſities among the contending Parties) therefore to prevent theſe miſchievous Conſequences, he puts in a Chapter on purpoſe, c. 41. in his Statutes, that if ſuch a Caſe happen'd, Nulla Actio, nullum Juris Remedium Canonici vel Civilis habeat, &c. This you may ſay, is a very hard Caſe; may not a Man ſee himſelf righted by proper Remedies at Law?

But this wiſe Founder look'd on the Conſequence as to the Society, more than the perſonal Injury of him that ſuffer'd; and he preferred the Peace of his College, before the reſtoring a particular Perſon to his Place. And he thought the Injury to the College by Law-ſuits would be far greater, and fitter to be conſider'd by him, than the Injury and Miſchief which one Man ſuffer'd.

And ſo in the Statutes of Exeter College it is expreſly mention'd, that if the Rector be depriv'd by the Commiſſary, he may appeal to the Biſhop as Viſitor, but if he be depriv'd by the Viſitor himſelf, then no farther Appeal is allow'd, nor any Remedies, Juris aut Facti.

If the Statutes did allow of Defenſiones legitimæ, as thoſe of Magdalen College do, c. 53. no doubt they may make uſe of them, within thoſe bounds which the Statutes allow: But here it is otherwiſe; for the Perſons depriv'd are bound to acquieſce in the Sentence paſſed upon them; and that with a regard to the good of the College more than to their own.

But it hath been ſaid with great appearance of Reaſon, That whatever the Intentions and Deſign of theſe Founders of Colleges might be, yet the Law of the Land is to ſet all things right which are amiſs; and if ſuch things do come before the King's Judges, they are to do Right in all Caſes; and for this Particular of Deprivation, we have been told of a notable Precedent in Dr. Coveney's Caſe in Dyer, often mentioned by my Lord Coke, who was depriv'd of the Preſidentſhip of Magdalen College by the Viſitor, and he made his Appeal, and the Cauſe was referred to two Judges, who declar'd that he had no Remedy by an Appeal in Chancery, but Deprivation being a Temporal thing, he might have an Aſſize or Suit at Common Law. This is the Force of all that has been urged from this Precedent: To which I muſt beg leave to give a full Anſwer.

I cannot deny that my Lord Coke ſeveral times refers to it, and ſeems to inſinuate it as a Foundation that the Courts might proceed upon; but he never mentions one Aſſize that was brought upon this Ground. But he had that Property of a good Judge, ampliare Juriſdictionem; and every one knows that in his time, there were great Endeavours uſed to enlarge the Juriſdiction of the Courts in Weſtminſter-Hall; and Sir James Baggs his Caſe is an evident Proof of it, which ſome great Lawyers have denied to be Law. But how come Dr. Coveney's Caſe to be called a Precedent, and ſo much inſiſted on as a Precedent in this Caſe? Whereas in Truth it is no Precedent at all relating to it. All that it can be a Precedent for, is only that in matters of Deprivation there lies no Appeal in Chancery; but what follows upon it, is nothing but an Inference made by the Judges, ex hoc ſequitur.

11 R. Kebl. 1. 667. 835.

Can that make a Precedent? What if they ſhould be miſtaken in their deduction? Can a falſe Conſequence make a true Precedent? I had thought a Precedent in Law had been grounded upon a Judicial Sentence, and a full hearing of a Cauſe. But here is nothing like it, and yet this muſt paſs for a Precedent as to the preſent Caſe, which ſhews a very great want of them. But however two Judges declared their Opinion, that Deprivation was a Temporal thing, and that an Aſſize did lie at Common Law in ſuch a Caſe.

Their Opinion was, That Deprivation was a Temporal thing: This with Submiſſion is a very crude and obſcure way of expreſſing a thing, ſo as to ground ſuch an Inference upon it. For a Temporal thing may either mean ſuch a thing as is not under the Spiritual Juriſdiction, ſo as an Appeal doth lie according to the Statutes 24 & 25 H. 8. and this was all the meaning of it, as to Dr. Coveney's Caſe. Or a Temporal thing may imply ſuch a matter as properly belongs to the Temporal Courts, which by no means follows from the former; for if this Inference be allow'd, then ex hoc ſequitur will hold as to all Sentences in the Courts of Chancery and Admiralty, as well as to this Caſe of Deprivation. For no doubt they are about Temporal things; and ſo this will prove an admirable Precedent for enlarging Juriſdiction.

But did Deprivation begin to be a Temporal thing at that time? Was it not as much ſo before and after as it was then? How came this Inference not to be made, and no Aſſizes brought in ſuch Caſes? Was there never ſuch an Occaſion before? That cannot be pretended. For A. D. 1379. upon a Quarrel about the Provoſtſhip of Queen's College in Oxford, the Archbiſhop of York being Viſitor, deprived the Provoſt and three Fellows. Was not this a Temporal thing? And they were very unquiet Men who were depriv'd, but they brought no Aſſize. But the King as Supreme Founder, ſent a Commiſſion to examine the matter, and upon hearing, the Provoſt ſtood deprived, and a new one confirmed. But to come nearer our own Times, A. D. 1562. 4 Eliz. the Archbiſhop of Canterbury as Viſitor proceeded againſt Hawles, and other Fellows of Merton College, for oppoſing the Admiſſion of a Warden, nominated by the Archbiſhop as Patron upon a Devolution; and he proceeded as Viſitor to their Deprivation. Was not this a Temporal thing? yet no Aſſize ſo much as thought upon at that Time.

A. D. 1568. The Biſhop of Wincheſter being Viſitor of Corpus Chriſti College, deprived thoſe Fellows who oppoſed the Admiſſion of Cole, nominated by the Queen, after the Election of Harriſon, which was ſaid not to be Statutable. Now both theſe Caſes had Difficulties in them, and were Temporal things as much as Dr. Coveney's, yet we read of no Aſſize brought, even ſoon after this Inference of the two Judges, which ſhews, that there was little regard had to it. 19 Eliz. happen'd a remarkable Caſe about the Headſhip of Lincoln College; one Will. Wilſon pretended to be choſen by the Society, and had the College Seal for his Election, with which he goes to the Biſhop of Lincoln to be confirmed. The Biſhop refuſes, he appeals to the Arches; and the Archbiſhop of Canterbury appoints a Commiſſion to examine and judge this matter; and then the Univerſity complained to the Queen of the Breach of their ancient Privileges: Upon which the Queen grants a Commiſſion ex plenitudine Poteſtatis noſtræ (are the very Words) to ſome Biſhops, Judges, and Civilians, to ſummon the Parties before them, and to determine the Cauſe, without any farther Appeal. Which Commiſſion is ſtill extant in the Rolls, and bears date 23 Apr. 19 Eliz. Here we have no Aſſize or Suit of Law once thought of, altho' it had been as proper then as any time afterwards.

But how hath this Matter ſtood ſince, and how came ſuch Cauſes to be brought into Weſtminſter-Hall? I will give your Lordſhips the true Account of it as far as I can trace it.

Soon after his late Majeſty's Reſtauration, 13 Car. II. one Dr. Withrington, Fellow of Chriſt's College in Cambridge, was deprived of his Fellowſhip by the Maſter and Fellows, he appealed to the King's Bench, and craved a Mandamus to be reſtored.

Kebl. 1. 2. In the Arguments in that Cauſe, one of the learned Judges of that Court affirmed, That the firſt Precedent of that kind was not above 10 Years before; and that was the Caſe of one Hern, who obtained a Mandamus to reſtore him to a Place he was deprived of in the Univerſity, when Glyn was Chief Juſtice. And the Reaſon given was, becauſe there was then no ſpecial Viſitor, for the Archbiſhop of Canterbury was local Viſitor. Can this Precedent hold, when there is a local Viſitor to whom it belongs to give Judgment in ſuch Caſes? after this A. D. 1655. one Craford made Application to the Kings-Bench, to be reſtored to the Place of School-Maſter in Cambridge, of which he was deprived by the proper Viſitors, the Maſter and Fellows of Gonville and Gaius-College. Upon ſeveral Arguments it was denied, and it was Reſolved, that no Writ of Reſtitution ſhould be granted, but the matter was referr'd to the Chancellor, &c. Styles 457.

So the Court of King's-Bench in Dr. Witherington's Caſe, declared, he could have no Reſtitution from thence, becauſe his Appeal lay to the proper Viſitor who was Fidei Commiſſarius, i. e. the Law truſted him with the diſcharge of his Duty. Siderfin. 71. Kebl. 234.

14. Car. II. Dr. Patrick was choſen Maſter of Queens-College by a Majority of Fellows; but another was admitted, upon which he appealed to the Kings-Bench, but ſome of the Judges ſaid poſitively, that no Writ ought to have been ever granted upon differences in Colleges, and that the Appeal lay to the local Viſitor and not to the Kings-Bench. It was then urged, that it was a matter of Freehold, and that it was no Spiritual Corporation, but the declaring of a Maſter was a Temporal thing. Notwithſtanding, the Chief Juſtice declared, that it would ſhake the whole Government of Colleges, to give Remedy in that Court. K. 1. 289, 610.

22. Car. II. one Daniel Appleford, was deprived by the local Viſitor of his Place in New-College; he brings the matter to the Kings-Bench, where my Lord Chief Juſtice Hales then ſat; the Caſe was argued by learned Council on both ſides. But my Lord Chief Juſtice ſaid, if there be a Juriſdiction in the Viſitor, and he hath determined the matter, how will ye get over that ſentence? And at this Rate, ſaith he, we may examine all Suſpenſions and Deprivations, and ſo where will there be an end? Which words have a great deal of Weight in them, for they ſhew where the Juriſdiction lies, and what Confuſion and Diſorder would follow the altering the ſettled Courſe of Juriſdictions. It is a great Argument to me, that the Law was far from being clear in this matter, that the learned Judges were ſo much divided in their Opinions, when thoſe Caſes were brought before them, ſoon after the Reſtauration they could produce no Precedents about 10 years ſtanding, one Judge remembred a Controverſie about a Provoſtſhip of Oriel; but then there was no Appeal thought of to the Kings-Bench; but the Queſtion was, whether it lay to the local Viſitor, or to the Archbiſhop, and it Reſolved for the Viſitor, in Dr. Lewis's Caſe. But there had been a a Precedent, when there were no Viſitors, and therefore ſome were for going upon that Precedent; although there were Viſitors, for one Precedent, is a very tempting thing in Caſe of Juriſdiction, where there is not a mind that values Right more than Power. But ſome ſuch there were among the Judges of that time, who refuſed to concurr in ſuch Proceedings that had no Warrant from ancient Practice, and tended to ſo apparent a Miſchief in the Government of Colleges: for all petty Controverſies among them muſt then be brought to Weſtminſter-Hall: Which might bring ſome Advantage to the Lawyers, but certainly none to the Univerſities. Mod. R. 80.

It is worth our while now to conſider on what Grounds thoſe went, who would have ſuch Cauſes brought to the Cogniſance of the Court of Kings-Bench, and the weakneſs of them will ſhew what little Reaſon they had for this new Practice. Some would go ſo far back as to found it upon Magna Charta, c. 29. That no man ſhall be diſſeiſed of his Freehold, but by his Peers. But they forget that it is added, vel per Legem terræ, which words eſtabliſh other legal Proceedings, which have been receiv'd as part of the Law of the Land, for otherwiſe not only all the Proceedings of the Eccleſiaſtical Courts muſt be illegal; but in the Court of Admiralty and Chancery, which I ſuppoſe was not intended by them.

Others ſaid, that if Colleges were Eccleſiaſtical Corporations, an Appeal would lie to the Chancery, as from other Eccleſiaſtical Courts, but being lay Corporations, they are under the Cogniſance of the King's-Bench; which according to Sir James Bagge's Caſe is to Judge of all Oppreſſions and Injuries in Corporations. But with ſubmiſſion, I think the Reſolution of this caſe doth not depend upon the Nature of the Corporations, whether they be Lay, or Eccleſiaſtical, or Mixt; but upon the ancient Right of Juriſdiction over them. There is no Queſtion but Colleges as well as other Schools of Learning were generally eſteemed as parts of the Eccleſiaſtical Body. For they were ſet up in theſe Weſtern Parts by the Biſhops in their ſeveral Churches, as appears by many Decrees of Councils to that purpoſe about the time of Charles the Great, and a little after. It is generally thought, and not without Ground, that Alcuinus who was bred up here in Learning under Egbert Archbiſhop of York (in ſuch a kind of College for Learning under him, which he mentions in his Epiſtles and the Library he founded there) did firſt put Charles the Great upon this Noble Deſign of Reſtoring Learning, and it had conſiderable ſucceſs for ſome time. But when thoſe Schools began to fail for want of Incouragement, ſome of the greater Monaſteries undertook to ſet them up, which brought great Reputation to them abroad. But here in England, Incouragement had been given by ſome of the Saxon Kings for the Scholars to Unite together, eſpecially in two ancient Cities, which lay moſt convenient for ſuch a purpoſe, and there, by degrees their Numbers ſo much increaſed, that they became conſiderable Bodies. For we are told, that at one time, there were 300 Halls and Inns for the abode of Scholars in Oxford. Such Bodies of Men of Parts and Activity were not to be let alone without due care of them, as to Diſcipline and Juriſdiction.

They had long ſince great Privileges given them by our Kings, as to Cauſes ariſing among themſelves (excepting Murder, Felony and Freehold; not ſuch a kind of Freehold as depends upon the Founders Will, but the Freeholds of the Halls or Inns or Poſſeſſions of the Colleges) but for all other Cauſes, they were to be under no Civil Juriſdiction, but what was lodged in the Officers belonging to their own Body. I need not to recite the particular Charters of H. 3. Ed. I. &c. ſince the Commiſſion 19 Eliz. clears the whole Matter. For therein it is not only ſaid that the Univerſity of Oxford had time out of mind large Privileges, Exemptions and Immunities, granted by Kings, and confirmed Parliaments; but this particularly, that the final Deciſion of all Cauſes ariſing among themſelves were to be determin'd in their own Body. And which is very obſervable, this Recital is made upon occaſion of a Complaint concerning the Title to a Headſhip over a College. So that, at that time, it was believed, long after Dr. Coveney's Caſe, that not Relief was to be had in ſuch Caſes by an Aſſize at Law; and that the Univerſity had been time out of Memory, in quiet and peaceable Poſſeſſion of theſe Privileges. by virtue of which, the Chancellor of the Univerſity had Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction over the Members of that Body, and could grant a Writ De excommunicato capiendo, (for the Chancellor was an Eccleſiaſtical Perſon till Sir John Maſon's time) and ſince that it became an Honourary place for Perſons of great Quality. The Vice-Chancellor Acts as his Commiſſary. And in this Reſpect, the Univerſity Juriſdiction is a Branch of the Eccleſiaſtical Law, and it is obſervable, that in the ancient Writs ſent to the Univerſity, they are all called the Clerks of our Univerſity, 5 Eliz. 3. 13 Ed. 3. 15 Ed. 3. 12 R. 2. and ſo in the time of H. 7. Walſingham mentioning the Difference between the Univerſity and Townſmen, calls it inter Clericos & Laicos. For the general Rule was, that a Corporation took its Denomination from the greater Number, and therefore the Univerſities were accounted part of the Eccleſiaſtical Body; although a conſiderable Number of the Members were not Eccleſiaſtical Perſons. But as to particular Colleges, we muſt obſerve that they are included in the General Privileges and are to enjoy the Benefit of them according to their own Statutes. For our ſeveral Kings having given the Founders a Power to make Statutes for their own Societies, and to appoint Viſitors with ſuch Powers as they thought fit, they enjoy their Privileges under the ſame Grants and Preſcriptions, which the Univerſity it ſelf doth. And theſe Viſitors are the Ordinaries of the ſeveral Colleges over which they are appointed, and are to Exerciſe their Juriſdiction according to the Limitations of the ſeveral Statutes. And if they tranſgreſs their Bounds, I do not ſee how they can be brought into Weſtminſter-Hall. For it is agreed, that where there is an ordinary Juriſdiction, there lies no Appeal to the Courts of Common Law; elſe all Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures might be there Examined over again. For this Kenn's Caſe is plain, and Huntley's Caſe, or Allen and Naſhe's Caſe, and before them Cawdrie's Caſe, which it is not ſo fitting for me in this place to recite as to refer to them. And no pretence of collateral Actions can be a ſufficient plea for examining what belongs to another Juriſdiction. For then the Right of peculiar Juriſdiction ſignifies nothing, if under another colour the ſame thing may be done as if there had been no ſuch Juriſdiction at all.

Walſingh. Ch. 69.

Rolls. 219.

The ſhort of it is, that by Charters and Privileges and length of Time, the Juriſdictions of the ſeveral Courts are ſettled; ſo that now, it would not be thought legal for the Common-pleas to try criminal Matters, or the Chancery Matters of Law; but every Court hath a limited Power and Juriſdiction.

The King's Bench is the Supreme Court; but it is not ſo unlimited a Court as the ancient Curia Regis was before the time of E. 1. That was indeed a Sovereign Court, wherein the King himſelf was preſent and all his great Lords, and they had the Right of Appeal in all Great Cauſes, and there the Capital, General, and Perpetual Juſtices attended the King and gave Judgment, as Bracton ſpeaks. And the Remainder of this, is in the Supreme Judicature of this Noble Houſe. Which is not derived from any later precedents of Appeals, as ſome have weakly imagined, but from the Fundamental Conſtitution of this Government, which always had a Supreme Court of Appeal; which as the Laws of Edward the Confeſſor ſay, was in the King and his Nobles. But for the Court of King's Bench; altho its Dignity and Authority be great as to Breaches of the Peace, correcting the Errors of other Courts, &c. (and I have not the leaſt deſign to leſſen the juſt Honour and Privileges which be-belong to it) yet it hath but a limited Power, and cannot extend its Juriſdiction as far as it pleaſes, and break in upon other Juriſdictions which are equally derived from the Crown, and ſettled by the ancient Law and Cuſtom of England.

But this is not all, for the peculiar Juriſdiction of Univerſities hath the general Conſent of the moſt Civilized Nations, ever ſince Univerſities have been ſet up in them, as appears by the famous Conſtitution to that purpoſe of Frederick I. A. D. 1158. by which all Differences among the Scholars were to be decided, either by their own proper Officer, or by the Biſhop of the place. Which Conſtitution hath not only been generally received, but ſo underſtood, as to exempt them from the Juriſdiction of Temporal Courts, as appears by * Baldus, † Accurſius, ‖ Scipio Gentilis, † Rebuffus and others. And Rebuffus gives the true Reaſon, Ne à ſtudiis avocentur propter lites alibi motas. In the Univerſity of Paris he ſaith, 'That he was looked upon as a Monſter, who being a Member of the Univerſity appealed to other Courts; and it was then thought Perjury in any ſuch to do ſo, eſpecially where Appeals are forbidden; as they are by the Statutes of Exeter College.

A learned * German Lawyer hath brought no fewer than 42 good Authorities in Law, to prove that Univerſities have a peculiar and diſtinct Juriſdiction within themſelves, and that other Judges have nothing to do with their judicial Sentences.

How then come our Univerſities and Colleges to be in a worſe condition than any abroad; when there are not greater Privileges given to any, nor enjoyed for a longer time than have been by ours? Shall the Noble Endowments of our Colleges, which are the Honour of our Nation, the Nurſeries of our Church, the Envy of Foreigners, and the Eyeſore of none but ſuch as hate Learning and ingenuous Education, make them become an eaſier Prey to ſuch unquiet Spirits, as by Law-ſuits and unſtatutable Appeals, would overthrow that Power which preſerves them in a ſtate of Peace and Tranquility, without which they can never attain the end of their Inſtitution.

If then your Lordſhips would conſult (as I know you will) the good of thoſe Societies, which have an influence on the whole Kingdom; if you would promote Learning, and Vertue, and Unity among them, there muſt be a timely check given to theſe tedious, expenſive and troubleſome Suits at Law, which diſquiet the Thoughts, eat out the Time, exhauſt the Purſes of all that are concerned in them, and lay the Foundation in Colleges of perpetual Feuds and Animoſities. And therefore although it be poſſible for a Viſitor to go beyond his Bounds, (for none are infallible) yet if ſuch a Caſe be put, it is better that one Perſon ſuffer, than that the Diſcipline, Government, and Peace of the College be in danger of being utterly deſtroy'd. For one froward contentious Man going to Law with the College, upon a Cenſure inflicted upon him, and being incouraged ſo to do, may put the College into ſuch Heats and Animoſities, as are of far worſe Conſequence than his continuing to ſuffer under a Sentence of Deprivation. And therefore I humbly move that the Judgement of the King's Bench may be Reverſed.

The Caſe of Commendams in the Houſe of Lords,
A. D. 169$^{4}_{5}$.

There are Three Points in the preſent Caſe before us.

I. The King's Prerogative in Right of Promotion.

II. The Power of granting a Commendam.

III. The Act of Parliament made about St. James's Church.

I. As to the King's Prerogative; two things are to be enquired into.

1. The Practice. 2. The Reaſon of it.

1. The Practice. 2. Advantages in Proof of a Practice.

1. If owned upon ſolemn Trial. 2. If the ſame Judgment hath continued afterwards.

1. Upon ſolemn Trial, when the matter hath been debated. As in Wright's Caſe 37 Eliz. Moor, fol. 399. where it is ſaid, That it was adjudged by many Precedents ſhewed in Court, that the Queen was to have the Right of Preſentation upon Promotion, and not the Patron. Here was a full view of Books and Precedents in Court; and upon it a ſolemn Judgment given. What Books? Not the Year-Books; where this Point is rarely mention'd, and not judicially determin'd: But the proper Books are the Regiſters of the ſeveral Biſhops, where the Inſtitutions are recorded, and the Avoidances, whereby it would be ſeen who preſented upon Promotion. And out of theſe were the Precedents taken by Noy, who produced, f. 138. R. no fewer than 18 Precedents within the compaſs of 40 Years, from 21 Eliz. to 14 Jac. 1. where the Prerogative had obtained by determination of Commendams retinere; the laſt is of Dr. Donne to the Rectory of Sevennock in Kent, by Promotion of Dr. Milburn to St. David's, who held it in Commendam retinere for a Year. And from ſuch Books the Practice is to be gather'd. Indeed if a Diſpute in Law happen'd, and that brought into Weſtminſter-Hall, then the Year-Books are to be ſearched; but where is there any judicial Opinion in them againſt the King's Prerogative? It is not enough to bring Inſtances where the King did not preſent, for the King might let the Patron preſent on particular Reaſons; but the true point is, where the Patron challenged the Right upon Promotion, and the Judges gave for the Patron againſt the King. No one Inſtance of this kind is produced, but ſeveral againſt it, ſince the time of Reformation, and thoſe grounded on Precedents before. In Wentworth and Wright's Caſe, 39 Eliz. the Point was ſolemnly debated in the Court of Common Pleas; Wentworth was Patron, Wright Incumbent by the Queen's Title upon Davis's being made Biſhop of St. Aſaph. There it was alledged by the Queen's Council, that it was the common Experience or Practice then for the Queen to preſent upon Promotion, and that they had many Precedents of it, Cr. El. 527. And on the other ſide, the main thing inſiſted upon was the Silence of the old Books; of which an Account is to be given.

Cr. Eliz. 527.

In the Caſe of Armiger and Holland, (Cr. Eliz. 39. f. 542, 601.) the ſame matter was debated. Holland was preſented by the Queen upon the Failing of a Commendam granted to Dr. May, made Biſhop of Carliſle; and then my Lord Coke ſaid to the Judges, I can ſhew you the Reſolution of all the Juſtices, that the Queen in this caſe ſhall preſent. And Chief Juſtice Popham ſaid, So is the common Experience at this Day.

In the Caſe of Baſſet and Gee, (Cr. Eliz. 42, 790.) the Incumbent being made a Biſhop in Ireland, the Judges declared, That in caſe of ſuch an avoidance the Queen ſhould have it by her Prerogative; but if ſhe loſt her Turn ſhe could not have it afterwards.

But it may be objected, That all the Judges have not been ſince of this Opinion: For in the Caſe of Wentworth and Wright, upon another Argument, the Judges were not ſatisfied, as appears by Owen, R. 144. and ſo Juſtice Hutton upon another Caſe in Winch. 95.

It cannot be denied, that theſe Judges did vary in their Opinions; but we muſt conſider that theſe were Doubts rather than Judgments, and no ſuch Doubts ought to be hearken'd to againſt the general Senſe and Opinion of others, even ſince their Time. Rolls confeſſes, That the Law is taken to be for the Prerogative, 2 Abridg. 343. Vaughan, who never followed the common Opinion of Judges againſt his own Reaſon, ſaith, f. 19. That he takes it for granted, that upon an avoidance by Promotion, the King and not the Patron is to preſent.

But the beſt way to anſwer the Doubts on the other ſide, is to examine the Grounds of them; and thoſe are two.

1. The Silence of the Year-Books.
2. The want of ſufficient Reaſon for the Practice.

1. As to the Year-Books; Juſtice Hutton in Winch. 95. ſaith, That for any thing he can ſee in their Books, the King had not any Title to preſent, except that he himſelf was Patron. And it cannot be denied, that there are Caſes in the Books where the King preſented by the Temporalties being in his hands. Fol. 3. Abr. Quare Impedit. n. 35. 4 Inſt. 356. where there is a particular Caſe on which Coke relies much, becauſe it ſeems to come home to the point; for it is there ſaid that when the Temporalties of the Biſhop of Exeter were in the King's hands, and the Archdeaconry of Cornwall became void by the Archdeacon's Promotion to Dublin, the King preſented by virtue of the Temporalties, and not by Prerogative, ſaith Coke; to which purpoſe he cites many Authorities which I ſee no reaſon to queſtion. But on the other ſide, Brook ſaith, Br. Abr. Preſent. n. 61. That 5 Mariæ, the Biſhop of Ely told him, That he had ſeen a Preſentation made by King Ed. III. to a Benefice which was in another's Patronage ratione Prærogativæ ſuæ, becauſe the Benefice was void by the King's making the Incumbent a Biſhop. To this Juſtice Hutton anſwers, That it was but the Report of the Chancellor who had that in Preſentation; which Anſwer will overthrow all Precedents where Parties are concerned. But this is grounded on a miſtake, for the Biſhop of Ely was not Chancellor, but Heath Archbiſhop of York. But if the Extracts out of Noy's MSS. may be believed, in the Margin of Dyer 228. the very ſame Year, 24 E. 3. the King recover'd upon Trial the Preſentation to a Prebend of Exeter, becauſe the Prebendary was made Archbiſhop of Dublin; and on the ſame account that he preſented to a prebend in the Church of Lincoln. How can theſe things conſiſt? It ſeems moſt probable, that the King made uſe of ſeveral ways to juſtify his Title; by Wardſhip, by the Temporalties, and by Prerogative; but this laſt was moſt tenderly inſiſted on, becauſe the Pope about that time did moſt openly begin to take upon him the diſpoſal of Church Preferments by Reſervation, Collation, and Proviſion, againſt all which the Statute of Proviſors was made, 25 E. 3. And among other Pretences the Pope did challenge to himſelf the Right of Promotion; for which end he publiſh'd a ſolemn Bull, Extr. Com.

de Præb. & Dignit. ad Regimen; wherein he reſerved to himſelf the Collation of all Benefices void by promotion to Biſhopricks. This in probability was one great occaſion of the Statute of Proviſors. As to which theſe things are obſervable.

1. That thereby all Collations at Rome, as to Benefices of Eccleſiaſtical Patronage were put into the King's hands, and ſo from time to time, as is expreſſed in the Statute; and the Reaſon given is, becauſe the King is Patron paramount immediate.

2. That although the King had this Power by Law, yet he did not Execute it, but let the Pope make Collations at Rome, as appears by the Year-Books, 41 E. 3. 5. 11 H. 4. where it is ſaid, That the Statute of Proviſors was grown out of uſe; and the Pope's Power is owned by the Judges, and the King gave up the Cauſe at laſt.

3. That the Pope's granting Collations upon promotion were allowed and permitted here till the Statute 25 H. 8. In 11 H. 4. a conſiderable Caſe is put, viz. whether the Pope's granting a Commendam to a Biſhop before Conſecration could ſuperſede the Law of the Land which makes Benefices void which were enjoyed before Conſecration? And it is looked on as the better Opinion of Thirring Chief Juſtice and Hankford by Davis 77. and Vaughan 21. that the Pope's Commendam did prevent the Avoidance being before Conſecration; but if it came after, it could not. And ſo Cardinal Beaufort's Diſpenſation for the Biſhoprick of Wincheſter coming after his being made Cardinal was void; but Cardinal Woolſey's for holding his Archbiſhoprick of York being before was held good. Lynwood ſaith, that in his time no one queſtion'd the Pope's power, of granting Commendams and Diſpenſations, f. 60. and this being ſo generally received here, it paſt for the Eccleſiaſtical Law at that time, till this power was taken from the Pope by Statute, 28 H. 8. c. 16.

Davis R. 77. b. 80.

4. That the Pope's granting Benefices vacant by promotion by himſelf, was looked on as a Preheminence and Privilege belonging to him as owned to be Head of the Church at that time. And the Reaſon the Canoniſts give for it is, that no patron hath a Right to preſent but when the Benefice is void; and in this Caſe of promotion it becomes void not by Death or Reſignation, which the Right of Patronage extends to, but by the Act of a Superior in whoſe power it was to hinder any ſuch vacancy; and the Patron hath the leſs Reaſon to complain, becauſe the Superiour follows and approves his Judgment in the perſon promoted. Beſides, ſay they, how comes a Benefice to be void by Conſecration? Some ſay, it is by Common Law; but Chief Juſtice Vaughan laughs at that, f. 21. 22. and ſaith, that it appears from 11 H. 4. that it was by the Eccleſiaſtical Law; then, ſay they, the Pope may diſpenſe with that in Commendam, and when he makes avoidance by his own Act, he may give away the Benefices ſo vacant. All the injury the Patron can pretend to, is the loſs of his hopes upon the next Avoidance; but ſay they, this is thought no hard thing in like Caſes. In the Civil Law, if a Man had a rich Slave, and expectation of his Eſtate by his Death, yet the Emperor might give him power to diſpoſe of his Eſtate, and the Patron had no cauſe to complain. In the Common Law, if a Man gives an Eſtate for another Man's Life, he can have no reaſon to complain of it, if it be diſpoſed to another while that Perſon lives; but here is ſomething more, for it may be for another's Life; however this is not to be thought hard when the Supreme Patron doth it; who may reaſonably be allowed ſuch a privilege above others. And we are told told by the French Canoniſts, that even in France ſince the pragmatick Sanction, this privilege of the Popes in caſe of promotion obtains there, even as to Lay-patrons.

5. By the Act of Supremacy 26 H. 8. c. 1. all Privileges, Authorities, Profits and Commodities to the ſaid Dignity of the Supreme Head of the Church belonging and appertaining are annexed and united to the Imperial Crown of this Realm. So that the King muſt have the ſame Privileges which the Pope had as Supreme Head, and ſuch in other Caſes are allowed by the Judges at Common Law. As for inſtance; In the Caſe of Royal Diſpenſations as to pluralities, the Judges in Armiger and Holland s Caſe declared their Opinion, that the King had the ſame power which the Pope had before, Mar. 543. And in caſe of Appropriations, the King had the ſame power which the Pope had before by Cuſtom and Uſage, as is declared in Grandon's Caſe, Plowd. 498. and no other Reaſon is given, but that the Pope had accuſtomed ſo to do. But beyond theſe, is the Inſtance in a Commiſſion of Review upon Appeals: For by the Statutes of Appeals, 24 H. 8. and 25 H. 8. the Sentence of the Court of Delegates is ſaid to be definitive, but my Lord Coke ſaith, 4 Inſt. 341. that the King may grant a Commiſſion of Review. For what Reaſon? Becauſe the King by the Statute 26 H. 8. 1. and 1 Eliz. 1. hath all the Authority which the Pope had by virtue of his Headſhip, and the Pope did grant ſuch Commiſſions of Review. This I am ſure is much harder than the preſent Caſe; for here the Act of Parliament makes the Sentence Definitive, which is a legal Reſtraint although not in words; but in the preſent Caſe, here are no Reſtraints, no ſaving the Rights of Patrons in ſuch Caſes; but the ſame Privileges are allowed which the Pope then enjoyed by virtue of his Headſhip; and the Bulls of Confirmation, Commendams and Collation on Promotion, were then looked on as belonging thereto. I do not ſay, as ſome have done, That the Kings have all the powers which the Popes had; for they exerciſed ſome extravagant Powers againſt the Laws of the Land; but I ſay, that in Beneficiary Matters, where there were Privileges then allowed to the Pope as Head of the Church, and no Law before or ſince doth limit or reſtrain them, thence I ſee no reaſon but that the Crown may ſtill enjoy ſuch Privileges; for ſomething certainly was meant by them, beſides the excluding foreign Juriſdiction; which was done before.

Heb. 146, 147.

6. The practice of following times will beſt explain the meaning of theſe Privileges granted to the King as Head of the Church. And we find that in the Caſe of Wentworth and Wright in Owen 144. Williams of Councel for the King produced 8 or 9 Precedents of the King's preſenting upon promotion in the time of H. 8. which were a great many from the Act of Supremacy 26 H. 8. to the end of his Reign. But what did the Judges ſay to them? Why truly, they were between Spiritual Perſons and thoſe were the Pope's Servants, and therefore they regarded them not. This is a very ſtrange Anſwer. For, were all theſe Precedents before the Act of Supremacy? Then they ſhewed that they were not the Pope's Servants if they came in upon the King's Right: If after, how could they be the Pope's Servants in diſowning the Supremacy? But they were between Eccleſiaſtical Perſons. What then? Have not they Rights like other Men? Or is it no matter what becomes of them, ſo others be ſecured? It is a hard caſe, when their peculiar Rights are taken off as the Pope's Servants, that they ſhould not be allowed the ſame common Rights with other Men.

II. Let us now come to the point of Reaſon, and conſider how far that will determine this matter. Which is, whether, ſince the Popes enjoyed this Privilege, and our Kings have been ſo long in poſſeſſion of it, there be now ſufficient Reaſon to lay it aſide? For this is the true Point; for it is granted, that ſince 21 Eliz. the practice hath been ſo; which had been thought a very conſiderable time the other way. Why ſhould ſuch a Prerogative, ſo long owned and ſubmitted to, be now renounced and caſt off as an unreaſonable Uſurpation? Were not others ſenſible of their own Rights and Liberties in all this time? Hath the King no intereſt in any Patronages but his own? Hath he not the Right of Lapſe in all Livings? How comes he by this? Is it not as Supreme Patron by our Law? This is a Term not taken up to ſerve this buſineſs, but is owned by our Judges in Point of Law. In caſe of Lapſe to the King he preſents as Supreme Patron, ſay the Judges in C. 2. 651. and Coke ſaith it hath been often ſo determined. 5 R. E. 3. Dyer in Frenden's Caſe Plowd. 498. f. ſaid the ſame thing; and Harper, and the other Judges, called the King Supreme Patron as King; and not on the Moor 900. Account of the Act of Supremacy; and for this Reaſon the King's Conſent was neceſſary to an Appropriation, becauſe he loſt his Title by Lapſe; and withal it is there ſaid, that every Patron hath his original Right of Patronage by Virtue of the Land which he held of the King, on which the Church was built; which might come to him be Eſcheat. So that the King had not only the ſame Privilege by the Act of Parliament, which the Pope had before, but he had a Superiour and Antecedent Ground as Supreme Patron. But not as if this gave him always the ſame Title by Promotion; but that it makes it more unreaſonable to take it away from the Crown, when it hath been ſo long in Poſſeſſion of it. But the great Objection is, as to the Patron's Right which we ought to be concerned for, being a part of the Liberty of the Subject, which muſt be taken care of as well as the Prerogative of the King. The true Anſwer to this, is, from conſidering the Patron's Right to preſent; which is no doubt a juſt, legal and ancient Right. But it is not an abſolute Right, but liable to ſeveral Limitations. For (1) the Patron is not Lord of the Fee Simple of the Benefice; as Littleton owns S. 643. 1 Inſt. 341. but hath only a Fiduciary Right, or a Truſt put in him to Nominate or Preſent a fit Perſon. (2) This truſt is limited to a certain time, within 6 Months; for then by the Law there is a Lapſe to the Ordinary; if he fails to the Metropolitan; and then if he fails to the King. This is a truſt provided by the Law in Caſe the Patron fails; not in Right of the Patron, as ſome think, but by Devolution and Compact. Hob. 154. (3) The Patron's Right ſtill ſuppoſes a Vacancy; but there is nothing in Law which hinders the King's Act either to prevent an Accidence by a Commendam retinere; or to preſent in an extraordinary Caſe, when he promotes the Incumbent, and makes the Benefice void by his own Act. And a Prerogative by Law is not inconſiſtent with the Liberty of the Subject by Law. For the Law is the moſt equal Meaſure of both.

II. As to the Power of granting a Commendam in the King; we muſt diſtinguiſh between what is really a Commendam; and what is called ſo; but is truly nothing but a Diſpenſation to hold a Benefice with a Biſhoprick for a limited Term. A real Commendam is that which is given for Term of Life, and taken after Conſecration. I do not mean that it was originally ſo; for a Commendam then was only a Temporary Caſe of a Church, till the Patron did proceed; and was nothing but the Guardian-ſhip of a Church during the Vacancy. This was only for the Profit and Convenience of the Churches, without Regard to the Benefit of the Perſon. But afterwards Commendams were granted by the Pope for Term of Life, for the better Support of the Dignity of the Perſon, whoſe Revenues were not ſuitable to his Honour. And this was the chief Reaſon of retaining the uſe of Commendam here, after the Reformation. For many of the old Biſhopricks being reduced very low; and new one erected with ſmall Revenues; it was found neceſſary to grant to the Biſhops a Power to hold other Benefices in Commendam by the King's Grant before Conſecration.

The beſt Light we can have as to the Senſe of our Law in this matter, will be to take a view of the moſt remarkable Caſes, which have been in the Courts of Law, and the Judgments, and Reaſons which have been given upon them: which are of far greater Conſequence than mere Precedents, than were never queſtioned.

The firſt of this kind which we find debated, was a Commendam granted to the Biſhop of Oſſory in Ireland, 33 Eliz. which was to take as many Benefices as ſhould be vacant, not exceeding the Value of 40 perpetuæ Commendæ titulo; ſome Years after a Vicarage became void in his Dioceſe, which he took by virtue of his Commendam; and the Queſtion came into the Common Pleas 9 Jac. whether this were a good Title or not, which was ſolemnly argued by Counſel and the Judges. Thoſe againſt it pleaded, that the Form was too general, and iregular, and that there ought to have been an expreſs Clauſe of Derogation to Davis 74. the Patrons Right; or his Conſent expreſſed. For otherwiſe this were a real Injury to the Patron's Right, which is an evil in it ſelf, and cannot be diſpenſed with. But the main Argument was, that there was a great difference between a Commendam retinere, which ſuppoſes an actual Incumbent according to Law; and ſuch a Commendam as gives a Biſhop Power to take Benefices without a legal Admiſſion. But, as to the former, it is confeſſed that ſeveral Judgments had been given for them in the Courts of Juſtice in England. As of Parkhurſt Biſhop of Norwich in the beginning of Q. Elizabeth's Reign, who obtained a Commendam retinere of the Rectory of Cleve for 3 years; the Point in Law was, whether the Living was void by Creation, or not; i.e. whether ſuch a Commendam were good in Law; and it was reſolved that it was not Dyer 233. void by Creation, but by Reſignation within three Years. Davis 77. Moor 900.

Dr. May had a Beneſice called North-creak above 8 l. and takes ano- Latc. 239. ther of this value, whereby the firſt became void; he was after made Hob. 156. Biſhop of Carliſle, and put the firſt Benefice into his Commendam; but Winch. 99. it was adjudged againſt him; becauſe he was not then legal Incumbent; but if he had been, there had been no Diſpute.

It is allowed by the other ſide, that ſuch kind of Commendams were frequently granted by the Popes, as appears by 41 E. 3. and 11 H. 4. Dav. 80. 6; and in the time of H. 6. and H. 8. and that ſuch Commendams were not within the Statute of Proviſors.

As to the other ſort of Commendams, the main Argument for them was the Poorneſs of Biſhopricks, and the Neceſſity of ſupporting them that way. And it is hard to conceive that theſe ſhould be more unlawful than Vicars, and Appropriations ad Menſam; which are part of the ancient Endowments of ſome Biſhopricks, as Wincheſter and Saliſbury, and there is no great difference between a Commenda perpetua, and an Appropriation; only one is for a ſingle Life, and the other for a Perpetuity.

The next remarkable Caſe was that of Colt and Glover, againſt the Biſhop Moor 898. of Litchfield and Coventry, 10 Jac. 1. who had obtained a Commendam under the broad Seal, for as many Benefices as ſhould not exceed 200 Marks; which Caſe was ſolemnly debated by the Judges in the Exchequer-Chamber; ſome of the Judges were wholly againſt the Commendam, as unlawful; whoſe Reaſons were anſwered by Dodderidge, but he thought that Commendam void, becauſe it was too large Hob. 140. and indefinite. Hobart Chief Juſtice, made an elaborate Argument in this Caſe, which is to be ſeen in his Reports. The ſubſtance of it is, that he meddles not (1) with the King's Supreme Power; but with the ordinary Power by the Statute 25 H. 8. c. 21. nor (2) with a Commendam
150. retinere; which he ſaith is no Commendam; for a Man's own Benefice
153. cannot be commended to him: nor (3) with a Commenda perpetua, which this is not, but ſo long as he lives and continues Biſhop of that See. But he condemns this ſort of Commendam for the uncertainty of it, the Churches being full, and defectiouſneſs as to the Patron's Conſent, and as to the Term of it. For, he allows Commenda perpetua, if it be abſolutely for Term of Life; but he will not allow this Condition ſo long as he continues Biſhop; becauſe the Perpetuity of the Incumbent cannot be diminiſhed; ſo as to take a Benefice for 3 or 4 years, or ſo long as he ſhall remain Biſhop of ſuch a Dioceſs. But the Lord Chief Juſtice Vaugh. 27. Vaughan in the caſe of Edes, and the Biſhop of Oxford ſaith, that the King may grant a Commendam retinere, as long as a Man continues Biſhop there; becauſe no Property is alter'd by a Diſpenſation, but if he takes a Preſentation to a new Living by his Commendam, and doth ſuch things whereby the Property is changed, then he thinks it muſt be for Life. But according to Hobart's Opinion this ſeems ſomewhat ſtrange to me; that a Commendam for Life ſhould be good, that a Commendam for retaining a Benefice for years ſhould be allowed; but a Commendam for Life, or ſo long as the Perſon continues Biſhop of ſuch a Place ſhould be void, where lie the Incongruities and Abſurdities in Law, which cannot be born? It is that there ought to be Vinculum Conjugale, between the Rector and Rectory? Then no Commendam can be good; for the Vinculum lies in the Inſtitution and Induction; and he is not ſeized in Fee in one Caſe more than the other. But the words are ample enough to make a full Incumbent. What? Without committing the Paſtoral Care by Inſtitution? In the Caſe of Appropriations it is allowed to be good Law, that by the words the Grant of the perpetual Incumbency paſſes without Inſtitution. Why then may not a Temporary Commendam be as good in Law, if it paſs by good Authority? Were not ſuch allowed before 25 H. 8? And how comes the King's Power to be ſo abridged?
Hobart doth not deny, but the Pope might grant ſuch by the Canon Law, but from thence he obſerves the Fallibility of Foreign Authors, and Foreign Practice. How doth it appear in this Caſe? Hath our Law any where declared the contrary? No, but it requires Inſtitution and Induction, and theſe muſt be executed according to the Form preſcribed by Law, and cannot be modified. Then, all Appropriations and Commendams for Term of Life muſt be void in Law; and I can ſee no Reaſon why thoſe ſhould be good without Inſtitution, and the other void for the want of it. But the Nature of Freeholds by Law cannot be alter'd by the Popes Authority. Very true, but that is not the Queſtion; but whether the Profits of a Free-hold cannot be aſſigned by legal Authority for a Term of Years? Which is the ſame kind of Proviſion, as in a Commenda perpetua, but only differs in the Expiration of it.

But no ſuch Commenda is to be found in the Books of Law. That's ſtrange, when it is confeſſed, that 11 H. 4. Thinning and Hankford a- Hob. 155. gree, that the Pope may grant to a Biſhop to take Benefices de Novo; which is the Power of granting Commendams; and there is no Limitation, whether for Years, or for Life. And in common Reaſon the former is the better, becauſe it beſt ſerves the Churches Neceſſities in ſmaller Biſhopricks. And Neceſſity is the beſt Ground for any Commendams. But as to Commendams retinere, his Words are full and clear: If an Incumbent takes a Biſhoprick, and obtains a Diſpenſation to hold Hob. 156. his Benefice for 3 Years, he ſaith, there is no Injury done either to the Church or Patron; for altho' it be Damnum it is abſque injuriâ. Which is ſufficient for our preſent purpoſe.

In the Caſe of Hoodly and Manwaring, the Caſe of a Commendam retinere was conſidered by the Judges. For the Incumbent was made Bi- Winch 94. ſhop in Ireland, 37 Eliz. but before Conſecration obtained a Commen- Crook. 2. 691. dam of his former Benefice for 6 Years; this Caſe was argued by the Judges, 22 Jac. I. ſaith Crook. But in this Caſe the Judges differed. Hutton ſaid, that he would not deliver his Opinion about the King's Prerogative, but gives Intimations enough againſt it; and withal ſaith, that if the King had it, he thought his Turn ſerved by that Commendam, becauſe he thought the Limitation for Years void, and that he had a Title for Life. Winch aſſerted the Prerogative, and produced Prece- Winch 95. dents for it, where the King had preſented in England, upon his making a Biſhop in Ireland. Hobart concurred as to the Prerogative: But it is obſervable as to Juſtice Hutton, that although he queſtioned the King's Title to preſent upon Creation; yet he doth not deny that the King may diſpenſe before Conſecration, but he can never have a Title after he hath diſpenſed. For this he ſaith is diſpenſing with his Prerogative; becauſe the Commendam according to him muſt be for Life, becauſe he that hath it is free Incumbent: And for this he alledgeth Winch 96 Parkhurſt's Caſe; which, ſaith he, proves that the King may diſpenſe, and that the Commendatory hath full Power to reſign; and withal, that the King's Turn is ſatisfied with the Diſpenſation. This comes home to the Caſe, if it will hold. But I am not ſatisfied as to the main point, viz. That a Diſpenſation for Years is all one with a Commendam for Life. Hobart we ſee was quite of another Opinion; and the Reaſon of the Miſtake was not diſtinguiſhing the Right of Incumbency before his Creation, and after by virtue of the Commendam. For Hutton grants Winch 95. that when an Incumbent is made Biſhop, his Benefice is void by Common Law, then the firſt Title is gone, and all his Right after is only by his Commendam; but by that he hath a Right only for a Term of Years. But as his Opinion is delivered by Cr. Jac. 692. he thought any ſuch Limitation void in it ſelf, and that he had a permanent Eſtate for Life. Which Opinion muſt overthrow all ſuch Diſpenſations which himſelf allows; for an Incumbency for Life muſt by our Law be by Inſtitution and Induction; and that can ſignify nothing here, becauſe the Benefice is good by Creation. The main Difficulty is as to ſeparating the Profits and the Cure which the Law ſuppoſes to go ſtill together, and ſo they ought to do in all common and ordinary Caſes; but the Queſtion is, Whether the Supreme Power may not diſpenſe with Reſidence for a Publick

Good. For which we are to conſider, (1.) That Church Revenues were at firſt in common, and the Biſhop had his ſhare out of the common Stock, and he allotted to the Presbyters as he ſaw convenient. (2.) The Settlement of Parochial Duties was not done by any Law at firſt, but according to the Diſcretion and Judgment of the Biſhops. For when the Tythes were firſt granted, it was here by the Laws of the ſeveral Kingdoms in the Heptarchy, without any formal Diviſion of Pariſhes, which was a Work of Time and Diſcretion. (3.) The Biſhopricks being ſufficiently endowed in thoſe times, the Biſhops did then part with their ſhares in the other Revenues of the Church, and left Moor 905. them to the Parochial Clergy. (4.) Where Biſhopricks are mean and inſufficient, it is no unreaſonable thing to make a Proviſion for them, out of vacant Places in their Dioceſſes, or to continue their former Benefices for that End. (5.) The King hath by the Law a Power to diſpenſe in ſuch a Caſe, even before the Acts of Supremacy. Which Ho-

Jones 160. 7. 12. (6.) If the King hath a Prerogative by Promotion, that is not ſerved by ſuch a Diſpenſation. For the Power of diſpenſing is not by the Right of Promotion, being inherent in the Crown; and therefore what accrues by Promotion, muſt be ſubſequent to it. Juſtice Hutton went upon that Ground, that every Commendam was for Life however expreſſed; but Hobart ſo well ſaw the Diſtinction between them, that he looked on a Commendam retinere, but as a Diſpenſation in Law.

All the Difficulty lies in a Commendam for Life, whether that be not inſtead of the King's Turn to preſent. But here we muſt diſtinguiſh between the preventing an Avoidance, and the filling it up. In the Commendam retinere, there is only an Avoidance prevented by the King's Diſpenſation: But in a Commendam to take a vacant Benefice, there is an actual Avoidance, and the Place is to be filled with an Incumbent, which makes the Caſe much harder; for the Patron loſes a Turn upon Vaugh. 27. an actual Vacancy; but in the other Caſe, as Vaughan well ſaith, a Diſpenſation gives no Property, nor takes away any: But if a Man hath a Diſpenſation to hold his Benefice for three Years, when that time is expired,
25. the Benefice voids, as it would have done at the firſt, if there had been no Diſpenſation.

Latch. 31. The laſt Caſe I ſhall mention is that of Evans and Ayſcough; which Jones 158. aroſe upon Thornbergh, Dean of York, being made a Biſhop in Ireland, 36 Eliz. upon which he obtained a Commendam retinere for his Deanry: Some Years after he was removed to Briſtol, 1 Jac. and then gets another Commendam for the ſame Deanry. The point in Queſtion was, Latc. 250. Whether a Commendatory Dean could confirm a Leaſe or not? And Noy 94. after a ſolemn Debate, and ſeveral Arguments, the Judges agreed that the Commendam was good as to the Deanry, and not meerly as to the Profits; becauſe the King had the Power by Law to diſpenſe with holding it together with his Biſhoprick. And Montague Ch. Juſtice ſaid in Moor 304. the former Caſe, that all the Judges were agreed that the King had 111. Power to grant a Commendam.

As to the Act of Parliament, in this Caſe I can ſee no Difficulty therein; for the Intention of it was not to found a Donation, but to continue the former Incumbent in his own Right, but as it was made a new Pariſh; and ſo it is but a kind of Commendam retinere by Act of Parliament. But it is unreaſonable to ſuppoſe that an Act of Parliament, which only deſigns to ſettle the Ordinary Turns of preſenting ſhould exclude the King's Right upon promotion. For whether the Pariſh be new or old ſignifies nothing in this Caſe; for the King's Right doth not ariſe from preſcription on particular Pariſhes, but from a general Reaſon which takes hold of every new Pariſh as well as old: For as ſoon as it becomes a Pariſh it is liable to all the common Incidents of parochial Churches. Of which this Right of preſenting upon promotion is one.

There are two Objections remain ſtill to be anſwered,

1. That if this Prerogative be allowed, it will hold toties quoties, and ſo the Patron will loſe his Right without his Fault. To this may be anſwered, that a poſſible Inconvenience in particular Caſes, which rarely happens, doth not take away a General Right. The Queſtion is, whether the King hath ſuch a Right or not; it is not, what will follow upon it; but whether it be ſo, or not. There are many things allowed in Law, which are never to be brought in Queſtion for Inconveniencies that may poſſibly happen. But all the Inconvenience in this Caſe is only poſſible, and not certain; and poſſible only as to Turns, and not as to the Right it ſelf.

Vaugh. 26.

2. That St. James's Church is a Donative by Act of Parliament, and ſo not ſubject to the Prerogative. But this proceeds upon a Miſtake, as though a Benefice ſubject to Inſtitution, and Induction, could be made a Donative; whereas the very Inſtitution and Induction, takes away the Nature of a Donative; as Coke and others poſitively affirm. Now in this Caſe the Right of Advowſon goes along with the Act, and by it the Patrons are inveſted with a Right to preſent; how is this conſiſtent with a Donative? If there be a Right of Preſentation, and the Incumbent be liable to Inſtitution and Induction, and the Living to a Lapſe, it is impoſſible that it ſhould be a Donative created by Act of Parliament. But if it be made a Benefice like others, as appears by the Act, for what Reaſon ſhould it not be liable to the ſame Rights of promotion that others are?

1 Inſt. 344.
Cr. 2. 63.

But the King conſented to the Act. What then? He gave his Conſent to make it a new Pariſh; and to ſettle the Rights of Advowſon; but he did not as to the taking away any Right belonging to himſelf in Right of his Crown; and therefore cannot be excluded from it by this Act.

Profits; becauſe the King had the Power by Law to diſpenſe with holding it together with his Biſhoprick. And Montague Ch. Juſtice ſaid in Moor 304. the former Caſe, that all the Judges were agreed that the King had 111. Power to grant a Commendam.

As to the Act of Parliament, in this Caſe I can ſee no Difficulty therein; for the Intention of it was not to found a Donation, but to continue the former Incumbent in his own Right, but as it was made a new

new Pariſh; and ſo it is but a kind of Commendam retinere by Act of Parliament. But it is unreaſonable to ſuppoſe that an Act of Parliament, which only deſigns to ſettle the Ordinary Turns of preſenting ſhould exclude the King's Right upon promotion. For whether the Pariſh be new or old ſignifies nothing in this Caſe; for the King's Right doth not ariſe from preſcription on particular Pariſhes, but from a general Reaſon which takes hold of every new Pariſh as well as old: For as ſoon as it becomes a Pariſh it is liable to all the common Incidents of parochial Churches. Of which this Right of preſenting upon promotion is one.

There are two Objections remain ſtill to be anſwered,

1. That if this Prerogative be allowed, it will hold toties quoties, and ſo the Patron will loſe his Right without his Fault. To this may be anſwered, that a poſſible Inconvenience in particular Caſes, which rarely happens, doth not take away a General Right. The Queſtion is, whether the King hath ſuch a Right or not; it is not, what will follow upon it; but whether it be ſo, or not. There are many things allowed in Law, which are never to be brought in Queſtion for Inconveniencies that may poſſibly happen. But all the Inconvenience in this Caſe is only poſſible, and not certain; and poſſible only as to Turns, and not as to the Right it ſelf. Vaugh. 26.

2. That St. James's Church is a Donative by Act of Parliament, and ſo not ſubject to the Prerogative. But this proceeds upon a Miſtake, as though a Benefice ſubject to Inſtitution, and Induction, could be made a Donative; whereas the very Inſtitution and Induction, takes away the Nature of a Donative; as Coke and others poſitively affirm. Now in this Caſe the Right of Advowſon goes along with the Act, and by it the Patrons are inveſted with a Right to preſent; how is this conſiſtent with a Donative? If there be a Right of Preſentation, and the Incumbent be liable to Inſtitution and Induction, and the Living to a Lapſe, it is impoſſible that it ſhould be a Donative created by Act of Parliament. But if it be made a Benefice like others, as appears by the Act, for what Reaſon ſhould it not be liable to the ſame Rights of promotion that others are? 1 Inſt. 344. Cr. 2. 63.

But the King conſented to the Act. What then? He gave his Conſent to make it a new Pariſh; and to ſettle the Rights of Advowſon; but he did not as to the taking away any Right belonging to himſelf in Right of his Crown; and therefore cannot be excluded from it by this Act.

A DISCOURSE of the True ANTIQUITY of LONDON, and its State in the Roman Times.

Tacit. Annal. 14. c. 33.

Londinium perrexit cognomento quidem Coloniæ non inſigne, ſed Copia Negotiatorum & Commeatuum maxime celebre, Ammian. Marcell. l. 27. c. 8. Londonium vetus Oppidum &c. Si quos imbellis Sexus, aut feſſa ætas, vel Loci Dulcedo detinuerat, ab hoſte oppreſſi ſunt.

§. 1. THE firſt mention we find of London is in Tacitus, where he ſpeaks of Suetonius Paulinus returning from the Aſſaults of Mona, (i. e. Angleſey) upon the Revolt of the Britains, and making his way thither, through the midſt of his Enemies. On which Occaſion he takes notice, That London had not the Honour of being called a Roman Colony, but yet it was even then famous for its Number of Merchants, and all ſorts of Accommodations. He doth not celebrate it for its Antiquity, as Ammianus Marcellinus doth long after; but for its great Conveniency for Trading, and the Pleaſantneſs of its Situation. For immediately after, giving an Account, how Suetonius was forced to forſake the place, for want of ſufficient Number of Soldiers to defend it, he adds, That he took away as many of the Inhabitants as would remove into the Charge of his Army; but thoſe whom either Weakneſs or Age, or the Sweetneſs of the Place kept behind, were deſtroyed by the Enemy. This Enemy was the Britiſh Army under the Command of Boadicea, the Relict of Praſutagus King of the Iceni; who being very ill uſed by the Romans, to whoſe Protection their dying King had left them, took up Arms under the Conduct of Boadicea; and ſoon drew in the Trinobantes to join with them. For, now they diſcerned, that the Roman's Deſign was to reduce them to Slavery, under the pretence of making them a Roman Province; and to this end they had lately ſettled a Colony of Veterans at Camalodunum, where they drove out the Britains, and took poſſeſſion of their Houſes, and Lands, and erected a Temple to Claudius, and ſet up the Image of Victory, and made ſuch Prieſts, as might exhauſt the Britains under a ſhew of Religion. Theſe things, together with the inſolent Behaviour of the Veterans, and the Roman Soldiers towards the Inhdbitants, ſo highly provoked them, that they reſolved to ſell their Liberties at a dearer rate than the Roman Governours imagined. And ſo taking Advantage of the Abſence of the Roman Army, and the Security of the New Colony, the Britains in great Multitudes fell upon it, and burnt down the greateſt part of it; only the Temple eſcaped, whither the Soldiers fled, which after two days Siege was taken. Then they marched againſt Petilius Cerealis, and beat the 9th Legion; killing the Foot, and making the Horſemen fly to their Camp; the noiſe of which Overthrow had a very different Effect on two Roman Officers: For, it made Decianus Catus, the Procurator, haſten into Gaul, and Suetonius Paulinus to return with all poſſible ſpeed to London. Being come thither with great Difficulty, he debated with himſelf, whether he ſhould make London the Seat of the War, or not. But upon conſideration, he found his Forces not great enough to defend it; and therefore giving notice to as many to depart as had a mind to it, he abandoned the City, chooſing rather to ſacrifice that, than to hazard all. And ſo London fell under the ſevere uſage of the inraged Britains: For as many as were left were deſtroyed. The ſame Diſaſter befell the Roman Municipium at Verulam; for the Britains in that that Heat, did not ſtay to beſiege Caſtles and Fortifications, but ran thither, where the greateſt Prey was; not ſparing the Lives of any who came under their Power, who were ſo many, that Tacitus reckons ſeventy thouſand Citizens and Confederates who were killed in theſe Places. But Dio ſaith, that in this Inſurrection the Britains deſtroyed two Cities, and 80000 Men. And by comparing Dio and Tacitus together, it appears that London was one of theſe Cities, and very well inhabited then; which was above 1622 Years ago. From hence we may reaſonably conclude, that London was at that time a Roman City; and inhabited either by Citizens of Rome, or ſuch as were confederated with them. But it was of a different Nature from the Roman Colony at Camalodunum; or the Municipium at Verulam; and yet no Præfecture, as Mr. Camden ſuppoſes. For that was a State of hardſhip and ſervitude, the People having no Laws, or Magiſtrates of their own; to which ſeveral Cities in Italy were reduced for their Falſeneſs, or Ingratitude to the Roman State, as Sigonius hath truly obſerved; but I ſee no ground to ſuſpect, that London was treated otherwiſe than with great Kindneſs by the Romans; all the Hardſhip it then ſuffered, being from the Britains.

But becauſe this may look like a ſtrange Paradox to thoſe, who from our common Hiſtorians believe London to have been an ancient Britiſh City, long before Cæſar's coming, I ſhall therefore endeavour to clear this Matter, by an Enquiry,

(1.) Into the true Original of London.
(2.) Into its State and Condition during the Roman Government.

And when I have diſpatched theſe two I ſhall conſider,

(3.) Whether there were any Temple of Diana ſtanding in that part of the City, where the Foundations of St. Paul's Cathedral are laid.

This is the Method which I intend to purſue in the following Diſcourſe.

I begin with the Original of the City of London; which I deſign to prove to have been firſt built by the Romans, and that by ſhewing,

(1.) That there was no ſuch City when the Romans came firſt to conquer Britain.
(2.) That the other Britiſh Cities mentioned by the Britiſh Hiſtorians, were no elder than the Romans ſettling here; and therefore it is not probable that London alone ſhould be of greater Antiquity.

(1.) To prove that there was no ſuch City, when the Romans came to conquer Britain: I need no more than to ſhew, that there is not the leaſt mention of it, in the Expedition of Cæſar or Claudius, and yet it was impoſſible to have avoided it, if there had been ſuch a City then. When Cæſar came over into Britain, he ſaith, he deſigned to underſtand as much as he could concerning it; and then he was certainly able to give an Account of the Cities and Towns here. And both theſe are mentioned by him: In one place he ſpeaks of the ſeveral Cities ties of Britain, which ſent their Embaſſadours, and offered Hoſtages to him; and in another, that at his going away the Princes met, and commended themſelves, and their Cities to his Protection; again he mentions, the Maritime Cities of Britain; the Cities Claſſivelaun had war with; and the ſtrong City of the Trinobantes: So that one would think Britain had rather more Cities, than Geoffrey of Monmouth gives it. But all this ariſes from want of conſidering the Propriety of Cæſar's Expreſſions; for he doth not take a City for a Place, but for a People, united under one Government, having Laws and Privileges peculiar to themſelves. And I do not remember one Paſſage in Cæſar, where he uſeth civitas in another Senſe. But if a People ſo united had other leſſer Diviſions; thoſe were called Pagi by him; ſo he ſaith, the City of the Helvetians was divided into 4 Pagi, i. e. ſo many Cantons, and ſo the Pagus Tigurinus is ſaid by him to be a part of the City of the Helvetians. Thence Joſeph Scaliger obſerves the French word Pais to be taken: And thence the Germans uſe Paguus for the ſame, which we mean by a County. So Ammianus Marcellinus ſpeaks of the Pagi Alamannorum, which among the Germans, ſaith Freherus were generally divided by Rivers; for by them as Tacitus takes notice, the old Germans were wont to ſeat themſelves not in any Cities; for, ſaith he, they would not bear any Houſes being joined together; but they had ſeparate Habitations near the Head of a River, a Wood, and a Plain. Meibomius and others, after Feſtus, derive the Name Pagi from the Dorick, παγὰ a Fountain; and ſo thoſe who drank together of the ſame Fountain were Pagani; which Name at laſt remain'd to thoſe who worſhiped the Fountains; and ſo came to be applied to the Heathens; which is ſo called from the German Heiden, which ſignifies a Heathy Ground, where they worſhipped the Trees; theſe two being the laſt Monuments of Heathen Idolatry in theſe parts of the World. The Pagi among the old Saxons were called Schyres, ſaith the ſame Meibomius; for which Lindenbrogius quotes the old Saxon MSS. Gloſſaries; and theſe Pagi as Bignonius obſerves, had generally the Comites preſiding over them; whoſe reſidence was, ſaith Freherus, in Burgo: i. e. in a fortified Place; for ſo in Cyril's Gloſſary πύργος is rendred Burgos; and here was the publick Hall, or Meeting for Juſtice. Which in time was the Original of many Cities, when Perſons thought it moſt convenient to live near the Place of Buſineſs and Government, promiſing themſelves greater Security and Protection, under the Eye of the Magiſtrate. And moſt of the Cities of Europe have riſen one from of theſe 3 Cauſes either from Roman Colonies, as the moſt conſiderable Cities in Gaul and Spain have come from them; when Auguſtus as Dio ſaith, ſent ſo many Colonies thither; or from Merchandice; when Perſons for the Conveniency of Trading, found it neceſſary to live together upon ſome great River, or near the Sea; which was the Riſe of thoſe Cities called Emporia, or Trading Colonies; or laſtly, for Security, when they found themſelves expoſed to ſo many Hazards in their ſcattered and diſperſed Habitations, and therefore thought fit to live together under Laws and Government. Such a fortified Place among the Britains, Cæſar calls by the Name of Opidum, or Oppidum; which according to Varro and Feſtus had its Name from the mutual help Men gave to one another and the works made for its Defence. Such an Opidum Cæſar ſaith Caſſivelaun's was: viz. a large Compaſs of Ground with Cattel and Hutts in it, and ſurrounded with Woods and Boggs, or fenced with a Mound and a Ditch. This Caſſivelaun, velaun, whom Dio calls Suellan, leaving out the firſt part of his Name, and ſaith, he was the greateſt of the Princes of Britain, and was at that time King of the Trinobantes, after his deſtroying Immanuentius; and the Thames was the Boundary of his Kingdom, as Cæſar tells us. If therefore there was then ſuch a City, as London is deſcribed by Geoffery, how came Caſſivelaun not to retreat thither when he was purſued by Cæſar? For, if Geoffrey ſays true, Lud repaired the Walls of London, and compaſſed it about with innumerable Towers; and commanded the Citizens to build their Houſes in ſuch a Manner, as there was not a fairer City in many Countries, and it was from him called Caerlud, and by Corruption of the word Caerlondon, (but in Nennius and Huntingdon, it is Cair Lundein.) A late learned Man conjectures that this was called by Cæſar Trinobantes, becauſe the Name of London was not yet received, there being a Quarrel between Lud and Nennius about the Change of the Name; or Lud being Brother to Caſſivelaun, he would not make uſe of it. I confeſs, if thoſe ancient MSS. of this Nennius, or of Gildas Cambrius about this diſpute could be once brought to light, (although Boſton of Bury and Leland, never had the Fortune to hear of them) there might be ſome hopes to obtain greater Satisfaction about theſe remote Antiquities of London; but as things are, I cannot be convinced that Cæſar could be ſo wonderfully miſtaken about Caſſivelaun's Town, as not to diſtinguiſh between a Wood and a City; and between Boggs and Towers. The truth is, Geoffrey's Relation and Cæſar's can never ſtand together; not only as to London, but as to his whole Expedition: For he not only makes Caſſivelaun to beat Cæſar out of Britain the firſt time, but the ſecond alſo. For, ſaith he, upon the firſt notice of his ſecond coming, he fortified his Cities, and repaired the Walls, and placed Souldiers in the Ports, and put Iron Stakes in the Thames, (not to hinder his Paſſage over, as Cæſar ſaith) but his coming up the Thames to Ternovant, (ſo he calls London) which did ſuch miſchief to his Ships that he was forced to land his Men; and there was ſo over-powred by Caſſivelaun, that he fled to his Ships, and returned to the Coaſt of the Morini. Upon this, Caſſivelaun appoints a ſolemn day of Triumph in the City of Ternovant with his Nobles; where a quarrel happened between Androgeus Son to Lud and Caſſivelaun; which proceeded ſo high that the former invited Cæſar over again, and ſent his Son as a Hoſtage to him, and the other laid Siege to Ternovant; then Cæſar came, and by the help of Androgeus had the better of Caſſivelaun, who by his means was reconciled to Cæſar, and ſo Britain was brought under Tribute to the Romans. This is the ſhort of Geoffrey's Account of theſe Matters. Here we find Cæſar attempting to ſurprize London, and Caſſivelaun's Triumph in it, and that he afterwards beſieged it, but upon Cæſar's landing, marched off to meet him. And it is reaſonable to ſuppoſe, if London were ſo great a City then, that the great Scene of War and Peace muſt be acted there. But how then comes it to paſs, that Cæſar himſelf takes not the leaſt notice of any ſuch City? He tells us, he came up to the Thames, croſſed over it with his Army, purſued Caſſivelaun to his Faſtneſs, which he called a Town, beat him out of it, brings him to Submiſſion, charges him not to meddle with Mandrabatius, or the Trinobantes, takes Hoſtages, and ſo leaves Britain. How could all theſe things happen ſo near the Thames, and when Caſſivelaun was forced to retreat, and yet no mention at all of ſuch a ſtrong City ſo near at hand as Lud had made London? Suppoſe Caſſivelaun purpoſely withdrew to prevent the Spoil of ſo fine a City; yet how came Cæſar not to viſit it in his Return, nor once to ſpeak of it, to heighten the Glory of his Enterprize? For he was concerned in point of Reputation to make as much of it as he could; ſince ſome of the great Men at Rome wonder'd at his Deſign in going over into Britain, and hazarding the Roman Legions upon ſo ſlender a Pretence; as the Suſpicion that ſome Britains aſſiſted the Gauls. What could more vindicate his Honour in it, than to let the Romans underſtand how many Cities there were in Britain, and above all the reſt, one that did outvy moſt other Cities in the World; which had been newly fortified and adorned with many beautiful Towers but a little before his going for Britain? They who conſider how punctual Cæſar is in giving Account of all the conſiderable Places he met with in Gaul, their Camps, Fortifications, and ſuch Cities as they had, cannot imagine that he ſhould wholly leave out ſuch a City as London, if it had been then in being? So that Cæſar's Silence ſignifies far more in his Circumſtances againſt London at that time, than all the Teſtimonies yet produced can do for it. But this is not mere ſilence in Cæſar; for he tells us, what kind of Towns the Britains then had, viz. nothing but ſome Fortifications by Woods, and Boggs, and Ditches, wherein they endeavoured to ſecure themſelves in Caſe of War; but at other times they had ſcattered Houſes like the Germans and Gauls; and as Iſ. Caſaubon obſerves from Cæſar, the Houſes of the Gauls were then nothing but thatched Cottages. And Diodorus Siculus ſaith, the Habitations of the Britains conſiſted of Reeds and Sticks put together. Strabo gives an elegant Deſcription of the Cities of the Britains, when he ſaith, they incloſed a large Piece of Ground with the Bodies of Trees, and therein they ſet up their Cottages and Stables for their Cattle, which were intended for no long Continuance. For as Herodian ſaith of the Germans, their Habitations were ſo mean, becauſe they did not underſtand the way of building by Stone or Brick: Which the Romans inſtructed theſe parts of the World in, and ſo became the great Inſtruments of building Cities and Temples. And Tacitus in the Life of Agricola takes notice, that whereas the Britains lived rude and diſperſed, he inſtructed and aſſiſted them in building Temples and Houſes, and Forums, or Places of Publick Reſort. But what need all this Care, if the Britains had ſo many Cities, and ſo well built, before ever the Romans ſet foot in Britain? And if that be true, not only Cæſar, but all the other Roman Hiſtorians carried on the ſame uniform Deſign to make Poſterity believe the Old Britains lived rude and diſperſed, as other Neighbouring Nations did, whereas in truth they had 28 famous Cities, and London in the Head of them; which in thoſe times was called Troynovaunt; the place being choſen out by Brutus as the fitteſt to build New Troy in, becauſe of its admirable Situation.

The next conſiderable Expedition into Britain was that of Claudius. For, after Cæſar's Attempt rather than Conqueſt, (having gone no farther than thoſe he calls The Maritime Cities, which were peopled from Gaul, among whom Comius King of the Atrebates had ſo great ſway) the following Emperours would not concern themſelves about the Affairs of Britain. Auguſtus, as Dio tells us, once gave out at Rome, that he intended an Expedition into Britain, and great preparation was made for it, but being come into Gaul, Embaſſadors went from the Britains to him, who accepted their Terms of Submiſſion, his chief deſign being to ſettle the Provinces of Gaul and Spain. And afterwards Strabo ſaith, That there was a fair Correſpondency in his time, between the Kings of Britain and Auguſtus; they courting his Favour by Preſents which they ſent to the Capitol. It is certain, there was no Roman Garriſon here, and Strabo gives two reaſons for it; one is, That it would hardly quit coſt; for at the leaſt, there muſt be a whole Legion beſides Horſe, which would more than eat out the Profit that came by it; another is, That it would but provoke and exaſperate the Britains more: And therefore the Romans accepted a very eaſie Tribute from them; ſuch as lay in thoſe ſmall Commodities of Ivory and Amber, and ſuch like, which they ſent over into Gaul.

It ſeems that when Auguſtus ſet Bounds to the Roman Empire, Britain was left out of it; and therefore little notice was taken of it in the Reign of Tiberius, who as Tacitus obſerves, followed Auguſtus his Judgment therein, and made it a Rule to himſelf. But in the time of Caligula, Adminius Son of Cunobelin, being driven out by his Father made Application to him, who thereupon undertook his ridiculous Expedition, remarkable for nothing but the famous Watch Tower, which he built on the Shore: Which ſome Learned Men take to be the Arx Britannica formerly ſtanding on the Banks of the Rhine. Others, the Tower on the Port of Bolein, which Bucherius ſaith, he examined with great care, and found it to be a Roman Work; and he thinks it the moſt noble Monument of Roman Antiquity on this ſide the Alps. Malbranch ſaith, The French call it Tour d'Ordre; which by the middle Age Writers was called Odrans, and before that Ordans, which he ſuppoſes to be taken from Turris ardens, becauſe it was a Pharus, or Watch-Tower for thoſe who ſailed upon thoſe Coaſts.

But Claudius began the moſt memorable Expedition into Britain in his 4th Year, as Oroſius computes it, which gave a mighty turn to the Affairs of Britain. It happen'd that Claudius was very ambitious of a Triumph, but wanted a good Occaſion for it; and there being then in Rome one Beticus, as Dio relates it, who was a Britain, and baniſhed for Sedition, he perſwades Claudius to undertake the Conqueſt of Britain; the Britains being then tumultuous, becauſe the Romans did not ſend back their Fugitives, ſuch as Beticus himſelf was. Claudius not a little glad of the Opportunity, ſends away A. Plautius, then Pretor, with a good Army into Gaul; and not without great difficulty he perſwades his Army to venture into Britain; where Cæſar had much adoe to maintain his Reputation, and returned, as Dio ſaith, with the Glory of having made an Expedition into Britain, having rather frighted the Britains than ſubdued them, as both Dio and Tacitus inſinuate; however, the Romans in great civility, decreed him a Supplication of 29 Days, for the Honour rather of a Diſcoverer than of a Conqueror. The Britains hearing of the Diſorders in the Roman Army, thought themſelves ſecure; and therefore when A. Plautius landed with his Forces, being not in a condition to reſiſt them, they thought it Wiſdom to retire into their Woods and Boggs, hoping by that means to tire them out, as, ſaith Dio, they had done Julius Cæſar.

The State of the Britains, as he tells us, then was Monarchical, but under divers Kings; who had ſuch ſmall Principalities, that Cæſar himſelf ſaith, there were Four in Kent alone, Cingetorix, Carnilius, Taximagalus, and Segonax; but all theſe at that time were in ſubjection to Caſſivelaun, who commanded in chief for that War; and ſent his Orders to them, which they readily obeyed. But at this time, they had Tacit. Vit. Agric. not conſulted or could not agree upon a Supreme; which, as Tacitus obſerves, proved at laſt the Ruin of the Britains, not being united under one common Head; for while each fought for himſelf, they were Strab. l. 4. all deſtroyed. Strabo ſaith, the Britains lived under ſeveral Dynaſties; Diod. l. 4. and Diodorus Siculus to the ſame purpoſe, that they had many Kings Mela. l. 3. c. 6. and Lords among them; and ſo likewiſe Pomponius Mela; but theſe two differ very much in the Conſequences of this Government: For Diodorus ſaith, they generally lived peaceably together; and the other juſt Jornand. de rebus Get. c. 2. contrary, with whom Jornandes agrees; and which is more, Tacitus confirms it; who adds, that it was a rare thing for them to unite their Councils or Forces; all little Governments being weak and diſtruſtful; and although unable to defend themſelves, yet had rather periſh than yield to an Equal.

This was too much the Caſe of the Britains, upon the Invaſion of the Roman Army; all their buſineſs was, not to unite together to make Head againſt a common Enemy, but to ſhift for themſelves, by which means they were conquered almoſt as ſoon as diſcovered; as appeared by the flying of Caratacus and Togodumnus, Sons of Cunobelin; and after the Battle with C. Sidius Geta, Dio ſaith, the Britains made as faſt as they could towards the Mouth of the Thames, where they ſecured themſelves in the Marſhes for a time, till at laſt the Romans found a way to them, and made great ſlaughter among them, not without a conſiderable loſs to themſelves. But the Britains being now made deſperate, were ſo far from being diſcouraged by the Death of Togodumnus that they were reſolved to revenge his Death, and to make a ſtanding War of it. And now, according to his Inſtructions, A. Plautius ſends word to Claudius of the preſent State of his Affairs here, and that it would be a ſeaſonable time for him to appear in the Head of his Army. Who immediately diſpatches all things in order to a ſolemn Expedition, and coming into Britain finds the Roman Army waiting for him, on the ſide of the Thames, and the Britains on the other ſide; and then, ſaith Dio, croſſing the Thames he fought the Britains and overcame them, and then took in Camalodunum the Royal Seat of Cunobelin. Suetonius very ſpitefully, will not allow one Blow to be given, nor a drop of Blood to be ſhed while Claudius was here; but he grants he made a magnificent Triumph upon the Victory over the Britains. Whether the Battle was fought before or after Claudius's coming is not material to my Buſineſs; but I ſee no reaſon to miſtruſt Dio, who is ſo particular in his Relation, and had ſeen what Suetonius had ſaid. But that which I obſerve is, That all this while, when the Seat of the War was about the Thames, there is not the leaſt intimation given of ſuch a City as London; which could not have been avoided, if it had been then built. For why ſhould not the Britains have retreated thither; and the Romans have laid Siege to it? Why, after the Battle ſhould not that much rather have been mentioned than Camalodunum as the Royal Seat of Cunobelin. And ſince Vanity and Oſtentation led Claudius hither, why ſhould we imagine the Name of the greateſt City in Britain ſhould be concealed? What an Addition had this been to the Pomp of his Triumph, to have had the Rrepreſentation of ſo famous a City as London is Strab. l. 3. ſaid to have been at that time? For ſo Strabo ſaith, The Cuſtom was in Triumphal Pomps to ſet forth in glorious Scenes the Places they had ſubdued. And beſides, there is not the leaſt mention of it in the following Proſecution tion of this War under the Roman Lieutenants, although Veſpaſian fought, as Suetonius confeſſeth, thirty Battles with the Britains, took 20 of their Towns (or fortified Places) and ſubdued two whole Nations and the Iſle of Wight.

Suet. in Veſpaſ. c. 4.

The only conſiderable Objection againſt the former Diſcourſe is from a certain Coin mentioned by Camden, among thoſe of Claudius relating to Britain; wherein on one ſide is nothing legible but Britannicus, in great Letters; and on the other, Metropolis Etyminii Regis, as he reads it; and then there are two Syllables on the Reverſe, ΒΑ ΛΟ. in that of Octavius Strada, which ſome have ingeniouſly conjectured to ſtand in the Greek for ΒΑΣΙΛ. ΛΟΝΔ. and ſo to be a plain Evidence that London was then a Metropolis, and this Etyminius King of it. But there are ſeveral things which keep me from being ſo tranſported with this Conjecture, as the Authors I mention are. For (1.) The reading of the Reverſe is very uncertain. Camden's Coin had not ſo much as that of Octavius Strada; and thoſe Readings produced by Occo, Ortelius, Triſtan and Spanhemius are very different. Triſtan refers it to ΕΠΙΝΙΟΝ ΒΑΛΟΙΩΝ, Epineium being a Maritime City of Macedonia; but ſaith Spanhemius, he hath joined two mean Cities of Macedonia to make one Metropolis. But that Learned and Judicious Antiquary obſerving other Letters in Strada's Coin, which are not in Camden's, ΚΟ being put before ΜΗΤΡΟΠΟΛΕΩΣ, and the following Words being ΕΠΙ ΜΙΝΔΙΟΥ ΒΑΛΟ, he conceives it to relate to the Metropolis of Corinth, and to one Mindius, then Proconſul of Achaia under Claudius. But becauſe Occo's Coin hath Ν before ΚΟ he therefore thinks it may as well relate to the Metropolis of Nicomedia, this Mindius being likewiſe Proconſul of Bithynia. But however this be, we ſee what a very uncertain Foundation this Coin affords to build the Metropolis of London upon. Eſpecially (2.) When the whole Series of the Roman Hiſtory at that time, with reſpect to the Affairs of Britain, have no ground for ſuch a Conjecture. For, why ſhould not Dio have mentioned this Etyminius being placed by Claudius in the Metropolis of London, as well as his taking Camalodunum for the Royal Seat of Cunobelin? If this Etyminius were the ſame with Adminius (as Camden conjectures) who fled over to Caligula, no doubt he would have been placed in the Royal Seat of his Father at Camalodunum; but there was the firſt Roman Colony ſettled, without any regard to the Son of Cunobelin, all the Britains Eſtates being taken from them. And this Colony was deduced in Claudius's time, as appears by one of Claudius's Coins in Camden; where, on one ſide is the Effigies of Claudius, with all his Titles; and on the other, a Plowman, driving a Bull and a Cow, according to the Roman Cuſtom in ſetting out Ground for a Colony; and over it,

From hence I proceed to conſider the other Britiſh Cities, whether any of them can be found elder than the Roman Times. A Catalogue of theſe we have in Nennius, and Huntingdon, and others; but the learned and accurate Archbiſhop of Armagh having tranſcribed a Copy of them out of two MSS. in the Cotton Library, and compared it with 9 others; I ſhall generally keep to the Readings that are in him, although not to the Method he ſets them down in; but take them according to the Roman Provinces then.

I begin therefore with the Province of Britannia prima; and therein (1.) Caer Mincip or Municip, which was old Verulam, called by Tacitus a Municipium, and Caer Municipium in an old Inſcription ſet forth by Goltzius. That it was a Roman Town appears by the Rage of Boadicea and the Britains againſt it; who from London went immediately thither, and ſack'd it, and deſtroy'd the Inhabitants; and they were the more provoked by its being a Municipium, becauſe this was a Device to draw the Britains in to betray their Country, by making them capable of Roman Privileges. Britan. p. 292. Camden thinks that Verulam ſtood in that very place where Caſſivelaun's Town was; which agrees well enough with Cæſar's Deſcription of it, there being no other Marſh ſo conſiderable in thoſe Parts as the great Pool formerly near Verulam; Leland. ad Cygn. (2.) Cair Ceint. This Ranulphus Higden ſaith from Alphred of Beverly, was Canterbury; called Dorovernum in Ptolemy, Durovernum in the Itinerary. Leland in Doris. Frag. Deſcript. Britan. p. 13. b. This, as ſeveral other places in Kent, as Leland and Llhuyd obſerve, had the Name from the Britiſh Word Dwr or Dour, which ſignifies Water; as Durobrevum, Dorolenum, Durovernum, Doris, as he calls Dover. That Canterbury was a City in the time of the Romans, there is no queſtion; for it appears by the Itinerary, that the way to 3 Ports lay through it, to Rutupia, not Richborough (but Sandwich) to Dubris, (Dover) Ad portum Lemanis, (to Lim or Lomen near Hith) from whence to Canterbury was one of the Viæ Stratæ, or old Roman Military Ways, as appears by the Peutinger Tables. Mr. Somner's Treatiſe of the Roman Ports and Forts in Kent ſince publiſht. But Mr. Somner thinks, that the Roman Watch-Tower was near Lim-hill, where the Roman Garriſon was; but the Portus Lemanis he thinks was at Romney, where he ſhews the River Lomen did anciently run into the Sea, and made a convenient Haven at the Mouth of it. Four Roman Forts beſides there were in Kent; Richborough, where the Garriſon was upon the Hill Northward from Sandwich, (which he juſtly ſuppoſes to have been the Port-Town.) Reculver, where the Tribunus Cohortis Vetaſianorum lay in Garriſon, and where Roman Coins were frequently taken up, and the Roman Brick or Tile is ſtill diſcernable: Dover, where lodged the Præpoſitus Militum Tungricanorum; and the Watch-Tower there, as Mr. Somner, after a diligent Survey, concludes, was the Square Tower in the midſt of the Church or Chapel, where he found great ſtore of Roman Bricks; and the like in the Caſtle-Hill at Folkſton, whence Camden proves it to have been a Roman Fort. Thus we find the Romans had Ways, and Ports, and Forts in Kent. The Queſtion now is, Whether the City of Canterbury were built by the Romans, or a long time before? Geoff. l. 1. c. 14. If Geoffrey may be believed, it was built by Hudibras ſometime after Salomon; but no manner of Proof is offered for it, not ſo much as Agreement in the Name, which Annius Viterbienſis generally took Care of. Antiquities of Canterbury, p. 3. Cæſar, l. 5. But I have one great Argument to prove, that Canterbury was built by the Romans, not from the Roman Coins found almoſt in all parts of the City, as Mr. Somner affirms; but from Cæſar's Account of his 2d Landing, which is, that he marched 12 Miles before he eſpied the Britains Army, and then a River parted them, where they began to fight, the Britains having the Advantage of the upper Ground, but being beaten back by the Roman Horſe, they retired into a Wood, very well fortify'd both by Nature and Art, having all the Entrances ſhut with great Trees cut down on purpoſe. Here we have juſt ſuch another as Caſſivelaun's Town; which, as Cæſar ſaith, was ready made upon occaſion of ſome Quarrel among themſelves. Now if there had been ſuch a City as Canterbury in Cæſar's time, it muſt have been mentioned here. For near the very place where Cæſar's Army firſt eſpied the Britains, Canterbury ſtands, being at that diſtance from Deal, where Cæſar landed; there runs the River which parted the Armies, and on this ſide was the riſing Ground and the great Wood where the Britains hid themſelves, only ſometimes appearing in ſmall Parties; but the Seventh Legion at laſt beat them out of this Fortification. But if there had been any thing like a City at Canterbury then, Cæſar could not have avoided the mention of it; for there muſt have been ſome conſiderable Action about it.

(3.) Cair Colun or Colon, which by the Interpretation of H. Huntingdon and Alfred is ſaid to be Colcheſter, called in the Roman Itinerary, Colonia, as appears by the Diſtances and Scope of the fifth Iter; which is from London to Carliſle, not direct, but with a great compaſs to the Eaſt, and then to Lindum. And the ſixth Iter from London to Lindum is very different. So that the Itinerary doth not ſhew the ſhorteſt Ways, but the Roads which lay fitteſt for Buſineſs, eſpecially for the Roman Magiſtrates taking their Progreſs through the ſeveral Cities and Colonies inhabited by the Romans, or Natives of the Country, for the Adminiſtration of Juſtice among them; ſo theſe Itineraries ſeem to be framed here in Britain, to ſhew the ſeveral Stages and Diſtances between them, much like our Circuits for the Itinerant Judges: Thus from London to Lindum they ſet out Eaſtwards, and ſo went into Eſſex, part of Suffolk, Cambridge, Huntingdon, and ſo by Caſterton to Lindum; but being there, the ſixth Road ſhews how they might paſs from thence by Ancaſter to Leiceſter, and thence by ſeveral places mentioned to Verulam, and ſo back to London. So that the Deſign of the Itinerary is to ſhew, what Places were viſited in the ſeveral Progreſſes; and no doubt there were Roman Ways then to all theſe Places, and therefore they were moſt convenient for travelling, although the great Roads called Viæ Stratæ were more remarkable than the reſt; which Hieron. Surita ſaith, ought to be reckoned among the greateſt Works of Mankind, being made through all the Provinces of the Roman Empire. To this purpoſe the Romans made uſe of their own Soldiers, and the Inhabitants of the ſeveral Provinces: So Galeacus complains, that the Romans did wear out the Bodies of the Britains in paving of Boggs and Woods; and Bede ſaith, the Romans were known here by their Cities, and Temples, and Bridges, and High-ways. It ſeems Bede had not heard of the four famous Ways made by Belinus the Son of Malmutius, called Watling-ſtreet, the Foſſe, Ermin-ſtreet, and Ickneld-ſtreet, about which our Antiquaries have been ſo puzzled, that they know not where to begin or end them; for in truth they were no other, but ſuch as led from one Roman Town to another. And although Camden ſaith, he could find no Footſteps of ſuch Ways in Eſſex, time having worn them out; yet it is certain, according to the courſe of the Itinerary, and the Peutinger Tables, there had been ſuch; for according to both of them, there was a Road from Venta Icenorum to London by Sitomagus, Combretonium, Camalodunum, Cæſaromagus, &c. and again from London to Cæſaromagus, Colonia, Villa Fauſtini, Iciani, Camboricum, and ſo to Lindum. In the Fifth Iter, we find Colonia mentioned, in the Ninth Camalodunum, but not Colonia; which makes me think the ſame place is meant in both, becauſe they both lie at almoſt an equal diſtance in the Itinerary from Cæſaromagus, and all Perſons yield the Numbers to be much corrupted; and in the Peutinger Tables, Camalodunum is ſet down but not Colonia; upon which Reaſons I am very inclinable to Leland's Opinion, that Colcheſter was both Colonia and Camalodunum. I know Mr. Camden, whoſe Sagacity and Judgment were extraordinary, hath pitched upon Maldon, rather than Colcheſter, becauſe of the Affinity of the Name; which is a very deceitful way in ſuch a Corruption of Languages in Britain, to judge of the Original of a Town. But which is far more obſervable, at Maldon, Camden takes no notice of any Roman Antiquities, but ſuch as ſuppoſe it to have been the Colony; but at Colcheſter, he ſaith, an infinite Number of Roman Coins were found; and as to the Name Colcheſter hath as much remaining of Colonia, Cheſter being the Saxon Addition, as Maldon of Camalodunum. And there can be no queſtion, if it were a Roman Colony, that it was originally no Britiſh City.

Britan. p. 325.

(4.) Cair Granth, al. Grant, which Alphred of Beverly calls Cantebrigg; H. Huntingdon Cantebrigia, and in ſome Copies Grantebrigia. But Cair Grant being the Britiſh Name, it is certain it could not be derived, as Mr. Camden ſuppoſes, from Gron a Saxon Word, ſignifying a fenny or mooriſh Place; which however doubtfully ſpoken by him, is applauded by others. And the Monks of Crowland calling the River Gronta, diſcovers that even they did not take it in the Senſe of Gron; for they plainly diſtinguiſh between the River and the Fens which ariſe from it. And ſuppoſe Gron to ſignifie a Mooriſh Ground, yet how comes the River to be ſo called, and the Town from the River? But what is all this to the Britiſh Cair Grant? Was that from Gron too? I wonder Mr. Camden took no notice here of the Britiſh Name, as he doth ſo often elſewhere? Had he no mind to confute his Saxon Derivation? But Mr. Camden grants that Cambridge was either a Part of, or ſprung from the Roman Camboritum mentioned in the Itinerary; yet he ſeems puzzled about the two Names Cam and Grant, it being very hard to derive one from the other. Leland thinks Cambridge is only a Corruption of the Word Cantebrige, and that, of Grantbrigge, as it is called in the old Chronicle of S. Neots. That which ſeems to me moſt probable is, that the River conſiſting of two Branches, which fall into one before they come to Cambridge, the one by reaſon of its many turnings and windings, was by, the Britains therefore called Cam, and the other Grant; and ſo after their Union it did bear either Name. In Camden's Map of Eſſex, that Branch which riſes in Newport Pond, and runs by Waldon, Cheſterford, &c. is called Grant; and the other from Aſhwel doth deſerve the Name of Cam, from its winding Courſe, as well as Camel in Cornwall. But that Cair Grant, or Granceſter was the Roman Camboritum, or as moſt Copies have it, Camboricum (Cambric) Mr. Camden proves not only from the Name and Diſtance, but from the Number of Roman Coins there taken up. As for thoſe who have fetched the Original of it from Cantaber and Chembrigia, Daughter to Gurgun- guntius, I leave them to the grave and learned Confutation of ſuch who have taken great pains to diſprove it.

(5) Cair Guent. agreed by Alfred of Beverley, and H. Huntingdon to be Wincheſter, called Venta Belgarum in the Roman Itinerary, ten Miles from Clauſentum, (Southanton) which was a Roman Port, as Mr. Camden proves from the Coins there taken up; and likewiſe he found the Ruins of a Fort near it built by the Romans upon the Sea-coaſts, as Gildas teſtifies they uſed to do againſt the Inſolencies of the Saxon Pyrates who infeſted them; as thoſe were in Kent already mentioned. As to the Name of Venta, Camden follows Leland in deriving it from the Britiſh Guen, which ſignifies White; all the Roman Cities with that Name, as Venta Silurum and Venta Icenorum, being ſituate in a white chalky Soil. In this City a Roman Procurator had his Reſidence, as appears by the Notitia Imperii; who was overſeer of the Work-houſe (called Gynæcium) for making Sails for Ships and Garments for Souldiers; which were provided at the publick Charge, as appears by ſeveral Edicts in the Theodoſian Code; and is there called Canon Veſtium. And in order to the providing theſe, there were 15 Gynæcia, or publick Work-houſes in the Weſtern Empire; 2 in Illyricum, 4 in Italy, 1 in Africa, 2 in Gaul, 5 in Belgium, and 1 in Britain; over all which were ſo many Procurators, who were to provide Materials, and at certain times to make returns to the ſeveral Governours of the Provinces; and the Procurator Gynæcii Ventenſis in Britain, had ſuch a Work-houſe at Wincheſter; from whence the Sails might be conveniently ſent to the Roman Ports; and the Military Veſts to London; where the Governours of the Province had their chief abode. As to Geofferys making this Cair Guent another of King Hudibras his Cities, it is as true, as that he built the Town upon Mount Palado, or Shaftſbury, where the Eagle ſpake while the Walls were building: But J. Bale underſtands it of a Druyd at that time called Aquila Septonius; whoſe Prophecies were preſerved in great Eſteem among the Britains, and he affirms that he had ſeen ſome Fragments of them. It is true, that Geoffery affirms that in the latter end of the Britiſh Government, Cadwallader was perſwaded to give over all, becauſe by the Prophecies of the Eagle, as well as by Merlin's and the Sibyl's there was an end now come to the Britains Kingdom. But he never intimates that this Aquila was any more than an Eagle. But here Bale followed the Steps of Leland, who being aſhamed of Geoffery's Tale, turned the Eagle into a famous Druyd; and Leland gave the intimation, where the Eagles Prophecies were to be found. But Geoffery hath ſometing more particular of Wincheſter, viz. that Claudius landing near Portſmouth, having demoliſhed Cair Peris, or Portceſter purſued Arviragus to Wincheſter, and there beſieged him; and by perſwaſion of the Britains, Arviragus yielded the City to Claudius, and married his Daughter Geniſſa; and the place of their Marriage in honour of Claudius was called Caerglou, or Glouceſter. Suetonius ſaith indeed, that Claudius had three Daughters, Claudia whom he diſowned, Antonia married to Pompey and Sylla, and Octavia to Nero. But this Geniſſa is wholly a ſtranger to the Roman Writers as likewiſe Arviragus at that time, who lived in the Reign of Domitian. So that, as we have a clear proof that Wincheſter was a Roman City, ſo there is no Evidence of its being a City before, much leſs that it was beſieged by Claudius, who ſpent but ſix Months in his whole Expedition, and his (6.) Next to this, is Cair Peris; which H. Huntingdon and Ranulphus Ceſtrenſis from Alfred ſay, was Portceſter, the ancient Port within the Iſland of Portſey, at the Entrance whereof Portſmouth now ſtands, i. e. ſaith Camden, the Mouth or Entrance of the great Port, for ſo Ptolemy calls it, Μέγας Λιμὴν the great Port; which ſhows the Eſteem it was of in the Roman Times: For Ptolemy lived in the time of Antoninus; and he placeth it not far from the Iſle of Wight, and diſtinguiſheth it from the Mouth of Triſanton; or, as Camden ſaith, the Britiſh words ſignifie, the Mouth of Anton, (Traith Anton) ſince called Southanton. But it ſeems uncertain, whether, notwithſtanding what Mr. Camden ſaith, Portſmouth might not have its Name from Port the Saxon, who as the Saxon Annals tell us, landed at that Place, A. D. 501. with his two Sons, Bleda and Magla, eſpecially being joined with the Saxon Word Muth, which ſignifies an Entrance into a Haven. However, it is not improbable, after Veſpaſian had ſubdued the Iſle of Wight, that he ſhould take care of the Ports which lay oppoſite to it; and therefore in the Roman Times there might be ſuch a Place fortified, as Cair Peris, although there be no Roman Antiquities there mentioned, as there were at Clauſentum, neither is it mentioned in the Itinerary as the other is.

(7.) Cair Caratauc, which the old Gloſſer on Nennius, and Geoffrey interpret Salisbury, which was a Roman Fortification, then called Sarbiodunum, as it is in the Itinerary. But why Cair Caratauc? Humphry Llhuyd would have it Cair Caradoc in Shropſhire, ſo called from Caractacus, who there fought with Oſtorius; but this was a Hill and no City. Why not as well Cataractonium, a noted Roman Station? But that was in another Province.

(8.) Cair Dauri; ſo H. Huntingdon and Alfred read it, and interpret it Dorcheſter; but Archbiſhop Uſher reads it Cair Daun, and ſo makes it Doncaſter. But I ſee no reaſon to reject the former Reading and Interpretation; Dorcheſter being called Dornium in ſome Copies of Ptolemy, and the Inhabitants Durotriges; which ſignifies the ſame with the Aremorici and Morini in the oppoſite Coaſts, all which imply their Habitation to be near the Sea. And at this Place Mr. Camden found evident Remainders of the Roman Ways, and many Roman Coins; and its Name in the Itinerary is Durnovaria.

(9.) Cair Penſavelcoit, called by Geoffrey Cair Penvelcoit; which he interprets, and Matt. Weſtminſter after him, Exonium; however in Badius his Edition it was miſ-printed Oxonium, But William of Worceſter, quoted by the learned Oxford Antiquary, makes it to be Exeter too. Camden thinks it to be read Pont Ivel Coit, which he renders a Bridge upon Ivel in a Wood; and by it underſtands Ivelcheſter, Ptolemy's Iſchalis, where many Roman Antiquities are found. Archbiſhop Uſher rather thinks it to be Pemſey in Suſſex, which ſome Hiſtorians call Pevenſellum, and Coit ſignifies a Wood, there having been ſo very much in thoſe Parts. But I do not find this Penvenſel mentioned before the Norman Writers; nor any Footſteps of Roman Antiquities there: And therefore I either think it to be the Iſca Danmoniorum, in the Itinerary, ſince called Exeter, being the laſt Weſtern Station therein; or that thoſe Copies which Alfred and Huntingdon ſaw, were the truer, wherein it is wholly left out.

(10.) Cair Celemon, or Celemion in H. Huntingdon; but he gives no light to it. Camden, whom Archbiſhop Uſher follows, thinks it ſhould be Camelion, and ſo takes it for Camalet in Somerſetſhire, where are the Remainders of an old Roman Caſtle, with Regular Fortification, and a great Number of Roman Coins have been there taken up. The Hill, ſaith Leland, is more than a Mile in compaſs, and in divers places Foundations of Walls are to be ſeen; and many Gold, Silver and Copper Coins, have been found there in plowing; and likewiſe in the Fields thereabouts, with many other Antique things, and eſpecially by Eſt, the Place he calls Camulatte, and ſaith, it was ſometime a famous Town, or Caſtle.

Britan. p. 161.

Lel. Itin. p. 113.

(11.) Cair Segent. Alfred, Huntingdon, Camden, Uſher, all agree it to be Silceſter: But Camden would have it read Cair Segont, as coming nearer to Civitas Segontiorum. Archbiſhop Uſher thinks Cair Sejont different from it, being the ſame with Cair Cuſteint in Nennius, i. e. the City of Conſtantius near Carnarvan; but Camden applies all this to Silceſter; from whence to Venta Belgarum the Roman way, he ſaith, is yet unſeen; and ſo he concludes it to be the Vindonum in the Itenerary. Theſe Segontiaci are a People mentioned by Cæſar; and when they began to inhabit together, the chief City did bear the Name of the People; as when the Pariſii dwelt together, their City was called Lutetia Pariſiorum, and the chief Town of the Seguſiani, Forum Seguſianorum; and from hence London might well be called Auguſta Trinobantum, being the chief City of the Trinobantes, but with no more relation to Troy, than the City of Paris to the Son of Priamus.

Britan. p. 195.

(12.) Cair Britthon. Huntingdon calls it Cair Briſtou; and Leland is earneſt to make it Venta Belgarum; but Camden by no means allows it. Who differs ſo much, and ſo often from Leland, that nothing but Spite and Envy could raiſe that Calumny upon him, that he was Leland's Plagiary, as any one may diſcern who hath compared them both. And when it was objected againſt him in his Life-time, he ſaith, he thought it a Calumny more deſerving Laughter than Confutation; and he deſires no better Anſwer, than to compare Leland's Works with his; which are extremely different both in their Deſign, and the Accompliſhment of it. This I here mention, becauſe a late Hiſtorian hath inſerted a Copy of Verſes to that purpoſe, called Leland's Ghoſt, and concludes that Camden is not to be excuſed. A very unjuſt Cenſure; and abundantly refuted by Camden in a little Tract he wrote in his own Defence. But as to Briſtow, he declares he can find no Teſtimony at all of its coming near the Roman Times; and he thinks it built not long before the Norman Conqueſt. But how comes it then into this Catalogue of Britiſh Cities? It is certain, the Copies do not agree: For in all which Archbiſhop Uſher compared ſome are left out, which are in thoſe which H. Huntingdon ſaw, and he puts in others, as Cair Glou (called Glevum in the Itinerary,) and a Colony is here mentioned in an Inſcription at Bath, by Camden and others. But Humphry Llhuyd thinks it was not known to the Romans, but built, as Nennius ſaith, (whom he calls Gildas) after their Times by one Glouy Anceſtor to Vortigern; (but the Itinerary and Inſcription are much ſtronger Arguments to prove it a Roman City.) And Cair Ceri, Chicheſter, called Corinium in Ptolemy, and Durocornovium in Antoninus: Humphrey Llhuyd reads it Cair Cori, which agrees

P. 14. agrees beſt with Corinium; and he calls Chicheſter, Cair Ceri; but Camden and Uſker, Cair Cei. It ſeems to have been a Miſtake in making theſe diſtinct, there being no Evidence to prove Chicheſter a Roman or Britiſh City: But beſides theſe, there was Cair Dorn, called Durobrivæ in the Itinerary, the Remainder of it ſtill called Dornford; here Camden takes notice of abundance of Roman Coins found in the Fields, and plain Tokens of the Roman ways. Theſe I mention to ſhew how different the Copies were in Huntingdon's Time from what they are now, and how they came to be filled up with ſome Cities of a later Original.

(13.) Cair Gauiragon, al. Guorangon, or Cair Wrangon; which is agreed to be Worceſter, called in the Itinerary Branonium, for Brannonium; by Britan. p. 434. Ptolemy, Brannogenium. Camden quotes an ancient MS. to prove that it was walled about by the Romans; which is not at all improbable by its Situation on the Eaſtern ſide of the Severn, it being the Roman Cuſtom to place their Garriſons on Rivers which parted them and their Enemies, as appears by the Number of Caſtles and Fortreſſes built by Am. Mar. l. 28. Valentinian along the Rhine, as Ammianus Marcellinus ſaith; which were the Occaſions of ſo many Cities and Towns there afterwards. Theſe were called Burgi by the Romans, i. e. limitum Caſtella, as Vignier Vig. Chron. Burg. init. obſerves; and Oroſius ſaith, That the Name of Burgundians came Oroſ. l. 7. c. 32. from thoſe who were placed in the Burgi of Germany, to defend the Borders, by Druſus and Tiberius: But Pontus Heuterus thinks them ſo Pont Heut. Rer. Burg. l. 1. called from the German, Baurhwoonders, from living diſperſedly, as all the old Germans did; and therefore that ſeems to be no Reaſon for Zoſim. l. 2. a particular Denomination. Zoſimus obſerves that the Romans were wont to ſettle their Military Colonies, upon the Rivers which bounded Tacit. Hiſt. l. 12. c. 31. the Roman Provinces. And as to the Severn, Tacitus ſaith, that P. Oſtorius did fortify it againſt the Incurſion of the Silures, who lived on the other ſide, and were not ſubdued till Veſpaſian's Time, and then the Legions removed beyond the Severn. It ſeems therefore very probable that Worceſter was firſt a Burgus, or Caſtle on the Borders, then a Colony as Glouceſter on the ſame River was, and ſo became a Roman City.

(14.) Cair Guaricon, which is not explained by Huntingdon, nor Britan. p. 425. mentioned in ſo much of Alfred as Ranulphus hath preſerved. Camden reads it Cair Guaric, and ſo derives it from the Britiſh Guarth, the ſame with the Roman Præſidium, which the Notitia Imperii mentions, and here he ſuppoſes the Præfect of the Dalmatian Horſe to have had his Quarters: This being in the Middle of the Land, as the Præſidium in Corſica was, and conveniently ſeated for a Garriſon upon a Rock on the ſide of the Avon. Which is far more probable, than J. Rous his attributing the Building of it to King Guithelin, and ſays, that it had its Name afterwards from a Britiſh Prince called Gwayr, Couſin to King Tacit. Hiſt. l. 12. c. 40. Arthur. For Tacitus mentions the Caſtella, that were built by Didius Gallus, upon an Incurſion of the Silures; which was a very probable Seaſon for the firſt building the Caſtle at Warwick.

(15.) Cair Maunguid, which Archbiſhop Uſher thinks to be the Manduesſedum in the Itinerary, ſtanding on the Roman Way between Etocetu near Stafford, and Bennones in Leiceſterſhire, but upon the Edge of Warwickſhire; and by the Diſtances and Way, Camden happily found it to be Manceſter; which, he ſaith, in Nennius his Catalogue is called Mancegued.

(16.) Cair Lerion, which Alfred and Huntingdon agree to be Leiceſter. But here Geoffrey hath found out a King Lear for the Builder of this City long before the Romans came hither. It is an eaſy matter to make Kings and Builders after their Names, without any Proof or Monument to confirm it, by a mere Similitude of Name. And yet of this Leland gives a better Account, viz. that Leir was the ancient Name of the River that runs by it; which is confirmed by Burton's Obſervation, that there is a Place near the firſt riſing of it ſtill called Leire. That it was a Roman City is made evident, by the Remainders of an old Temple of Janus, and Roman Antiquities, Medals and Coins here found in great Abundance. What the Name of it was among the Romans is not agreed, but very probably ſuppoſed by Camden to be Ratæ in the Intinerary, which in Ptolemy is placed next to Lindum, which follows.

(17.) Cair Luitcoit, which the ſame Authors affirm to be Lincoln. Camden ſaith, it ſhould be Lindcoit, and was anciently called Lindecoln, juſtly ſuppoſed to be Lindum in Antoninus. R. Talbott, in his Notes on Antoninus, thinks the Name, Diſtance and Situation of Lindum agree better to Lenton or Lanton, near Nottingham, than to Lincoln; but I confeſs, Camden's Argument from the Courſe of the Road, convinces me that Lincoln was the Lindum of the Romans. For between Ratæ and Lindum are Verometum, M. P. XIII. Margidunum, M. P. XIII. Ad Pontem, M. P. VII. Crococalanum, M. P. VII. Lindum, M. P. XII. Which Diſtances are irreconcilable, with making Ratæ to be Leiceſter, and Lenton by Nottingham to be Lindum: But Camden hath very well cleared it as to Lincoln, making Verometum to be Burrough, Margidunum near Beavoir; ad Pontem to be Daunton; Crococalana, Ancaſter, where ſeveral Monuments of Roman Antiquity were found; and the Roman Way from thence to Lincoln, at the Diſtance between the Manſion in Antoninus and Lindum. If any object, that this is a great Way about in the Road from London to York; I anſwer, That the Romans did not meaſure the Roads by a Line, but by the Conveniency of Stations and Manſions; and it is very queſtionable whether there were any Paſſage thro' the Foreſt of Shirewood in the Roman Times, there being no Footſteps of any Roman Ways, or Manſions, or Coins in thoſe Parts, unleſs at a Place called Littleburgh; which therefore Camden thinks to be the Segelocum in Antoninus, the Stage between Lindum and Danum, i. e. Lincoln and Dancaſter.

Deſcript. of Nottingh. p. 414.

(18.) Cair Guintguic, the firſt in the Catalogue of Archbiſhop Uſher, which he thinks may be Norwich, or rather Winwick in Lancaſhire. Here we have no light from the ancient Interpreters of Nennius; but as to Winwick here is no Colour for it, but a bare Similitude in the Name, which is not certain; for ſome think it ought to be rather Cair Guntum, which, they ſay, was the Britiſh Name of Norwich; a late Name not known, ſaith Camden, before the Daniſh Wars, and the Word is wholly Saxon. Some have found out a brave old Britiſh King for the Builder of this City, called Gurguntius; but Geoffrey himſelf is ſilent in this matter. Camden and Leland agree, that there is ſome remainder of Guntum in the Name of the River Wentſum, as Leland ſaith it is called in the old Donations of the Cathedral in Norwich. It is certain there was an old Roman City hereabouts, called Venta Icenorum. Leland affirms it was Norwich; Camden finding no Roman Antiquities there, but many not far off at a Place called Caſter, concludes that to be the old Venta of the Iceni; from whence the Road went by Sitomagus (Thetford) to Camalodunum, and ſo to London. Thus I have gone through the Britiſh Cities of the firſt Province; the other will be more eaſily diſpatched. I come now to the Province of Britannia Secunda, whereof Caerleon upon Vſk was the Metropolis; and according to Mr. Camden's Rule, the Province extended as far as the Juriſdiction of the Archbiſhop of Caerleon did; who, according to Ranulphus Ceſtrenſis, had ſeven Biſhops under him; and the Severn was the Boundary of the Province: Giraldus Cambrenſis affirms the ſame. Which Sees in probability were beſide the four ſtill known, S. Patern, Cair Went, and Henfort; and this Number of ſeven went to meet Auguſtin, when he challenged Juriſdiction over all the Biſhops of Britain.

(1.) I begin with the Metropolis, Cair Legion guar Vſic, as it is in Nennius, but commonly called Caer Leon ar Vſk. This was a known Station and Colony of the Romans, where the ſecond Legion had its Quarters, as evidently appears from the Diſtances in Antoninus; although Ptolemy placeth the ſecond Legion at the Iſca Danmonionum. But there are ſeveral things in Ptolemy miſplaced with relation to Britain, either by the fault of Tranſcribers, or want of good Information ſo early, and at ſuch a Diſtance. There ſeems far greater Reaſon to follow the Itinerary, being of a later time, however it bears the Name of Antoninus; and there was more Cauſe to ſettle a Legion among the Silures, than among the Danmonii, who were never ſo troubleſome to the Romans as the other. Geoffrey doth not deny the Roman Legions being here, and that it was called from thence Urbs Legionum; but he ſaith the City was built long before by Belinus, and then it was called Caer Vſk, from the River Vſk. Here were found very remarkable Monuments of Roman Antiquities, Ruins of Roman Temples, Baths, Theatres, Inſcriptions, as may be ſeen in Camden and others. But what evidence is there of any City before the Roman Colony? And it was truly obſerved by a very learned Man, that the Roman Stations gave the occaſion of building moſt of the ancient Cities and Towns of Europe: So that the Civilizing and Improvement of theſe Parts of the World is very much due to the Prevalency of the Roman Empire; only the more Southern People of old Gaul had learnt the way of Building near together, and walling their Towns from the Greek Colony at Marſeilles, as Juſtin ſaith out of Trogus. But when Polybius ſpeaks of 300 Cities in Spain overthrown by Tiberius Gracchus, Strabo explains it only of Towns and Caſtles; other kind of Buildings, ſaith he, not agreeing with the Barbarouſneſs of the Inhabitants. And it is no diſgrace to the Britains to have been like the reſt of their Neighbours, full of Superſtition, and Barbariſm, living rude and diſperſed among Woods and Marſhes, frequently changing their Habitations for Conveniency. For all the barbarous People, till they were improved, lived much after the ſame manner, being Nomades, divided into little Governments, full of Quarrels and Animoſities among themſelves, and therefore eaſily conquer'd by a greater and more united Force. Of which before.

(2.) Cair Meiguod, or Meguaid, as it is in Huntingdon; in other Copies Meiuod. Dr. Powel mentions a Place called Myvot, where the Princes of that part of Wales were buried; not far from Matraval, where ſome think the Mediolanum, mentioned by Antoninus and Ptolemy, my, ſtood; and which he ſaith, is diſcover'd by many Monuments of Antiquity there found. Camden undertakes to demonſtrate, from the Diſtance in the Itinerary lying between Boniam and Rutunium in the Itinerary, i. e. Bangor and Rowton, that it muſt be thereabouts; but he will not determine whether at Matraval or Lanvethlin. Annius had cunningly found out too notable Men, called Olanus and Medus, for Mediolanum in Italy; it is pity Geoffrey had not heard of them, for he could have made them Kings of Britain, or at leaſt Princes of Wales, and have founded this Mediolanum. But in truth, Geoffrey's Invention could not hold out with Nennius his Catalogue; which makes him omit ſo many Britiſh Cities. But we have a better Account from Tacitus, who ſaith, when the Ordovices were ſubdued by Julius Agricola, among whom this Mediolanum ſtood, he built Caſtles and Fortreſſes for Security of the Province, which by degrees were made Towns and Cities.

(3.) Cair Went; how it comes to be omitted in the Copies of Nennius, I know not, unleſs it be meant by Cair Guorthigirn, which he ſaith was built in the Region of Guenneſi; which Archbiſhop Uſher thinks is the ſame with Guent in Monmouthſhire; which Name was taken from Cair Went near Chepſtow, which hath riſen out of its Ruins, Which was the Venta Silurum in the Itinerary, and is ſtill diſcerned, ſaith Camden, by the Fragments of Roman Antiquities there found. Geoffrey ſaith, that Vortigern's Caſtle was built upon the River Wye, which runs into the Sea at Chepſtow. But how came Vortigern's Caſtle among the Britiſh Cities, and ſo noted a Place as Cair Went to be left out?

(4.) Cair Merdin, which is in Huntingdon's Catalogue, and keeps its Name to this day; and is the Maridunum of Ptolemy, but called Muridunum in the Itinerary, and is the fartheſt Roman Station mention'd that Way.

(5.) Cair Sejont, called Cair Cuſteint in Nennius, where he ſaith Conſtantius lay buried, as he ſaith was known by the Inſcription on his Monument. Mat. Weſtminſter ſaith it was the Father of Conſtantine, who died at York; but why his Body ſhould be carried hither is hard to underſtand, if he had the Apotheoſis of the Roman Emperors. Probably it was only an Inſcription to his Memory, which by Nennius his Time might paſs for a Funeral Monument. This was Segontium in the Itinerary, being a Roman Station on the Frith, which divides Angleſey and Britain; and from whence Suetonius Paulinus paſſed over with his Army thither.

(6.) Cair Urnach, mentioned in Nennius; which is ſuppoſed to be the Uriconium of Antoninus and Ptolemy, called Wroxeter, being built at firſt as a Roman Fortreſs on the Severn; where Camden found great Remainders of the Roman Building and Way.

(7.) Cair Draiton; which Archbiſhop Uſher thinks to be Drayton in Shropſhire, which hath nothing of memorable Antiquity in it. More probably Rutunium, ſtanding on the Weſtſide of the Severn, which was a noted Station of the Romans, ſtill called Rowton, near the Roman Way which went into Wales.

From hence I proceed to the 3d Province of Maxima Cæſarienſis, which I ſhall take in Camden's Latitude, as far as the Archbiſhop's Juriſdiction extends.

(1.) Cair Ebranc, which Alfred and Huntingdon agree to be York. Here Geoffery hath found a King Ebranc, who built it in the time of King David. But in all the Battels Petilius Cerealis fought with the Brigantes, we meet with not one word of any ſuch City; which is afterwards ſo much ſpoken of in the Wars of thoſe Parts, both in the Roman and Saxon times; it is mention'd by Ptolemy among the Cities of the Brigantes, where the Legio VI. Victrix had its Winter Quarters: Which was brought hither out of Germany by Hadrian. Here Severus and Conſtantius died, and Conſtantine was declared Cæſar by the Legions here. Spartianus calls it a City and ſaith that Severus went to the Temple of Bellona in it; which was hardly built by King Ebranc; becauſe I think Bellona was no Britiſh Deity.

(2.) Cair Ligualid, and Legeuit and Lualid; called Luguvallum by the Romans, as in the Itinerary: Which ſignifies a Tower built ad Vallum, as Camden proves: And Ranulphus Ceſtrenſis cannot deny that part of the Roman Wall went through the City; but yet he would have it built by one King Leyl; who according to Geoffery was 7th King of the Britains. Then Carleyl muſt be the Britiſh Name; and ſo all the Copies of Nennius were ſtrangely miſtaken; but that this was an ancient Roman City, is evident from the Monuments of Roman Antiquities both in and near it; as at Morbium, (Moresby) Arbeiæ, (Ierby) and all the places that were ad lineam Valli; on both ſides the Roman Wall, as will appear to thoſe that will take the pains to compare them: and no County affords ſo ample a Collection of Roman Antiquities, as Cumberland.

(3.) Cair Legion, called Civitas Legionum by Bede, and interpreted by Alfred of Beverly Cheſter. Here the 20th Legion had its Winter Quarters. Ranulphus himſelf confeſſeth the Work in the old Monuments, looks more like Romans Work than Britains. So that one of Geoffery's trueſt Diſciples is almoſt content to give this up for a Roman City. This is called Deva in the Itinerary; and it appears by the Coin of Septimius Geta, to have been a Roman Colony: And William of Malmsbury ſaith, the Emeriti Legionum, i. e. the Veterans reſided here, and ſo made a Military Colony.

Thus I have gone through all the noted Britiſh Cities, and particularly proved them to have been founded by the Romans; and therefore when Gildas and Bede ſay, that Britain was famous for its 28 Cities, it is to be underſtood of the Roman times and of Cities here built by their Means.

II. The next thing I propoſed was the State and Condition of London during the Roman Government here.

To underſtand this we muſt conſider the different Conditions of Cities within the Roman Empire. For all were not Colonies or Municipia, or Emporia; neither did thoſe which were once ſo always continue in the ſame State. For a Colony might be turned into an Emporium; as Strabo obſerves of Sevil in Spain; and an Emporium might be advanced to the Dignity of a Colony; and ſo Colonies might be turned into Municipia and on the contrary. Pliny who lived in the time when the different Condition of the Roman Towns was well underſtood, doth undertake take to give a particular Account of them in ſome Provinces. In Hiſpania ulterior, he ſaith, there were 275 Roman Towns; whereof were 8 Colonies, as many Municipia, 28 that had the Jus Latij, (of which hereafter) 6 Free Cities, 4 Confederate, above 20 Stipendiaries. In the other Province of Hiſpania citerior were 294 Towns; whereof were, 12 Colonies, 13 Municipia, 17 that had the Jus Latij, 1. Confederate, the reſt Stipendiaries. In the Province of Narbon, beſide the Colonies he reckons up the Latin Towns, the confederate Cities, &c. and ſo in Sicily, Sardinia, Luſitania, &c. From hence it appears, that it was well ſaid by Siculus Flaccus, that the Titles of Colonies, Municipia and Præfecturæ, did ariſe from the carriage and deſerts of the People towards the Roman State. If any Cities upon the Invaſion of a Province readily joyn'd with the Roman Forces they were called confederate Cities, and were by virtue of the Compact between them to enjoy all their former Rights and Privileges, without paying any Tribute. Of which ſort were many Cities in Italy; but ſometimes ſuch Cities parted freely with their own Liberties, to make themſelves capable of the Privileges of the Roman City; and ſometimes upon misbehaviours, they were taken from them. Thus Suetonius ſaith, that Auguſtus deprived ſeveral confederate Cities of their former Liberties for the ill uſe they made of them. Dio mentions Cyzicum, Tyre and Sidon, for the ſeditious carriage of the Citizens; but Cyzicum had theirs ſoon reſtored upon their Submiſſion, as Dio ſaith, not long after. Veſpaſian too away the Freedom of Achaia, Lycia, Rhodes, Byzantium, and Samos; and likewiſe reduced Thracia, Cilicia and Comagena, into the Form of Provinces, which had hitherto obey'd their own Prince. For there were ſome Nations accounted it as great a Privilege to live in Subjection to them as others did to caſt them off; as appears not only by theſe Inſtances of Thracia, Cilicia and Comagena, but Strabo ſaith, of Cappadocia, that when the Royal Line failed, the Romans gave them Liberty to chooſe their own Government, not doubting that it would be a Common-wealth, as theirs was then at Rome; but they ſent Embaſſadors, to Rome, to deſire they might live under a Monarchy ſtill; and ſo, to the wonder of the Romans they choſe Ariobarzanes King.

But Strabo ſaith, there were 2 ſorts of free Cities in the Roman Empire; ſuch as were ſo by original Compacts; or ſo made by enjoying their own Laws and Magiſtrates, upon certain terms. Of this ſort we have many Inſtances in the Roman Hiſtory; as all the Cities of Greece by a Decree of the Senate; Amiſus a City of Pontus, as Strabo calls it, had a ſtrange Revolution; having its Liberty given by Cæſar, taken away by Anthony, reſtored by Auguſtus, and in the time of the younger Pliny ſaid to be a Free and confederate City; and the like change Tacitus obſerves in Rhodes.

But theſe were Cities made free, i. e. were admitted to the Privileges of the City of Rome, although no Colonies deduced from thence. Which being very great both in a publick and private Capacity, were ſparingly granted, eſpecially in the remoter Provinces. Such a City, I ſuppoſe Tarſus, where S. Paul was born, was, having its Liberty given by Antony, and confirmed by Auguſtus; and S. Paul pleads the Privilege of being born a Roman Citizen. Spanhemius produces a Coin of Gordianus, wherein it is ſaid to be a Colony; but that was of later times. For why ſhould Antony and Auguſtus give Liberty to a Roman Colony: Which according, to Cicero, is Civitas a Matrice Civitate deducta, and ſo their Freedom was the ſame with that of the City of Rome. Among theſe Cities made Free, there were 2 ſorts; one of thoſe who enjoy'd their own Municipal Laws, but had honorary Privileges, that is a Capacity of the ſame Dignities which the Citizens of Rome had; and theſe were properly Municipia. Which Municipal Laws ſome Cities valued above all the other Privileges of Rome; and therefore deſired to be reduced from being Colonies to be Municipia; of which Hadrian gives an Inſtance in Præneſte; not called therefore a Colony but Opidum, in Frontinus his Book of Colonies in Nerva's time, as Joſ. Suareſius obſerves: But on the other ſide many of the Municipia were impatient till they obtained the Privileges of Colonies, as Hadrian there obſerves, and inſtances in Italica and Utica. Now theſe Cities which parted with all their own Laws and Cuſtoms, and were incorporated into the Roman State, were ſaid to be Populi Fundi Facti, among whom the Roman Law is ſettled tanquam in Fundo, as Cicero explains it. Upon which happen'd a great Caſe in Rome, whether a Native of a Confederate City, not being populus fundus factus, could partake of the Privileges of the Roman City? Which was the Caſe of Cornelius Balbus, born at Gades, but had the Privilege of a Roman Citizen given by Pompey; the City pleaded that he was uncapable by their Exemption as a free City. Cicero on the other ſide, that the Roman State did not abridge their own Power, but could give the Privilege of the City to whom they thought fit. But it is plain by his Diſcourſe that the Confederate Cities were far from being pleaſed, when their Citizens forſook their own Privileges and became Members of the City of Rome. And in ſeveral of the Original Compacts this Clauſe was inſerted, that none ſhould be allowed ſo to do without the Conſent of the City; but then Cicero urges, that where that Clauſe was not mention'd, they might make any one a Roman Citizen whom they pleaſed; which Authority was given to Pompey, by a Law. But thoſe Cities which could not be admitted to an equal participation of the Privileges of the City of Rome, yet were deſirous of ſome ſhare of them; which was called the Jus Latij, and was diſtinct feom the Jus Quiritium, which as Sigonius explains it, moſt probably was that which no Strangers were admitted to, who were not Fundi Populi, i. e. not incorporated into the Roman City. But the jus Latij, lay only in a Right of Suffrage, but without a Tribe ſaith Onuphrius Panvinius; and in a capacity of being Roman Citizens upon bearing Offices in their own Bodies. Aſconius Pedianus ſaith C. Pompeius obtained this Privilege for the Colonies beyond Po; and he calls it Jus Latij.

The Jus Italicum, was leſs than this, conſiſting only in the Liberty of chooſing their own Magiſtrates; and afterwards carried with it an exemption from Tribute; which Italy was freed from by the Law of Cæcilius Metellus as Dio ſaith.

Dio, l. 37.

Thoſe Places which had none of theſe Privileges were ſaid to be reduced into the Form of a Province, and were governed wholly by Officers ſent from Rome, who had different Names and Titles, according to the Extent and Nature of their Juriſdiction; as Prætors, Queſtors, Legats, &c. But where the Power extended only to one place, they were called Præfecti, and the Government Præfectura; of which ſort there were many in Italy, which are reckon'd up by Feſtus.

As to the Government of the Roman Provinces, they that were under the immediate Care of the Emperor, after the Diviſion made by Auguſtus, ſtus, (as this Province of Britain was) had a Governour in chief over the whole Province ſent among them, whoſe Title commonly was, Legatus Aug. pro Prætore Prov. Of ſuch here in Britain there are two Inſcriptions in Gruter ; and one lately found ſince the Fire near Ludgate, being ſaid to be a Funeral Monument for Vivius Marcianus, Legate to Hadrian here in Britain. That it was an Inſcription to his Memory is plain, and it is probable he was Cæſar's Legate here, although not expreſſed at large. Theſe Legates had their chief Reſidence in the Metropolis of the Province ; and therefore this Inſcription to the Memory of Cæſar's Legate was properly fixed in the Metropolis at London ; but the Burying-place was not within the City, that being contrary to the Roman Cuſtom ; but in the Fields, not far from the Roman Way. And ſo here the Burying-place was on the North-Eaſt and Eaſt-ſide of the Suburbs, where many Urns, Funeral Veſſels, little Images, and Earthen Pots have been taken up, and Coins of Claudius, Nero, Veſpaſian, &c. which is fully ſet forth by Mr. Stow, whom I do not intend to tranſcribe. But it deſerves to be remembred, that Sir Robert Cotton had diſcovered the Monument of a Proprætor's Wife in Ratcliff Field. As the Legate or Proprætor had his chief Reſidence in the Metropolis, ſo the great Buſineſs of the Province, as to civil Matters was brought thither to him ; and the Power of Life and Death belong'd to him ; which the Procurator Cæſaris had not, unleſs he were Governour of the Province too ; as in ſmaller Provinces it often happen'd, ſo in Judæa, he that was Procurator Cæſaris, as Pilate was no more, had the Juriſdiction too, but under the Preſident of Syria ; for Vitellius ſent Pilate to Rome upon complaint of his ill Government ; but in greater Provinces the Procurator only minded the Revenue. This Diſtinction was obſerved in Britain ; as the Britains in Tacitus ſadly repreſented their Condition to each other, that whereas before they were under one King of their own, now they had two put upon them, the Legate that diſpoſed of their Blood, and the Procurator of their Eſtates: So that all Capital Cauſes belong'd to the Legate's Court ; and thoſe of the Exchequer to Cæſar's Procurator. The Legate had his Prætorium in the Metropolis, which at firſt ſignified the General's Tent ; but as the Name came from the Camp to the City, ſo the Prætorium was the Manſion-Houſe of the Governour ; altho' in Auguſtus's time it ſignified any ſtately Palace. Near the Prætorium was the Baſilica or Court of Juſtice, where he ſat in his Sella Curulis, and diſpatched publick Buſineſs relating to the Province ; for particular Cauſes he either heard them himſelf with the Judges appointed, or left them to their Examination, who were to be taken out of that Conventus or Diviſion, wherein the Parties lived, and to whom they conſented, as appears by Cicero's proceeding againſt Verres. Theſe were called Recuperatores in the old Roman Writers ; and might be challenged by the Parties, without alledging a Cauſe, ſo it were done ante Legem conteſtatam ; and it was enough to ſay, Hunc Nolo, as Cujacius obſerves.

tus, were ſaid to make up the Dioceſe. So Cicero uſes the Word ſeveral times; from whence it appears, that a Dioceſe was originally leſs than a Province, although in the New Diſtribution of the Roman Empire, it comprehended ſeveral Provinces. Sometimes the Governour called ſeveral Conventus's to one Place, as Cicero ſaith he did at Laodicea. Pliny ſaith, that in one Province of Spain there were 4 Conventus's, in another 7, in another 3. The Place where the Conventus uſed to be kept, was called Forum as Feſtus ſaith; thence Forum Seguſianorum in Gaul. But the Forum Flaminium, and Forum Julii were ſo called from being Places of Trading.

The Stipendiary Cities were ſuch as were cited to the Conventus, being governed by the Roman Magiſtrates, and paying Tribute; and ſo were of the Nature of the Præfecturæ in Italy; only they had not Magiſtrates ſent to them annually from the People of Rome, or the Prætor as thoſe had. And I cannot underſtand by Feſtus, that there were any Præfecturæ out of Italy; nor to what purpoſe Præfects ſhould be ſent from Rome into remote Provinces, when the Governours of them were to adminiſter Juſtice in all the Stipendiary Cities at the ſeveral Convents. And if there were occaſion for a Præfect to be ſent, the Preſident of the Province was to take care of it; and theſe were called Vicarii & Judices Locorum, as Berterius obſerves; only at Alexandria the Prince himſelf did appoint the Governour. Since then that Britain was reduced into the Form of a Province, and had a Legate appointed as Governour over it, who had his Reſidence in the Metropolis at London, there can be no probability in Mr. Camden's Opinion, that it was in the Condition of a Præfecture and not of a Colony. But Mr. Camden urges, That it was not for the Intereſt of the Roman Government to make ſuch a Place of Trading as London was, a Roman Colony. Therefore, to clear this, we muſt conſider that there were ſeveral ſorts of Colonies, (1.) Civil Colonies, i. e. ſuch as conſiſted only of Roman Citizens, drawn out from the City, and planted in ſuch places out of which the former Inhabitants were removed. Theſe had all the Privileges of the City of Rome, the ſame kind of Magiſtrates and Government; thence A. Gellius calls them, The little Images and Repreſentations of the City of Rome. Many Rites and Cuſtoms belong'd to the drawing out and ſettling ſuch a Colony, which are beſide my purpoſe. (2.) Military Colonies, when the Veteran Soldiers for a Reward of long Service were ſettled together by way of a Colony. Of which ſort, from Sylla's time, there were very may both in Italy and the Provinces abroad. Theſe generally took their Name from the Legions they belong'd to. Ezek. Spanhemius mentions about 120 of theſe, which he had obſerved from Coins, Inſcriptions, and other good Authorities. Of this kind here were the Colony of Veterans at Camalodunum, the Colonies of York, Cheſter, Caerleon, &c. But beſides theſe two, there were, (3.) Mixt Colonies, where the Roman Citizens and the Natives joyned together; and although they had not the Name, yet had the Privileges of a Colony. Of this ſort Onuph. Panvinius reckons up many in Italy it ſelf; and ſuch a one Julius Capacius ſaith Puteoli was, which Cicero calls an Emporium; Livy and others a Colony; Lipſius ſaith, it had the Right of a Colony before it obtained a mix'd Colony: And the like M. Velſerus ſaith of Auguſta Vindelicorum and Colonia Agrippina; and of this kind I conclude London

London to have been; which was Nobile Emporium, in Tacitus's time, Lipſ. ad Tacit. Annal. 14.74. a Place of mighty advantage by its Situation for Trade, and therefore apt to draw both Romans and Natives together, where they had all the Encouragement, which the Roman Governours Reſidence could give it. Which would ſoon make the City in ſo little time, grow ſo great, that although it were firſt built in Claudius's time, yet in Nero's, it might be too large for Suetonius Paulinus to hazard his Army to defend it. For where-ever there was a new Province made, there was great occaſion for ſuch an Emporium or place of Trading to be ſet up. For the Citizens of Rome made mighty Improvement of their Eſtates by ſending their Money into new Provinces; and one Perſon in Rome had at one time ſo much Money at Intereſt here, (even Seneca) that Dio ſaith, The Xiphil. in Ner. calling of it in, was one of the occaſions of the Revolt of the Britains. But beſides the Roman Bankers, they had great Traders among them; and very early there was Collegium Mercatorum at Rome; they were called Liv. l. 2. c. 27. Mercurialis in Tully, becauſe, as Feſtus ſaith, they looked on Mercury Cicer. Ep. ad Q. Frat. l. 2. Ep. as the God of Trading. Theſe lived at Rome and traded abroad; but there were others, who went themſelves into the Provinces, and were called Negotiatores, of whom Cicero ſaith, Gaul was full in all places; Cicer. pro Fonteio. and all Buſineſs of Trade and Money was diſpatched by them: and the like he mentions in the Provinces of Aſia; and he ſaith, their Stock Pro Lege Man. was ſo great, that a Blow could not be given them, but it would be felt at Rome.

But all the Trade of Britain did not depend upon the New Province; for Cæſar confeſſes, that before his coming there was a ſettled Commerce between the Parts of Gaul and Britain. Cæſar ſaith, the Mer- Cæſar. l. 4. chants could tell him little of the Country; it is far more probable they would not. For, he after ſaith, he ſent over word of his coming. And how came the Gauls to be ſuch Strangers here, if Divitiacus commanded a great part of it, as himſelf ſaith, if they ſent over Supplies into Gaul; if Comius of Arras had ſuch Authority among the Britains; if Perſons were ſent over from Gaul hither to be inſtructed in the Druids Doctrine? All which being affirmed by Cæſar, evidently prove a conſtant Correſpondency between Britain and Gaul. And the Trade was, not for trifling Commodities, as Strabo inſinuates, viz. of Knacks made of Ivory Strab. l. 4. and Amber, &c. but for Lead and Tin; which, as Diodorus Siculus obſerves, the Merchants bought here and tranſported into Gaul, and Diod. Sicul. l. 4. ſo by Land to Marſeilles, which is likewiſe affirmed by Poſidonius in Strabo; and from thence it was called the Celtick Tin by the Greeks. Strab. l. 3. But ſome of them had learnt it came from certain Iſlands called Caſſiterides, Herod. l. 3. but where they lay Herodotus confeſſeth he knew not. Strabo Strab. l. 3. ſaith, the Phœnicians traded to them, and conceal'd the Paſſage to that degree, that one of the Maſters rather choſe to ſtrand his Ship than diſcover it to the Romans, for which he was reimburſed out of the publick Stock. But after many Attempts, he ſaith, the Romans found the way of Trading thither, and he mentions P. Craſſus who was upon the Place and ſaw the way of digging and preparing their Metals, and taught the People the Art of Navigation. But Strabo diſtinguiſheth between the Caſſiterides and Britains. And Mr. Camden hath very well proved, Brit. p. 857. that the Iſlands of Silly were the Caſſiterides of the Greeks; and the Oeſtrymnides in Feſtus Avienus.

Whether the Phænicians Trade did extend any farther than thoſe Iſlands is uncertain, after all the Attempts which have been made of late to make them almoſt the Peoplers of Britain. A very learned Perſon had ingeniouſly conjectured, that the Name Britannia was derived from two Oriental Word, ברת Barath, which in the Syriack ſignifies a Field, and אנך Anac, which in the Hebrew ſignifies Tin or Lead; from hence he preſumes the ſame Signification continued in the Phænician Language; and from thence the Name Britannia came, as Strabo and others call it. This may paſs among the better ſort of Conjectures; but a bare Similitude in the Sounding of Words, where there are not ſufficient Teſtimonies to prove, that the People which uſed that Language did firſt give it, affords but a ſlender Foundation to build upon. It is poſſible the Phænicians might give names to thoſe Places about Britain which they traded to in their own Language, as the Engliſh have in Hudſon's-Bay, and the Spaniards in America, but the Dutch may give other names to the ſame Places; whereby they are called among them. Therefore to juſtifie this Etymology, it is not enough to ſhew, that in ſome parts of the Eaſt, thoſe Words bear ſuch a Senſe, but that the Phænicians uſed them ſo, and applied them to Britain; and that other Nations did take this Name from their Books, or Commerce with them. But it appears by Strabo they concealed their Trade to the Caſſiterides to the utmoſt, and therefore would not acquaint other Nations with ſuch a Name, as would be moſt apt to draw other Traders thither. For, what was this, but to boaſt to the World, that they had found out a whole Country of Lead and Tin? Which is far from the Practice of that Maſter of the Ship who choſe rather to loſe his Ship than to diſcover the Trade. So that the Phænicians would have called it by any other Name, rather than that, if theſe Words did ſignifie ſo among them. But I ſee no ground to believe, that the Phænicians did trade hither, before the flouriſhing of the Carthaginian State. For, who that Midacritus was that firſt brought Lead from the Caſſiterides, Pliny doth not inform us, nor at what time he lived. Bochartus reads it Melicarthus or Melcarthus the Phænician Hercules in Sanchoniathon. But he confeſſes Midacritus to be a Greek Word; and Piny ſaith nothing to prove he was a Phœnician; and juſt before ſpeaking of the refining of Gold he attributes it to Cadmus, and calls him the Phœnician. It is certain Strabo gave little credit to the Phœnicians Stories of their Navigations in the elder times; and he blames Eratoſthenes for believing them; and by Hanno's Voyage it appear how little they had then diſcovered beyond Hercules's Pillars. For Cerne was no farther beyond them on the African Coaſt, than it was from Carthage to them. I will not deny that Himilco came farther this way, at the ſame time, being ſent out for Diſcoveries; but all the account we have of that is what is preſerved in Feſtus Avienus, who profeſſeth to follow the Punick Annals; where he mentions the Oeſtrymnides rich in Lead and Tin, full of People who were skilful in Trading, near the Iſland of the Hiberni and that of Albion; and that it was four Months Voyage from Carthage thither. Now if Feſtus Avienus may be credited, Himilco firſt diſcovered theſe Iſlands which were diſtant from Britain, and Albion was the Name uſed in the Punick Annals.

It is aſſerted by a late learned Writer of our own, that Britain was wholly unknown of old to the Greeks; and that the very Name of Britain cannot be found in any Greek Writings before Cæſar's time. An Aſſertion I could not read without wonder, conſidering the Greek Authors mentioned by Strabo and Pliny who had writ concerning it; ſuch as Timæus, Iſidorus, Charaeenus, Pytheas, Dicæarchus, Eratoſthenes, Poſidonius, and Polybius. It is true, their Works are now loſt; and Strabo finds fault with ſeveral things ſaid by them? But what then? Doth this prove that Britain was not then known to the Greeks, becauſe their Works are not now to be found? Did they ſay nothing true, becauſe they ſaid ſomething that was not? And yet even Pytheas of Marſeilles is now juſtified in what Strabo moſt accuſes him of, viz. his Deſcription of Thule; whereas a preſent ingenious and learned Perſon hath undertaken ſo far to juſtifie Pytheas therein that he ſaith, one might have ſuſpected ſome modern Geographer had inſerted it into Strabo. But from hence it appears, that Britain was known to the Greeks before Cæſar's time; and therefore it ſeems to be a piece of Artifice in Cæſar to pretend ſo great Ignorance of Britain when he came thither, thereby to heighten the Glory of his Enterpriſe.

Having thus ſhewed that there was a ſufficient Trade even in Britain to found ſuch a mixt Colony of Romans and Natives at London, and that it was the Metropolis where the Roman Governour had his Reſidence; I proceed to the Third Enquiry.

III. Concerning the Temple of Diana ſuppoſed to ſtand where the Foundations of S. Paul's are ſince laid. Which Mr. Camden gives countenance to, from the Camera Dianæ not far from it, and from the Number of Oxes Heads taken up in Ed. I's time; and from the Ceremony of bringing the Stags-Head to S. Paul's by the Family of Bawds in Eſſex. Of which laſt a true Account is given in the Hiſtory of S. Paul's. As to the Camera Dianæ, which appears ſtill in the Books, Mr. Stow hath given the beſt account of it; viz. That they were only Lodgings for Roſamond in H. II's time, from whence there was a ſecret Paſſage to the King's Palace at Baynard's Caſtle; which, as Mr. Camden ſaith, ſome thought was only a part of the old Royal Palace which ſtood on the Weſt-ſide of the City. This Leland and Camden both ſay, was that which Fitz Stephen calls the Palatine Tower on the Weſt ſide of the City; and in the place where that ſtood, the two Caſtles called Baynard's and Mount Fitchet were afterwards built. For when by the Charter of 4 E. 1. extant in Stow, a Licence was given to R. Kilwarby by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, to pull down the Tower of Mount-Fitchet, it was that he might build the Church or Convent of Black Friars in the ſame place. And withal it is there expreſſed, that the Biſhop of London had obtained the Stones of William the Conquerour to reedifie the upper part of S. Paul's-Church. But a little after, through great Incogitancy, Mr. Stow makes the ſame Tower to ſtand on the other ſide the Fleet, where Bridewell ſtands: For he mentions the ſame Gift of King William to Mauritius of the choice Stones of his Caſtle ſtanding near the Thames, at the Weſt end of the City; but in that very place Black-Friars was built by Kilwarby, and therefore it muſt ſtand where that did.

But to take away all Suſpicion of any Temple to Diana being built where S. Paul's ſtands; I ſhall a little farther examine the Truth of this Tradition, and that will be by conſidering by whom Diana ſhould be worſhipped in that place. For it muſt have been either by the Britains, or by the Romans, or by the Saxons; but if by none of theſe, then it will be allow'd, there was no ſuch Temple here. The Saxons are not ſuſpected to have had any particular kindneſs for Diana, and therefore it belongs to the other too.

As to the Britains I ſhall prove, both that they had no ſuch Deity; and if they had, they would not have worſhip'd her in that manner.

It will hardly be thought, that the Worſhip of Diana Perſica ſhould be propagated among the Britains, which beſt agrees with this Fancy; for Plutarch ſaith, Oxen were ſacred to her. But we never read that Brutus travelled ſo far as Perſia, to bring a Diana from thence: For the Diana he worſhipped was among the Greek Iſles, from whom he received his Oracle. Therefore it cannot be Diana Taurica, which was a Scythian Deity, and worſhipped with Human Sacrifices. Lucan doth parrallel the Worſhip of Taranis and of Diana; and Taranis was a Britiſh Deity But Taranis was not the ſame with Diana; ſo far from it, that he ſeems moſt like to the Roman's Jupiter Tonans, and the Thor of the Goths and Saxons. Neither can it be underſtood of the Greek Diana, the Huntſmen's Deity, the Daughter of Jupiter of Crete, called Britomartis by the Cretians; for Brutus himſelf worſhipped her with the Sacrifice of a White Doe; and the offering up ſo many Oxen was very improper to her. There remains yet another Diana, called Diana Lucifera in many Inſcriptions, and Diana Cæleſtis, i. e. the Moon. But it is agreed, that the Worſhip of the Gauls and Britains was the ſame; and Cæſar therein places the difference between the Religion of the Germans and Gauls, that the Germans worſhip'd only the Gods they ſaw, the Sun, and Vulcan, and the Moon; but the Gauls worſhipped Apollo againſt Diſeaſes, Minerva as the inventreſs of artificial Works, Jupiter as having the Power of the Heavens, Mars as God of War. But here is no place for Diana; which Cæſar would not have omitted, being ſo celebrated a Deity among the Romans; and if they had worſhipp'd the Moon, why doth he ſet it down ſo expreſly as to the Germans, and leave her quite out among the Gauls? And if they did worſhip the Moon, as the Germans did, wherein lay the mighty Difference, between thoſe who worſhipped viſible Deities and them?

But ſuppoſing the Britains did worſhip Diana, yet how come they to build a Temple to Diana, when it is ſo notorious, that the Druids performed all their Superſtitious Worſhip in Sacred Groves, which were all the Temples in Uſe among them. Lucan, Pliny, Tacitus, Maximus Tyrius, and Claudian, all atteſt this. And in this all the Northern Nations ſeem'd to have agreed. So Tacitus ſaith of the Germans; that they neither had Temples nor Images, but only conſecrated Groves. Cluverius ſaith, the Temple of Hertha was only her Grove; and Loccenius ſhews, Tanfana mentioned by Tacitus is no more than Luci Dominus, the God worſhipped in the Grove. Fan is Lord, and Tan is the Fir-tree. Tacitus mentions the Sacred Groves among the Batavi; Adamus Bremenſis ſaith, the old Saxons worſhipped well-ſpred Trees. Helmoldus ſaith, the Sclavi and Pruſſians worſhipped in Woods and Groves. Æneas Sylvius ſaith the ſame of the Lithuanians. Pet. de Duysberg ſaith, that the Crive, or Chief of the Pruſſian Druids, dwelt under under the great Oak of Romove, of an incredible Thickneſs; and they could not be removed from it till Boleſlaus, firſt King of Poland, cauſed it to be cut down. So that it would have been very ſtrange for the Britiſh Druids to have built a Temple to Diana. It remains therefore, that if there were any ſuch Temple, it muſt be built by the Romans, among whom Diana was in great Requeſt; and had been ſo very ſoon after the Foundation of their City, as is obſerved by Dionyſius Halicarnaſſæus and Feſtus. But it is as evident that Stags were the proper Sacrifices to Diana; but if they could not be had, Sheep were allowed, and a Sheep was then called Cervaria Ovis.

But Mr. Camden ſaith, the Tauropolia were kept in Honour of Diana. But they had no relation to Oxen, but to the Worſhip of Diana Taurica, as Mr. Selden hath ſhewed at large; and there were Taurobolia often mention'd in Gruter's Inſcriptions, which were Rights of Initiation to the Mater Deorum, and are deſcribed at large by Salmaſius. So that we can find no Ground at all for any Temple to Diana; and the Arguments hitherto produced for it, rather make againſt it.

But if any ſhould ask, Whether ſo remarkable a part of the City of London could be ſuppoſed, in the Roman times, to have been without any Temple at all? I anſwer, not; and if I may propoſe my Conjecture, I rather think there ſtood a Capitol, and that for theſe Reaſons: (1.) Moſt of the noted Colonies had Capitols erected in them, in Imitation of Rome; which not only Lipſius affirms to have been the common Cuſtom, but the ſeveral Capitols are mention'd by good Authors. That at Capua and at Beneventum by Suetonius; at Pompeij by Vitruvius; and of later times, at Florence by Politian; at Ravennæ by Hier. Rubeus; at Milan by Caſtellionæus; at Narbo Martius by Sidonius Apollonaris; at Tholouſe by Greg. Turonenſis; at Autan by Eumenius; at Veſontio by Chiffletius; and at Colonia Agrippina by Hadr. Valeſius, who mentions it as a general Cuſtom. (2.) The Situation of the Place makes it probable; it being the Rule in Vitruvius, that Capitols were to be erected in the higheſt and moſt conſpicuous Part of the City, as that is where St. Paul's ſtands. As the Temples to Mercury were to be built in the Forum or Emporium; to Apollo by the Theatre; to Mars without the City; and ſo to Ceres; to Venus at the Gates. (3.) The Agreeableneſs of the Sacrifices For Oxen were accounted the moſt noble Sacrifices, and ſo moſt proper for the Worſhip performed in the Capitol. Et maxima Taurus Victima, ſaith Virgil. Servius obſerves, that thoſe who went up to the Capitol in Triumph ſacrificed white Oxen. And again, Ubique Jovi Juvencum legimus immolatum. And Feſtus, in Opima Spolia, Jovi Feretrio Bovem cædito, which he ſaith was a Law of Numa. In the Columna Trajani, there are Oxen ready to be ſacrificed when he went up to the Capitol. And Joh. Sariſburienſis, upbraiding Gilbert Biſhop of London for attempting to reſtore the Metropolitan See to London, becauſe it was there in the Roman times, he ſaith, Cultum Jovis inſtaurare diſponit; he makes as if he would ſet up the Worſhip of Jupiter again; which ſhews, that he believed a Temple to Jupiter to have been here in the Roman Times; and his Teſtimony is more conſiderable than that of the Monks, who being poſſeſſed with the Story of Brutus and his Troy novant, could think of nothing but his ſetting up a Temple to Diana, in remembrance of her Oracle, who directed him firſt to Britain.

IV. I now come to the laſt part of my deſign, which is, to give an Account of the firſt Foundation of the Cathedral Church of St. Paul's by King Ethelbert.

After that by the Influence of his Queen Bertha, and the Perſuaſions of Auguſtin the Monk, (ſent hither on purpoſe by Gregory the Great) Ethelbert had embraced the Chriſtian Faith, the firſt thing he took care of was to have Churches erected for the publick Worſhip of God. For when Auguſtin came firſt over, Bede ſaith, that he and his Brethren performed all Offices of Religion in the Queen's Church, called the Church of St. Martins on the Eaſt ſide of the City of Canterbury, which had been built in the time of the Romans: But when there was ſo great Progreſs made towards the Converſion of the People, as to have the King own himſelf a Chriſtian, then a new Cathedral Church was fitted up at Canterbury, being the Place deſigned for the Archbiſhop's See. To this end, he obtained from the King the Grant of the Ruins of an old Church in the Roman times; which being by the King's Munificence raiſed to a greater Splendor, was dedicated to the Honour of our Bleſſed Saviour, and deſigned to be the Metropolitical See. For although, according to Pope Gregory's Model, London was ſtill to have been the chief See, as it had been in the Britiſh times; yet Canterbury being then the Royal Seat of King Ethelbert, it is moſt reaſonable to ſuppoſe, that by his Authority it came to be fixed there. For otherwiſe what Reaſon had Auguſtin to vary from the Inſtructions of his Maſter? Gregory having declared London and York to be the two Metropolitan Sees, and ſeveral times calling him Biſhop of London: And yet ſoon after the Receipt of thoſe Letters brought by Mellitus (after Biſhop of London) the Metropolitical See was fixed at Canterbury. Which either ſhews Auguſtin's Diſobedience to the Pope's Authority, or the King's Power to order what concerns the external Polity of the Church. For the Monks who ſay, the See was fixed there afterwards out of Honour to Auguſtin, do not conſider that Bede ſaith that Auguſtin fixed the See in Chriſt's Church for himſelf and his Succeſſors. Which ſhews, that it was not done by others after his Death, but by himſelf, while as yet Pope Gregory was living; as appears by comparing the latter end of the firſt with the beginning of the 2d Book of Bede. And the Year before Gregory's Death, he had conſecrated Mellitus Biſhop of London, which Bede ſaith was done A. D. 604. and Gregory died not till A. D. 605.

This Mellitus was ſent with Juſtus, Paulinus, Rufinianus, and others, to aſſiſt in the great Work of converting the Saxons from their Idolatry; and he was pitched upon as the fitteſt Perſon to be employ'd in ſettling Chriſtianity among the Eaſt Saxons, over whom King Ethelbert had at that time great Power, not only becauſe Sebert their King was his Nephew, being his Siſter's Son, but becauſe he had brought all the other Saxon Kings on this ſide Humber, to own a Subjection to him, as Bede ſeveral times affirms. Mellitus was very kindly receiv'd by Sebert, and Chriſtianity for the time embrac'd by his People, and eſpecially at London, which then continued (as Bede, Malmsbury, and Huntingdon all ſay) a noble Emporium, famous for the Trade which it ſtill maintained into foreign Parts.

Here by the incouragement of Sebert and of Ethelbert, two Churches were deſigned (as is ſaid) by Mellitus; the one within the City to the Memory of St. Paul, and the other at a diſtance from it, in an Iſland then called Thorney, to St. Peter's. Both theſe are called Minſters, i. e. Monaſteries; for from St. Auguſtin's time the Clergy living together with their Biſhop, do bear the Name of a Monaſtery. But theſe were of two different kinds; that which ſtood in a place of Retirement, as Weſtminſter then did, was intended for a Nurſery to the Church, wherein Perſons might be bred up in a way of Devotion and Learning, to fit them for farther ſervice, when they ſhould be taken out; but the other was made up of ſuch who were actually imploy'd in the daily Offices; or ſent up and down by the Biſhop to ſuch Places as he thought fit, for inſtructing the People. This ſeemed to have been Gregory's deſign, when he ſent Mellitus and the reſt over, that, where-ever they ſettled a Church they ſhould take care of both theſe Foundations. So Gotſelin in his Life of St. Auguſtin ſaith, that Ethelbert after his Converſion took care to eſtabliſh two things, Epiſcopia & Monaſteria; which he preſently after calls Eccleſiæ, & Cœnobia, i. e. Cathedral Churches and Nurſeries of Religion and Learning, to fit Men for the Service of the Church. And that the firſt Monaſteries here were ſo deſigned, appears by the Education of Perſons therein for the Service of this Church. For although at firſt they were forced to make uſe of Foreigners, yet after a reaſonable time the Engliſh were bred up ſo, as to be capable of the higheſt Dignities in the Church. For immediately after the Death of Gregory's own Diſciples, viz. Auguſtin, Laurentius, Mellitus, Juſtus and Honorius, who were ſucceſſively Archbiſhops of Canterbury, the next who ſucceeded, was an Engliſhman born among the Weſt Saxons, who was called by a Latin Name Deuſdedit; and after him by the conſent of the Kings of Northumberland and Kent, Wighardus another Engliſhman was choſen in his Place, one highly commended by Bede for his Learning: and ſo at Rocheſter, Ithamar a Kentiſhman ſucceeded Paulinus, and comparable, ſaith Bede, to his Predeceſſors, either for Life or Doctrine. He was the firſt Engliſhman advanced in the Church, ſaith Malmsbury, and brought a Reputation to the Nation by his Excellent Learning: to whom Damianus ſucceeded who was a South Saxon. Theſe I inſtance in to ſhew that before the coming of Theodore, care was taken to breed up Perſons in Learning, for the Service of the Church: and Bede takes great care to ſhow how well the Monaſteries were furniſhed to that purpoſe; and how he was brought up himſelf ſo, under Ceolfrid from ſeven years old. He tells how many Journeys to Rome, Benedict Biſcop took to provide the beſt Books for their Library: and he ſpeaks of the Diviſion of his time, between Praying, Studying, Writing, and Inſtructing others. And where Bede ſpeaks of Sigebert's appointing a School among the Eaſt Angles for the Education of Youth, he ſaith, that Felix Biſhop of the Dioceſe, provided Maſters and Tutors for them, according to the Cuſtom at Canterbury Now this Sigebert was contemporary with Eadbaldus Son to Ethelbert; and Felix was Biſhop of the Eaſt Angles while Honorius was Archbiſhop and Paulinus Biſhop of Rocheſter: From whence it follows, that at Canterbury, there was care taken in the Monaſtery there founded, for Maſters and Tutors; in order to the Education of fit Perſons for the Churches Service. And Bede mentions the great Number of Books which Gregory ſent to Auguſtin, as ſoon as he heard of his Succeſs; which were laid up in the Monaſtery of St. Auguſtin; but the M S. Chronicle of that Abby gives a very ſlender account of them: the chief whereof are, the Biblia Gregoriana, Pſalterium Auguſtini, wherein was contained the ordinary Offices then uſed of Pſalms and Hymns; Textus Evangeliorum with Ten Canons in the beginning. Another Pſalter divided into Five Books; with Notes and Directions for the uſing and underſtanding it: and Hymns at the end. And then it is ſaid, Hæ ſunt primitiæ Librorum totius Eccleſiæ Anglicanæ: but certainly theſe could not be the Codices plurimi, which Bede ſaith, were ſent; but we know what diſtinction there was made of Monaſteries and Libraries in the time of the Danes; and Thorn takes notice of the loſs of many Books by a Fire, Anno Dom. 1168.

Chronic. W.Thorn. c. 12.

The like care we have reaſon to believe was taken in other Dioceſes as well as that of Canterbury and the Eaſt Angles; eſpecially where we have ſuch evidence of the building a Cathedral Church and a Monaſtery, as there was by Mellitus, in the Dioceſe of London. Bede indeed ſaith no more than that Ethelbert, cauſed the Church of St. Paul*'s* to be built in London for an Epiſcopal See, for Mellitus and his Succeſſors. H. Huntingdon keeps cloſe to Bede, and takes notice only of St. Paul's being built by Ethelbert, for a Biſhop's See, which he ſaith, was richly endowed by him. And Gotſelin of St. Bertins, who lived before Malmsbury, and was eſteemed by him next to Bede, mentions only an Epiſcopal See, as ſettled by Ethelbert at London. But William of Malmsbury, not only ſaith, that the Biſhop of London had his See fixed in the Church of St. Paul, which was built by King Ethelbert; but that Mellitus built a Monaſtery to St. Peter in the Weſtern Part of the City, being admoniſhed, as is ſaid, to do it by a Meſſage from St. Peter; and then follows the Legend of St. Peter's being ſeen to conſecrate the Church himſelf by a Fiſherman, who brought him over the River in his Ferry-boat: which, he ſaith, was ſo firmly believed, that it had no other Conſecration. Florence of Worceſter takes no notice of Weſtminſter, but only ſaith that Ethelbert built the Church of St. Paul in this Metropolis of London. But others ſay, that Ethelbert built the Church of St. Paul, and Sebert his Nephew that of St. Peter at Thorney, now called, (from the Church) Weſtminſter; ſo Sporely the Monk of Weſtminſter; and another old Chronicle; and Sulcardus who lived in the Conqueror's time, makes Sebert alone the Founder of that Church. To which the Charter of King Edgar the Confeſſor agrees; but in that of Edward the Confeſſor, it is only ſaid, that it was built in the time of Mellitus; but Ailredus where he gives an account of King Edward's Foundation, ſaith that Sebert built the Church of St. Paul within the Walls of London and honoured it with the Epiſcopal See of Mellitus; and without the Walls Weſtward he founded a Monaſtery to the Honour of St. Peter and richly endowed it. But when the New Church was built at Weſtminſter by Henry III. (the Old Church of King Edward being pulled down) which Stow ſaith, was Fifty Years in building; then Walſingham tells us, the Body of King Sebert was tranſlated from his Sepulchre in the Old Church into the New; he being the firſt Founder of a Church there; and his Body having been buried there about 700 Years before. So that upon the whole matter it appears moſt probable that King Ethelbert founding the Church of St. Paul in the City and eſtabliſhing the Epiſcopal See therein; Sebert to ſhew his readineſs to promote Chriſtianity here complied with Mellitus his deſires in founding a Monaſtery at Weſtminſter for a Seminary to the Church of Eaſt Saxons, over which he was Biſhop. So Baronius rightly underſtands it when he calls it amplum Seminarium a large Nurſery for the Church of England; which ſhews, that he believed it to have been firſt deſigned for the Education of Perſons for the Service of the Church; and not for a Monaſtery of Benedictin Monks, whoſe buſineſs it was to work with their Hands, when their Offices were performed in the Choire; as appears by the Benedictin Rule, which they are ſtrictly bound to obſerve.

Baron. To. 8. A. D. 610. *n.*10.

The Church of St. Paul being thus built by King Ethelbert and the Epiſcopal See eſtabliſhed, the next thing was to ſettle a Society of his Clergy, who were to live together, under his care and inſpection, and to attend the publick Offices of Religion in the Cathedral, or where the Biſhop ſhould appoint them. And that there was ſuch a Body of the Clergy here fixed by Ethelbert, appears by a Charter of William the Conqueror, wherein he grants to God and St. Paul and his Servants the Twenty four Hides of Land, which Ethelbert gave to the Church of St. Paul when he founded it; and therein large Privileges are confirmed and granted to them. The meaning of this Charter is beſt underſtood by Doomſday-Book, wherein a particular Account is given of the Lands then held by the Canons of St. Paul; which for the moſt part are the ſame which they enjoy to this day. In the Charter of King Ethelbert mentioned in the Appendix, the Mannor of Tillingham is given ad Monaſterii ſui ſolatium. King Athelſtan in his Charters mentions the Lands given to the Monaſtery of St. Paul and the Privileges by King Sebba, which are confirmed by him. King Edgar in his Charter beſtows Land in Monaſterium S. Pauli: and ſo doth Egelſeda his Queen. King Ethelred Father to Edward the Confeſſor gives Land to St. Paul ejuſque Eccleſiæ Fratribus, and to the Brethren of his Church. In another Charter of his they are called Terræ Monaſterii B. Pauli, the Lands belonging to the Monaſtery of St. Paul's. In a Charter of King Cnute all the Lands were confirmed which were given ad augmentum Monaſterii B. Pauli, &c. In a Charter of William the Conqueror he reſtores ſome Lands which had been taken from the Church of St. Paul's and calls them Terras Monaſterii S. Pauli, &c. Theſe things I mention to ſhew that there was a Society of the Clergy upon the firſt building of the Church who lived together under the Government of the Biſhop, and had Lands given them by ſeveral Kings before the Conqueſt (or the building of the great Church begun by Mauricius) and appropriated to their uſe.

This Body of the Clergy ſo living together went then under the Title of a Monaſtery. And ſuch a one was called Monaſterium Epiſcopale by Marianus Scotus; and Monaſterium Canonicorum in the Capitulars; ſuch Clergy being then called the Canons of the Church. Of which a twofold Reaſon is given; either firſt from their inrollment among the Members of the Church, which Roll was called Canon; or from their having their ſhares out of a common Stock. Canon ſignifying a certain payment and ſo uſed among the Romans, as appears by Aſconius Pedianus; thence the Canon Frumentarius in the Theodoſian Code; Canon Veſtium, Canonica penſitatio; and the Canonici Tituli in a Law of Valentinian: and Agobardus mentions the Canonicum which was a certain proportion of Corn, which ſome People paid to Perſons, whom they believ'd could ſecure the reſt while growing, from the force of ill Weather. And ſo Præbenda ſignified a certain allowance of Diet among the Romans, to Souldiers and others; and the Proportions of Bread allow'd by the Imperial Laws to the Citizens of Rome and Conſtantinople were called Panes Præbendarii; which were ſet out according to the Canon Frumentarius. Both which words came afterwards into the uſe of the Church; when there came to be allowances made out of the Common Stock to particular Perſons. In St. Cyprian's time we read of the Sportulantes Fratres, and the Diviſiones menſurnæ; which ſhews that the Clergy had their ſhares then allow'd them, which the Biſhop had the diſtribution of. This Stock did in thoſe times of Perſecution ariſe out of the Benevolence of the Chriſtians; but when Chriſtianity came to be ſettled, Conſtantine did make a large allowance to the Clergy of the Cities, by a legal Eſtabliſhment, beſides the Donations of particular Perſons. This is expreſly affirmed by Sozomen, viz. that Conſtantine did ſet apart a ſhare of the Publick Revenue to the Clergy of every City, which he confirmed by a Law: which Law, ſaith he, remains ſtill in force, being only repealed in the time of Julian. By vertue of which Law, the City Clergy were well provided for, throughout the Roman Empire; and in Gregory's time, there were annual Præbends paid to them; as appears by an Epiſtle of his to the Biſhop of Meſſina; wherein he charges him to pay to the Clergy their annual allowance, according to Cuſtom. But when a New Church was to be founded here among the Saxons, Gregory adviſed Auguſtin to follow the Primitive pattern in the Church of Jeruſalem, viz. for the Biſhop and his Clergy to have all things in Common. It ſeems by Auguſtin's Queſtion, his deſire was to know what ſhare was to be reſerved to the Biſhop out of the Common Stock; Gregory tells him that at Rome indeed, the Biſhop had his ſhare diſtinct from the Clergy; but he could not adviſe ſuch a Diſtribution in the beginning of a Church, as the caſe was then in England. And it is plain from hence, that he deſigned to ſet up here that Courſe of Life, as to the Biſhop and his Clergy, which had been firſt brought into the Weſtern Church by Euſebius of Vercelles, and follow'd by Simplicianus at Milan and St. Auguſtin at Hippo. And the Clergy Men ſo living, from adding a particular Rule to the general obligation of Church-men, were in after-times, called Canonici Regulares, which as Petrus de Marca obſerves, is no ſuch impropriety, as is commonly thought; ſince the former only relates to their being in Canone, i. e. among the Clergy; and the latter to their obligation, to live together after a peculiar Rule. But I do not find that Auguſtin did follow this Counſel; and the Reaſon I ſuppoſe was, becauſe he found Ethelbert in ſo good a Diſpoſition to make a ſettlement of ſufficient Revenues to maintain both the Biſhop and Clergy as diſtinct from each other. So that the Original Endowment of the Engliſh Church, is not to be conſtrued according to the quadripartite or tripartite Diviſion, ſo often mention'd in other Churches of the Oblations of the Faithful: but according to the intention and deſign of ſuch pious Founders of Cathedral Churches, as King Ethelbert was. Who not only built the Church of St. Paul, and gave Lands to maintain the Biſhop; but he

he made a ſettlement, for the maintance of the Clergy, as a diſtinct Body, (but under the Government of the Biſhop) as appears by the Charters already mentioned. But before I conclude this Diſcourſe, I ſhall briefly endeavour to make out the uſefulneſs of Cathedral Churches in a Chriſtian Kingdom, in a three-fold Reſpect.

(1.) To the Biſhop of the Dioceſe.
(2.) To the Publick Worſhip of God.
(3.) To the Propagation of Religion.

(1.) As to the Biſhop of the Dioceſe.

The Clergy being ſettled under the Eye and Care of the Biſhop, were not only ready to attend the Publick Service in the Church, but to aſſiſt as an Eccleſiaſtical Senate to him in the great affairs of his Dioceſe. Thence Ignatius calls the Presbyters of the Church (in conjunction with the Biſhop) a Divine Council; and Origen, a Senate in every City of God's own appointing; anſwering to the Collegium Decurionum in every Roman Corporation. St. Cyprian very frequently mentions his Compresbyters as ſitting with him. At Rome, the College of Presbyters not only governed the affairs of the Church in the vacancy of the See, as appears by St. Cyprian's Epiſtles; but he ſaith, that the Clergy there ſat all together with the Biſhop, and made up a holy and venerable Senate. Et nos habemus in Eccleſiâ Senatum noſtrum, cœtum Presbyterorum, ſaith, St. Jerom: where he writes without provocation. The Author of the Commentary on the Epiſtles in St. Ambroſe's Works, wonders how in ſome Places, the Council of Presbyters came not to be ſo much regarded; which he imputes to ſloth on one ſide, and Pride on the other: But that it was not commonly ſo, appears by St. Jerom's Words, who ſaith the Chriſtian Church had ſtill ſuch a Senate of Presbyters. The 4th Council of Carthage, voids the Sentence of a Biſhop, if he gave it without the Advice of his Clergy. St. Chryſoſtom ſaith, the Presbyters had their ſhare in the Government of the Church. And therefore it is no wonder if the Deans and Chapters of this Church, have had time out of Mind, any part of the Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction committed to them. And by the Canon Law, the Dean or Archipresbyter hath a Right of Viſitation of the Churches within his Juriſdiction, as Alteſerra proves. For the Ancient Power of the Presbyters, under the Biſhop, upon the great increaſe of the Clergy, came to be fixed, by a kind of devolution upon thoſe who were neareſt to the Biſhop, and ſo more capable of Aſſiſting in the affairs of the Dioceſe. So Claudius Fonteius, a late learned Divine of Turin having undertaken to clear the Ancient Right of Presbyters in the Government of the Church in ſubordination to the Biſhops, he intended to ſhew, if he had lived, how that Right came to be devolved upon the Deans and Chapters of Cathedral Churches. Joh. Molanus ſaith, the Clergy who reſide in Cathedral Churches are, Epiſcopi Confratres, Conſiliarii & Aſſeſſores, and preſently after he calls them Senatum Eccleſiæ. Thence the Canon Laws calls the Dignities and Prebends of the Cathedral Churches membra Epiſcopatus; of which Molanus gives this Account, becauſe by their firſt Inſtitution, they were deſigned for ſuch, who were to be opitulatores & co-operarii Epiſcopalis ſolicitudinis: and ſo Card. Palæotus calls them in the Diſcourſe he made to

to the Canons of his Church of Bononia; and he proves, that they are the Biſhops Counſel by the Canon Law, as well as by the Teſtimonies of the Fathers. Theſe, as Hallier obſerves, are ſaid to be à latere Epiſcopi; as the Legats à latere were thoſe which the Biſhop of Rome ſent from his own Clergy, or Conſiſtory; for none but ſuch, as the Canoniſts tell us, can be ſaid to be à latere though ſent by the Pope, and his own Attendents. And thoſe of his Conſiſtory do plead that the Pope cannot diſpatch any great affairs of the Church without their Advice, as appears by the Clauſe in his Bulls de Fratrum noſtrorum Conſilio. But it is warmly debated among the Canoniſts how far the Pope is bound to take and to follow their Advice. Card. Palæotus ſaith, ſome went ſo far as to null all Acts that are done without it; chiefly for this Reaſon, becauſe thoſe who deny the Neceſſity of it, yet all grant it to be de honeſtate, and therefore the acting without it is contra honeſtatem, which, ſay they, renders the Act void in Law. But although he denies the Conſequence, yet he grants that there is an Obligation on the Pope to take the Advice of his Conſiſtory; which he proves by many Arguments in the fore-going Sections; and the firſt is from the Parity of Reaſon as to a Biſhop and his Chapter; who, ſaith he, Jure Communi is bound to make uſe of it; and the College of Cardinals hath the ſame reſpect to the Pope, which the Chapter hath to a Biſhop; who are by the Canon Law ſtiled Concilium and Senatus Epiſcopi, as Barboſa and Antonius Frances confeſs. But that which is far more material to us, is, that by our Common Law; it is ſaid, That the Dean and Chapter were appointed as a Council to the Biſhop; with whom he is to conſult in Caſes of Difficulty, to which purpoſe every Biſhop habet Cathedram; and who are to conſent to every grant, &c. And in the Caſe of the Dean and Chapter of Norwich, their being is declared to be ſo neceſſary, that although they ſhould depart with their Poſſeſſions, yet for neceſſity the Corporation doth remain, as well to aſſiſt the Biſhop in his Calling, as to give their Aſſent, &c.

(2.) The Cathedral Churches being thus eſtabliſhed in the Biſhop, and his Clergy, all things were to be ſo ordered as might the moſt tend to the ſolemn Performance of the Publick Worſhip of God; which was another End of the firſt Inſtitution of them, and an Argument of their Uſefulneſs. For in the beginning of a Church it was neceſſary for the Biſhops to have an Eye to two things; firſt to ſet up the publick Worſhip in the moſt decent and ſolemn Manner, and in the Places of greateſt Reſort; and this was the Foundation of Cathedral Churches; the ſecond was to gain as many Converts as they could in diſperſed Places, and to let them want nothing that was neceſſary to the Chriſtian Profeſſion, and this was the Foundation of Parochial Churches: which were as the Synagogues to the Temple at Jeruſalem; being built for the Conveniency of thoſe who could not attend the ſolemn Worſhip of God in the Temple. So it was in the Chriſtian Church; every Cathedral in its firſt Inſtitution was as the Temple to the whole Dioceſe, where the Worſhip was to be performed in the moſt decent, conſtant and ſolemn Manner; for which End it was neceſſary to have ſuch a Number of Eccleſiaſtical Perſons there attending, as might ſtill be ready to do all the Offices which did belong to the Chriſtian Church. Such as Conſtant Prayers, and Hymns, and Preaching, and Celebration of Sacraments; which were to be kept up in ſuch a Church as the daily Sacrifice was in the Temple. Not only for the ſatisfaction of all Perſons who deſire to know what the Manner of our Worſhip is, but that all devout Perſons may certainly know whither to go at certain Hours to offer up their Prayers and Thankſgivings to God, and that in the moſt publick and ſolemn Manner. And upon this Ground the Inſtitution of Cathedral Churches among Chriſtians was a very pious and reaſonable thing. For granting that all that is meerly neceſſary to Salvation may be had in Parochial Churches, yet muſt thoſe who profeſs themſelves Chriſtians, look at nothing in the Worſhip of God beyond what is plainly neceſſary? It can never be proved neceſſary to Salvation to have Parochial Churches well built, or decent Pulpits or Pews in them, or to go to thoſe Churches in a more orderly Dreſs than they ſit in at home, or to have the Pſalms ſet to the beſt Tunes, or to have their Bibles handſomely bound; yet there is ſuch a becoming Decency in theſe things, as argues, that what relates to God and his Worſhip, ought to have ſomething above what is barely neceſſary. For to give God no more than juſt what is neceſſary, is as if we thought we had a hard bargain of it, when we were required to ſerve him. Shall Ingenuity, Gratitude, Generoſity, Beneficence have no Influence on what relates to the Publick Worſhip of God in the World? But if the greater Solemnity of Divine Worſhip makes for the greater Honour of Religion, then there ariſes an Obligation to promote it proportionable to the Concernment we have therein. It is certain the Worſhip of God in his Temple might have been performed after a ſort by a far leſs Number of Men, without the Courſes of Singers and Levites, and Prieſts of ſeveral Ranks, who were required to attend it. But God would be worſhiped in a way becoming his Greatneſs and Majeſty. It is true he hath not laid ſuch a ſtrict Law upon the Chriſtian Church, as to the Solemnities of Worſhip, but we are obliged to do whatſoever things are orderly, decent, and of good Report. Phil. 4. 8. So that we are only to enquire, whether ſuch a ſolemn way of worſhipping God be of this Nature, and if it appear to be ſo, we are obliged to promote and maintain it. And who is ſo fit a Judge of what becomes his Service as God himſelf? Would he have ſuffered any Indecency in his Worſhip, becauſe there were Types and Shadows among the Jews? What did the Pſaltery, and Harp, and Organs, and Ten-ſtringed Inſtruments, and loud ſounding Cymbals ſignifie? Why ſhould the harſh unpleaſing Voices and unskilful Singing of common People be thought more agreeable to Goſpel-worſhip, than grave and melodious, vocal and inſtrumental Muſick? And why ſhould the beſt Harmony in the Worſhip of God be thought a Jewiſh Diſpenſation? It is a great miſtake in thoſe that look on all things practiſed in the Jewiſh Church as Ritual and Ceremonial, which related to the Worſhip of God. For there were many Circumſtances uſed and allow'd, which had no relation to the Ceremonial Law, but were taken up as fit Expreſſions of Natural Decency, and helping to ſet forth the Solemnity of Divine Worſhip. Of this kind I ſuppoſe the Muſick of the Temple to have been, for there was no Inſtitution of it in the Ceremonial Law; which was ſo complete in its kind, that there was a Command not to add to it; Deu. 44.8. 12, 32. which extended to Princes and Prophets as well as others. And although God by his Prophets did lay other Commands on the People, yet he added not to the Ceremonial Law; but rather ſuch as interpreted and mollified the ſtrictneſs of it, and made the Ritual Service

6. 31. the Publick Worſhip came to be ſettled in David's time by the reſting of the Ark, then it is ſaid, that David appointed the conſtant Service of the Choire; for the words are, And theſe are they whom David ſet

did himſelf compoſe Anthems, which were conſtantly uſed with thoſe of, there was not only a great Regard had to the Levitical Service appointed by the Law, but to this particular Inſtitution of David. So of 23. 18. Jehoiada, that he appointed the Offices of the Houſe of the Lord by the of the Lord with Cymbals, Pſalteries, and Harps, according to the Commandment of David, and Gad the King's Seer, and Nathan the Prophet;

for ſo was the Commandment of God by his Prophets. Which words are on purpoſe added, leaſt all this ſhould be thought an illegal Impoſition, by virtue of David's Royal Authority, without God's particular Approbation.
And after the Return of the Jews from the Captivity, this was one of the firſt things ſet up with reſpect to the Worſhip of God;
Ezr. 3. 10. for we read, when the Builders laid the Foundation of the Temple of the Lord, they ſet the Prieſts in their Apparel with Trumpets, and the Levites
the Sons of Aſaph, with Cymbals to praiſe the Lord, after the Ordinance of David King of Iſrael. And they ſung together by courſe in praiſing
and giving thanks unto the Lord, becauſe he is good, for his mercy endureth for ever towards Iſrael. And this Cuſtom, as far as we can learn, continued as long as the Jewiſh Temple ſtood, and therefore was conſtantly obſerved in our Saviour's time; who was frequently preſent at the

the Temple Muſick, which begun in Courſe as ſoon as the Oblation was over. In the time of offering the Incenſe the Solemn Prayers began, both Morning and Evening; and when the Daily Sacrifice was at an end the Choir began their Service. The former no one queſtions, was a part of Natural Religion added to the Ceremonial Worſhip, and there is no Reaſon to queſtion the latter to have been of the ſame kind; but had more expreſs Divine Approbation by the Prophets than in being at the time of David's firſt Inſtitution of it. By whom the Publick and Solemn Prayers were firſt appointed, we have no certainty; but we know that the uſe of the Quire was firſt appointed by no leſs a Perſon than David, a Man after God's own Heart; who would therefore never ſet up a Way of Worſhip any ways unſuitable to the Divine Nature. And it ſeems very unreaſonable to think David's Pſalms ſtill fit to be uſed, and the way of ſinging them, which himſelf appointed, viz. in Inſtrumental as well as Vocal Muſick, to be unbecoming the Chriſtian Church; for how comes one to be Typical and Ceremonial and not the other? If there be any thing indecent in the former, i. e. it be light and vain, on that account it ought to be rejected as unſuitable to Divine Worſhip; but if it be grave and ſolemn, apt to compoſe or elevate the Mind in Acts of Devotion towards God, it is not eaſie to underſtand, why it ſhould not be very agreeable to the Nature and Deſign of Publick Worſhip. And a very learned Perſon had undertaken to make out that the uſing both theſe ſorts of Muſick in the Worſhip of God is one of thoſe things which are common to all Religion (as he particularly deſigned to prove out of the Oriental Books) and therefore ought to be look'd on as a Dictate of Reaſon and Natural Religion; not ſtrictly taken for the Neceſſary Duties of it, but for what is naturally Decent and becoming the Worſhip of God. And ſo much at preſent may ſuffice as to this part of the Cathedral Service; as to others I have occaſion to give an account of them in another place.

Jac. Golius in Epiſt. ad Diſſert. de Organ. p. 72.

(3.) As to the Propagation of Religion. For the Biſhop and his Clergy being united together in one Body, he knew better how to direct and imploy them in ſeveral Places abroad in order to their Converſion and Eſtabliſhment; and by their returning back to him, he had a conſtant and certain Account of the Affairs of his Dioceſe. And this was generally the means whereby moſt Countries were converted to the Chriſtian Faith; the Biſhop and his Clergy leading very Regular Lives together, and when they went or were ſent abroad, it was with a deſign only to do Good among them, and ſo to return to their Society again. And this continued till ſuch time as Pariſhes were divided; which was not near ſo ſoon as is commonly thought. It is generally ſaid, that Pariſhes were divided in the Saxon Churches in the time of Honorius Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who was one of Gregory's Diſciples; and the learned Author of the Antiquitates Britannicæ, is produced for it. Mr. Cambden follows his Authority: for he alledges none elſe. But whoſoever conſiders the Circumſtances of that time will find no Reaſon to believe it; this Church being ſo little ſettled before Theodore's coming, and hardly capable of a Diviſion into Pariſhes then; ſo that had it not been for the Cathedral Foundations, there had been no tolerable Subſiſtence for thoſe who were to carry on that difficult Work of Converting the Saxon Idolaters: but the great Advantage was, that the Cathedral Churches being firſt endow'd by the Munificence of the firſt Chriſtian Princes, they were thereby enabled to conquer the many Difficulties required. And it is obſervable afterwards, in the Reformations ſpoken of, there was not only a great Regard had to the Levitical Service appointed by the Law, but to this particular Inſtitution of David. So of 23. 18. Jehoiada, that he appointed the Offices of the Houſe of the Lord by the Hand of the Prieſts, the Levites whom David had diſtributed in the Houſe of the Lord ; to offer the Burnt-Offerings of the Lord, as it is written in the Law of Moſes, with rejoycing and ſinging as it was ordained 29. 25. by David. And of Hezekiah, that he ſet the Levites in the Houſe of the Lord with Cymbals, Pſalteries, and Harps, according to the Commandment of David, and Gad the King's Seer, and Nathan the Prophet ;

for ſo was the Commandment of God by his Prophets. Which words are on purpoſe added, leaſt all this ſhould be thought an illegal Impoſition, by virtue of David's Royal Authority, without God's particular Approbation.
And after the Return of the Jews from the Captivity, this was one of the firſt things ſet up with reſpect to the Worſhip of God ;
Ezr. 3. 10. for we read, when the Builders laid the Foundation of the Temple of the Lord, they ſet the Prieſts in their Apparel with Trumpets, and the Levites
the Sons of Aſaph, with Cymbals to praiſe the Lord, after the Ordinance of David King of Iſrael. And they ſung together by courſe in praiſing
and giving thanks unto the Lord, becauſe he is good, for his mercy endureth for ever towards Iſrael. And this Cuſtom, as far as we can learn, continued as long as the Jewiſh Temple ſtood, and therefore was conſtantly obſerved in our Saviour's time ; who was frequently preſent at
the

the Temple Muſick, which begun in Courſe as ſoon as the Oblation was over. In the time of offering the Incenſe the Solemn Prayers began, both Morning and Evening; and when the Daily Sacrifice was at an end the Choir began their Service. The former no one queſtions, was a part of Natural Religion added to the Ceremonial Worſhip, and there is no Reaſon to queſtion the latter to have been of the ſame kind; but had more expreſs Divine Approbation by the Prophets than in being at the time of David's firſt Inſtitution of it. By whom the Publick and Solemn Prayers were firſt appointed, we have no certainty; but we know that the uſe of the Quire was firſt appointed by no leſs a Perſon than David, a Man after God's own Heart; who would therefore never ſet up a Way of Worſhip any ways unſuitable to the Divine Nature. And it ſeems very unreaſonable to think David's Pſalms ſtill fit to be uſed, and the way of ſinging them, which himſelf appointed, viz. in Inſtrumental as well as Vocal Muſick, to be unbecoming the Chriſtian Church; for how comes one to be Typical and Ceremonial and not the other? If there be any thing indecent in the former, i. e. it be light and vain, on that account it ought to be rejected as unſuitable to Divine Worſhip; but if it be grave and ſolemn, apt to compoſe or elevate the Mind in Acts of Devotion towards God, it is not eaſie to underſtand, why it ſhould not be very agreeable to the Nature and Deſign of Publick Worſhip. And a very learned Perſon had undertaken to make out that the uſing both theſe ſorts of Muſick in the Worſhip of God is one of thoſe things which are common to all Religion (as he particularly deſigned to prove out of the Oriental Books) and therefore ought to be look'd on as a Dictate of Reaſon and Natural Religion; not ſtrictly taken for the Neceſſary Duties of it, but for what is naturally Decent and becoming the Worſhip of God. And ſo much at preſent may ſuffice as to this part of the Cathedral Service; as to others I have occaſion to give an account of them in another place.

(3.) As to the Propagation of Religion. For the Biſhop and his Clergy being united together in one Body, he knew better how to direct and imploy them in ſeveral Places abroad in order to their Converſion and Eſtabliſhment; and by their returning back to him, he had a conſtant and certain Account of the Affairs of his Dioceſe. And this was generally the means whereby moſt Countries were converted to the Chriſtian Faith; the Biſhop and his Clergy leading very Regular Lives together, and when they went or were ſent abroad, it was with a deſign only to do Good among them, and ſo to return to their Society again. And this continued till ſuch time as Pariſhes were divided; which was not near ſo ſoon as is commonly thought. It is generally ſaid, that Pariſhes were divided in the Saxon Churches in the time of Honorius Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who was one of Gregory's Diſciples; and the learned Author of the Antiquitates Britannicæ, is produced for it. Mr. Cambden follows his Authority: for he alledges none elſe. But whoſoever conſiders the Circumſtances of that time will find no Reaſon to believe it; this Church being ſo little ſettled before Theodore's coming, and hardly capable of a Diviſion into Pariſhes then; ſo that had it not been for the Cathedral Foundations, there had been no tolerable Subſiſtence for thoſe who were to carry on that difficult Work of Converting the Saxon Idolaters: but the great Advantage was, that the Cathedral Churches being firſt endow'd by the Municifence of the firſt Chriſtian Princes, they were thereby enabled to conquer the many Difficulties ficulties they otherwiſe met with. As will beſt appear by a brief Account of the State of the Churches here in thoſe times. I begin with the Dioceſe of London; while Ethelbert and Sebert lived, by the aſſiſtance of Mellitus and his Clergy, the Face of Chriſtianity was kept up in London and other parts of the Eaſt Saxon Kingdom. But after their death Sebert's 3 Sons returned to Paganiſm, and affronted Mellitus in the publick Celebration of the Euchariſt, and becauſe he refuſed to give it them without Baptiſm, they baniſhed him and his Clergy. Upon the Converſion of Eadbaldus Son to Ethelbert, Mellitus was recalled and ſe[illegible] back to London, but the Londoners would not receive him, and perſiſted in their Idolatry; although the Sons of Sebert were all deſtroyed. After which, the Biſhoprick of London was vacant about 40 years till after Honorius his death; how then could Pariſhes be divided in this Dioceſs in his time? But in the time of Sigebert, by the perſwaſion of Oſwi, King of the Northern Saxons, Chriſtinity was again received in theſe parts, and Cedda was made Biſhop of the Eaſt Saxons; and of him it is ſaid indeed that he built Churches, and ordained Prieſts and Deacons for his Aſſiſtance, chiefly at a place called Ithanceſter (not far from Maldon in Eſſex, ſaith Radulphus Niger, and Camden thinks it was Othona in the Roman times) and at Tilaburg now Tilbury on the Thames. But in the time of Siger and Sebbi there was a new Apoſtaſie in the Dominions of the former, as Florentius Wigornienſis ſaith; whereupon Wolſere King of the Mercians ſent Jarumannus to convert them, and he effected his deſign, ſaith William of Malmsbury and H. Huntingdon, who ſucceeded Trumhere in the Biſhoprick of the Mercians. But Wolſere ſent Wina, driven out from the Weſt Saxon Biſhoprick by Kenwalch, to the Biſhoprick of the Eaſt Saxons, where he continued Biſhop as long as he lived, ſay Bede and Florentius; but not reckon'd among the Biſhops of London, ſaith Matt. Weſtminſter, becauſe he came in by Simony: which ſhews that the Endowments of the Biſhoprick were then recovered.

After him Erkenwald was made Biſhop of London by the favour of K. Sebba, ſaith Leland, out of an old Author of his Life, (who was Canon of St. Paul's in the time of Gilbertus Univerſalis.) This Erkenwald was one of the Diſciples of Mellitus, and conſecrated Biſhop of London by Theodore, who lived and died with great Reputation for Sanctity, and was buried in St. Paul's; to the Structure whereof he had given freely, and out of his own Poſſeſſions increaſed the Revenue of the Church, and obtained large Privileges for it, ſaith Biſhop Godwin. It is pity he did not cite his Authorities, that we might learn what Alterations were made in the Church of St. Paul by Erkenwald; for the Author of his Life affirms, that it continued the ſame to the time of the horrible Fire in the Conquerour's time, which burnt it to the Ground. He deſcribes it as a Timber-Building, and ſaith, they did not then underſtand the way of Building with Stone Arches; which was brought in by the Normans. From whence ſome have concluded, that our Churches before the Normans were all made of Wood; but if I miſtake not, this new way of Building relates only to the Roof, and not to the Walls, i. e. they did not underſtand the way of turning ſuch great Arches with Stone, as were in the New Church of St. Paul's begun by Mauricius. For the Saxons did know the way of building Churches with Stone, as appears by what Matt. Weſtminſter ſaith of King Edwin's building a Church of Stone for Paulinus at York. I confeſs Bede ſaith not ſo much, but only that a Baſilica was built by him, which was after burnt by the Pagans; but Stephanus Stephanus Heddius, who lived before Bede, in the Salisbury MS. (for that part is defective in the Cotton MS.) affirms that Edwin did build at York a Church of Stone, which was afterwards repaired by Wilfrid, and the Windows adorned with Glaſs then newly brought into England by Benedict Biſcop. And Bede himſelf ſaith, that Paulinus having converted Blecca the Governour of Lincoln ſet up there Eccleſiam operis egregii de lapide, a famous Church of Stone, the Wallls whereof ſtood in his time, but the Roof was decayed; in which Church Paulinus conſecrated Honorius Archbiſhop of York. And there is no reaſon to ſuppoſe the Church of St. Paul's, being founded by King Ethelbert, the richeſt King of the Saxons, ſhould fall ſhort of the Churches built at York and Lincoln not long after. But as to Parochial Churches, I can find no certain evidence of any one that was built in London in the Saxon times: For what Matt. Weſtminſter ſaith of St. Martins's Ludgate being built by the Britains for the ſake of Cadwallader, is very improbable, conſidering the great hatred between the Britains and Saxons at that time, even after they both profeſſed to be Chriſtians, which Bede ſpeaks of with great reſentment. As to the Tradition of St. Peter's Cornhill, that depends upon the credit of an obſcure Table hung up in the old Church, without ſufficient Authority to atteſt it; and if it prove any thing, it only proves, that the old Cathedral ſtood there in the time of the Romans, and not that there was any Parochial Church there after the building of St. Paul's. So that the main care of preſerving and propagating Religion in the City of London, if not through the whole Dioceſe, did in thoſe elder times of the Saxon Churches depend upon the Biſhop and his Clergy, who were then ſettled in the Cathedral Church of St. Paul's. And to it the City reſorted, to attend on the publick Offices of our Religion; and eſpecially to the celebration of the Holy Sacraments. For even after the time that for the multiplicity of Converts in great Cities, there was a neceſſity of having other places for the People to meet in for Prayers, &c. I much queſtion whether the Adminiſtration of Sacraments were commonly allowed to the Parochial Churches, unleſs the Biſhop and his Clergy went thither. And Onuphrius Panvinius and Joſephus Vicecomes have proved that there was for ſome time but one Baptiſtery in a City, and that by the Cathedral Church; and the One Altar relating to the Biſhop doth imply that thoſe who were under the care of the Biſhop did communicate with him. Which Notion is ſo far incorporated into the Canon Law, that it is a Maxim ſtill received, that the Cathedral Church is the Pariſh to the whole Dioceſe; ſo that thoſe who adminiſter there, may give to thoſe of any Pariſh, and thoſe who receive there do anſwer the Canons as much as if they did it in their own Parochial Churches; and that Magiſtrates on ſolemn Days are bound to go to the Cathedral Churches; which ſay the Canoniſts, doth not ariſe from the Preſence of the Biſhop, but from the very Notion and original Right of a Cathedral Church, which they call Jus Cathedralitatis: which, ſay they, can no more be taken away from it by the Biſhop, than a Parochial Miniſter can take away the Right of a Pariſh from his Church. All theſe Privileges are the remainders of the ancient Practice, and the Teſtimonies of that Right which accrues by them; and is not loſt by the frequency of Parochial Churches.

But to proceed in ſhewing how the Chriſtian Religion was here propagated by the means of the Cathedral Churches at firſt erected. Sigebert King of the Eaſt Angles fixed the Epiſcopal See for Felix who came out of Burgundy at Dumnoc or Dunwich; where he reſided 17 years, and was the means of converting the whole Province. Birinus was fixed at Dorceſter as his Epiſcopal See by the Gift of Cynigilſus King of the Weſt Saxons and Oſwald King of the Northumbers; and by that means much People was converted and ſeveral Churches built in his own time. The Kingdom of Mercia, or the Middle Angles, ſeem to owe their Converſion to Four Presbyters, Cedda, Adda, Beſſi, and Diuma, the 3 firſt Engliſh, and the laſt a Scot; but this was while Penda lived, who was no Chriſtian; but he was no ſooner dead but a Cathedral Church was erected and Diuma was made Biſhop of the Middle Angles, and was very ſucceſsfull in converting much People in a little time. In the time of Wulphere Cedda was by Theodore's means made Biſhop of the Mercians, and the Cathedral Church was fixed at Litchfield; who beſides the Body of his Clergy had, ſaith Bede, 7 or 8 of his Brethren, with whom in his retirement as often as he had leiſure from his work of Preaching, he was wont to Pray and to Study; and after his death Winfred one of his Clergy ſucceeded him. Laſtly, as to the South Saxons Wilfrid the Biſhop of Tork, but then driven out, was the chief Inſtrument of their Converſion, but he had the aſſiſtance of his Clergy who are mentioned by Bede: and King Edilwalch fixed the Cathedral Church for them at Selſeſey and very liberally endowed it. From which it appears how extremely uſefull the firſt Cathedral Churches among the Saxons were for the Converſion of the Nation; and upon what great Conſiderations the firſt Chriſtian Kings of the Saxons did beſtow their Endowments upon them: which in ſome meaſure they have ever ſince enjoyed, and there is Reaſon to hope they will do, as long as Chriſtian Princes and the due ſenſe of our Converſion to Chriſtianity remain among us: which I hope will be to the Worlds End. A DISCOURSE

Concerning the Unreaſonableneſs of a New Separation,
On account of the OATHS: With an ANSWER to the Hiſtory of PASSIVE OBEDIENCE, ſo far as relates to THEM.

SIR,

YOur former Letter gave me an Account of Your own and others Diſſatisfaction about the Oaths; but your ſecond carries the Point a great deal farther; for therein you tell me, Thoſe who are unſatisfied, think themſelves bound to ſeparate from the Communion of thoſe who have taken them; and that if Eaſe be not given to the Scrupulous, new Congregations will be immediately formed; and therefore you beg my Aſſiſtance in clearing theſe Points, in order to the preventing a New Separation.

I was not a little ſurprized at the reading theſe Paſſages; and I ſoon apprehended the miſchievous Conſequence of a new Schiſm, eſpecially among the Members of the Church of England. But I can hardly think it poſſible that thoſe who have expreſſed ſo great a Senſe of the Miſchief of it in others, ſhould be ſo ready to fall into it themſelves, and that upon the meer Account of Scruples; when the Difference is only about the Reſolution of a Caſe of Conſcience, wherein Wiſe and Good Men may eaſily differ: But it cannot be a Mark either of Wiſdom or Goodneſs, to ſeparate from thoſe who do ſo. Some think the Oaths lawful, and therefore take them; others do not, and therefore forbear: But is taking the Oaths made a Condition of Communion with us? Is it required of all who join in our Worſhip, at leaſt, to declare, that they think the taking of them to be lawful? If not? what Colour can there be for breaking Communion on the Account of the Oaths?

Suppoſe thoſe who take the Oaths are to blame; If they act according to their Conſciences therein, what Ground can there be of Separation from them for ſo doing, unleſs it be lawful to ſeparate from all ſuch who follow the Dictate of an Erroneous Conſcience? And ſo there can be no End of Separations, till all Men's Conſciences judge alike: for a Man's Conſcience is his practical Judgment concerning Moral Actions; and there are ſo many Circumſtances, which vary the Nature of ſuch Moral Actions, as Oaths, that I do not wonder to ſee Men differ about them; but I ſhould wonder and lament to ſee them ſeparate from each other for the ſake of ſuch a Difference.

But there is a great deal of Difference between a Tenderneſs and a Sowreneſs of Conſcience. There is a natural Tenderneſs in the Eye, which makes it apt to be offended with Motes; and in that Caſe it is to be gently dealt with: But when an ill Humour falls into it, there ſeems to be greater Tenderneſs, but from a worſe Cauſe; and then the beſt way of Cure is to ſweeten or remove the bad Humour which cauſed it. I cannot imagine why, becauſe ſome Men's Conſciences are ſo tender in the Point of Loyalty, that they cannot take the Oaths, that they muſt be ſo tender too, as not to joyn in Communion with thoſe who do it. This ſeems to come from another Cauſe, and not from the Original Scruple. Are they afraid of joyning with others, not ſo tender as themſelves? This is the Scruple about mixt Communion, which hath been ſo long exploded among us. What then? Have we hereby changed the Standard of our Communion, or are there in this Caſe impoſed any new Terms of Communion with us? How then comes a Scruple about the Oaths to lead men to think of a Separation? How come they to make ſo much Conſcience of one, and ſo little of the other? Is a Separation from our Church become a Duty with thoſe, who ſo lately looked on it as ſo great a Fault in others? But, I perceive, a tender Conſcience is like a tender Conſtitution, it is ſoon put out of Order: So much greater Care then ought thoſe to have who forſake any worldly Advantages for the ſake of their Conſciences, leſt that which begun with a Scruple, at laſt end in Humour and Faction, and the Ruine of that Church, which they have always pretended to value.

But to leave theſe general Reflections, I ſhall now apply my ſelf to the main Point, Whether there be any Reaſon for theſe Scruples about the Oaths? for if there be not, it will be granted that there can be no Reaſon for a Separation on the Account of them. If there be any Reaſon, it muſt ariſe, either from the continuing Obligation of the former Oaths, or from the Nature of the preſent Oaths: And therefore I ſhall enquire into two things:

Firſt, The Nature and Meaſure of the Obligation of Political Oaths in general.

Secondly, The Difficulties which relate to our Oaths in particular.

Firſt, As to the Nature and Obligation of Political Oaths; by which I mean ſuch as have immediate and particular reſpect to Humane Society, and the Government we live under; as all Oaths of Allegiance do.

And herein the Difference lies between thoſe and the common Oaths between Man and Man; becauſe theſe are founded on an Equality of Right, but the other on the general Security of Humane Society.

In Political Oaths we muſt diſtinguiſh the particular Intention and Deſigns of the Perſons to whom they are made, from the general End and Scope of the Oaths themſelves. I do not deny but ſuch Oaths at firſt came from the Miſtruſt, which thoſe in Power had, of ſuch as were at preſent in Subjection to them. And becauſe the Fears of a Deity made the ſtrongeſt Impreſſions on People's Minds, therefore they were not contented with bare Promiſes, but they added the Solemnities of Oaths, that they might look on God as concerned, both as a Witneſs and a Judge.

Leſſ. de Juſt. & Jure, l. 2. c. 17. n. 52.

But if we ſearch narrowly into this Matter, the Obligation comes not from the bare Oath, but from ſomething antecedent to it, or from the Promiſe contained in it, to which the Oath adds greater Solemnity on the Account of Religion. And therefore it is generally reſolved by the Civilians as well as Caſuiſts, That an Oath follows the Nature of the thing about which it is converſant; for that, ſay they, is the Principal, and the other is but the Acceſſary; and the Acceſſary ſtill follows the Nature of the Principal.

Molina de Juſt. & Jure, tr. 3. diſp. 150.

Even Molina, who is noted for ſingularity in this matter, (for aſſerting That an Oath added an Obligation of Juſtice beſides that of Religion) yet yet when he comes to explain himſelf, he founds it on the Promiſe included in the Oath, and not in the Oath it ſelf: For after an Oath taken, ſuch as the Obligation was before, ſuch is it after, and the Promiſe contained in an Oath admits of the ſame Conditions, which it would have had, if no Oath had been joyned with it.

If there be a Law, which makes a Contract void, on the Account of the Publick Good, the adding an Oath to ſuch a Contract doth not make it valid: As for Inſtance, if the Law of the Country makes void all clandeſtine Marriages; if a Man marries a Woman after ſuch a manner, although this be an Obligation of the ſtricteſt Nature: Yet ſuch is the Force and Power of Laws made for a Publick Good, that although the Intention of one Perſon was to tie the other in an indiſſoluble Bond; yet the Law ſuperſedes that Obligation, or elſe it is made to no purpoſe, at leaſt, ſo far as it relates to the Civil Contract, which is as much as is neceſſary to my purpoſe; for, even that hath an obligation of Conſcience going along with it, which however in this Caſe is ſuperſeded for the Publick Good.

I do not deny, that the chief Intention of thoſe who require Oaths of Allegiance to themſelves, is to bind Men as faſt as may be to them; and there is a Perſonal Obligation conſequent upon it. But then, I ſay, that the Rule and Meaſure of it, is not to be taken from ſuch Intention of the Perſons, but from the General Good, which was chiefly intended in ſuch things. For, there is a Common Good of Humane Society, which Mankind have an obligation to, antecedent to that obligation they are under to particular Perſons. For, as Magiſtrates were deſigned for a general Good, ſo the obligation to them muſt be underſtood ſo, as to be ſtill in ſubordination to the main end.

And it is agreed on all hands, That an Antecedent and Superiour Obligation doth void that which is ſubſequent and inferiour, when they contradict each other; elſe an Oath might bind a Man to ſin; which no Man will aſſert.

Therefore whatſoever the Intention of the Perſons was, how ſtrict ſoever the Expreſſions may be, if the keeping of the Oath be really and truly inconſiſtent with the welfare of a People, in ſubverting the Fundamental Laws which ſupport it; I do not ſee how ſuch an Oath continues to oblige: For, there is no Relation of Mankind one to another, but there is ſome good antecedent, which is the juſt meaſure of that Obligation they ſtand in to each other. Thus it is between Parents and Children, Husbands and Wives, Maſters and Servants; and therefore it is moſt reaſonable to be ſo between Princes and their Subjects.

A Vow to God is as ſolemn a thing as an Oath; but our Saviour declares, if it hinders that Good which Children are bound to take care of with reſpect to Parents, it ceaſeth to oblige. If Parents, inſtead of regarding the Good of their Children, do openly deſign their Ruin, and contrive ways to bring it about; none will ſay but that they are bound to take care of their own welfare, although ſuch Parents may call it Obſtinate Diſobedience. For, even the Government of Parents, as natural as it is, is not abſolute, but is limited by Reaſon and the Good of their Children. And when they are of age, they are allow'd to judge of what concerns their welfare, and (if it be neceſſary) to withdraw from their Parents immediate care, but preſerving a due Reverence and Reſpect to them.

The hardeſt Caſe we can ſuppoſe, is that of Slavery, i. e. of Dominion by Force ; but although the Law of Nations allows it, yet it is with ſuch limitations, as ſtill ſhew, That whatever the condition of Men be, with reſpect to one another, there is ſtill a regard to be had to the Benefit of thoſe who are in ſubjection to others.

The only thing which makes a ſtate of Slavery reaſonable, is, That when Men are taken Captive by others, they are at their Mercy; and the giving of life is ſo great a benefit, as cannot be compenſated by any thing leſs than a perpetual Service; and in conſideration of it, the Maſter is to afford Protection and Maintenance. Still we ſee all reaſonable ſubjection is in order to ſome Good of thoſe who are under it; and without it, as Ariſtotle ſaith, They are not uſed as Men, but as Tools. And it is agreed by the beſt Writers on this Subject, That if the Slave be kept in Chains, he is under no obligation of Conſcience to him that keeps him; but he may find his own way to eſcape, becauſe he is treated as an Enemy, and therefore hath all the Right of War on his ſide. But if he yields upon Terms, then he is under Obligation, but it is according to the Terms upon which he yielded himſelf.

Mr. Hobbs indeed ſaith, That thoſe who ſubmit upon Compact, are capable of no Injury afterwards; becauſe they have given up their Wills already, and there can be no Injury to a willing mind. But this is very falſe reaſoning; for himſelf grants, That where there is ſuch a Compact, there goes ſome Liberty or Priviledge along with it. And it is not to be imagined, that ſuch who entred into compact for their Benefit, ſhould renounce all right to it when they have done it; and if they have right they may be wronged. And in the Caſe of the greateſt Slavery, Natural Equity was required, and a Common Right was ſtill due to Slaves, as Men: So that Nature owns no ſuch thing, as meer Abſolute Power in ſome over others, meerly for their own advantage; but all Reaſonable Power ſuppoſes Conſent, and a Good to be attained by it. But when it is carried to a contrary end, it is againſt the Intention of Nature, which lays an obligation on ſome Men towards others, with regard to a Common Good, which cannot otherwiſe be attained.

De Cive c.8. n.7.

Ariſt. Nic. l.8. c.13. Sen. de Clem. l.1. c.18.

It is not denied by the ſtricteſt Caſuiſts in theſe matters, but that under a ſtate of uſurpation, notwithſtanding their Oaths to the Rightful Prince, men are bound to do thoſe things which tend to the Publick Safety as well as their own. But then they found it upon a preſumptive Conſent of the abſent Prince; whereas, the true Reaſon is, That Men are in the firſt place bound to promote the Publick Good, and conſequently, and with reſpect to it, to regard the Will of their Princes, who are appointed by God and Nature for that end. And if ſuch be rendred uncapable of doing it, yet the Obligation on others remains. Whereas, if it depended on the Will of the abſent Prince, his preſumptive Will would not be ſufficient; for that can lay no obligation.

But, that the Publick Good is the true and juſt meaſure of the Obligation in theſe Oaths, doth further appear, in that the Oaths are reciprocal. Whereas, if only the Good of the Perſons to whom Oaths of Allegiance are made, were to be our Rule, then there would be no mutual Oaths. I am not now enquiring how far in reciprocal Oaths one Party's failing diſobliges the other, but I am ſhewing, That it muſt be a General Good that is aimed at when both Parties are ſworn to each other; ſo it was in the ſtricteſt Feudal Allegiance, the Lord was as much ſworn to the Tenant to protect and defend him in his Rights, as the other was to attend him in his Wars for the ſecurity of his Perſon. And this was certainly founded on a mutual Contract, called by the old Feudiſts Liga, and thence Ligeas and Ligeantia, and ſo our Allegiance. The words of Glanvil and Bracton and the Cuſtomary of Normandy, are plain, to ſhew the Reciprocal Obligation in this Caſe, and the meaſures on both ſides were to be the Rights, and Cuſtoms, and Laws of the Land. So that Allegiance originally implies a Compact, and is to be meaſured by the Laws, which are the Standard of the Publick Good of a Country.

Mutua quidem debet eſſe Dominii & Homagii fidelitatis connexio, ita quod quantum debet homo Domino ex homagio, tantum illi debet Dominus ex Dominio præter ſolam Reverentiam. Glanvil. l. 9. c. 4. Bracton. l. 2. §. 2. Curſt. Norm. c. 43.

2dly, Having thus in general fixed theſe grounds to proceed upon, I come to the particular examination of the difficulties which relate to the preſent Oaths; and becauſe we are charged with Apoſtacy from the Principles of the Church of England, and that is made the main ground of the deſigned Separation, I would fain know what this Charge is built upon, with reſpect to the Oaths, for that is all we are concerned in. If any particular Perſons have advanced new Hypotheſes of Government, contrary to the Senſe of our Church, let them anſwer for themſelves. The Caſe of the Oaths is quite of another Nature.

Here is no Renouncing the Doctrine of Paſſive Obedience, or aſſerting the Lawfulneſs of Reſiſtance; but the ſingle Point is, “ Whether the Law of “ our Nation doth not bind us to Allegiance to a King and Queen in actu- “ al Poſſeſſion of the Throne, by conſent of the Three Eſtates of the “ Realm? and whether ſuch an Oath may not lawfully be taken, not- “ withſtanding any former Oath?

And by this very ſtating of the caſe, any one may ſee how impertinent to this purpoſe the Book called the Hiſtory of Paſſive Obedience is; the truth is, there are not many paſſages in it which come near the buſineſs; but thoſe that do, contain in them the main difficulties which relate to the Oaths, and therefore I ſhall impartially conſider them. Which are theſe.

I. That they are to the prejudice of a third Perſon.

II. That they are contradictory to a former Oath.

III. That the Perſon to whom they were made, hath given no releaſe or diſcharge from them.

For the firſt we have theſe Teſtimonies; Biſhop Hall, p. 46. ſaith, That a Promiſſory Oath, which is to the certain Prejudice of another man's Right, cannot be attended with Juſtice.

Biſhop Sanderſon, p. 61. An Oath impoſed by one that hath not a juſt Authority, is to be declined as much as we can; if it be forcibly impoſed, it is to be taken with reluctancy, upon this condition, that the words imply nothing unlawful or prejudicial to the Rights of a third Perſon; for if ſo, we muſt refuſe the Oath at the peril of our lives.

I grant, it is a Rule among the Caſuiſts, That an Oath ought not to be taken to the Prejudice of a third Perſon; but ſo it is likewiſe, That it ought not to be taken againſt the Publick Good; and theſe two are often put together. It is a ſin, ſaith Zoeſius, to make a compact to the publick prejudice and injury of another; and an Oath that is converſant about ſuch a matter, is unjuſt, and not to be kept. So that the Right of a Third Perſon is not to be taken as diſtinct from the Publick Good; for, if it be inconſiſtent with it, there is no ground to ſet up a perſonal Intereſt againſt a General Good. And ſo far a MISCHIEF is better than an Inconvenience; for it is a ſtanding Rule in Reaſon as well as Law, The publick Right cannot not be changed by the Contracts of particular Perſons, ff. l. 2. tit. 14. If a Man takes an Oath to a third Perſon, to do ſomething which the Law forbids; although he ſuffers by it, yet it is concluded, That ſuch an Oath doth not bind, becauſe the Publick Good is to be preferred. As often as a Compact doth depart from the Common Right, it ought not to be kept; nor is an Oath requiring it to be obſerved. ff. l. 2. tit. 14. Juris Gentium §. 16. And again, An Oath againſt the Force of Law and Authority of Right is of no moment. What is the Reaſon that an Oath doth not bind againſt the Law? Is not the Authority of God above that of Men? No doubt of it; but ſince God hath eſtabliſhed Government and Laws for a Publick Good, their meaning is, That Men cannot by any Act of their own be bound to overthrow it, in what ſolemn manner ſoever it be done.

It is reſolved in the Text of the Canon Law, in the King of Hungary's Caſe, That an Oath taken againſt the good of the Kingdom, doth not oblige, de jurejur. c. 33. intellecto; although it were to the Prejudice of others, becauſe it was in Præjudicium Regni ſui, to the Prejudice of his Kingdom; which was more to be regarded; and becauſe it was contrary to the Oath which he took at his Coronation, Jura Regni ſui illibata ſervare, That the Rights of the Kingdom were to be preſerved inviolable.

Sylveſter in ſum. 6. juram. 4. n. 16. ſaith roundly, That an Oath doth not bind againſt the Publick Good in the firſt Place; but if it be for a Private Benefit principally and conſequentially for the Publick, then the Oath holds; becauſe ſtill the publick Good is to overrule in all ſuch Oaths.

If a Man ſwears to keep a Secret, and that be to the Prejudice of a third Perſon, the Caſuiſts ſay, That Oath doth not oblige; how much leſs, where the Publick Intereſt and Safety is concerned?

And it is generally agreed by our Divines, That an Oath of Secrecy, where the Publick Safety is in Danger, doth not bind; as in Garnet's Caſe, who pleaded his Oath for not diſcovering the Gun-Powder-Treaſon. Now if an Oath doth oblige againſt the common Good, Garnet made a good Plea; for his Diſcovery was to the Prejudice of others: but if his Plea was naught, then the Publick Good doth make the Obligation of an Oath to ceaſe.

Suppoſe a Man makes a Contract with another, who thereby acquires a Right: yet if that Contract be againſt the common Good, and be confirmed with an Oath; that Oath doth not oblige, ſaith Bonacina, de contract. diſp. 3. q. 1. p. 1.

There are two ſorts of Laws, ſaith Suarez, which reſpect the Publick Good; ſome which concern ipſum ſtatum Reipub. & utilitatem communitatis; the general State of the Commonwealth, and Benefit of the Community: Others which concern Bonum commune mediante privato; that common Good which reſults from every Man's Good: Againſt the former, he ſaith, an Oath cannot oblige; but in the latter, it may, as far as concerns his own Benefit. Suarez de juram. l. 2. c. 26. No Obligation, though ſworn to, is of any Force againſt thoſe things which are owing to God and the Kingdom, ſaith Zeiglerus in his Notes on Grotius de jure B. & P. l. 2. c. 13. §. 7.

From all this it appears, That if the Right of a third Perſon be inconſiſtent with the publick Good, ſuch an Oath doth not oblige. And it is to be obſerved, That thoſe Perſons, whoſe Teſtimonies are alledged, never put the Caſe of the Right in a third Perſon and a Publick Good ſtanding in Competition; and therefore they do not reach our preſent Caſe.

II. It is alledged, That this Oath is contradictory to a former Oath.

Biſhop Hall again, Hiſtory of Paſſive Obedience, p. 46. No Oath is or can be of Force that is made againſt a lawful Oath formerly taken; ſo that he that hath ſworn Allegiance to his Sovereign, and thereby bound himſelf to maintain the Right, Power and Authority of his ſaid Sovereign, cannot by his ſecond Oath be tied to do ought that may tend to the infringement thereof; and if he hath ſo tied himſelf, the Obligation is, ipſo facto, void and fruſtrate.

No doubt, if the firſt Oath continues in Force, the ſecond is void, ſo far as it contradicts it. But we ſay, The former Oath is not in Force, as it is repugnant to the Publick Good, and ſo the ſecond may be taken without any Contradiction: And if the Doctrine there laid down holds in our Caſe, I cannot ſee how it is conſiſtent with the former Oath, for any ſuch Perſons to continue under the Protection of the preſent Government, or to enjoy the Benefit of the Laws; or to take out a Writ in their Names, any more than to pray for them; the one being owning their Authority as much as the other.

III. Becauſe the Perſon who had the Right hath given no Releaſe.

For this Dr. Hammond is quoted, in his Practical Catechiſm, Hiſtory of Paſſive Obed. p. 54. S. but was not Tiberius an Uſurper, and yet Chriſt ſaith, Render to Cæſar the things that are Cæſar's. C. Julius Cæſar wreſted the Power out of the Hand of the Senate; but before the Time of Tiberius the Buſineſs was accorded between the Senate and the Emperors, That the Emperors now reigned unqueſtion'd, without any Competition from the Senate; which Caſe, he ſaith, is diſtant from other forcible Uſurpations, where the Legal Sovereign doth ſtill claim his Right to his Kingdoms, and to the Allegiance of his Subjects, no way acquitting them from their Oaths, or laying down his Pretenſions.

To clear this Matter, I ſhall enquire into two things.

1. How far a Diſcharge is neceſſary from the Perſon concerned.
2. How far our Saviour's Rule holds in our Caſe?

As to the former, I ſay, The Reſolution of Conſcience in this Caſe doth not depend upon the Will and Pleaſure of the Perſon to whom the former Oath was made, but upon the Grounds on which it was made, and from which it had its force to oblige: And if thoſe ceaſe, the Obligation of the Oath ceaſes together with them. And whether they do or not, no particular Perſon is ſo fit to judge as the Three Eſtates of the Realm; as I ſhall now prove from ſeveral remarkable Inſtances to this purpoſe in our Hiſtories and Parliament Records; whereby I ſhall make it appear, That when a Diſpute hath happened about the Right of Succeſſion, and to whom the Oaths of Allegiance were to be made, they have looked on it as their proper Right, to limit the Succeſſion, and to determine the Oaths.

Under the Britiſh Government, we find a conſiderable Inſtance to our Purpoſe; Vortigern the Britiſh King had entered into a Secret League, To bring over the Saxons; upon which the Great Men of the Nation deſerted him, and choſe Vortimer in his room. Here it is plain, They thought the introducing a Foreign Power, a ſufficient Diſcharge of their Obligation to him, it being ſo directly contrary to the publick Good of the Nation, although Vortigern gave them no Diſcharge.

In the Saxon Times, Sigebert King of the Weſt Saxons, was complained of for Miſgovernment, and for changing their Laws for his own Ends; but when he perſiſted in his Way, there was a Convention of the Nobility and People, (convenêrunt Proceres Regni cum Populo univerſo, ſaith Matt. Weſtminſter) and they declared themſelves free from Allegiance to him, and choſe Kineulfus in his room.

In the Kingdom of Mercia Beornredus for not governing by the Laws, was by a Convention of the Nobility and People ſet aſide from the Government, and Offa choſen King; who was of the Royal Stem, but not the next Heir; and ſo William of Malmsbury obſerves, in the Weſt Saxon Kingdom after Ina, That no lineal Succeſſion was then obſerved; but ſtill ſome of the Royal Line ſat in the Throne. And of Ina himſelf, That he was rather put into the Throne for his Virtue, than by Right of Succeſſion.

Æthelulphus, King of the Weſt Saxons, went to Rome, and there crowned Alfred, his youngeſt Son, King, and married the King of France's Daughter in his Return, and made her Queen against their Laws; for which Reaſons he was excluded his Kingdom: His eldeſt Son and Alſtan, Biſhop of Shireburn being at the Top of this Act of Excluſion; and he came back only upon the Terms of receiving his Son into a Share of the Kingdom: Which ſhews, That they looked on the Laws as the Meaſure of their Allegiance; and where thoſe were openly broken, that it was in their Power to transfer it.

Mat. Weſt. p. 101. Bromton p. 862. W. Malmſbur. l. 1. c. 3. p. 14.

If our Allegiance cannot be transferred by the States of the Realm, it muſt be becauſe (as ſome think) by the fundamental Conſtitution of this Kingdom we are bound in Allegiance to the next right Heir in a Lineal Succeſſion; but I find no ſuch thing in the Saxon Times: for although generally they kept to the Royal Line, yet not ſo, but that when it appeared to be much more for the Publick Good, they did not ſtick upon the Point of Proximity. I ſhall not meddle with the Kingdom of the Northumbers, which alone was originally Elective, as appears by Matt. Weſtminſter; and wherein there happened ſo great Diſorders and Confuſions, that at laſt William of Malmsbury ſaith, None could be perſwaded to accept of the Kingdom; and ſo it continued thirty three Years, till at laſt Egbert took it into his Hands; and ſo it became a part of the Engliſh Monarchy; which was eſtabliſhed in him.

Mat. Weſt. A. D. 934. A. D. 939.

But if by the fundamental Conſtitution, Allegiance were indiſpenſably due to the next Rightful Heir in this Monarchy, how came Athelſtan to be crowned magno conſenſu Optimatum, ſaith Malmsbury, when he was not the rightful Heir? Some ſay (from an old Monk in Malmsbury) That his Father left him the Crown by his Teſtament; (which doth not clear the Difficulty as to the inviolable Right of Succeſſion by the Conſtitution.) But this cannot be true, for his elder Brother Elwardus died after his Father; and none pretend that his Father diſinherited him: And if Athelſtan were lawful Heir, what made him to diſpatch his Brother Edwin out of the way, and to build two Monaſteries for Expiation of that Guilt? How came Alfred to oppoſe his Election, as being illegitimate, as Malmsbury confeſſes? but Matt. Weſtminſter gives the Reaſon, the Times were then difficult, and Edward's other Sons were too young to manage the Government, and therefore they ſet up Athelſtan, as one fit for Buſineſs.

How came Edred to ſucceed Edmond, and not his Son Edwin and Edgar? Matt. Weſtminſter and Bromton give the ſame Reaſon; They were uncapable by reaſon of their Age, Repugnante illegitimâ ætate, Patri ſuccedere non valebant. Florence of Worceſter ſaith, The Northumbers ſware Allegiance to Edred; and he ſaith, He was next Heir, and yet there were two Sons of Edmond before him; for he confeſſes, That they were the Sons of Edmond and Algiva his Queen.

Mat.Weſt. A. 946. Bromton. p. 862. Flor. Wigorn. A. 949.

After the Death of Edred, the eldeſt Son of Edmond ſucceeded; but being found under a Moral Incapacity, (for in Florentius his Words, and Matt. Weſtminſter, In commiſſo Regimine inſipienter egit) he was ſet aſide, as to all the Government beyond Thames, and Edgar put into it: And not long after into the whole Kingdom, by general Conſent.

A. 957.

How came a Diſpute to happen about the Election, after the Death of Edgar, between his eldeſt Son Edward, and Ethelred his youngeſt? I lay no Force on his Mother's Endeavours to advance him; but if there had been ſuch an unalterable Right of Succeſſion, there had not been any Colour or Pretence for it; eſpecially ſince it is ſaid, That his Father declared his Mind, That the elder ſhould ſucceed. But ſaith Florentius Wigorn. there was a great Contention among the great Men about the Choice of the King: How could there be any Diſpute, if they knew the Conſtitution of the Kingdom to be, That the next Heir muſt inherit the Crown; and that thoſe are perjured who transfer their Allegiance?

A. 975.

After the Death of Ethelred, the Nobility and People were divided, ſome chuſing Canutus the Dane, and ſwearing Allegiance to him; others to Edmund the Son of Ethelred.

Florent. Wigorn. A.D.1016.

The former pleaded for themſelves, that Ethelred had broken his Faith with them, and therefore they deſerted him, ſo as he was fain to fly into Normandy; and that Edmund was not his legitimate Son.

W. Malm. l.2.p.35.2.

Matt. Weſtminſter ſaith, That the greateſt part of the Nation, Clergy as well as Laity, did ſwear Allegiance to Canutus; without any Diſcharge from Ethelred, while living, or his Son after him.

Mat.Weſt. A.D.1013. 1015, 1016.

After the death of Canutus, a new difference aroſe about the Succeſſion; ſome were for Harold his ſuppoſed Son by Algiva, others for Hardecnute, his Son by Emma. If the lineal Succeſſion were a part of our Conſtitution, How come ſuch perpetual Diſputes to be concerning it? For if it had been owned as a Fundamental Law, the Right of Succeſſion muſt have been clear beyond Diſpute. But Reaſon of State and the Publick Intereſt ſtill over-ruled this matter, and ſo Ethelred's Sons by Emma, who were the true Heirs by Legal Succeſſion, were ſet aſide, and Harold, being upon the Place, and ſo beſt able to manage the Affairs of the Kingdom, carried it.

A. 1055.

Hardecnute being dead, how came the baniſht Sons of Edmund Ironſide, if he were lawful Heir, not to be ſent for to ſucceed? If Edmund had no good Title, how was the Right of Succeſſion then preſerved? How could Allegiance on theſe Principles be ſworn to him? If he had a good Title, How could the Oaths be taken to Edward the Confeſſor, when the Heirs of Edmund Ironſide were living? I perceive ſome, to ſalve the Succeſſion, make the Mother of Edmund to have been Ethelred's firſt Wiſe, and call her Elgiva Duke Thored's Daughter; but William Malmsbury ſaith, She was ſo obſcure a perſon, that ſhe was not known; and that Edmond Ironſide made up what was wanting in the management of his Father, and the Quality of his Mother. And the ſame is ſaid by Matt. Weſtminſter. Florentius Wigorn. ſhews the reaſon of the miſtake; for he ſaith, That Emma, E- thelred's Queen, was in the Saxon Language called Algiva; and ſo, out of two Names, they have made two Queens. Bromton leaves the matter in Diſpute, and ſaith ſome affirm, The Mother of Edmond was betrothed to King Ethelred, and was the Daughter of Count Egbert: Others, That ſhe was a Stranger and a Concubine. Now, if a Man's Conſcience be ſtrictly tied in ſuch Oaths of Allegiance, to the Right Heir in a lineal Succeſſion, what ſatisfaction can he have as to the taking them, ſince he is then bound to ſatisfie himſelf in the ſtrict Juſtice of a Title? For, if Edmond's Mother was not married, he had no Title, and no Oath of Allegiance could be taken to him; and whether he was married or not, for all that we can perceive, there was a great doubt at that time, and ſo continued. And, it is not eaſie to determine what is to be taken for Marriage in a Prince, unleſs the Law be the Rule. And, if the Law determines the nature of Contracts in Princes, why not as well the Obligation of Subjects? For, if there be no Rule, it is not poſſible to ſatisfie Conſcience in the Niceties of Titles; if there be a Rule, the general Conſent of the People, joined with the Common Good, ſeems to have been that which our Anceſtors proceeded by.

Append. 7. ad vit. Alf. Bromton inter 10. Script. p. 877.

I do not hereby go about to ſet up the Power of the People over Kings, which is in effect to overthrow Monarchy; for then the whole Soveraignty lies in the People, and Kings are but their Servants: And ſo there is but one ſort of Reaſonable Government, viz. that of a Commonwealth. Whereas, from the eldeſt times, the Rights of Soveraignty have been placed in ſingle Perſons, before any Popular Governments were known; and Monarchy hath been ever eſteemed a diſtinct and a reaſonable Government, eſpecially where it is limited by Laws, and thoſe Laws made by the Conſent of the People, i. e. by the Three Eſtates of the Realm; which are together the true Repreſentatives of the People.

I ſee no neceſſity of going about to undermine the Monarchy, that I may come at a reſolution of the preſent caſe; for, I take ours to be a true Original Monarchy, eſpecially after the Rights of the leſſer Monarchs were ſwallowed up or delivered into that of the Weſt-Saxon Kings. And farther, I do not ſtick to affirm, That it was Hereditary, where the Right of Succeſſion and the Publick Good did not interfere; i. e. where there was not a Natural or Moral Incapacity: a Natural, as in the Sons of the elder Edmond, when Edred was made King before them; a Moral, as when Edgar's elder Brother was ſet aſide for his ill Government, by one half of the Nation, and the other never diſputed the matter with them; and when Ethelred was ſo far deſerted, that he went into Normandy, and was recalled upon Promiſe of better Government. Si ipſe vel rectius gubernare, vel mitius eos tractare vellet, are the words in Florentius; and to the ſame purpoſe Matt. Weſtminſter, and Bromton, and Malmsbury: H. Huntingdon adds, That he promiſed omnia Rege & Populo digna; all things worthy of the KING and People. Theſe things I mention to ſhew, That although this were a true and ſucceſſive Monarchy in ordinary courſe; yet where the Publick Good was by the Eſtates of the Realm judged to require it, they thought it no Perjury or Breach of Faith, to transferr their Allegiance, although it were without the Conſent of the actual Governour, or the next lineal Heirs.

Having thus far cleared this Point, as to the Saxon Conſtitution of our Government, I come to that of the Norman; and here I ſhall not go about to ſhew how broken the Succeſſion was by Force and Faction, but what the Judgment of the Nation was, as to the transferring Allegiance.

And the firſt Inſtance I ſhall bring, is in the Caſe of the Oath taken to Maud the Daughter of Henry the Firſt, in the One and Thirtieth year of his Reign; and there is no queſtion, but he deſigned her to ſucceed him; Legitimâ & perenni ſucceſſione, as Malmsbury's words are; but Stephen, (who had before ſworn Allegiance to her) watched his opportunity, and by the help of a Party made by his Brother, (the Biſhop of Winchester) he was Crowned KING; and although at firſt, Malmsbury ſaith, but three Biſhops, and very few Noblemen, joined with him, yet he ſoon after ſaith, That moſt if them went in to him: And even Robert of Glouceſter, King Henry the Firſt's natural Son, took an Oath to him, but with the condition of his preſerving his Honour and Covenants. There are ſeveral things worthy our obſervation in this Affair, with reſpect to Oaths of Allegiance.

(1.) That thoſe who excuſe them from Perjury, who had Sworn Allegiance to Maud before, do it upon this account, Becauſe it is ſaid by Rad. de Diceto, That Hugh Bigod ſware, that King Henry the Firſt, on his Deathbed, diſinherited his Daughter, and made Stephen his Heir. Suppoſing the Story true, what is this to the Diſcharge of the Oath as to Maud? (for the Oath was not made to Henry the Firſt, but to his Daughter, and her Right was chiefly concerned in it.) If this hold, an Oath of Allegiance may ceaſe, without diſcharge from the Party to whom it is made. And ſo the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Biſhops of Wincheſter and Salisbury, as well as the Nobility, thought themſelves at liberty to take a New Oath of Allegiance, without a Releaſe from the Party concerned in the former Oath.

(2.) That upon the Agreement between K. Stephen and H. 2. Maud her ſelf was ſet aſide, and Stephen was to continue King for his Life, and H. 2. to ſucceed him. Now if Oaths of Allegiance muſt not be interpreted by the Publick Good, here are inſuperable Difficulties as to the Obligation of theſe Oaths. For the Allegiance was transferr'd from the right Heir to an Uſurper, as Stephen muſt be owned to have been by thoſe who deny that Allegiance can be transferr'd from the right Heir. And they muſt continue Allegiance to the Uſurper for his Life; which is repugnant to the Nature of our Conſtitution, if it be founded in a Lineal and Legal Succeſſion. And again, Maud, to whom they had ſworn, is ſet aſide, and the Reverſion of the Crown is entailed on her Son, although ſhe was living. Forteſcue, in a Manuſcript-Diſcourſe about the Title of the Houſe of Lancaſter, ſaith, this was done in Parliament, Communi Conſenſu Procerum, & Communitatis Regni Angliæ. Rad. de Diceto, who lived nearer the time, ſaith no ſuch thing; but Forteſcue appeals not only to the Chronicles, but to the Proceedings of Parliament, for it. And Matt. Weſtminſter and Paris ſay, The Right of H. 2. was declared by K. Stephen in Conventu Epiſcoporum, & aliorum de Regno Optimatum; which was the Deſcription of a Parliament of that time; for, as yet, the Baronage repreſented the Nation. Gervaſe ſaith, The Great Men were ſummoned to perfect the Agreement, by giving their Aſſent to it, and confirming it by their Oaths. Forteſcue ſaith further, that H. 2. was crowned King in the Life of his Mother, (who lived to the 13 of H. 2.) by the general Conſent of the Kingdom. Which ſhews how far the Publick Good was thought to be the Meaſure of the Obligation of theſe Oaths. For Guil. Neuburgenſis ſaith, That the Bonum Publicum was the Foundation of this Agreement. And Matt. Weſtminſter, That the King and the Lords did all ſwear to it, and a ſolemn Charter was made of it, and kept in a moſt ſecure Place.

Matt. Weſtm. S. 1153.

And thus the Oaths of Allegiance were continued to one that had no Right for his Life; and made to one who pretended to no Right, but after his Mother, who was ſet aſide in this Agreement. So that here were three Oaths of Allegiance at once, that to Maud the Empreſs, that to K. Stephen, and to H. 2. and yet the General Good of the Nation muſt give an equitable ſenſe of theſe Oaths, or there muſt be Perjury on all ſides. For thoſe who had firſt ſworn to Maud, could not tranſfer their Allegiance on any other account, either to Stephen, or H. 2. during her Life. For we never read that ſhe was preſent at the Agreement, or reſigned her Right to the Crown.

The next Inſtance I ſhall produce, is in the Oaths that were taken during the Controverſies between the Houſes of Tork and Lancaſter. Which was not ſo plain a Caſe as Men commonly imagin; and in Truth, if the juſt legal Title be the only Rule of Conſcience in this Caſe, it was hard to take the Oaths on either ſide. For, as on the one ſide, a lineal Deſcent was pleaded from the Daughter of the Duke of Clarence, who was elder Brother to John Duke of Lancaſter, from whom by Marriage the Duke of Tork claimed his Title; ſo, on the other ſide, it was objected, that there was no ſufficient Evidence of the Legitimacy of Philippa Daughter to the Duke of Clarence; becauſe, as Forteſcue obſerves, the Duke of Clarence was abroad from before the time of her Conception till after her Birth, and that he never owned her Mother after; that ſhe never aſſumed the Arms of the Duke as her Father, nor thoſe deſcended from her, till the Duke of Tork pretended to the Crown; that E. 3. made an Entail of the Crown upon his Heirs Male; (of which I have ſeen a written Account as old as the time of H. 6. which not only affirms the Abſence and Divorce of the Duke of Clarence; but that E. 3. ſeized all his Lands into his Hands, and in Parliament ſoon after entailed the Crown on his Heirs Male, and that his Daughters there preſent agreed to the ſame.) But beſides they pleaded, that ſo long a Preſcription as the Houſe of Lancaſter had of above threeſcore years, was allowed by the Jus Gentium, to purge the Defects of the firſt Title: Theſe are things which deſerved Conſideration againſt ſuch a meer lineal Deſcent as the Houſe of Tork inſiſted upon. And againſt the Houſe of Lancaſter, the Intruſion of H. 4. upon the Depoſition of R. 2. is an invincible Objection to ſuch as found Allegiance on the Right of Succeſſion.

But that which I lay the greateſt weight upon, is the way of ending this Difference in Parliament, which hath ſeveral remarkable things in it:

(1.) That the Duke of Tork, notwithſtanding his Title, takes an Oath of Allegiance in Parliament to H. 6. during his Life; reſerving to himſelf the Right of Succeſſion after him. For he ſwears to do nothing to the Prejudice of his Reign or Dignity-Royal, nor againſt his Life or Liberty; and that he would to the utmoſt of his Power, withſtand all Attempts to the contrary. The ſame Oath was taken by his Sons Edward Earl of March (afterward E. 4.) and Edward Earl of Rutland. Was this a lawful Oath or not? To ſay it was unlawful, is to reflect on the Wiſdom of the Three Eſtates, who looked on this as the beſt Expedient for the Publick Good, as being the way to prevent the Effuſion of Chriſtian Blood. And it is not eaſie to prove ſuch an Oath unlawful; as containing nothing unlawful, nor to the Prejudice of a third Perſon, when he who was chiefly concerned voluntarily took it. If it were a lawful Oath, then an Oath of Allegiance on the account of Poſſeſſion, is a lawful Oath. For the matter of Right is not mentioned in it, and Richard Duke of Tork did not renounce the opinion nion of his own Right hereby, (whether true or falſe) but did bind up himſelf to do nothing to the Prejudice of the Royal Dignity of H.6. and yet he look'd on him as meer Poſſeſſor of it; therefore in his Judgment and the Parliament's, an Oath of Allegiance may lawfully be taken, on the account of the Poſſeſſion of the Crown, although Perſons be not ſatisfied of the Right of it.

Rot. Parl. 39. H. 6. n. 21.

The Words of his Agreement are remarkable to this Purpoſe, as they are to be found in the Parliament-Rolls. The ſaid Title notwithſtanding, N. 20. and without Prejudice of the ſame, the ſaid Richard Duke of York tenderly deſiring the Weal, Reſt and Proſperity of this Land, and to ſet apart all that might be trouble to the ſame; and conſidering the Poſſeſſion of the ſaid King Henry the Sixth, and that he hath for his time be named, taken, and reputed King of England and France, and Lord of Ireland, is content, agreeth and conſenteth, that he be had, reputed and taken King of England and of France, with the Royal Eſtate, Dignity and Preeminence belonging thereto, and Lord of Ireland, during his Life natural; and for that time the ſaid Duke, without hurt or prejudice of his ſaid Right and Title, ſhall take, worſhip and honour him for his Sovereign Lord. Here was certainly an Oath taken to a King, whom the Perſon taking it looked on only as a King de facto, and not de jure; and yet this Oath was taken and allowed, nay contrived in Parliament; and that for no leſs an end, than for the Weal, Reſt, and Proſperity of the Land, i. e. for the Publick Good.

It may be ſaid, That the Caſe is different; for Richard Duke of York parted with his own Right; but we cannot with anothers, which we have ſworn to preſerve.

I anſwer, That he did not look on ſuch an Oath as parting with his Right, but as a thing fitting to be done on the account of Poſſeſſion for the Publick Good. And ſo may others take ſuch another Oath of Allegiance, wherein there is no Declaration as to Right, but the ſame things required, which the Duke of York promiſed in his Oath to Hen. 6.

But Allegiance is not due but where there is a Right to claim it; and that cannot be, where there is no Right to the Crown.

I anſwer, That an Oath of Allegiance may be twofold: 1. Declarative of Right; and in that caſe none can be owned to have Right, but he that hath it.

2. Submiſſive Allegiance; where no more is required than is contained in the Duke of York's Oath, and yet he declared this was no prejudice to his Right. But it may be ſaid, He declared ſo much before he took the Oath, and ſo gave the Senſe in which he took it.

I anſwer, That

His putting in his Claim, and his Title being allow'd after the King in being, had been ſufficient; but in our caſe there is no need of a Declaration, ſince the declaratory part is left out; which is a fuller Declaration of the ſenſe of the Oath, than our Words can make.

But to proceed;

(2.) The firſt Objection the Parliament made to the Duke of York's Claim was, from the Oaths they had taken to H. 6. To which the Duke of York gave a large Anſwer, that Oaths muſt not bind againſt Truth and Juſtice. But this was to take it for granted, that he had the Truth and Juſtice of his ſide, whereas there was a long Poſſeſſion of threeſcore Years againſt him; ſurely matters of Fact which were neceſſary to the diſproving his Title, were then ſo far out of Memory, that it was impoſſible to make clear Evidence about them; and others were not examin'd, as whether the Duke of Clarence were abſent ſo long from his Wife abroad, when Philippa was born? Whether one Sir James Awdely ſuffer'd about it? Whether he was divorced from her upon it? Whether E. 3. after the Death of the Duke of Clarence, did entail the Crown on his Heirs Male? Whether upon the Depoſition of R. 2. the Claim of Right on behalf of the Duke of Clarence's Heir ought not to have been made? How far Edmond Mortimer's owning the Title of H. 5. and the Duke of Cambridge's Attainder did affect him? Whether he had not renounced his own Pretentions, by owning H. 6. to be his Supream and Sovereign Lord, as he had often done in a moſt ſolemn manner, particularly in his Oaths at the Altar at St. Paul's, which is to be ſeen in the Book of Oaths, p. 146. and elſewhere. But at that time, H. 6. was under the Power of the Duke of York; and that was a very unfit time to clear a ſinking Title.

But however the Lords in Parliament were concerned for their Oaths to H. 6. and propoſed the former Expedient, not only for the publick Welfare, but in regard to their Oaths, notwithſtanding that they allow'd the Duke's Title to be good. Their Words are, It was concluded and agreed by all the ſaid Lords, that ſince it was ſo, that the Title of the ſaid Duke of York cannot be defeated, and in eſchewing the great Inconvenience that might enſue, to take the Mein above rehearſed, the Oaths that the ſaid Lords had made unto the King's Highneſs at Coventry and other places ſaved.

From whence it is plain, that they look'd on their Oaths to Hen. 6. as conſiſtent with owning the Right to be in the Duke of York; and that Poſſeſſion was a ſufficient Ground for continuing their Oaths.

(3.) In 1 E. 4. where the Right and Title of the D. of York is moſt amply ſet forth, there this Agreement, 39 H. 6. is recited, and the Proceedings againſt H. 6. are grounded upon his Breach of it. Which ſhews farther that thoſe Parliaments which did aſſert the Right of Succeſſion higheſt, (among which, this of E. 4 ought to be reckon'd) yet it was never diſputed, whether thoſe who had taken the Oaths to H. 6. were perjured; for they look on the Poſſeſſion of the Crown as a ſufficient Ground for the Allegiance required.

But it may be ſaid, That from hence we ſee that he was look'd on as having the beſt Title, who had the beſt Right by lineal Succeſſion. I anſwer, that we are not enquiring into Titles, but ſearching into the Reaſons and Meaſures of Oaths of Allegiance; and whether thoſe do require full Satisfaction about the beſt Title? Or ſuppoſing one unſatisfied about that, he may not yet be ſatisfied in taking ſuch an Oath as the D. of York and his Sons did?

But ſuch Precedents prove nothing, unleſs they be agreeable to our Laws and Conſtitutions. Yes, a great deal, while we are enquiring into our Legal Conſtitution; and we find ſuch things allowed in Parliaments; and not only ſo, but in ſuch Parliaments which allow'd not the Title of the King to whom thoſe Oaths were made.

But it may be ſaid, Our Law owns no King meerly as in Poſſeſſion, but the Right Heir is the legal King, whether in Poſſeſſion or not. Our Law does own a King in Poſſeſſion, if Treaſon may be committed againſt Him; and for this we have not only the Authority of Sir E. C. but of the Year-Books, 9 E. 4. where it is deliver'd for Law at that time; and with a particular Reſpect to H. 6. Et home ſera arraigne de Treaſon fait a dit Roy H. and therefore Sir E.C. had good Authority for what he ſaid; and that not in the Reign of a King de facto, but when a King thruſt out another for want of Right, and derived his whole Right from a lineal Succeſſion. Bagot's got's Caſe goes farther than Grants and Judicial Proceedings of a King de facto; for therein it is declared Treaſon to compaſs the Death of a King de facto; and it is very abſurd to imagine Treaſon againſt one whom the Law doth not own: for Treaſon is a high Violation of the Law, and how can the Law be violated againſt one whom the Law doth not own? Beſides, in Bagot's Caſe there is a diſtinction made between a meer Vſurper, and one on whom the Crown is ſettled by Parliament; and ſo H. 6. is denied to be a meer Uſurper. Et ſix le dit Roy H. de fait Merement, come Vſurper, Car le Corone fuit taille a luy per Parliament. So that by our Conſtitution a great Deference is to be ſhew'd to the Judgment of the Three Eſtates in matters that concern the Right of the Crown; Or elſe, an Entail made by them could make no difference; but the whole Reſolution muſt be into the lineal Deſcent. And thus I look on the Statute, 11 H. 7. as agreeable to our Conſtitution; for if it be Treaſon to compaſs the Death of a King de facto, there is great Reaſon there ſhould be Indemnity for thoſe who act for Him.

But what doth this ſignifie to the Conſciences of Men? Very much, if they are to be ſatisfied by our Conſtitution. I grant meer Indemnity doth not clear a Man's Mind; but its agreeableneſs to former Proceedings and Judgments ſhews how far our Conſtitution allows us to go, and that there is no Argument from thence which can hinder the Satisfaction of Conſcience ſo far.

But ſuppoſe a King de jure be in Poſſeſſion of this Act, and another comes and diſpoſſeſſes Him, and ſo is King de facto, Doth this Law indemnifie thoſe who fight againſt the King de jure for the King de facto?

Whoſoever is in actual and quiet Poſſeſſion of the Crown, by Conſent of Parliament, hath the Right to challenge the Benefits of this Act for thoſe who ſerve Him. But I do not ſay, that this Act gives any Man Right to oppoſe a Rightful King; but it only provides for the Indemnity of thoſe who aſſiſt the preſent Poſſeſſor, although another had the Right by Deſcent. For after the D. of York's challenging the Crown by Right of Succeſſion againſt the Poſſeſſor, there were two Parties in the Nation, the one was for the Right of Succeſſion, and the other for the Right of Poſſeſſion by a National Conſent. And the Diſputes between theſe two continued as long as the Differences between the Houſes of York and Lancaſter laſted. When H. 7. was ſettled in the Throne, without regard to the Right of Succeſſion, although there was a general Submiſſion, yet there was ſtill a great Diſſatisfaction in the York Party; which occaſioned all the Diſturbances of H. 7th's Reign, from ſetting up an Heir of the Houſe of York. (And Sir William Stanly was gained to that Party, which coſt him his Life.) And they went ſo far as to conclude it Treaſon to ſtand by the Poſſeſſor againſt the next lineal Heir. Which I take to have been the true occaſion of the Statute 11 H. 7. which doth certainly Indemniſy thoſe who adhere to the Poſſeſſor, although another may claim a better Right; and thereby declares a Poſſeſſory Right to be a ſufficient Ground of Allegiance, as far as that Act goes.

There are three ſorts of Perſons may be ſaid to have Poſſeſſion of the Crown, an Vſurper, a King de jure, and a King de facto; and becauſe the diſtinction between theſe doth not ſeem to be well underſtood, I ſhall briefly explain it.

An Uſurper is one who comes in by Force, and continues by Force.

A King de jure is one, who comes in by lineal Deſcent, as next Heir, and whoſe Right is owned and Recognized by the Eſtates of the Realm.

A King de facto is one, who comes in by Conſent of the Nation, but not by Vertue of an immediate Hereditary Right; but to ſuch a one being owned and receiv'd by the Eſtates of the Realm, the Law of England, as far as I can ſee, requires an Allegiance. Or elſe the whole Nation was perjur'd in moſt of the Reigns from the Conqueſt to H. 8. For the two Williams, ſix at leaſt of the ſeven Henries, King Stephen, and King John were all Kings de facto, for ſome time at leaſt, for they came not in as next Heirs in a lineal Deſcent. But ſtill Oaths of Allegiance were taken to them; and no ſuch Scruples appear to have been made all that time; nor any charge of Perjury, on thoſe who did what our Law and Conſtitution required. Was the Nation perjured in the Time of H. 7. who, as all know, had no Pretence of an Hereditary Right? Yet being received and Crowned, the Oaths of Allegiance were taken to Him, before he was Married to the Daughter of E. 4. For, he was Crowned Octob. 30. 1485. Had the Crown entailed in Parliament Nov. 7. and was Married Jan 18. But the firſt Parliament of R. 3. endeavoured to make void the Title of the Children of E. 4. upon pretence of a Precontract with the E. of Shrewsburies Daughter; and of George Duke of Clarence by his Attainder, thereby to make R. 3. Right Heir to the Crown; but leſt theſe things ſhould fail, to his Claim of Inheritance, they join their own Election, and deſire him to accept the Crown, as to him of Right belonging, as well by Inheritance as by lawful Election. It ſeems, they would have made him a King de jure as well as de facto; but the excluding the Children of E. 4. never gave Satisfaction ſince the Lady Lucy her ſelf diſowned it to the Mother of E. 4. And if ſuch an Allegation would hold, the whole Succeſſion both of York and Lancaſter might be queſtioned; for both derive from H. 3. whoſe Mother was believed at that time to have been precontracted at leaſt to Hugh le Brun, before ſhe was married to K. John, and was married to Him, whilſt his former Wife was living. And if Q. Eleanor's Divorce from the K. of France were not Good (as it is hard to prove it ſo) what becomes of all the Line of H. 2. who married Her, after ſhe had two Children by her former Husband? But if Mens Conſciences are tied to a ſtrict legal and lineal Deſcent, they muſt be ſatisfied in all theſe Points.

Mat. Weſt. A. 1200.

But ſuppoſing the Right of the Children of E. 4. to have been never ſo Good; what doth this make towards the juſtifying the Oaths of Allegiance, which were made to H. 7. whom ſome will not allow to have any Claim by the Houſe of Lancaſter, ſince they ſay, the ſame Act which legitimated John of Gaunt's Children by Kath. Swinford, did exclude them from any Title to the Crown? Yet the Oaths of Allegiance were taken by the whole Nation in the time of H. 7. and no Diſpute was then made about it; becauſe it was then believed, that quiet Poſſeſſion was a ſufficient Ground for Allegiance.

It is objected, That it cannot be agreeable to the Law of England to ſwear Allegiance to a King de facto, when the Duke of Northumberland ſuffered by the Law for adhering to a Queen de facto.

A King de facto according to our Law (as I ſaid) is one in quiet Poſſeſſion of the Crown, by Conſent of Parliament, without Hereditary Right; ſuch as H. 4, 5, 6, 7. were all thought to be, by thoſe who made this Diſtinction. For, as far as I can find, the Diſtinction of a King de facto and de jure was then ſtarted, when the Houſe of York ſo much inſiſted on their Hereditary Right; and ſo many of our Kings had governed the Kingdom by Conſent without it. Therefore the Lawyers, to find a ſufficient Salvo for the Kings of the Houſe of Lancaſter, framed this Diſtinction of Kings de facto and de jure; but ſtill they meant Kings Regnant, as they called them, or in full Poſſeſſion of the Royal Dignity by a National Conſent. (The Diſtinction had been better of a two-fold Right, viz. Poſſeſſory and Hereditary.) But this was far from being the Caſe of Queen Jane, who was ſet up by a particular Party againſt the General Senſe of the Nation, as ſoon appear'd; for the main Point her Title ſtood upon was this, Whether the King by his Grant could diſpoſe of the Crown againſt an Act of Parliament which ſettled the Succeſſion? and that this was the true Point, appears evidently by Judge Mountague's Papers, who was imployed againſt his Will, in drawing up the Grant. So that the Duke of Northumberland's Caſe doth by no means reach the Point of a King de facto.

But it is further urged from our Homilies, That our Church therein condemns thoſe Engliſh who did ſwear Fidelity to the Dauphine of France, breaking their Oath of Fidelity to their Natural Lord the King of England. To which I anſwer.

Sixth Part of the Homily againſt wilful Rebellion.

(1.) That King John was only a King de facto himſelf, if a Legal Succeſſion makes a King de jure. For, (1.) His eldeſt Brother's Son Arthur was then living, as all confeſs. (2.) He was convicted of Treaſon againſt his Brother R. 1. and the Sentence pronounced againſt him by Hugo de Pudſey Biſhop of Durham, as the King of France pleaded to the Pope's Legat who came to ſolicit for him. (3.) Hubert Archbiſhop of Canterbury declar'd at his Coronation, that he came not in by Hereditary Right, but by Election; and he accepted of it ſo. (4.) What Right he had after the Death of his Nephew, he gave up by the Reſignation of his Crown to the Pope. He could have no Hereditary Right while Arthur's Siſter lived, who ſurvived him, and was kept in the Caſtle at Briſtol. But ſuppoſing it, I do not underſtand how he that gave up his Right of Dominion to the Pope, could ſtill retain it? And if he was Feudatary to the ſame, he could not challenge Allegiance as due to him, but to the Pope as Lord Paramount. And it was pleaded againſt him, That although he could not diſpoſe of his Crown without Conſent of his Barons, yet he might demiſe it: And upon his Reſignation he ceaſed to be King; and ſo the Throne was vacant. And by that means there was a devolution of Right to the BARONS to fill up the Vacancy; who made choice of LEWIS by the Right of his Wife, who was Heir to King John. If after all this, an Oath of Allegiance to him was lawful, then, I ſay, an Oath to a King de facto is ſo, for King John was no more.

(2.) As to the Barons calling in Lewis, and forſaking K. John, it is neceſſary to obſerve on what Reaſon it is that our Homilies condemn it. For the whole deſign of that Homily is, to ſhew the Popes Uſurpations over Princes, and their ſtirring up Subjects to Rebellion againſt them, by diſcharging them from their Oaths; and for thoſe the Inſtance of King John is produced; as appears by the words juſt before. Now had Engliſh-men at that time known their Duty to their Prince ſet forth in God's Word, would a great many Nobles, and other Engliſh-men natural Subjects, for this foreign and unnatural Uſurper his vain Curſe of the King, and for his feigned diſcharging them of their Oath and Fidelity to their Natural Lord, upon ſo ſlender, or no Ground at all, have rebelled againſt their Sovereign Lord the King? Would Engliſh Subjects have taken part againſt the King of England, and againſt Engliſh Men, with the French King, and French Men, being incenſed againſt this Realm by the Biſhop of Rome?

Mat. Paris. A. 1216. f. 281.

(2.) As to the Barons calling in Lewis, and forſaking K. John, it is neceſſary to obſerve on what Reaſon it is that our Homilies condemn it. For the whole deſign of that Homily is, to ſhew the Popes Uſurpations over Princes, and their ſtirring up Subjects to Rebellion againſt them, by diſcharging them from their Oaths; and for thoſe the Inſtance of King John is produced; as appears by the words juſt before. Now had Engliſh-men at that time known their Duty to their Prince ſet forth in God's Word, would a great many Nobles, and other Engliſh-men natural Subjects, for this foreign and unnatural Uſurper his vain Curſe of the King, and for his feigned diſcharging them of their Oath and Fidelity to their Natural Lord, upon ſo ſlender, or no Ground at all, have rebelled againſt their Sovereign Lord the King? Would Engliſh Subjects have taken part againſt the King of England, and againſt Engliſh Men, with the French King, and French Men, being incenſed againſt this Realm by the Biſhop of Rome?

(3.) This doth not concern the preſent Caſe. For Men may condemn thoſe Engliſh Men who ſent for Lewis, and yet may lawfully take the preſent Oaths. By which Men are not bound to juſtify ſuch Proceedings, but to promiſe Faith and Allegiance to ſuch as are in actual Poſſeſſion of the Throne. Which the Oaths taken to K. John will juſtify.

Thus I have conſidered the greateſt Difficulties I have yet met with about taking the Oaths, and have not diſſembled the ſtrength of any of them.

There is only one thing remains, and that is the Anſwer given to the Caſe of Tiberius, who was an Uſurper, and yet our Saviour ſaid, Give unto Ceſar the things that are Ceſar's. The Anſwer is, That although it were a forcible Uſurpation in Julius Ceſar, yet before that time the Matter was accorded between the Senate and the Emperors, and they reigned unqueſtioned without any competition from the Senate.

So that it was not lawful to ſwear Allegiance to Julius Ceſar, who had the full Poſſeſſion of the Power, but it was to Tiberius: And why ſo? Where was the Right of Government in the time of Julius Ceſar? In the Senate and People. And ſo it continued all Julius Ceſar's time. But how came the Senate and People to loſe their Right in the time of Tiberius?

(1.) Had they given it up by any ſolemn Act of theirs, as many ſay they did by the Lex Regia, which Juſtinian confidently affirms; Then all the Right which the Emperour had, was by Devolution from the People; and ſo they acted by vertue of that Power which the People gave them; (Populus comprehends both Senate and Community.) And then the Emperors had their Rights of Sovereignty from the People, and not from God. For here was no other Act but that of the People giving up their Right. And then the Caſe of Obedience to the Roman Emperors will be found very different from that of the Northern Kingdoms, where the People never gave up their Rights in ſuch a manner: but in Caſes of Difficulty concerning Succeſſion, the three Eſtates did look on themſelves as particularly concerned; as might be eaſily proved, if it were needful, in all the Northen Kingdoms.

(2.) But ſuppoſe they did not formally give up their Right, but were partly wheedled and partly forced out of it; Doth this give a good Title? Suppoſe Auguſtus had by his Acts procured the Conſent of the People, as to his own Government; What was this to Tiberius? Did they give him a Power to make whom he pleaſed his Succeſſor? Something may be ſaid from Dion and Strabo as to the former; but there is no Pretence as to the latter: For it was a meer Arbitrary Act in Auguſtus to nominate Tiberius; and all the Title he had at firſt was from the Prætorian
Tacit. l. 1. Band and Legions: Afterwards the Conſuls, and Senate, and Souldiers, and People did ſwear Allegiance to him, as the Hiſtorians tell us. Now here I deſire to know, whether Tiberius was any more than Emperor de facto, when they did thus ſwear to him? For all the Right he had was from their voluntary Submiſſion to him at Rome.

Tacit. ib. As to the Roman Provinces, Tacitus ſaith, They were content with the preſent change of Government, becauſe they ſuffered by the Factions and Avarice of the great Men; which made them weary of the Government by the Senate and People. But this only ſhews that they were willing to change their Maſters, hoping they might mend their Condition, but ſignifies little to the matter of Right. Since after they were made Provinces, they owned their Subjection to the Roman Government, by paying Tribute, bute, and receiving Magiſtrates from it, however that Government was managed, whether by Senate or People, or by one who had the Imperial Power, whatever Name he were called by. But as to the Province of Judea in particular, there are ſeveral Conditions of it to be conſidered.

(1.) While it was tributary to the Kings of Perſia and Syria. Jaddus the High Prieſt told Alexander that they had taken an Oath of Fidelity to Darius, and therefore could not bear Arms againſt him while he lived. But was Darius King de jure or de facto over the Jews? He was not King over them by a lineal Succeſſion from their own Princes; nor by the Fundamental Conſtitution of their Government, which owned no legal King that was not of their Brethren: I do not ſay they were not to ſubmit to, but not to chuſe any other. But what Right had Darius over the Jews, any more than ſucceeding in the Perſian Monarchy gave a Right to the Chaldean Conqueſts? I grant, the Jews did act under the Perſian Monarchs, as Nehemiah was Governour under Artaxerxes, and that they did ſwear to them, appears by Jaddus; but the Queſtion is, On what Right that Oath was founded? and whether upon Alexander's Conqueſt, they could not as well take a new Oath to him? For why ſhould not preſent actual Dominion give as much Right, as ſucceeding into anothers Right of Dominion, which was at firſt gained by Conqueſt? If Poſſeſſion gives Right in one caſe, why not in the other; ſince there is more reaſon for Allegiance, where there is a Power of Protection, than where there is none. And ſo we find Jaddus and the Jews did ſubmit to Alexander afterwards, and ſome of them went into his Army, although Darius was ſtill living; which ſhews, that as they were not forward to break their Allegiance ſworn to Darius; ſo they were not obſtinate in oppoſing Alexander, but yielded to the over-ruling Hand of Providence.

(2.) When the Jews had their Liberty granted them by the Kings of Syria. For Antiochus Eupator made Peace with them, by which they were to have the Liberty of their own Laws; and although he ſoon brake his Agreement with them; yet the Lacedæmonians and Romans owned them as a Free People, and treated with them as ſuch. And Simon pleaded to Athenobius in this War; We have neither taken other Mens Land, nor holden that which appertaineth to others; but the Inheritance of our Fathers, which our Enemies had wrongfully in Poſſeſſion a certain time. Wherefore we having Opportunity, hold the Inheritance of our Fathers. Which plainly ſhews, that they look'd on thoſe who ruled over them as unjuſt Poſſeſſors; at that time when they were ſo far under them, as to ſwear Allegiance to them. After this Antiochus Pius did grant them their Liberty upon Compoſition; which they enjoyed as their Neighbours did, and ſuffered not as Slaves to the Kings of Syria, but as ſometimes oppreſſed by them.

Poſſeſſors; at that time when they were ſo far under them, as to ſwear Allegiance to them. After this Antiochus Pius did grant them their Liberty upon Compoſition; which they enjoyed as their Neighbours did, and ſuffered not as Slaves to the Kings of Syria, but as ſometimes oppreſſed by them.

(3.) When they were reduced into the form of a Roman Province; which was done by Pompey. And from that time they were in Subjection to the Roman State; being only permitted to enjoy the Liberty of their Religion.

But I ſhall take notice only of the caſe of the Jews Subjection to the Roman Emperor in our Saviour's time. Suetonius takes notice of the ſtrange Impudence of Tiberius, in ſeeming ſo long to decline the accepting the Soveraignty, when from the very firſt he had aſſumed the Soveraign Power, without asking the Leave either of Senate or People. * Tacitus ſaith, That he took upon him the Government immediately upon the Death of Auguſtus; and did exerciſe the Imperial Power every where; only when he was in the Senate he ſeemed to demur, for fear of Germanicus and his Legions.

† Dio, That he exerciſed all the parts of the Government, having ſecured the Italian Forces to himſelf; but he declined the Name, till he underſtood the Deſign of Germanicus.

So that here we have a plain Original Uſurpation in Tiberius; there being no conſent of Senate and People to his aſſuming the Soveraign Power. And yet Tacitus ſaith, Firſt the Conſuls and great Officers, then the Senate and People did ſwear Allegiance to him. Which was before he had their Conſent. For he uſed his own Art afterwards, that he might ſeem to be choſen by them; and not to come to his Power by the force of Arms, or the Intrigues of his Mother. But what Appearance of conſent ſoever afterwards he gained from the Senate, it was extorted from them by Force or Fraud; as is evident from the ſame Hiſtorians. But what Right can ſuch a Conſent give? And he took away the Remainder of the Peoples Liberties in their Comitia, and never asked their Conſent.

What then was the Right of Tiberius to the Government founded upon? Auguſtus had ſeveral repeated Acts, whereby they continued his Government from time to time, and thereby ſhewed their Conſent, as Dion and Strabo affirm, That the whole Government was committed to him from the Senate and People: But what is there like this in the Caſe of Tiberius? He was Auguſtus his Wife's Son, and he made him his Heir by his Teſtament: And what was that to the Roman State? Was not Agrippa Poſthumus, then living, much nearer to Auguſtus, who was his own Grand-child? And by the Story in Tacitus of Fabius Maximus, ſeemed deſigned by him to ſucceed him; but upon the Diſcovery of it, firſt Auguſtus, and then Agrippa, was ſent out of the World to make way for Tiberius, who had before-hand engaged the Italian Legions. So that he truſted to no Teſtamentary Right, as appears by all his Colluſions with the Senate, which there had been no place for, if he had aſſumed the Government by virtue of Auguſtus his Teſtament or Adoption.

Here we have then a plain Inſtance of one who was in the Poſſeſſion of Power without Colour of Right, and yet Oaths of Allegiance were taken to him, both by the Senate and People. And when theſe Oaths were taken, there was no adjuſting the matter between him and the Senate; for he had newly aſſumed the Government by Force when they took theſe Oaths. Here was no unqueſtioned Authority from the Senate (whatever Vell. Paterculus pretends) but when he had gotten the Power into his Hands, he required them to own it.

Auguſtus was ſo wiſe, as when they offered him their Oaths, he refuſed them for this Reaſon; He conſidered well, ſaith Dio, that if they gave their free Conſent, they would do what they promiſed without ſwear- ing; and if they did not, all the Oaths in the World would not make them. But Tiberius was of another mind, and he required their Oaths in the firſt place; and it is not improbable that the ſame were required in ſeveral Provinces.

When our Saviour appeared in Judea, Tiberius was in poſſeſſion of this Power, over the Roman Empire; and becauſe the Jews were more ſcrupulous than other People, on account of their Fundamental Laws, as to the owning any uſurped Juriſdiction over them; ſome among them put the Queſtion to him about paying Tribute to Cæſar, i. e. about owning any Act of Subjection to an Uſurped Power. For there were plauſible Arguments on both ſides; one was from the Strictneſs of their Laws; the other was from the Benefit they received from the Roman Protection. The former ſeemed to have more of Conſcience, and the latter of Humane Prudence. Our Saviour takes a wiſe Method to anſwer the Doubt; he asks for the Currant Tribute-Money, and finding it had Cæſar's Superſcription, ſaith, Give to Cæſar the things that are Cæſar's. They might have replied, they are his de facto, but not de jure. Why did not our Saviour anſwer this Difficulty, but leave them to collect their Duty from the uſe of Cæſar's Coin among them? Might not one that had no Right, have the Power of coining Money, and diſperſing it, ſo that it ſhould be in common uſe? And was not Tiberius ſuch an one? What then doth he mean by this Anſwer? Either we muſt ſay, that he declines the main Queſtion, or that he reſolved it to be lawful, upon general Reaſons, to ſhew Acts of Subjection to ſuch a Power, which we may not be ſatisfied, is according to our Laws. For ſo it is plain the Roman Power was not agreeable to the Jewiſh Conſtitution; and although that were from God, yet our Saviour, who gives the beſt Directions for Conſcience, would by no means have Men to be peeviſh or obſtinate in ſuch Matters.

But paying of Tribute is quite another thing from Oaths of Allegiance. It is ſo, as to the manner of teſtifying our Subjection; but the main Queſtion is, Whether any Act of Subjection be lawful or not? If it be lawful to teſtifie it one way, why not another? If in paying Tribute, why not in ſolemn promiſing to pay it? If in promiſing, why not in ſwearing, i. e. in calling God to witneſs that I do it? Thus far then we may go; we may ſwear to pay Tribute; but on what account? Is it not as a token of Allegiance, i. e. of a Duty owing on the account of Protection? Then we have gained one ſtep farther, viz. that we may ſwear to perform ſome parts of Allegiance. But why then may we not do ſo as to all that ſuch an Oath implies, if it reſpects no more than the Duty which we owe, with reſpect to the Publick? And that is certainly the meaning of an Oath, when all Declarations of Right are left out, and only thoſe of Duty expreſſed, as it is in our preſent Caſe.

As to the dreadful Charge of Perjury and Apoſtacy, which ſome, of much greater Heat than Judgment, have made uſe of againſt thoſe who hold it lawful to take the Oaths; if what I have ſaid be true, it is little leſs than ridiculous: And it would have had more appearance of Reaſon, if the Phariſees had urged it againſt our Saviour's Reſolution of the Caſe about Tribute-Money. For had not God by his own Law ſettled the Government among them? And was it not a Fundamental Article of that Law, that none ſhould rule over them, but one of their Brethren? Was the Roman Emperor, or Pontius Pilate ſuch?

Have not all the ancient Zealots of the Law oppoſed any ſuch Foreign Power? What can it be then leſs than Perjury and Apoſtacy to give any Countenance to ſuch an open Violation of this Law, and to incourage Men to renounce it; when they find ſuch Liberties allowed by ſuch a Teacher? But I forbear.

To conclude then; I have, at your earneſt Deſire, taken this Matter into ſerious Conſideration, and have impartially weighed the moſt preſſing Difficulties I have met with; I cannot promiſe to give you Satiſfaction, but I have ſatisfied my ſelf, and have endeavoured to do the ſame for you. I am heartily ſorry for any Breaches among us at this time, and it is eaſie to foreſee who will be the Gainers by them. But I am glad to underſtand that the chiefeſt of thoſe who ſcruple the Oaths, have declared themſelves againſt the Attempts of ſuch an Unſeaſonable Separation, and I hope others will be ſo wiſe as to follow their Example.

A VINDICATION OF Their MAJESTIES Authority TO FILL THE SEES of the Deprived BISHOPS;

In a Letter out of the Country. Occaſioned by Dr. B---'s Refuſal of the Biſhoprick of Bath and Wells.

SIR,

THE Account we have received here of Dr. B ——'s Refuſal of the Biſhoprick of Bath and Wells, hath occaſioned great Talk and different Cenſures, as men are divided in their Intereſts and Opinions. I know not what to think of it, becauſe I know not the Reaſons for which he did it; but it is an unhappy amuſement at ſuch a time as this, to which a Wiſe Man, who had well conſidered Conſequences, would not have given the occaſion. I hope it may end all in noiſe, without any miſchievous Effects; but conſidering how many there are, who are very watchful to improve every Accident to the Diſturbance of the Government, and to unſettle mens minds, I cannot forbear giving you my Thoughts about it; tho' my tender regard for the Perſon concerned, would have made me ſilent at any other time.

I can eaſily apprehend ſeveral Reaſons which might move Wiſe and Good men, where there are no greater and more preſſing Obligations to the contrary, rather to chuſe an Eccleſiaſtical Preferment void by Death or Ceſſion than by Deprivation; but our preſent Circumſtances are ſuch, as ought to over-rule all Niceties; the miſchiefs of ſuch a Refuſal being ſo intolerable, as nothing can excuſe, much leſs juſtifie it, but the abſolute unlawfulneſs of ſucceeding in ſuch Preferments, while the Deprived Biſhop lives; which would be very odd for them to pretend, who have ſubmitted to the preſent Government. To ſatisfie you in this matter, I ſhall briefly conſider the firſt ſort of Reaſons, and ſhew that they are no Reaſons in our Circumſtances; and then examine the Lawfulneſs of the thing it ſelf.

As for the firſt, It may ſo happen, that the perſon Deprived, and the perſon to be Promoted, have been old and intimate Friends; and this may grate hard upon the perſon to be Promoted, to ſucceed in the Chair of one whom he loves, whoſe Misfortune he pities; whom he greatly values for his other many Good Qualities: Now if to refuſe ſuch a Preferment, would keep my Friend poſſeſſed of it, there were ſome ſenſe in this; but I know no other caſe, wherein 'tis thought a Breach of Friendſhip to ſucceed a Friend in a Preferment which he has loſt, and which the Law ſays is not, and ſhall not be his; when there is no ſuſpicion of foul play in ſupplanting him, any more than to ſucceed a dead Friend: Friendſhip is ſo far from being any Reaſon againſt it, that it ſhould make it deſirable

Have not all the ancient Zealots of the Law oppoſed any ſuch Foreign Power? Their MAJESTIES Authority TO FILL THE
SEES of the Deprived BISHOPS;

In a LETTER out of the Country. Occaſioned by Dr. B--'s Refuſal of the Biſhoprick of BATH and WELLS.

102:2.2.

SIR,

THE Account we have received here of Dr. B ——'s Refuſal of the Biſhoprick of Bath and Wells, hath occaſioned great Talk and different Cenſures, as men are divided in their Intereſts and Opinions. I know not what to think of it, becauſe I know not the Reaſons for which he did it; but it is an unhappy amuſement at ſuch a time as this, to which a Wiſe Man, who had well conſidered Conſequences, would not have given the occaſion. I hope it may end all in noiſe, without any miſchievous Effects; but conſidering how many there are, who are very watchful to improve every Accident to the Diſturbance of the Government, and to unſettle mens minds, I cannot forbear giving you my Thoughts about it; tho' my tender regard for the Perſon concerned, would have made me ſilent at any other time.

I can eaſily apprehend ſeveral Reaſons which might move Wiſe and Good men, where there are no greater and more preſſing Obligations to the contrary, rather to chuſe an Eccleſiaſtical Preferment void by Death or Ceſſion than by Deprivation; but our preſent Circumſtances are ſuch, as ought to over-rule all Niceties; the miſchiefs of ſuch a Refuſal being ſo intolerable, as nothing can excuſe, much leſs juſtifie it, but the abſolute unlawfulneſs of ſucceeding in ſuch Preferments, while the Deprived Biſhop lives; which would be very odd for them to pretend, who have ſubmitted to the preſent Government. To ſatisfie you in this matter, I ſhall briefly conſider the firſt ſort of Reaſons, and ſhew that they are no Reaſons in our Circumſtances; and then examine the Lawfulneſs of the thing it ſelf.

As for the firſt, It may ſo happen, that the perſon Deprived, and the perſon to be Promoted, have been old and intimate Friends; and this may grate hard upon the perſon to be Promoted, to ſucceed in the Chair of one whom he loves, whoſe Misfortune he pities; whom he greatly values for his other many Good Qualities: Now if to refuſe ſuch a Preferment, would keep my Friend poſſeſſed of it, there were ſome ſenſe in this; but I know no other caſe, wherein 'tis thought a Breach of Friendſhip to ſucceed a Friend in a Preferment which he has loſt, and which the Law ſays is not, and ſhall not be his; when there is no ſuſpicion of foul play in ſupplanting him, any more than to ſucceed a dead Friend: Friendſhip is ſo far from being any Reaſon againſt it, that it ſhould make it deſirable to both; to one, That his Friend may get what he has loſt; to the other, That he may have opportunity, if there be occaſion for it, to make his Friends Misfortune more eaſie, than a Stranger would do.

And if Friendſhip be no Objection, What ſhould hinder any Man from taking a Preferment, which another is legally deprived of? for I muſt take the Legality of it for granted now, and argue upon that Suppoſition. We muſt not take away what is another's; but ſurely what is not his, we may accept from thoſe who have Power to give it. If one may give, the other may receive; for let the Objection be what it will, it lies as much againſt the Giver as the Receiver. They who have loſt it, want it; And what then? ſo do a great many Men what is not theirs, what they never had, as well as what they have loſt: And muſt no Man take a Preferment in Church or State which another wants? Muſt the good Order and Government of Church and State be ſacrificed to the Wants and Misfortunes of private Men?

But there is a more material Conſideration, which may influence prudent and cautious Men, who are well preferred already. The Experience of the Revolution in 1660 hath taught them, how dangerous it may be in caſe ſuch a Revolution ſhould happen, to change their old Preferments for new ones, which may be challenged again by their old Proprietors. But in our Caſe there is the leaſt to be ſaid for this Caution, that can poſſibly be in any Revolution: for it is as vain a thing to hope to ſecure our ſelves in ſuch a Revolution, by Prudence and Caution, as it is for a Man to fortify his Houſe againſt the breaking in of the Sea: If he take care of the Banks, and keep out the Sea, his Houſe will eſcape; but if the Sea break in upon him, he muſt periſh with his Neighbours. If there ever be ſuch a Revolution as can unſettle what this hath done, God be merciful to this miſerable Nation; the prudent and the cautious Sinner, and the zealous Defenders of the preſent Government, will fare much alike: Nay, however they may flatter themſelves, the deprived Biſhops will not long triumph over their new Succeſſors.

Thus in ſome Caſes it may be a good Reaſon not to do a very lawful and innocent thing, if it be greatly miſtaken and miſrepreſented, and give a general Offence and Scandal: But when it appears, that there is nothing but Miſtake and Paſſion, and private Intereſt, or ill Deſigns on one Side, and a real Scandal, and great and publick Miſchief on the other; no wiſe Man will deliberate long which ſide to take: None but the Enemies of the Government can take offence at any Man's ſucceeding the deprived Biſhops; and I think thoſe who have ſubmitted to the Government, and ſworn Allegiance to their preſent Majeſties, ought not to be concerned at that: They have offended theſe Men already, and are no better in their Opinion than Perjured Rebels; and all that they can now gain by humouring them, is to be flattered, and to be laugh'd at. They may for a while give them ſome good words, as our Diſſenters did thoſe honeſt Men, who, as they thought, conformed againſt their Conſciences; but they will either ſecretly abhor them as Knaves, for ſwearing againſt their Conſciences, or deſpiſe them as Fools for refuſing Biſhopricks. And this is no very good Reaſon for a wiſe Man to court their Favour.

But on the other hand, what an unpardonable Scandal does ſuch a Refuſal give, both to the Enemies, and to the Friends of the Government, and to the Government it ſelf?

Whatever may be pretended, the World will not believe that Doctor B—— refuſed a Biſhoprick, but either out of Fear or Conſcience: The firſt calls in queſtion the Stability or Continuance of the preſent Government; the ſecond the Authority of it. Now this confirms the Enemies of the Government in their Opinion of the unlawfulneſs to ſubmit to it, and encourages them to attempt its overthrow; it weakens the Hands of Friends, and makes them cautious of embarking in a ſinking Intereſt, and fills them with new Jealouſies of the lawſulneſs of it; and what juſt offence this muſt give to the Government, I need not ſay.

The truth is, were I not better perſwaded of the good Inclinations of their Majeſties to the Church of England, and the general Inclination of the Nation to ſupport the Government, I ſhould dread what might be the fatal Conſequence of ſuch a miſcarriage as this both to Church and State.

There are always too many, who are glad of ſuch an opportunity to reproach the Church, and to poſſeſs their Majeſties with an ill Opinion of the Clergy, notwithſtanding their Oaths of Allegiance; and I confeſs this gives too great an Advantage to ſuch Miſrepreſentations, were not the Zeal and good Affection of wiſer Men too well known to be ſuſpected; and then I hope a ſingle Inſtance of Folly can do no great hurt; for that is the ſofteſt Name I can give it, on which ſide ſoever I view it.

This plainly proves, that ſuppoſing it lawful to have taken the Biſhoprick, no other Conſideration whatſoever can juſtifie the reſuſal in our Circumſtances; and I know not how to ſuppoſe that Dr. B—— could think it unlawful.

He ſubmitted to the Government, and took the Oath of Allegiance as early as any Man; and never, that I heard, had the leaſt ſcruple about it; and yet this was the time to have been Scrupulous, if he would have been ſo; for it ſeems a little of the lateſt, when he is become a ſworn Subject to King William and Queen Mary, to queſtion their Authority to make a Biſhop. And if the former Biſhops were Deprived, and New Biſhops made, by ſuch an Authority as he can ſwear Allegiance to, I cannot underſtand, that it can be unlawful to accept a Biſhoprick from the Hands of thoſe whom he owns, by his ſwearing Allegiance to them, to have Authority to give it; for this is an Authority which belongs to the Imperial Crown of England.

Beſides this, Dr. B—— was one of thoſe, who by Commiſſion from the Dean and Chapter of Canterbury, hath exerciſed Archi-Epiſcopal Authority, during the Vacancy of the See, by the deprivation of the A. B. as it is expreſſed in the Commiſſion; and I take this to be altogether as unlawful (if either of them were unlawful) to ſeiſe upon the Authority of the A. B. upon the Account of his deprivation, as to take the Character, and exerciſe the Authority of a Biſhop in the See of a deprived Biſhop. To receive the Conſecration of a Biſhop, I ſuppoſe, is not the thing he accounts unlawful, nor to exerciſe the Authority of a Biſhop; and then there is nothing he can think unlawful, but to exerciſe the Authority of a Biſhop in the See of a deprived Biſhop; and then it ſeems to me as unlawful for a Presbyter to do this, as for a Biſhop to do it; unleſs a Presbyter may do it without the Revenues of the Biſhoprick; but a Biſhop muſt not do it with them; but this can be no Eccleſiaſtical Scruple, as ſo great a Canoniſt muſt needs know; for if the Civil Power cannot diſpoſe of ſuch Temporal Matters, it can do nothing.

But whatever he thought, his refuſing a Biſhoprick upon great deliberation, after an appearing forwardneſs to take it, hath tempted People to think, ſirable to both; to one, That his Friend may get what he has loſt; to the other, That he may have opportunity, if there be occaſion for it, to make his Friends Misfortune more eaſie, than a Stranger would do.

And if Friendſhip be no Objection, What ſhould hinder any Man from taking a Preferment, which another is legally deprived of? for I muſt take the Legality of it for granted now, and argue upon that Suppoſition. We muſt not take away what is another's; but ſurely what is not his, we may accept from thoſe who have Power to give it. If one may give, the other may receive; for let the Objection be what it will, it lies as much againſt the Giver as the Receiver. They who have loſt it, want it; And what then? ſo do a great many Men what is not theirs, what they never had, as well as what they have loſt: And muſt no Man take a Preferment in Church or State which another wants? Muſt the good Order and Government of Church and State be ſacrificed to the Wants and Misfortunes of private Men?

To receive the Conſecration of a Biſhop, I ſuppoſe, is not the thing he accounts unlawful, nor to exerciſe the Authority of a Biſhop; and then there is nothing he can think unlawful, but to exerciſe the Authority of a Biſhop in the See of a deprived Biſhop; and then it ſeems to me as unlawful for a Presbyter to do this, as for a Biſhop to do it; unleſs a Presbyter may do it without the Revenues of the Biſhoprick; but a Biſhop muſt not do it with them; but this can be no Eccleſiaſtical Scruple, as ſo great a Canoniſt muſt needs know; for if the Civil Power cannot diſpoſe of ſuch Temporal Matters, it can do nothing.

But whatever he thought, his refuſing a Biſhoprick upon great deliberation, after an appearing forwardneſs to take it, hath tempted People to think, that he judges it unlawful; and to let him ſee how inconſiſtent this is with his owning the preſent Government, and his exerciſing the Archiepiſcopal Authority, I ſhall explain the meaning of it to him, which, I believe he never thought of.

If it be unlawful to ſucceed a deprived Biſhop, then he is the Biſhop of the Dioceſs ſtill; and then the Law that deprives him is no Law, and conſequently the King and Parliament, that made that Law, no King nor Parliament; and how can this be reconciled with the Oath of Allegiance, unleſs the Doctor can ſwear Allegiance to him, who is no King, and hath no Authority to govern?

If the deprived Biſhop be the only lawful Biſhop, then the People and Clergy of his Dioceſs are bound to own him and no other; then all Biſhops, who own the Authority of a new Arch-biſhop, and live in Communion with him, are Schiſmaticks; and the Clergy, who live in Communion with Schiſmatical Biſhops, are Schiſmaticks themſelves; and the whole Church of England now eſtabliſhed by Law is Schiſmatical, and Doctor B—— himſelf a Schiſmatick, if he communicate with it. And thus we have no Church, or only a Schiſmatical Church, as well as no King; and all that Dr. B—— has got by refuſing a Biſhoprick, is to prove himſelf a Schiſmatick, if he live in Communion; or to make a Schiſm, if he ſeparate from it.

Now will the Doctor ſay this? or if he dare not ſay it, will he dare to think it? and yet if the deprived Biſhops, though they retain their Epiſcopal Character, have no Authority or Juriſdiction in the Church of England, then it muſt be lawful for other Biſhops to exerciſe that Authority, which they have loſt; and to ſucceed in the Government of ſuch vacant Sees, unleſs ſuch Churches muſt be deprived of the Epiſcopal Authority, while their deprived Biſhops live.

And this brings me to conſider the lawfulneſs of the thing it ſelf, which is ſo evident when ſet in a clear light, that it will admit of no diſpute with Men of Senſe.

In a late Letter ſaid to be ſent to Doctor B—— and now printed on the Backſide of a ſcandalous Rhyming Libel upon his Sermon of Reſtitution, he is threatned in caſe he ſhould accept the Biſhoprick, with the Fate of thoſe Eccleſiaſtical Schiſmatical Vſurpers, Gregory and George of Cappadocia, who unjuſtly invaded the See of Alexandria upon the depoſing of Athanaſius the Orthodox Biſhop there. What effect this might have on Dr. B—— I know not; but thoſe who have uſed themſelves to good Senſe, as well as to ancient Canons, eaſily perceive a vaſt difference between theſe two Caſes, as will preſently appear. But to repreſent this matter plainly and eaſily, I ſhall briefly ſtate the Caſe, and that I believe will ſatisfie underſtanding Men, without diſputing.

1. Firſt then in a Chriſtian Nation and Government, the Church is incorporated into the State, and the Soveraign Power has a Supremacy in all Eccleſiaſtical Cauſes. To deny this, is either Popery or Fanaticiſm: It is plain, the Reformation of this Church was founded on this Principle; and it is the conſtant Doctrine of our Articles, Homilies, and Canons, and they are our Rule conſidered as Members of the Church of England.

2. This Supremacy, though it do not extend to the adminiſtration of Holy Offices or Church Cenſures, yet it reaches the Perſons and external Juriſdiction of Biſhops and the other Clergy, and the Regulating and Ordering the Externals of Religion: As the making and depoſing Biſhops, when there is juſt cauſe for it, belongs to the Supremacy; which Authority was exerciſed by the Jewiſh Kings over the High Prieſt himſelf: and to reſolve all this into a meer Eccleſiaſtical Authority, is to ſet up a Pope, or a Presbytery, or a National Synod, above the Supream Power; and we may as well ſay at this day, that the Supream Power has no Authority to make a Biſhop, becauſe by the ancient Canons and Practice of the Church, a Biſhop ought to be freely and canonically elected by the other Biſhops of the Province, or by the Clergy and People of the Dioceſs; as that it cannot depoſe a Biſhop from the exerciſe of his Epiſcopal Authority within their Dominions, without a Synod or Council.

3. When a Church is incorporated into the State, an offence againſt the State is a juſt reaſon to depoſe a Biſhop from the exerciſe of his Epiſcopal Authority in ſuch a State: Eſpecially if ſuch Biſhop or Biſhops wholly diſown the Authority and Government of the State, and refuſe to ſubmit to it: The denial of the King's Supremacy in Eccleſiaſtical Cauſes, was thought a good Reaſon to depoſe Biſhops; and to deny their Civil Authority, is ſomewhat more than that. This is as certain and evident, as that the Church is and muſt be Incorporated into the State; for if Biſhops, who oppoſe and diſown the Authority of the State, muſt not be depoſed from the Exerciſe of their Authority in ſuch a State, then the Church muſt be divided from the State, and be independent on it; ſuch Men may be Biſhops of the Church who are no Subjects of the State; which is a contradiction to the very Notion of a Church incorporated with the State.

4. And therefore we muſt diſtinguiſh between an Eccleſiaſtical and Canonical depoſition of a Biſhop for Hereſie, or other Eccleſiaſtical Crimes; and a State-deprivation. The firſt concerns the Character, and Eccleſiaſtical Communion; it is the Cenſure of the Church, which concerns him as a Biſhop; and when it is ratified and confirmed not only by a Provincial or National Synod, but by a General Council, ſuch a depoſed Biſhop is no longer a Biſhop of the Catholick Church, and no Chriſtian muſt Communicate with him as a Biſhop: But a State-deprivation does not concern the Character; ſuch a Man may be a Biſhop of the Catholick Church ſtill, if he do not fall under Church-Cenſures, for Hereſie or other Crimes; but it only concerns the Exerciſe of his Epiſcopal Authority in any Dioceſs within the Dominions of that State, or enjoying any Eccleſiaſtical Benefice in it. And if we will not allow the Supreme Power of a Nation to judge, who ſhall be Biſhops in their Dominions, and enjoy the Revenues of the Church, which are the Gift of the State, you leave the Supream Power no Authority or Juriſdiction over Eccleſiaſtical Perſons.

5. And this makes a great difference between ſucceeding an Orthodox Biſhop uncanonically depoſed, and ſucceeding an Orthodox Biſhop deprived by an Act of State. If a Biſhop be depoſed by an Heretical Synod upon falſe ſuggeſtions, and publickly known to be falſe and malicious, and be own'd and acquitted by a Council of Orthodox Biſhops, it is Uſurpation to invade his See, a breach of Catholick Communion, and a Schiſm in the Catholick Church, which was the Caſe of Athanaſius and George of Cappadocia, who ſucceeded him: But if a Biſhop otherwiſe Orthodox, is guilty of ſuch an Offence againſt the State, that he is deprived of the Exerciſe of his Epiſcopal Office, neither the Faith nor the Communion of the Church is concerned in it, but only the Authority of the State, which obliges both the Clergy and the Laity in ſuch caſes; and when neither the Catholick Faith nor Catholick Communion are concern'd, it can be no

Eccleſiaſtical Offence to ſucceed in ſuch a Biſhoprick, but a due ſubmiſſion and compliance with that Authority, to which the Church in a Chriſtian Nation ought to be ſubject.

The reaſon why theſe Matters are not ſo accurately diſtinguiſhed by ſome Men, is becauſe they were not at firſt diſtinguiſhed when the Empire became Chriſtian, and the Church was at firſt Incorporated into the State. The Zeal of the Chriſtian Emperors for the Service of the Church, and that great Opinion which at that time they deſervedly had of the Piety and Prudence of the Governours of the Church, made them leave the Government of the Church in the ſame ſtate they found it in, when the Church was a diſtinct Society from the State; and in conſequence of this, they reſerved all Cauſes relating to Biſhops to the Cognizance of their own Synods, without diſtinguiſhing between Offences againſt the State, which properly belong to a Civil Cognizance, and thoſe which were of a pure Eccleſiaſtical Nature. This ſoon created great trouble to Princes, and by degrees grew into the Omnipotent Power of the Biſhop of Rome, which domineered over Emperors themſelves, and ſet the Church above the State.

The Reformation of our Church began with the Reformation of this Abuſe and Church-Uſurpation, and reſtored our Princes to that Supremacy, which both the Laws of God and the reaſon and nature of Sovereign Power gives them over all Perſons, in all Cauſes, as well Eccleſiaſtical as Civil: And now an Offence againſt the State, is as juſt a Reaſon for a State-Deprivation by the ſole Authority of the State, without the Authority of Synods or Councils; as Hereſie and Schiſm, and other Crimes are of Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures.

This Authority, as I obſerved before, the Jewiſh Kings exerciſed even over their High-Prieſts, as Solomon depoſed Abiathar for following Adonijah to make him King, and placed Zadock in his ſtead; which was a pure State-Quarrel, and done by his ſole Authority, without conſulting the Sanhedrim in it. Thus when Judea was under the Government of the Romans, they changed the High-prieſts every Year; tho' by the Inſtitution of God it was for Life; and this in our Saviour's Days, who never reproved them for it, nor ſeparated himſelf or his Diſciples from the Communion of ſuch Schiſmatical Uſurping High-Prieſts, who ſucceeded in the places of their living Predeceſſors without a Canonical Depoſition. The Grand Signior at this Day makes and unmakes the Patriarch of Conſtantinople at pleaſure, and no man blames the Patriarch who ſucceeds.

Dr. Sherlock in his Preface to the Caſe of Allegiance, took notice of this as matter of Fact, without enquiring into the Reaſons. His Anſwerer had nothing to return to it, but by denying the legal Authority of this Government; which is juſt nothing to the purpoſe: For if a legal Government, by their Authority and Supremacy, can depoſe Biſhops, and promote New ones; then all their Arguments againſt ſucceeding in the Sees of ſuch Biſhops as are not Canonically depoſed by an Eccleſiaſtical Authority, are utterly loſt; and beſides that, if this Anſwer be good, no man ought to queſtion theſe new Promotions, who owns the Authority of the preſent Government.

The Truth is, the ſame Objections which are now made againſt the Promotion of theſe new Biſhops, are equally ſtrong, and as eagerly urg'd at this Day by the Papiſts againſt our firſt Reformers: For they were promoted to Biſhopricks while the former Popiſh Biſhops were living, and not Canonically depoſed by any Act of the Church, but only by the Authority of the State; and their denying the Supremacy of the King, was one, and none of the leaſt of thoſe Doctrines, which they were depoſed for; and yet that only rejects the King's Eccleſiaſtical Authority; and therefore as it is only an Offence againſt the State, ſo it is a much leſs Offence, than utterly to renounce their Authority in Civil and Eccleſiaſtical Cauſes, as our deprived Biſhops now do.

I ſhall not need to enlarge on theſe things, which are plain and obvious at the firſt Propoſal: If you have any opportunity of ſeeing Dr. B——, deſire him to conſider again of it; and though he may repent too late to do himſelf any good, yet if he diſcover his miſtake, common Juſtice to the Government, under whoſe Protection he lives, and to Their Majeſties, to whom he has ſworn Allegiance, and who had placed ſuch a Mark of Favour and Honour on him, had he known how to value it, obliges him publickly to own his Miſtake, which is the only recompence he can now make. I am,

SIR,

Your Humble Servant.

AN

AN ANSWER TO THE PAPER

Delivered

By Mr. Aſhton at his Execution to Sir Francis Child, Sheriff of London, &c. Together with the Paper it ſelf.

Mr. ASHTON's Paper.

Mr. Sheriff,

H*AVING obſerved that the Methods of making Speeches at the place of Execution was not always attended with the deſigned Succeſs; and thinking it better to imploy my laſt Minutes in Devotion and Holy Communion with my God; I have prepared this Paper to leave in your Hands, as well to aſſert my Principles, as to teſtifie my Innocency. As to my Religion I profeſs, by* God's Grace, I dye in the Faith into which I was baptized, that of the Church of England, in whoſe Communion (nothing doubting of my Salvation thro' the Merits of my Saviour) I have always thought my ſelf ſafe and happy; according to her Principles and late much eſteemed Doctrines (tho' now unhappily exploded) I have regulated my Life, believing my ſelf obliged by my Religion to look upon my rightful lawful Prince (whatever his Principles were, or his Practiſes might be) as God's Vicegerent, and accountable (if guilty of Male-adminiſtration) to God only, from whom he received his Power; and always believing it to be contrary to the Laws of God, the Church, and the Realm, upon any pretence whatſoever to take up Arms againſt him, and let all the World take notice, in this Belief I dye. But I have more particular Obligation to the King my Maſter, whom I have had the honour to ſerve, and received many ſignal Favours from him, for ſixteen years paſt, ſo that Gratitude (a thing not much eſteemed at this time) as well as Duty and Religion commanded the utmoſt Service I could pay him; and when I add theſe Conſiderations, that we were born his Liege-Subjects, that we have ſolemnly profeſſed our Allegiance, and often confirmed it with Oaths, That his Majeſty's Uſage after the Prince of Orange's arrival was very hard, ſevere, (and if I may ſo ſay) Unjuſt; and that all the new Methods of ſettling this Nation have hitherto made it more miſerable, poor, and more expoſed to Foreign Enemies; and the Religion we pretend to be ſo fond of preſerving, now much more than ever likely to be deſtroyed: There ſeems to me no way to prevent the Impending Evils, and ſave theſe Nations from poverty and deſtruction, but the Calling home our Injured Sovereign, who as a true Father of his Country has (notwithſtanding all his Provocations and Injuries) a natural love and tenderneſs for all his Subjects; and I am ſo far from repining at the loſs of my life, that had I ten thouſand I ſhould think my ſelf obliged to ſacrifice them all rather than omit any juſt and honeſt means to promote ſo good and neceſſary a work; and I adviſe and deſire all my fellow Subjects to think of their Duty and return to their Allegiance, before the ſevere Judgment of God overtake them, for their Perjury and Rebellion, but certainly the Good and Intereſt of theſe Nations, abſtracted from all other Conſiderations, will e're long convince them of the neceſſity of doing it.

Having thus frankly declared my Principles, I know the Inference will be, that I have acted accordingly, and conſequently, that I am now juſtly condemned; but as I ingenuouſly own the Premiſes, ſo I poſitively deny the Conſequence; for whatever my Inclinations or Actions have been, yet, as to the Matter I was ſentenced to dye for, I declare my ſelf innocent, and will appeal even to the Judges themſelves, whether or no, upon my Tryal, there appeared the leaſt proof that I knew a tittle contained in the Papers, but Preſumption was, with the Jury, thought ſufficient to find me guilty, tho' I am told, I am the firſt Man that ever was condemned for High Treaſon upon bare Suſpicion or Preſumption, and that contrary to my L. Coke's and other eminent Lawyers Opinions. The knowledge of my own Innocency, as to the Indictment and Charge againſt me, was, that that armed me with ſo much aſſurance, and occaſioned my caſting my Life upon the firſt Twelve Men of the Pannel, without challenging any. But tho' I have, I think, juſt reaſon to complain of the ſevere Charge given by the Judges, and hard meaſure I have received, not to mention my cloſe Impriſonment, the haſty and violent Proceedings againſt me, nor the Induſtry uſed in the Return of fitting Perſons to paſs upon me, the denying me a Copy of the Pannel, &c. Yet, as I hope for pardon and forgiveneſs at the hands of my God, ſo do I moſt heartily pray for, and forgive them, and all my Enemies, all the World, nay even that Judge and Jury-man who did ſo ſignally (contrary to common Juſtice) expoſe themſelves to deſtroy me. But let the Will of God be done: I rely wholly upon his Mercy and the Merits of my bleſſed Saviour for Salvation, I do chearfully and entirely reſign my ſelf into his Hands, as into the Hands of a faithful Creator, in ſure and certain hopes of a happy Reſurrection. Bleſs, protect, and ſtrengthen, O Lord God, my good and gracious King and Maſter; in thy due time let the Virtue, Goodneſs and Innocency of the Queen, my Miſtreſs, make all her Enemies bluſh, and ſilence the wicked and unjuſt Calumnies that Malice and Envy have raiſed againſt her; make her and theſe Nations happy in the Prince of Wales, whom from unanſwerable and undoubted Proofs I know to be her Son; reſtore them all when thou ſeeſt fit to their juſt Rights, and on ſuch a Bottom as may ſupport and eſtabliſh the Church of England, and once more make her flouriſh, notwithſtanding the Wounds ſhe hath received of late from her prevaricating Sons.

Forgive, forgive, O Lord, all my Enemies, bleſs all my Friends, comfort and ſupport my dear afflicted Wife, and poor Babes, be thou a Huſband and a Father to them; for their ſakes only I could have wiſhed to live; But pardon that Wiſh, O good God, and take my Soul into thy everlaſting Glory. Amen.

Jn° ASHTON.

The ANSWER.

THE Paper which paſſeth under the Name of Mr. Aſhton's SPEECH ſeems to me to be compoſed with too much Art and Care to be the Work of one who profeſſeth, he thought it better to employ his laſt minutes in Devotion: And if he was ſo illiterate and unskilled in the Law, as he ſaid at his Tryal, Fol. 111. one may juſtly wonder not only at ſuch Terms as Impending, Prevaricating, Premiſſes, and Conſequence, &c. but at ſuch a peremptory Judgment as he gives about the Laws of the Realm, in a Caſe that muſt be acknowledged by all ingenious men of his own Party to have a great deal of Difficulty in it.

But there are ſome Men who think to bear down all others by their Confidence, and would have it taken for granted that the whole Nation (themſelves excepted) is under the guilt of Perjury and Rebellion.

Theſe are the modeſt Terms in this Speech, which at leaſt do not become the Charity of one juſt going out of the World. Therefore I rather believe it to be drawn up by ſome Perſons of more Art and Leiſure; who thought it beſt to convey their own Sentiments (as they call them) under the more popular Name of one who ſuffered for their Cauſe.

But the Weight of what is ſaid doth not depend on the Perſon, and therefore I ſhall calmly and impartially conſider the Things themſelves, and ſhew how unjuſt and unreaſonable the Inſinuations are which reſpect the preſent Government, and all ſuch who act in Obedience to it.

There are two Things this Paper is ſaid to be deſign'd for, to aſſert his Principles, and to teſtify his Innocency. For his Principles he profeſſeth, that he dyes in the Faith and Communion of the Church of England. And he might have lived longer in both if he had pleaſed, for I cannot ſee how the Faith and Communion of the Church of England obliged him to do that for which he ſuffered: But, by the Faith of the Church of England he means the Doctrine of Paſſive Obedience. Be it ſo: however he ſuffered not for his Paſſive Obedience, but for the want of it: If he had regulated his Life by this Principle, he had preſerved it; yet he ſaith he did ſo, and dyed for it. There muſt be certainly then ſome great Miſtake about the Doctrines and Principles of our Church. I always thought thoſe are to be found in the Articles and Conſtitutions of it. Which of theſe did he ſuffer for?

They are, he ſaith, her Principles and late much eſteemed Doctrines tho' now unhappily exploded. I know of no Doctrines or Principles of the Church of England which are exploded among us; and therefore this is unhappily inſiſted on by a dying Man, unleſs he had given ſome Proof of it.

Well; but he believed himſelf obliged by his Religion to look upon his Rightful, Lawful Prince (whatever his Principles were, or his Practices might be) as God's Vicegerent, and accountable to God only, from whom he received his Power. All this he might have done, and have been alive ſtill; for the Matter in diſpute is not whether Rightful, Lawful Kings are to be obeyed, but who in our preſent Circumſtances is our Rightful, Lawful Sovereign; not whether Kings be not God's Vicegerents, but whether God doth not ſometimes confer the Right of Sovereignty by a Law ſuperiour to the Laws of particular Countries, that is by the Law of Nations, which eſtabliſheth ſuch a Right upon the ſucceſs of a juſt War; not whether Sovereign Princes are not accountable only to God, but whether Allegiance be not due where the Rights of Sovereignty are placed, by an extraordinary Act of Providence and the concurrent Conſent of the Nation. But he goes on; And always believing it to be contrary to the Laws of God, the Church and the Realm, upon any Pretence whatſoever to take up Arms againſt him, and let all the World take notice in this Belief I dye. I had much rather have taken notice that in this Belief he lived; for I ſee no Reaſon of his dying for it. For, why muſt a Man be ſaid to die for not taking up Arms, who was Condemned to die for a Deſign juſt contrary, viz. for the ſubverting the preſent Government by Domeſtick Inſurrections and Foreign Power?

So that the Queſtion is not about Paſſive Obedience, but to whom it is due; I grant that the Laws of God and of the Realm are to determine the Meaſures of our Obedience; but here lies the only Point, whether the Rights of Sovereignty may not be transferred by the ſucceſs of a juſt War and the Conſent of the People: For if they may, then according to his own Principles he ſuffered juſtly. And if the Directors of his Conſcience did not ſpeak to this Point, they led him into a dangerous Error, and have been too much the Occaſion of his ſuffering.

Therefore to clear this whole Matter, and to prevent the like Miſtakes in others; I ſhall endeavour to ſtate the preſent Caſe of our Government, ſo as as to ſhew both that it is our Duty to ſubmit to it, and that no Principles or Doctrines of the Church of England are violated thereby.

To do this, we muſt of neceſſity look back to the Occaſions of this great Revolution: And there were two principal Occaſions of it.

Firſt, Great and violent Preſumptions of an Injury to the Right of Succeſſion.

Secondly, Too great Evidence of a formed Deſign to ſubvert the eſtabliſhed Religion and Civil Liberties of the Nation.

Now there are two very material Queſtions which ariſe from hence.

Firſt, Whether theſe were the juſt Occaſions of a War?

Secondly, Whether upon the ſucceſs of this War the Rights of Sovereignty were duly transferred?

If theſe were juſt Occaſions of a War, and upon the Succeſs thereof the Sovereignty was duly transferred, then there can be no Diſpute left to whom our Allegiance is due.

It is taken for granted by all who underſtand theſe Matters, that there is a Law of Nature, which determines the Rights and Properties of particular Nations; and that all private Perſons are bound to ſubmit to the municipal Laws of thoſe Societies for their Peace and Security: So there are other Laws which concern thoſe Nations, as they make up ſeveral independent Governments upon each other. And there are ſeveral Rights which belong to them with reſpect to one another, which do not belong to private Perſons as they live in ſubjection to any particular Government.

And as there are ſuch Rights, ſo there muſt be a juſt and lawful way for Reparation of Injuries. In particular Governments, the thing is plain by eſtabliſhed Laws and Courts of Judicature, whoſe Sentence is Executed by the Civil Power; but in Separate Nations and Independent Governments, although there be Laws by conſent called the Law of Nations; yet there is no commmon Judicature to determine of Right and Wrong, and therefore in caſe of Injury there is an allowance for the injured Party by this Law of Nations to Right himſelf by Force, as there would be to every particular Perſon, if there were no Laws nor Power to ſee them executed. There is then a Right in every Sovereign and Independent Prince to exerciſe Force againſt another Prince, who detains any Right from him, or doth any Injury to him, or to thoſe he is bound to defend.

The Queſtion then comes to the Juſt Occaſions of ſuch a War, and here are two aſſigned.

Firſt, great and violent Preſumptions of an Injury to the Right of Succeſſion. This is expreſly mentioned and inſiſted on, in the Declaration of the then Prince of Orange (our preſent King) in theſe Words —— " But " to crown all, there are great and violent Preſumptions inducing us to " believe that thoſe evil Counſellors, in order to the carrying on of their " ill deſigns, and to the gaining to themſelves the more time, for the effecting
" of them, for the encouraging their Complices, and for the diſcouraging
" of all good Subjects, hath publiſhed that the Queen hath " brought forth a Son; tho' there have appeared both during the Queen's " pretended Bigneſs, and in the manner in which the Birth was managed,
" ſo many juſt and viſible grounds of Suſpicion, that not only we our
" ſelves, but all the good Subjects of theſe Kingdoms do vehemently
" ſuſpect that the pretended Prince of Wales was not born of the Queen:
" and it is notoriouſly known to all the World, that many both doubted
" of the Queens Bigneſs and of the Birth of the Child, and yet there was " not any one thing done to ſatisfie them and to put an end to all Doubts.
" And ſince our Deareſt and moſt entirely beloved Conſort, the Princeſs, " and likewiſe we our ſelves have ſo great an Intereſt in this matter, and " ſuch a Right as all the World knows to the Succeſſion to the Crown.—
" And ſince the Engliſh Nation hath ever teſtified a moſt particular Affection " and Eſteem both to our Deareſt Conſort and to our Selves; We " cannot excuſe our Selves from eſpouſing their Intereſts in a matter of " ſuch high Conſequence, and from contributing all that lies in us, for " maintaining both of the Proteſtant Religion, and of the Laws and Liberties " of thoſe Kingdoms, and for the ſecuring to them the continual Enjoyment " of all their juſt Rights.

Here we have an Hereditary Right to the Crown aſſerted both remoter in Himſelf and nearer in the Queen, who was unqueſtionably the next, if there were no Heir Male: It was poſſible this Right might be really defeated by a Prince of Wales, and it was poſſible it might be pretended to be ſo when it was not: For there have been many Inſtances in Hiſtory of ſuborned and ſuppoſititious Princes, and therefore there was reaſon that ſufficient Evidence ſhould be given in a Caſe of ſuch Importance, and which was under ſo great Suſpicion. But if there was no reaſonable care taken to prevent or remove theſe Suſpicions, then the Parties moſt concerned have a Right to aſſert their own Pretenſions in ſuch a way as the Law of Nations doth allow.

And in this Caſe no private Depoſitions or confident Affirmations of ſuch as are Dependents or otherwiſe liable to Suſpicion, can in Reaſon be taken for ſatisfactory Evidence; for let any one conſider what the Laws of Nations have thought fitting Evidence in a Caſe of this Nature, and he will ſoon find how very much ſhort ſuch proofs are of what the Nature of the Thing has been thought to require —— The Civil Law is very ſtrict where there is any occaſion of Suſpicion.

" It requires notice to be given twice a Month to the Parties concerned D. 25. Tit. 4. " that they may receive full ſatisfaction. That the Mother is to be kept " in a Houſe by it ſelf: That thirty Days before ſhe expects to be delivered,
" ſhe muſt give notice of it to thoſe who are moſt concerned,
" that they may ſend ſuch as they can truſt to be preſent: that there

" ought to be but one Door where ſhe is to lie in, and if there be more, " they muſt be done up; that at that Door there are to be Three Men " and Three Women and Two Aſſiſtants: That all Perſons are to be " ſearcht who go in, eſpecially at the Labour, at which time there muſt " be ſufficient Light in the Room. When the Child is born it ought to " be firſt ſhewn to the Parties concerned, and great care is taken about " the Perſons in whoſe Hands he is put, and Satisfaction muſt be given " from time to time that it is the ſame Child, and if Satisfaction be not " given as to theſe things, the Roman Law doth not allow any Right of " Poſſeſſion.

By the Old Common Law of England, in caſe of Suſpicion, a Writ of Inſpection was allowed, the Form whereof is in the Books, and if there were any doubt, the Woman was to be put into a ſafe place, where no Suſpicious Perſons were to come near her till ſhe was delivered. This was then thought ſo reaſonable a thing, that the Old Law-Books have a Chapter on purpoſe, De Paratu Suppoſito, wherein Directions are given to prevent and diſcover a Subornation.

Bract. l. 2. c. 32.

Fleta. l. 1. c. 15.

Theſe things I mention to ſhow what Satisfaction is neceſſary to be given in caſe of Suſpicion, and the higher the Perſons are, and of ſo much greater Importance as the Succeſſion is, ſo much clearer ought the Evidence to be, that no occaſion of Doubt may remain: But if no ſuch care was taken, If the principal Perſons concerned had not the leaſt Satisfaction given them; If the whole thing were managed with Secrecy and ſuſpicious Circumſtances, then I can ſee no Reaſon to exclude thoſe who are moſt concern'd from a Right of demanding Satisfaction by force of Arms.

But Mr. Aſhton thinks he hath cleared this matter, when he affirms that he knows there was no Suppoſititious Birth by unanſwerable undoubted Proofs, and this is put into his Prayer, that it might look like an appeal to God as to the Truth of what he ſaid. This is one of the boldeſt and moſt artificial Strokes of the Penner of this Speech, not barely to make him affirm it with ſo much aſſurance, but to do it in his Prayer too. But a matter of ſo great Conſequence is not to be determined upon the Teſtimony of any ſingle Witneſs, although he were the moſt competent Witneſs as to ſuch a matter, which doth not in the leaſt appear as to Mr. Aſhton: For how could he know it by unanſwerable and undoubted Proofs; when conſidering the Circumſtances that were in this Caſe, it was hardly poſſible to produce ſuch Proofs, as would paſs for unexceptionable Evidence upon a Legal Trial? For there hath been ſuch a Trial here in England within the Memory of Man, wherein the Father, and Mother, and Midwife have all ſworn to the Truth of the Birth of a Son, and yet the Jury upon hearing the whole Evidence have given Judgment that it was Suppoſititious.

Therefore bare Affirmations of ſome Perſons concerned are not Evidence ſufficient in caſe of ſtrong and vehement Preſumptions to the contrary; and ſuch Evidence ought to have been given as might have either prevented or removed any juſt grounds of Suſpicion.

But ſince no ſuch unanſwerable undoubted Proofs were made to thoſe who were moſt concerned, the ſame juſt Right doth remain to the undoubted Heir of the Crown, as it did in the former Caſe to the next Heir at Law, who upon a fair Trial and the Verdict of the Country, recovered the Eſtate. But between Princes there are no ſuch ways of Trial or Courts of Judicature, and therefore in ſuch Caſes the Right of War is allowed by the general Conſent of Mankind.

Secondly, There was a further juſt Occaſion for that Expedition, which was the Deſign to ſubvert our Religion and Civil Liberties. As to the Particulars they are fully ſet down in the Declaration, and need not to be repeated; that which I am to make out is, that the then Prince of Orange by his Relation to the Crown had a juſt Right to concern himſelf in the Vindication of both, and that this is not repugnant to the Doctrines and Principles of the Church of England.

It was not thought diſagreeable to them for Q. Elizabeth to aſſiſt the Dutch againſt the King of Spain; yet ſhe had no ſuch reaſon for it as our King and Queen had to prevent the ſuppreſſion of their own Religion here, and the Rights of that People to whom they were ſo nearly related. For there was nothing in her Caſe ſo conſiderable as the growing Power of Spain, and the danger of overturning the Religious and Civil Liberties of a Neighbour-People. The Queen's Profeſſor of Law in Oxford at that time ſaith, that it was then made a Queſtion by ſome, whether Q. Eliz. had juſt Reaſon for that War in aſſiſtance of the Dutch, and he reſolves the Lawfulneſs of it upon 3 Grounds: Firſt, That it was to prevent enſuing Miſchief; Secondly, From the ancient Alliance between the two Nations; Thirdly, That if the Dutch were totally vanquiſhed by the Spaniard, they would be made Slaves under an Arbitrary Power. The Queen her ſelf owned this as the Ground of her Reſolution, That it was Chriſtian Piety to relieve them who were of the ſame Religion which ſhe profeſſed, and Wiſdom to prevent the pernicious deſigns of her Enemies. And in her Declaration ſhe publiſhed this as the Reaſon of her ſending Forces to the Aid of the Netherlanders, That they might peaceably enjoy their ancient Freedom.

Alberic. Gent. de Jure Bel. l. 1. c. 16.

In the latter end of the Reign of King James I. the War broke out in Germany, wherein the Emperor uſed his utmoſt endeavour to eſtabliſh abſolute Power and Popery together. There was occaſion offered to try whether the giving Aſſiſtance againſt theſe were againſt the Principles and Doctrines of the Church of England. For the Prince Elector Palatine was choſen King of Bohemia, and ſent over for King James's Advice about it: But his Deſigns lay then ſo much another way, that he had no mind he ſhould engage in it: But the Archbiſhop of Canterbury in his Letter to Sir R. Naunton, then Secretary of State, ſaith, That God had ſet up this Prince his Maſters Son in Law, as a Mark of Honour throughout all Chriſtendom, to propagate the Goſpel and to protect the Oppreſſed; that for his own part he dares not but give Advice to follow where God leads, apprehending the Work of God in this and that of Hungary; that he was ſatisfied in Conſcience that the Bohemians had a juſt Cauſe; that the King's Daughter, the Elector's Lady, had profeſſed, ſhe would not leave her ſelf one Jewel, rather than not maintain ſo Religious and ſo Righteous a Cauſe.

In the beginning of the Reign of King Charles the Firſt, when I ſuppoſe it will be granted, That the Doctrines and Principles of the Church of England were underſtood and followed; the King of Denmark had taken up Arms, to ſettle the Peace and Liberty of Germany, as he declared: But he met with a great Defeat. Whereupon King Charles the Firſt thought himſelf concerned to give Aſſiſtance to him: And Archbiſhop Laud was then employed (as Dr. Heylin confeſſeth) by the King's Command to draw up a Declaration, to be publiſhed in all the Pariſhes of England; which was read by the King, and approved by the Council, wherein the Greatneſs of the Danger they were in is ſet forth, and the People are exhorted to ſerve God and the King, and to labour by their Prayers to divert the Danger. Wherein lay this Danger? It is there ſaid to be, That by the Defeat of the King of Denmark, there was little or nothing left to hinder the Houſe of Auſtria from being Lord and Maſter of Germany. And what then? Why then there will be an open way for Spain to do what they pleaſed in all the Weſt part of Chriſtendom. It ſeems then, it was not thought diſagreeable to the Principles and Doctrines of our Church, to hinder the growth of a Weſtern Monarchy, altho' it be by aſſiſting Subjects againſt their Princes who promote it: And then follow theſe remarkable Words.

“You are to know therefore, that to prevent this is the preſent Care of the King and State; and there is no probable way left, but by ſending of Forces, and other Supplies, to the ſaid King of Denmark, to enable him to keep the Field, that our Enemies be not Maſters of all on a ſudden. And not long after—“If he be not preſently relieved, the Cauſe of Religion is not only like to ſuffer by it in ſome one part, (as it hath already in a fearful manner in the Palatinate) but in all places where it hath got any footing. So that if we ſupply not preſently our Allies and Confederates in this caſe, it is like to prove the Extirpation of true Religion, and the Replanting of Romiſh Superſtition in the Neighbouring parts of Chriſtendom. And the Coldneſs of the State ſhall ſuffer in all places, as the Betrayers of that Religion elſewhere, which it profeſſeth and honoureth at home; which will be an Imputation never to be waſhed off: And God forbid this State ſhould ſuffer under it.— And in the laſt place; You are to call upon God your ſelves, and to incite the People to joyn with you in humble and hearty Prayers unto God, That he will be pleaſed now, after long Affliction of his dear People and Children to look in mercy both upon them and us; and in particular for the Safety of the King of Denmark, and that Army which is left him, That God would bleſs and proſper him againſt his and our Enemies. Thus far Archbiſhop Laud.

Let thoſe who now with as much Ignorance as Confidence, upbraid Men with Renouncing the Doctrines and Principles of the Church of England, read and conſider theſe Paſſages; and if any thing will make them more wiſe and humble, this will. Did Archbiſhop Laud go off from the Church of England, or King Charles the Firſt, who both ſuffered for the ſake of it? But ſome Men have never throughly penetrated into the Doctrines and Principles of our Church, but look only on ſome Principles in oppoſition to the late Times of Rebellion, and think there is nothing farther to be looked after. Whereas the Conſideration is very different as to our Duties, with reſpect to our own Princes, and thoſe of a more general Concernment as to the ſtate of Religion and Government in the World. But from hence it is plain, that it was then thought not only Lawful, but a Duty, to prevent the dangerous growth of ſuch a Monarchy, which deſigns to ſuppreſs Religion and Civil Liberties; and not only to give Aſſiſtance to thoſe who joyn in the ſame Deſign, but to pray God to bleſs and proſper it. And accordingly a Form of Prayer was then appointed for thoſe Dangerous Times.

Not long after this a Breach with France happened, and the King publiſhed a Declaration of the ground of the War; wherein it is laid down as the firſt Ground, “That the Houſe of Auſtria conſpiring the Ruin of all thoſe of the Reformed Religion (as plainly appeared in the Affairs of Germany) had ſuch an Influence on the Councils of France, as to make them break Promiſe in ſuch a manner, as hazarded the loſs of the whole Party in Germany. The next is, “That he had broke his Articles with his Proteſtant Subjects, when he had been a Mediator of Peace between " them, and they had done nothing to violate them. So that a Deſign to ſuppreſs the Proteſtant Religion, in a Neighbour-Country, was looked on as a juſt Cauſe of War, when he was concerned to preſerve it. And then another Form of Prayer was appointed to be uſed ſuitable to that Occaſion; which plainly evidence, That ſuch a Deſign was no-ways thought repugnant to the Doctrines and Principles of the Church of England.

But ſince the French Conduct ſeems to be now admired by this ſort of Men, I ſhall bring ſome remarkable Inſtances from them.

Motifs de la France pour la guerre d' Alemagne, 94, 95, 117.

It is Notorious to the World what Powerful Aſſiſtance the French gave to the Confederate Princes of Germany, againſt the Emperour, their Lawful Prince, and what Defence they made for this. They Publiſhed an Account to the World of the Reaſons of it, and the Chief was this; viz. " That they had Reaſon to ſuſpect, that from Charles the Fifth's Time " the difference of Religions had been ſecretly ſupported by the Emperours, " in order to their making themſelves Abſolute; and that the Changing " the Form of Government in the Empire, was ſufficient for a Neighbour " Prince to interpoſe by force of Arms.

In the Revolt of Catalonia from the King of Spain, their Lawful Prince, the French King accepted of the Sovereignty over them, being offered him by the States of that Country, and cauſed Diſcourſes to be written in juſtification of their Transferring their Allegiance: And yet their Complaint was nothing but the Severity of the Spaniſh Government, and a deſire of ſome greater Liberties than they enjoyed under it. Why then ſhould it be now thought an Unjuſt thing, for a Sovereign Prince (ſo nearly related to the Crown of England) to eſpouſe the Cauſe of our Religions and Civil Intereſts, when the Deſign was ſo apparent for the Suppreſſing them? If that Opportunity had been loſt, they might before this time have been paſt all reaſonable hopes of Recovery.

II. But ſuppoſe this were allowed; yet here is another Difficulty ariſeth, concerning the transferring Allegiance from a Lawful Prince, to him that met with unexpected Succeſs in his Deſign.

And here I ſhall endeavour to make it plain, That this is not againſt the Doctrines and Principles of the Church of England. If we allow the Church of England, to have declared its Senſe in the Matter of Government, it can only be with reſpect to Subjects. But I think the Meaſures of our Obedience, are not to be taken from the Rules of the Church; but from the Laws of the Realm: Becauſe they are not the ſame in all Countries where the ſame Religion is Profeſſed; as is plain in the Caſe of France and Poland: The Reaſon of the different Meaſures in theſe Countries is not from the Church, but from the different Conſtitution of the Kingdoms.

And I do not ſee how the Rules of the Church can alter the Fundamental Laws: For the Church only enforceth the Duty of Obedience on the Conſciences of Men; but it doth not preſcribe or limit the Bounds of it.

Whether our Monarchy be Abſolute, or Limited; or if Limited, whether in its Exerciſe of Power, or in the Right of Sovereignty; how far the Limitation gives a Right of Reſiſtance, in caſe of the Breach of it, are nice Queſtions, but not to be reſolved by the Rules of the Church, but by our Legal Conſtitution and the General Reaſon of Mankind: And therefore in ſuch Caſes, where the Right of War and a Foreign Power are concerned, we are not to judge meerly by Municipal Laws; but we are to proceed by a more General Law, viz. that of Nations, which takes in the Effects of a juſt War, which the particular Laws of a Country have no regard to.

But where hath the Church of England declared its ſenſe about the Right of War? The Articles of our Church declare, that the chief Government of all Eſtates of this Realm, doth appertain to the Civil Magiſtrate: But they no where ſay, that in a juſt War the Supream Power cannot be acquired; or that God doth never confer it in an extraordinary method.

The Book of Homilies is very ſevere againſt Diſobedience and wilful Rebellion; but it is no where ſaid, that where the Right of Sovereignty is transferred by a ſucceſsful War, there is no Allegiance due to thoſe who poſſeſs it: “ On the contrary it is ſaid in the firſt Part, That if God for “ their wickedneſs had given them an Heathen Tyrant to Reign over “ them, they were by God's Word bound to obey him, and to pray for “ him. Can it then be agreeable to the Doctrines and Principles of our Church, to refuſe Allegiance to good Religious Princes, whom God hath made the happy Inſtruments of preſerving our Religion and Liberties?

In the ſame Part, the Jews are commended for praying for the King of Babylon, when they were in Captivity, that they might live under his Protection, and do him Service, and find Favour in his ſight. And what is this ſhort of Allegiance to one, who had nothing but bare Succeſs in War, to plead for his Title to it? If any Princes of their own Religion had reſcued them from that Captivity, would they have ſcrupled Allegiance to them, when we ſee how far the Maccabees went in the Defence of their Religion and Laws?

In the Second Part, the obedience of the Jewiſh Nation to Auguſtus is commended; and it is evident that he had no Authority over them, but by the Right of War. And our Bleſſed Saviour's example is mentioned, who being brought before the Roman Preſident, acknowledged his Power and Authority to be given him from God. And how was this Authority conveyed to him, but by the ſucceſs of War?

So that we can find nothing, in the certain eſtabliſhed Doctrine and Principles of our Church, which is repugnant to our Allegiance to the preſent Government. I might eaſily produce conſiderable Teſtimonies of ſome of the greateſt Divines of our Church, which aſſert, that Sovereignty may be transferred by a juſt War; but I leave that to others, and proceed.

Mr. Aſhton ſaith, That we were born leige Subjects to another; that we have ſolemnly profeſſed our Allegiance, and often confirmed it with Oaths. I know no body denies it. But is this all? Is our Allegiance ſo inſeparable from the Perſon we have once ſworn to, that no Caſe whatſoever, can alter it? Not the Caſe of plain voluntary Dereliction? Not the Caſe of putting the Kingdom under a Foreign Power? Not the ſeeking the utter Ruin and Deſtruction of the People? Is Allegiance inſeparable in theſe Caſes, becauſe we were Born Subjects and did ſwear Allegiance? If not, then it is not always ſo, notwithſtanding the Oaths. For theſe and ſeveral others are allowed, by ſuch who have written the moſt warmly againſt the Republican Principles. But we need not run to any difficult Caſes: Ours is only the caſe of a juſt War; which is allowed by all ſorts of Caſuiſts, who do agree, that Allegiance is due to the Party that prevails in it; and if it be due to one, it cannot be due to another, at the ſame time; altho' he be living and do not diſcharge Perſons from their Oaths; for the obligation of Oaths, depends on the Nature and Reaſon of things, and not upon the Pleaſure of thoſe to whom they are made. But where there is a Right to govern, there muſt be a Duty of Allegiance: And that Succeſs in a juſt war, doth give ſuch a Right, I could produce ſo many Teſtimonies, of all kinds of Writers, as would make the Reading of them as tedious as of thoſe in the Hiſtory of Paſſive Obedience. Nay, ſome go ſo far, as to aſſert a Right of Sovereignty to be acquired by ſucceſs, even in an Unjuſt War: But we need none of theſe Teſtimonies.

But doth not all this reſolve this whole Controverſy into a Right of Conqueſt, which is not ſo much as pretended in our preſent Caſe?

I Anſwer, That we muſt diſtinguiſh between a Right to the Government, and the Manner of Aſſuming it. The Right was founded on the Juſt Cauſes of the War, and the ſucceſs in it: But the aſſuming of it was not by any ways of force or violence, but by a Free Conſent of the People, who by a voluntary Recognition, and their Majeſties acceptance of the Government, as it is ſettled by our Laws, take away any pretence to a Conqueſt over the People, or a Government by Force.

Thus I have endeavoured to ſet this matter in as clear a light, and in as little a compaſs as I could; I now return to Mr. Aſhton's Speech.

Next to his Obligation on the Point of Religion, he mentions that of Gratitude to the King his Maſter, whom he had ſerved 16 years,—But this, he adds, is a thing not much eſteemed at this time. As little as it is eſteemed, I know no body would have blamed his Gratitude, if it had not carried him beyond the bounds of his Duty. But it is ſtrange, he ſhould be ſo much for Gratitude, and yet ſhould allow none for ſo great a Deliverance. What is 16 years ſervice to the Preſervation of a Nation from the imminent danger of Popery and Arbitrary Power? Such men look but a very little way, who talk at this rate: And can they imagine a French Power, under our Circumſtances, could ſecure any thing to us but Ruin?

As to his Maſter's uſage, which he ſaith, after the Prince of Orange*'s Arrival, was very hard, ſevere; and, if he may ſay it, unjuſt.* I would deſire his Friends to conſider a little better, and to think, if any ſuch thing as Severity had been intended, how eaſy it had been to have Executed it, and to have prevented his going away; and conſequently, a great deal of the charge of the War he complains of immediately after. Let them name any one Perſon in ſuch Circumſtances, who was allowed ſo great freedom as he had, of diſpoſing of himſelf: But this is very far from Mr. Aſhton's occaſion of Suffering.

Well, But all the new Methods of Settling, have hitherto, he ſaith, made the Nation more miſerable, poor, and expoſed to Foreign Enemies. It is poſſible ſuch may believe, that the Nation would be leſs miſerable and poor under the French Power, than it is now. But no man who obſerves the vaſt deſigns of France, and the incredible induſtry of the French Monarch, to inlarge his own Power and Dominions, can think (if he thinks twice) that ever he ſhould undertake ſo great a Work, out of kindneſs to any but himſelf; much leſs, out of perfect good will to the Engliſh Nation. Hath he given ſo much evidence to the World of his Sincerity in his Promiſes, when the keeping of them hath been prejudicial to his Intereſt? Suppoſe he ſhould compaſs his end upon us, and under ſo fair a Colour, make Provinces of theſe Kingdoms; what poſſible remedy would there be for this, then indeed, poor and miſerable Nation? What comfort will it then be to ſay, they did not think he would have broken his word ſo with them? In the mean time, Is it not great Wiſdom and Policy, to venture our Religion, and all our Liberties on the ſincerity and kindneſs of France? But if there be any preſent hardſhip, it is no more than a neceſſary War involves our Neighbours in as well as our ſelves; and that in a common Cauſe, for preſerving the Liberty of Europe, againſt the growing Power of France, as it did formerly of Spain.

But there is another Inſinuation of a higher nature, viz. that the Religion we pretend to be ſo fond of preſerving, is now much more than ever, likely to be deſtroyed. What is the meaning of this? What! More in danger than when Penal Laws and Teſts were taking away in order to the taking away our Religion after them? When the deſign was as plain and open as a thing of that nature could be, in ſuch a Nation? When ſome of the Factors themſelves complained, they made too much haſte, and were too eager and forward to accompliſh it. And altho' nothing was then pretended but the ſettling Liberty of Conſcience upon a new Magna Charta, yet all wiſe Men ſaw through theſe pretences, and that nothing was really deſigned but Popery; which the Jeſuits did not conceal in their Letters to each other: One of the which hapned to be intercepted; and the thing it ſelf, is now fully owned in the Kings own Letter to the Pope, printed at the end of the late Trials. So that there muſt be a deſign, either to deceive the Pope, or the Nation; and which is the more probable, let any man of ſenſe judge.

But where lies the danger of our Religion now? Have we not the ſame Laws, the ſame Protection, the ſame Encouragement, which we ever had, at any time ſince the Reformation? If our Religion be now in danger, it is by ſuch men who would bring in the French Power to eſtabliſh it; however it be diſguiſed under another Pretext.

After this follows a Charge of no leſs than Perjury and Rebellion upon his Fellow Subjects; whom, he adviſeth to return to their Allegiance, before the Judgments of God overtake them, for their Perjury and Rebellion. This is a heavy Charge indeed, upon the Body of the Nation, which hath taken the Oaths of Allegiance to their Majeſties: But if it be true, it is accuſing the greateſt part of Mankind of theſe Sins, who have hapned to live in the time of any great Revolutions, or changes of Government. Was the Nation Forſworn in the times of William the Conqueror, and his two Sons, and his Nephew? Was it Forſworn all the time of King John, and the ſeveral Reigns of the 4th, 5th, 6th and 7th Henries? One would think it better became a dying man to judge more charitably of his Fellow Subjects. Had he never heard of the Law of England, requiring Allegiance to the King, on account of the Poſſeſſion of the Crown; and that our moſt eminent Lawyers, in peaceable and quiet Times, have been of that Opinion? Methinks at leaſt, that ſhould make modeſt men not ſo peremptory in ſuch a Charge; for it is to make ſuch an Oath unlawful, which the Law makes not only lawful, but a Duty. And when the greateſt Lawyers this Nation hath had thought this a part of our Law; ſhall ſuch who confeſs themſelves unskilful in the Law, charge the Nation with Perjury, for taking an Oath, which the Law requires?

But if our Law did not require it, there is ſuch a general conſent in Mankind about it, that it ſeems to me, to be a Law of Nations, That an Oath of Fidelity ſhould follow Poſſeſſion; becauſe otherwiſe, there would be infinite ſnares to the Conſciences of all ſuch who are required to obey, but are not bound to enquire into the Rights of War.

Is it Perjury and Rebellion in the new French Conqueſts, for the Inhabitants to take Oaths of Fidelity to the French King? If not, how comes it to be ſo here? Is there not the ſame Right of War here as abroad?

Was it Perjury and Rebellion in the Subjects of the King of Spain in Portugal, to take a new Oath of Allegiance to the Duke of Braganza, when he was declar'd King? And yet they were all ſworn before, not only to the King of Spain, but to his Heirs: And even the Duke himſelf had not only taken this Oath, but the Spaniard particularly charged him with Perjury, and great Ingratitude: Yet the Obligation to his Countries good was then thought to over-rule that Perſonal Obligation to the King of Spain.

But if they were all guilty of Perjury and Rebellion; how came the other Princes of Europe ſo frankly and readily to own his Government; and the French, as much and as early as any, ſending Aſſiſtance by Sea and Land to ſupport it? But in this Revolution of Portugal, the beſt Title was the Succeſs of War, founded on a remote Title to the Crown, when the King of Spain had enjoyed the Poſſeſſion of that Crown to the Third Generation.

But it may be ſaid, That the Practices of other People are to be no Rule to us; and that we are not to be guided by bad Precedents abroad, but by the Principles and Doctrines of our own Church. This were to the purpoſe, if our Church had any where declared taking ſuch an Oath to be Perjury. But where is that done? I confeſs, I can find no ſuch thing: And if Mr. Aſhton (or his Friends) had made ſuch a Diſcovery, they ought to have told the World of it. But if there be no ſuch Declaration to be met with, then we are left to the general Rules of Conſcience, and the common Reaſon of Mankind; according to which, I ſee no ground for this heavy Charge of Perjury and Rebellion in our preſent Caſe.

But although Mr. Aſhton be ſo abundantly ſatisfied in the Deſign he mentions, that if he had ten thouſand Lives, he would ſacrifice them all in ſo good and neceſſary a Work; yet the Remainder of his Speech is ſpent in clearing his Innocency, as to the Fact for which he was Condemned. If it was ſo Meritorious an Act to die in ſuch a Cauſe, a Man might have been tempted to be thought Guilty.

But before he could think fit to die in Charity with all the World, he ſaith ſeveral things with a deſign to blacken the Judges, the Jury, and the Government.

The Judges he accuſes of a Severe Charge, and the Hard Meaſure he received.——

As to the latter, it is a very odd kind of Hard Meaſure, when he was ſo very little ſenſible of it then, that he ſaid, He did not complain of the Court, fol. 112. and more fully afterwards, fol. 115. I cannot but own I have had a fair Trial for my Life. Where was the Hard Meaſure then? Therefore this could not be Mr. Aſhton's Senſe, unleſs he would contradict himſelf; and thoſe who would free him from it, muſt take theſe Words to have been written by others, who thought to ſerve another End by it; and were not ſo near giving an Account for ſuch Calumnies.

The ſeverity of the Charge lay in applying the Statute 25 Ed. 3. to his Fact. Which was a Deſign to carry into France a Treaſonable Scheme and Project of an Invaſion, in order to the depoſing the King and Queen. This laſt the Judges declared, had been always held to be High Treaſon. All the Queſtion was then, Whether ſuch a Fact were an Overt-Act of ſuch a Deſign; and ſo it was left to the Jury, whether Mr. Aſhton intended to go over with ſuch a Deſign or not. If there be any Severity here, it muſt be in the Law; and that all thoſe who ſuffer by a Law, are apt to complain of.

He particularly chargeth that Judge, and that Juryman, who did, he ſaith, ſignally, contrary to common Juſtice, expoſe themſelves to deſtroy him. This is a very hard Charge from a Dying-man, and ought to have great Evidence to reconcile it to common Charity; but he offers none. The Jury were to act according to their Conſciences; and if they did ſo, how could they expoſe themſelves contrary to common Juſtice to deſtroy him? But what Evidence doth he give, that they did not ſo? Some have told him, that he was the firſt man that was ever Condemned for High Treaſon upon bare Suſpicion or Preſumption, and that contrary to my Lord Cook and other Eminent Lawyers Opinions.

The main point as to the Jury, was, Whether they were ſatisfied in their Conſciences, that Mr. Aſhton intended to go into France with ſuch a Deſign? And where the Fact lies in the Intention there can be no direct Evidence (without ſeeing the Heart;) but it muſt be gathered from a Concurrence of Circumſtances, ſtrong enough to determine an honeſt man's Judgment: And ſuch the Jury believed to be in his Caſe. My Lord Cook's words are on the Caſe of Treaſon, That the Compaſſing, Intent or Imagination, tho' ſecret, is to be tried by the Peers, and to be diſcovered by Circumſtances precedent, concomitant and ſubſequent, with all endeavour evermore for the ſafety of the King.

It is true, he ſaith afterwards, Fol. 12. That conjectural Preſumptions, or Inferences, or ſtrains of Wit, are not ſufficient, but there muſt be good and manifeſt Proof; but ſtill this Proof muſt be ſuch as the thing will bear; for there can be no direct and plain proof of a ſecret Intention: Either therefore no man can be juſtly condemned for a ſecret Intention, manifeſted by an Overt-Act, or there muſt be ſuch a Proof allowed, as is ſufficient to ſatisfie a man's Conſcience, although it come not up to plain and direct Evidence, as it is oppoſed to the higheſt degree of Preſumption.

But it may be ſaid, that the Preſumption lies in judging the Intention from the Overt-Act, but that Overt-Act muſt be manifeſtly proved. The Overt-Act in this caſe was the carrying over Treaſonable Papers into France, in order to an Invaſion. The ſole Queſtion then was, Whether there was manifeſt proof as to theſe Papers. That the Papers were found about him was manifeſtly proved; and he owns, Fol. 110. that they were unfortunately found upon him; but he ſaith that he knew not the Importance of them. It was manifeſtly proved, that he had an extraordinary Concernment to have theſe Papers thrown Over-board; which he ſaith was perfectly out of Friendſhip, and whether that was a true Anſwer, was left to the Conſciences of the Jury, who were to judge of this by all the Circumſtances antecedent, concomitant and ſubſequent, by which they did conclude him Guilty. And I cannot ſee how they went againſt Common Juſtice therein; eſpecially ſince Mr. Aſhton well knew, that one of the moſt material Papers taken, was of his own Hand-writing; not the firſt Draught, but the Copy which was ſhew'd him in the Court; and when it was ſo, he deſired, *Fol.*106. that the Original may be read, and not the Copy; and he had good reaſon for it: For as far as I can judge, upon peruſal of both, it is the very ſame Hand in which this Speech was written. But what ſaid Mr. Aſhton to the Jury, to clear this matter? He ſaith, Fol. 129. That his Hand was not proved to any of the Papers, and therefore there was nothing but Suppoſition or Suſpicion againſt him. It is true, there was no direct and plain proof of the Hand, as there was in the Caſe of my Lord Preſton; (and it is a wonder it was omitted, for that would have been plain proof of his knowing what was in thoſe Papers:) However, all the other Circumſtances put together, were a ſufficient proof of his Privity to the Contents of them.

And I wonder how Mr. Aſhton could ſo confidently in his Paper declare himſelf Innocent, as to the matter for which he was Sentenced to Die, when he knew the Paper was of his own Hand-writing, and plain proof hath been ſince made of his own delivery of it to a third Perſon. Can a Man be Innocent and Guilty of the ſame thing?

The only thing to be taken notice of, which remains, is, a Reflection on the Government for his Cloſe Impriſonment, and the haſty and violent Proceedings againſt him. If there were any thing more than uſual in ſuch Caſes, as to his Impriſonment, he ought to have mentioned the particulars; for otherwiſe it is to Arraign the Common Juſtice of the Nation. As to the haſty and violent Proceedings of his Trial; it was then told him, That the greateſt Advantage he had, was in putting off his Trial: For by that he knew how to lay the Papers on my Lord Preſton; which yet could not clear him, as to thoſe Papers which were not written with my Lord's Hand, nor related any ways to him; but one of them was written with his own Hand.

Upon the whole matter, I cannot ſee how he hath either proved his Innocency, or that he acted according to the Principles and Doctrines of the Church of England.

As to his Concluding Prayer, I cannot but obſerve, That in the Beginning of the Speech, the Reaſon he gives why he would not make any to the People, was, becauſe he would employ his laſt Minutes in Devotion and holy Communion with God: Which I hope he did. But thoſe who contrived the Speech, were to make a Prayer for him too; but not a Prayer of Devotion, but rather of Faction and Sedition: For it hath no other meaning, than that God would overturn this Preſent Government, and reſtore the Former, in order to the Flouriſhing of the Church of England; notwithſtanding the Wounds ſhe hath received from her Prevaricating Sons.

I cannot imagine how a Man could joyn theſe things together in a Prayer, unleſs he could think all thoſe are Prevaricating Sons, who are againſt Popery. For I know no Bottom large enough for Popery, and the Church of England, to ſtand upon together.

But this I do not think of Mr. Aſhton, and therefore conclude, as I began, That this ſeems rather the Speech of a Party, than of Mr. Aſhton; who made uſe of his Name and Hand, to convey into the Minds of the People, the moſt malicious Inſinuations againſt this Preſent Government, and all who live in Obedience to it.
